Here in London the financial world is again opposed to the Labor Chancellor of the Exchequer. A number of Germans in key positions have told me of their being strongly urged by British financiers to help in bringing about a moratorium by Germany. The London "City" wants the Germans to start the ball rolling by refusing further payments. The British financiers are united in their belief that this question of reparations and debts is at the bottom of the world crisis. They do not by any means believe that this is the only thing that is wrong with the financial world. Like the German financiers and statesmen with whom I have talked, they understand that there are numerous other causes at work. But they do firmly believe in the enormous psychological effect of a joint cancelation of debts, as well as the economic advantages. They are quite clear in their own minds that even the passage of German money through London to New York has its deleterious effect, and they want the whole problem tackled, and tackled quickly. I believe that they would unanimously stand behind the British Prime Minister if he should decide to call the conference herein suggested. More than that, important English organizations like the Quakers and the League of Nations Union are interesting themselves in this question. A committee of the Friends has been for some time past writing to the United States to let it be known among the Quakers there that the present situation is not to be trifled with, and that America should take the lead.

For one, I should not be afraid that any such conference as is here suggested could meet and adjourn without really accomplishing anything. It would be well worth while even if it merely discussed the question of the unhappy burden put upon Germany by the rise in the price of gold, which increases her debts between 10 and 30 per cent because of the dropping out, in the Young Plan, of the gold clause contained in the Dawes Plan. Should this injustice be done away with, Chancellor Brüning's position would be enormously strengthened. Such a conference would naturally first discuss economic questions, but it could not get very far in the consideration of these matters without touching upon the issues of war and peace in Europe. Europe cannot have that feeling of security necessary to a sound economic life until certain dangerous political symptoms are done away with. It is not surprising that European statesmen are as reluctant to tackle these problems as most American politicians are slow to study with open mind the question of the debt settlements. But here, too, the simple fact is that Europe cannot go on under these conditions and survive. It is not surprising that a Frenchman, Count Vladimir d'Ormesson, has just declared, in making his suggestion that half of Germany's debts be remitted, that the next two years will "decide the fate of Europe." It is a daily occurrence to meet men who see an entirely communized Europe within ten years if something is not done.

If this is so, then, obviously, everything ought to be tried, to prevent a catastrophe. Is it really true that Europe would be worse off if such a conference were called and came away without any concrete achievement? I do not think so. It should not meet with a definite program to be accomplished, but if, after meeting, its members went away unable to achieve anything in the face of the threat of oncoming disaster, then we should at any rate have gained the knowledge that European governments are once more bankrupt in statesmanship, that the men who now hold office are incompetent to govern in this emergency, and that the capitalist system is deservedly nearing its end.

Why Mothers Die

By MARY SUMNER BOYD

BY the failure of the Congress just ended to pass the Jones bill (S. 255), which would have revived the work for maternity and infancy discontinued by the Children's Bureau in 1929, the attention of the public is directed toward the large, unnecessary, and possibly increasing—certainly not in any year since 1900 decreasing—loss of mothers in childbirth. Though Dr. Livingston Farrand has called our annual loss of nearly 20,000 mothers an "outstanding American disgrace," the sacrifice of mothers is not a peculiarly American phenomenon. It is a world condition. The rate of the Near and Far East we cannot know, but it must be far above that of countries of European civilization. Among the latter, with the exception of the three in the Scandinavian group, there is none which loses less than 30 and few lose less than 40 mothers in 10,000 live births. This loss is from 50 to 85 per cent preventable. Among these countries, so far as we can compare international statistics, the United States appears to stand with Chile at the very head (or foot) of the list, with a mortality in 1929 of 70 in 10,000 live births, a rate which our own obstetricians tell us is 85 or even 90 per cent unnecessary.

The exact reason that the United States has this undesirable supremacy nobody knows, though we can conjecture some of the elements that enter into it. Our mixed blood and our foreign-born population have been suggested in explanation, but mixed blood has never been a physical detriment and the foreign-born have brought with them quite as good methods of maternity care as we ourselves offer. A truer guess based on race would be the effect of the Negro, for this frail and neglected race has throughout the Union a very much higher maternal mortality than the whites. Undoubtedly our vast distances, which often mean remoteness from any but ignorant neighbor help in such States as Montana (with a rate of 84 in 1929), increase the losses in those States and through them raise the national rate. But greatest of all factors, and this is not conjecture, is the effect of the native-born midwife, American mountain white, Mexican, and Negro, on the losses in all our Southern States.

The foreign midwife, with her long years of training, her many hundred student cases, her constant supervision by health authorities, and her contact with obstetrical specialists in case of emergencies, is one of the bright spots in foreign maternity care. She is responsible for the low rates of the Scandinavian countries and the figures, low in the 30's, of Finland, Italy, and Japan. But it is quite otherwise with our ignorant and benighted native product.

South Carolina in 1929 headed our list with 114 mothers dead in 10,000 live births. Louisiana and Alabama both had rates of 99, Florida and Georgia followed close behind, and the rest of the Southern States were all higher, most of them very much higher, than the average rate for the nation. Such figures as these must raise the average, especially as we have no very low figures to offset them. The rate for England—of which that country is deeply ashamed—was 44 in 1928, yet our proudest boast is Minnesota with 43, and we have only one other State in the 40's and only eleven of the forty-eight under 60. Until very recently the inadequacy of laws on matters touching maternity care and the laxness of public-health authorities in enforcing them have undoubtedly been elements of weakness in all States. Another element of weakness has been the neglect by health authorities of the immigrant, foreign-trained midwife whose standards and practice in her native country had been maintained by official public-health supervision. Possibly these facts are enough to explain why we stand in such a glaring and unenviable light, especially as we must add to them a general intensification, characteristic of our large-scale way of doing things, of those causes of maternal mortality which we share with all countries of like civilization.

The specific injuries recorded on death certificates of women who die in childbirth are the same and in the same order all over the world. First stands septicemia or puerperal fever, which in this country is responsible for about 40 per cent of the deaths; second, albuminuria with eclampsia, about 23 per cent; and, third, "other causes," a blanket group of emergencies, abnormalities, operative procedures, and the like, about 37 per cent. Only by a knowledge of the historical setting of maternity care can we understand why these injuries and diseases have been allowed to cause destruction on so large a scale, for our twentieth-century mortality is not an outgrowth, as some would have us believe, of modern conditions; it is a survival of an even larger death-rate which goes back to the time man first stood upright. For our purposes, as spiritual descendants of the Hebrews, our maternal mortality has a history which begins with the Book of Genesis, when it was made a matter of religious scruple to neglect the mother in childbed, since this was her deserved punishment. The Curse of Eve exercised the greatest influence on the Jewish mind, so great an influence that the men who wrote the Old Testament used it as the supreme curse, the type of suffering they would like to see inflicted on all the enemies of Jehovah. They made it a religious duty not to mitigate it in the case of woman, the original accursed one. This vengeful psychology we inherited, and even in our own day the curse of Eve has affected all maternity care. The last time it openly figured in medical literature under that title was in the middle of the last century, in opposition to the development of an obstetrical science which concerned itself with normal birth. Through certain religious influences, especially in remote or congested localities, where most mothers are confined, it still handicaps the physician at every turn.

In medicine itself its more gently entitled and more reasonable-sounding offspring has taken its place; this is the hypnotic slogan, repeated by the smiling family physician in the face of appalling figures of death and injury, that childbirth is merely a "physiological function" and nothing to worry about. It is safe to say that no obstetrical specialist any longer believes this; all know its dangers and are bitter in their denunciation of a practice based on it. Nevertheless, through the village doctor and the non-medical public, it is the principle on which is based the general practice of maternity care throughout the world. It is this attitude of mind which makes the public demand cheapness in the lying-in and which makes the care that is afforded cheap in every bad sense of the word.

We have our own native midwives as our distinctive illustration of this attitude, but the whole civilized world shares with us the example of the family doctor—a still greater problem because of the number of cases he handles—who builds his practice around his obstetrical cases and who learns his obstetrics on the bodies of his patients. In the United States in 1928, 112,000 general practitioners attended more than half—far more, probably two-thirds—of the two and a quarter million mothers who were confined. With what results? The death-rates of some of those States where there were no midwives to take the blame suggests the answer. In a year when the national rate was 64, the rate of four States with no midwives was 75, as against the relatively low rate of 59 for four States where foreign-trained midwives were in practice. Further evidence against the village doctor can be grouped around the two greatest single causes of death, septicemia and albuminuria, for which he has as great a responsibility, when we take the whole country into account, as has the ignorant and dirty midwife of the South. Her excuse is that she does not know, but he has no excuse, for throughout two generations all medicine has known that puerperal fever is a contagious disease whose spread can be prevented, and the methods of preventing albuminuria have been known for fifty years.

Yet the doctor described by Oliver Wendell Holmes, whose puerperal-fever cases "follow his footsteps with the keenness of a beagle through the streets and lanes of a crowded city," we have with us still. He is described by the late Dr. George C. Mosher as the physician "who comes from erysipelis or some other virulent infectious disease and does not even change his clothes or put on gloves to deliver the clean obstetric patient." Precautions he would automatically use for what surgery comes to him are not deemed necessary for the purely physiological function of birth. Yet septicemia is very largely preventable; handled with the same antiseptic precautions as surgery, it need never spread beyond the case of its origin.

A like responsibility lies on the family doctor for the prevalence of albuminuria. It too is almost 90 per cent preventable, and the means of prevention is prenatal care. In the intensive studies of maternal mortality in fifteen States now being carried on by the Children's Bureau and State medical societies the great majority of the women had received no supervision or utterly inadequate supervision during pregnancy. Prenatal care means visits to the doctor, and visits to the doctor cost money. Besides, pregnancy is a natural function and the doctor pays very little attention to it; truth to say he knows very little about it.

The doctor bears the blame for this, but the real responsibility does not lie with the individual. It rests on organized medicine for the neglect of the science of obstetrics, both in general and in particular, in the medical schools. Everywhere in the world obstetrics is "the blank page in the curriculum." Surgery and medicine absorb the teaching and clinical hours; obstetrics and the professor of obstetrics are despised and given the leavings. Though this is international, America leads the world; in foreign schools the teaching hours are approximately two of surgery for one of obstetrics, but with us the relation is four and a half to one. Yet the proportions of the use of his training made by the family doctor in his practice are 50 per cent medicine, 35 per cent obstetrics—including always the possibility of desperate emergencies—and 15 per cent (minor) surgery. A concrete picture of the inadequacy of obstetrical preparation is given by the Council of Medical Education of the American Medical Association. In its summing up at the end of 1929 the council reported that of 1,491 internes in approved teaching hospitals, 334 graduated without having delivered any women and 235 had not even observed deliveries; more than 200 had attended less than ten deliveries and only 70 had attended fifty or more. This is a startling contrast to the foreign-trained midwife with her minimum of 100 deliveries before graduation. Small wonder that the general practitioner does not think that obstetrics matters. His habit of mind has been formed in the medical school, where it is despised, derided, and neglected, and this habit of mind is fixed early in practice by the indifferent attitude of his patients and by their low estimate of the value of the mother's lying-in.

Most practitioners take their maternity cases with others as they fall in the day's work, but a few gradually set up without additional training as specialists in "baby cases." Most of these men carry with them to their work the same light-hearted standards of obstetrical practice, and in new and equally fatal ways they learn upon the bodies of their patients. They send them often to open hospitals where there is no segregation of maternity patients, few antiseptic precautions of other sorts, and no obstetrical supervision. Here, on the principle that in obstetrics one man is as good as another, they essay to carry out delicate operative procedures that require the specialist. This is largely what has given us the high rate of deaths under "other causes" and it has had no small part in deaths from septicemia. It has also given an unenviable reputation for mothers' deaths to the smaller cities of such States as New York, where open hospitals abound, unsupervised as to maternity cases.

Granted that the bad type of midwife and the ill-trained physician share the larger responsibility, there remains to be considered the obstetrician's own share, for there is a case against him in every country. There are in the United States about 8,000 obstetrical specialists, "80 per cent of them east of the Mississippi and north of the Ohio." They too have been handicapped and the development of their science has been very seriously retarded by the traditional social attitude toward maternity. From 1840 to 1850 there was what promised to be an epoch-making development toward normalizing childbirth—toward, with the aid of science, really making it a "physiological function." The great names in this movement are J. Marion Sims of Alabama, founder of gynecology; James P. White of Buffalo, who—boldest of them all and almost ruined for his pioneering—held the first obstetrical clinic; Holmes and Semmelweis, who proved the contagiousness of puerperal fever; and James Young Simpson of Edinburgh, founder of obstetrical anaesthesia, who openly fought the curse of Eve.

To this decade also belongs the discovery of anaesthesia and the beginning of a true science of surgery. If obstetrics had at that time been regarded as of equal importance and equal dignity with surgery; if it had been given equal place in the schools at the start, and if the work of these five men had been followed by ordinary and logical development along the lines in which they pioneered, obstetrics would now be the equal of medicine and surgery and there would today be no enormous death-rate of mothers but only an irreducible minimum from abnormal conditions. What came of Simpson's work cannot be discussed here. What has happened to Holmes's and Semmelweis's contributions has already been told; how greatly White's contribution has failed of its purpose we can judge by the neglect of clinical obstetrics today.

The history of Sims's contribution, gynecology, explains the present plight of obstetrics. Briefly, the story is this. Obstetrics, midwifery, the science of normal childbirth, was, as Dr. De Lee expresses it mildly, "in disesteem"; an obstetrician was sneered at, teachers of obstetrics were held to be in an unworthy occupation and were called by such titles as "he-grandmother to a man midwife." Surgery was in high honor and became more and more exalted as the possibilities of anaesthesia developed. So gynecology, originally designed, as its name indicates, to cover the whole reproductive life of woman from adolescence to the menopause, became a branch of surgery and the science that by operation mends the injuries inflicted by the despised and ill-trained or untrained obstetrician. There are whole fields in woman's reproductive life, such as the toxemias and abnormal psychoses of pregnancy, the sex life from fifteen to forty-five years, the mechanics of normal labor, about which little is known and in which there is crying need of research. Above all, the protection of normal labor begun in that great decade has been interrupted, with the result that it can be said without danger of contradiction that the death-rate of mothers today is not from gross abnormalities, which are relatively rare, but from neglect of normal spontaneous labor. And this neglect must be charged against not only the general practitioner but the obstetrician.

For strangely enough, but not unnaturally when we remember his history, the obstetrician has of late years turned more and more from natural to operative deliveries—to induced labor, the forceps, the caesarian, and a long list of ways of helping nature even in births where nature needs no help. The reason is not far to seek; he was tired of contempt, tired of being a man midwife, so he turned from safeguarding nature in her task and resorted to manual dexterity, to the surgery that was in such high esteem. Furthermore, he was himself in very many cases an operating gynecologist also, so surgery came naturally to him. By this means the specialist himself has added his quota, far the smallest it is true, to deaths in the group "other causes" and even, now and again, to deaths from septicemia.

About these causes of maternal mortality there is no controversy; all obstetricians accept them. There are, however, other and equally potent causes about which there is as yet no such common agreement and which this is not the place to discuss. The Jones bill which failed to become a law touches only the causes that are non-controversial. This, however, is a large field. The Children's Bureau by its seven years' work under the Shepard-Towner Act gave the only help ever offered to mothers on a nation-wide scale. While it lasted it made this country preeminent among the nations in its effort to right a great wrong. The work has been interrupted now for two years, and in some States the machinery for helping women in their hour of dire need is already showing signs of rust. Will the next Congress let the machinery go to pieces?

Doak the Deportation Chief

By GARDNER JACKSON

Washington, March 6

THE United States government is now midway in a drive to clear the land of everyone who cannot prove he is lawfully resident here. Heading the drive, President Hoover's Secretary of Labor, William N. Doak, finds satisfaction in the support he is receiving. "Never," he states, "has Congressional support for our deportation activities been so strong." And as for the White House, President Hoover has publicly assured Mr. Doak that he will not lack funds.

There are objectors, like the American Civil Liberties Union, in various cases, but, Secretary Doak points out, "the Civil Liberties crowd always objects, and the worse the aliens are the louder that crowd shouts." It seemed to disturb him somewhat to have Senator Robert F. Wagner of New York join the objectors.

Senator Wagner was troubled by the report of a raid a few weeks ago upon a dance of the Finnish Workers' Education Association in New York City. The New York Times report described the blocking of all exits of the Fifth Avenue dance hall by twenty Department of Labor agents and ten New York policemen, the lining up of the 1,000 guests, and the command that each of them show credentials proving his right to be in America. "In an atmosphere of hysteria tinged with indignation," wrote the Times reporter, "the dancers came forward singly and offered their proof. All but sixteen men and two women passed the test. These were taken to the West 123d Street police station and then to Ellis Island for deportation."

Senator Wagner suggested in a letter to Secretary Doak that he issue a denial of the raid, in which methods were used comparable to "the sensational methods which were first employed in the enforcement of prohibition." "It is error to assume," added Senator Wagner, "that only the alien will be harassed by the pursuit of this policy of raids and wholesale arrests. Drag-net methods will, without question, inflict injury and annoyance upon citizens and aliens alike."

Discussing the Senator's letter, Secretary Doak's immediate reaction was, "Well, the boys took sixteen men and two women who admitted they were in the country illegally. They knew what they were doing. They struck pay dirt all right, didn't they?" He recounted the recent arrest of some illegally resident aliens at a Lutheran Mission in New York City, with the sanction of the superintendent of the mission. "It was charged that we had raided a church," he explained. Elaborating upon the difficulties of apprehending deportable aliens, Secretary Doak stated his view of the problem by asking, "If you take away dances, homes, missions, and hospitals from us where do you expect we're going to get these fellows to deport?"

It was suggested to Secretary Doak that the objection of Senator Wagner and others is directed only at the methods used and that it is perhaps based upon the American tradition of the United States as a country founded as a haven for political refugees. "Yes," responded the Secretary without a moment's hesitation, "and we've been reaping the harvest ever since."

Three factors seem to contribute to the current campaign to corral and deport all deportable aliens—who number 400,000, according to Secretary Doak's estimate. The first factor is the hard times—the bread lines, in some of which, at Los Angeles, for example, the Secretary says, large numbers of illegally resident aliens were found. Whether the complaint on this score comes from the citizens in the bread lines themselves or from the city authorities and those who have the wherewithal to give charity is not made clear. One simply gains the impression from the Secretary that only bona fide citizens must be fed.

The second factor is the widespread racketeering of the gangster type, and in this connection Mr. Doak cites his recent interview with a delegation of "small merchants" from New York City who urged him to deport the gang of racketeers who have been quietly exacting tribute from them for some time. "The racketeering may not be as showy in New York as it is in Chicago," he observes, "but there's plenty of it." The Chicago racketeering game, he suspects, is peopled largely by Sicilians expelled from Italy by Mussolini.

The third factor is the anti-red sentiment which has been prevalent since the war in greater or less degree and which now seems to dominate a large section at least of the Congressional mind. Secretary Doak specifically denies any intention of singling out "the reds or any particular class" for deportation. But at the same time he evinces an especial sensitiveness at the mention of that aspect of his problem.

"What do you think the red newspapers would say," he asks, "if we raided your square down there—Union Square? You know how they'd yell." And by way of defining his position on the matter more clearly, he falls to talking of Congressman Hamilton Fish, Jr., who has in his opinion been unjustly pictured as a reactionary on these questions when in fact he is "a very sincere and liberal-minded man."

He concurs in Assistant Secretary of Labor White's enthusiasm for the investigation of communism by the Fish committee as laying the foundation for insertion of the word "Communist" in the deportation law alongside the word "anarchist," which is now there. Mr. White quotes approvingly the recommendation of Congressman Bachman to that effect and relates the success of Department of Labor agents in securing court acceptance of a number of deportation warrants in California issued against individuals merely because they were members of the Communist Party.

The Secretary's responsiveness to newspaper opinion, even though it be that of "red newspapers" which "yell," is further evidenced by his obvious resentment at the Scripps-Howard newspapers for defending the Italian Serio against the deportation order compelling him to go to Italy. "We are told we mustn't deport him to Italy because he'll be shot when he gets there," explains Mr. Doak, paraphrasing Serio's contention that Mussolini will do away with him because of his political activities against the Fascist regime. "There are some who think we ought to shoot him here before shipping him. Those against deporting him to Italy tell us to send him to Russia, where he wants to go. But we can't send him to Russia, because we have no diplomatic relations with Russia."

The summation of Secretary's Doak's attitude in promoting this deportation drive is found in this remark: "If the people don't like our methods they ought to adopt registration. We're about the only country that hasn't it. Most of the European countries have. They ought to make all these people give us their thumb prints and hand prints when they come into the country and we'd keep records of them. Then we'd be sure where to find them and wouldn't have to raid dances."

The deportation drive is going on. No doubt about that. In the three weeks preceding the Finnish dance raid more than 500 aliens were rounded up in New York City. Ellis Island is crowded to capacity with persons awaiting deportation. And this is accomplished without an additional force of agents. "That's not unusual," Mr. Doak says. "They recently took in 104 in one afternoon. And of course the New York police are giving us fine cooperation." Mr. Doak has announced that he will add "dollar-a-year men" to his force if he hasn't funds enough to prosecute the drive. "There are plenty who would like to help."

The danger is that even though Mr. Doak expresses his intention to administer the deportation law "humanely and as a liberal-minded man," he and his agents, along with great sections of the populace, will be swept into the use of methods that are lawless in themselves. The Finnish dance raid is, as Senator Wagner indicates, an extremely disquieting omen. Popular disapproval of such methods is hard to arouse. A forthcoming report from the Wickersham Commission on the handling of deportation cases may prove germane to the issue. Anyone at all familiar with deportation cases knows that in many of them the foreigner (despite Mr. Doak's assertion that each case has to be prepared so thoroughly that it will stand a test in the courts) has slight chance for adequate protection. The law provides each deportee the right of counsel or friends at the original examination. But often in the rush of arrest and prosecution the alien never realizes that in the remarks hastily addressed to him by the immigration agents he is offered that right. Then, too, the foreigner is sometimes preyed upon by unscrupulous lawyers—"much worse than ambulance chasers," as Mr. Doak says.

For anyone who regards our treatment of aliens, whether illegally here or not, or whether reds or gangsters, as one test of our civilization it will be pertinent to study the development of the deportation drive now progressing under the aegis of the White House, and to use the Wickersham Commission expert's report as a guide to such study.

President Hoover on the Depression

On March 7, 1930, President Hoover gave out the following statement, which was printed generally by the newspapers of the country. It is here reprinted unchanged after the lapse of a year, as a document of interest to the American people in view of the weight that is properly given to any official utterance of the President. The entire statement deserves close examination, but the final conclusion is specially noteworthy after a year of continued depression.

> The Departments of Commerce and Labor are engaged in the usual monthly survey of business and unemployment, and especially of the results obtained from the measures which have been in progress since the last of November to reduce unemployment and the hardship following the dislocation from the stock-exchange crash. The survey is not as yet complete.
> There are, however, certain conclusions that are evident:
> 1. Unemployment amounting to distress is in the main concentrated in twelve States. The authorities in the remaining thirty-six States indicate only normal seasonal unemployment, or that the minor abnormal unemployment is being rapidly absorbed.
> 2. The low point of business and employment was the latter part of December and early January. Since that time employment has been slowly increasing, and the situation is much better today than at that time.
> 3. Nation-wide response to the request for increased construction and improvement work by public authorities, railroads, utilities, and industries is having a most material effect. Construction contracts in these categories in January and February were from 40 per cent to 45 per cent higher than ever known in these months. The total construction work for 1930 seems assured to be larger than even 1929.
> 4. The undertakings to maintain wages have been held.
> 5. The amount of unemployment is, in proportion to the number of workers, considerably less than one-half (probably only one-third) of that which resulted from the crashes of 1907-8 and 1920-22, at this period of the situation.
> 6. Measures taken to ameliorate interest rates have resulted in continuous decrease since December, and money is available at lower rates for business and commercial purposes. One result is, an increasing volume of bond issues have been placed for public improvements. Available money for mortgage purposes of home-building and agriculture has lagged behind other forms of credit. But a decrease in demands of policy-holders for loans on the insurance companies and the action recently taken by the Federal Reserve System should result in increased supplies of credit, especially for residential building, which in turn has lagged behind other construction.
> 7. All the evidences indicate that the worst effects of the crash upon unemployment will have been passed during the next sixty days, with the amelioration of seasonal unemployment, the gaining strength of other forces, and the continued cooperation of the many agencies actively cooperating with the government to restore business and to relieve distress.

In the Driftway

Light verse in this country has never developed as it should have. Either it degenerates into sentimental doggerel which is very profitable—syndicates are paying fabulous sums weekly to professional rhymesters who, armed with a thesaurus and a poetic license, wil[illegible]ther in, no questions asked, in ten lines. Or it beco[illegible]s-minded, calls itself poetry, and goes out to be used a[illegible]filler in the "quality" magazines. Perhaps we are not at the exact stage in our civilization when good light verse is produced. Perhaps the philosophers have an explanation. Or can it be that we have not just the subjects we need?

* * * * *

Our versifiers, for instance, have not, as England has, an Epstein and his works to motivate their pens. We have many a public statue guaranteed to raise the hair on any head. And the famous battle that raged around Civic Virtue is evidence that we are not indifferent to the monstrosities that somehow get foisted upon our innocent streets. But as the Drifter remembers it, that battle was fought out with more anger than humor, more prose than rhyme. And the fact remains that we have nothing quite like Epstein.

* * * * *

The London populace does not like Epstein's works, neither the monument to W. H. Hudson, nor the decorations on the entrance to the Underground. The Drifter has unfortunately forgotten both name and location of the latest one, but that low groan you heard recently coming out of the east was London's greeting to the most recent Epstein contribution. And the light verse here appended, written by the perennial and always delightful Lucio for the Manchester Guardian, was probably motivated in part by the same event. The Drifter exhibits it both as a revealing comment on London and her sculptor, and as a model for any incipient light versifiers who may be hovering in the American offing. Its title, incidentally, would indicate that its author was not indifferent to the possibility of an American audience.

STEIN SONG

[With particular reference to reports that Relativity has been relegated to the second division of its author's affections, while the first place is now claimed by a revised theory called the "Unified Field."]

Two lads of noted power and pep
Were Albert Ein. and Jacob Ep.—
A pair of most distinguished Steins,
Pursuing widely famous lines.

But note, in spite of all their fame,
Those lines were not at all the same;
They were not, as a child could tell,
The sort described as parallel.

While Albert put a kink in space,
Jake uglified the human race;
While Ein. put Newton "on the spot,"
Ep. sculped the squalid and the squat.

'Twas Albert whose prodigious hand
The Universe itself replanned;
While Jacob's no less artful paw
Produced a prehistoric squaw.

But, lo! by all accounts 'twould seem
That Albert has revised his scheme:
So is there not a modest hope
That Jacob might extend his scope?

If one of these distinguished Steins
Can shoot right off on novel lines,
Well, why should not the other try
Some newer sources of supply?

Why should not artful Ep. compete
With something fluffy and petite?
Some fragile and less bulging type,
With hands less like large sheets of tripe?

Be of good cheer—a change may come
To strike the whole of Chelsea dumb.
If Brother Ein. can change his step,
Well, what about it, Master Ep.?

Insanity in Oregon

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mike Kulikoff, eighteen-year-old Portland schoolboy, was arrested on November 7, 1930, for radical activity. At the time of his arrest he was reading Lenin's "State and Revolution" and "Imperialism" at the Washington High School, where he went for gymnasium and music during the noon recess. He was then doing probationary high-school work as a student at Buckman Grammar School.

The boy was first taken to the local immigration office, which is now engrossed in wholesale deportation of alien Communists. Questioned for hours concerning his radical literature, he persistently refused to answer. Finally, when it was learned that he had been born in Russia and was ineligible for deportation, the boy was handcuffed and taken to the local police station several blocks away. District attorney and police captain here debated the advisability of preferring State criminal-syndicalism charges against the boy. Several citizen Communists have been arrested under this law. But obviously it would be difficult to obtain a conviction carrying a maximum penitentiary sentence of ten years against a schoolboy who had never been in trouble before. The boy was photographed, finger-printed, and locked in a cell overnight.

At noon the next day, November 8, 1930, Kulikoff was taken before a circuit-court judge, where a hearing was held on his sanity. There were present the judge, a physician, and Mike Kulikoff. No lawyer was there in the boy's behalf; there were no witnesses. An order of commitment was summarily signed by the judge—the words "cause of such insanity" therein were followed by a blank line. The boy was again handcuffed and then rushed to the insane asylum fifty miles away. For three days he was kept in bed and thereafter put to work pushing blocks to wax the hallway floors. Two weeks later he was transferred to the main building and placed in a ward with about fifty insane men, who became of necessity his daily associates.

Habeas corpus proceedings were instituted for the boy's release. The district attorney, in cross-examination, asked him what I. W. W. literature he had read, whether he "disagreed with the laws of this country in any respect," whether he "feels they are fair," whether they should be changed, and questioned him concerning Lenin's "Imperialism." The district attorney assured the judge that the examination "reflects the mental condition of this boy." Testimony of both prosecution and defense conclusively showed that the boy had never been in any trouble before, never committed any acts of force or violence, always regularly attended school, and lived at home. Nevertheless, the institution's superintendent and assistant physician testified that the boy was insane and that it was unsafe for him to be at large. The main symptoms of his insanity, they stated, were that he was mentally resistive, refused to cooperate, made false statements, had a tendency to run or walk fast, and refused to eat all food served him. They testified that such conduct indicated insanity, although the boy had been committed against his will and until then had spent all his life with orthodox Russian parents, which explains his refusal to eat the food served at the asylum.

Pending appeal of the case to the Oregon Supreme Court, there is a weekly traveler from Portland to the insane asylum. It is the boy's mother, a small middle-aged woman whose broken English is unintelligible. Four hard-boiled eggs, nearly a loaf of home-made rye bread, some apples, and a container of coffee are in the basket on her arm. Mike eats, mother departs, and the boy awaits the lapse of seven days for another square meal when she returns again.

Should the Oregon Supreme Court uphold the boy's confinement in the asylum it will establish a dangerous precedent for dealing with those who because of their youth are beyond the reach of ordinary anti-radical legislation.

How delicately they are wild,
On their proud wings how slender,
Or resting in the river mild,
Untamable yet tender.

And you, as delicate as they,
Seem like them in slim hauteur,
Seem gentle and yet far away
As wings upon wild water.

Give beauty when you give your heart,
Give tenderness a river,
Give love which is the giving art,
But give the wild will never.

Goethe and Dr. Johnson

Everybody's Boswell. Edited by F. V. Morley. Illustrated by Ernest H. Shepard. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

Conversations of Goethe with Eckermann. Edited by J. K. Moorhead. Introduction by Havelock Ellis. Everyman's Library. E. P. Dutton and Company. 90 cents.

BY a pleasant coincidence these two great books, which tempt us from so many aspects to compare them with each other, now appear almost simultaneously in new although somewhat abridged editions. Paradoxically, though there can be no question that Goethe was a vastly greater man than Johnson, Boswell's volume remains more enthralling than Eckermann's. The result comes partly from the fact that Boswell is much the superior protraitist; his observation never misses the slightest minutia, and his candor is almost unparalleled. Boswell set down virtually everything; but one senses that Eckermann is often omitting or toning down any petty traits that may have appeared in Goethe; and as a result, though Goethe emerges as a nobler, a more Olympian figure than Johnson, he also emerges as a vaguer one. We never see his warts and wrinkles; what we get is a retouched photograph with a softened focus. Now there is a certain artistic justification for this procedure, as even a Fifth Avenue photographer could explain; for the camera that impartially photographs a blemish may make it seem more prominent than it really is; and the "psychographer," by the very act of mentioning a petty trait, selects it, and thereby inevitably emphasizes it. But in his ability to put in all the blemishes without this distortion, Boswell shows himself a Rembrandt, while Eckermann remains a mere Sir Thomas Lawrence.

Boswell, too, is a better dramatist, or perhaps it was merely that he had better opportunities. Virtually all the conversations Eckermann records are mere duologues between himself and Goethe, while Boswell is constantly showing his hero in company, which necessarily implies showing him in a wider variety of aspects and in more dramatic situations. Yet when Eckermann has these opportunities, he never takes full advantage of them. When Hegel comes to visit Goethe, for example, and Goethe banters him regarding dialectics, Eckermann gives what appears to be a mere summary of the conversation in only half a page. One could not imagine Boswell making so little of such a meeting. On another occasion, when the great philologist Wolf dines at Weimar, Eckermann merely records:

> The bon mots at table were too evanescent, and too much the result of the moment, to bear repetition. Wolf was very great in witty turns and repartees, but nevertheless it seemed to me that Goethe always maintained a certain superiority over him.

Knowing how worshipful the biographer's attitude is, the reader cannot help suspecting, when even the good Eckermann grants so slight a margin to his hero, that perhaps Goethe on this occasion got slightly the worse of the exchange. In any case we feel that Boswell would have told us everything brilliant that was said at such a meeting. Even Boswell, of course, is somewhat less than perfect in this respect. One wonders, at times, how impartially the repartee is recorded—when Johnson nearly always has the last word. And then there is the mysterious and almost exasperating omission of any real verbal exchange with Burke. "That fellow," Boswell reports Johnson as saying once when he was ill, "calls forth all my powers. Were I to see Burke now it would kill me." But we are never permitted to hear these two conversational Titans clash.

One further cause for the superiority of Boswell's book, again paradoxically enough, is the fact both that Johnson was a more limited man than Goethe and that Boswell was more of a fool than Eckermann. Boswell's questions, even before we get the doctor's answer, entertain us constantly for their sheer asininity; but though Eckermann's questions are sometimes naive, they are never absurd. Of course, in Boswell's asininity there was also a shrewdness amounting to genius: he knew that he must irritate his oyster to get pearls; or, rather, he was like a circus exhibitor who prods his lion so the public may hear him roar. Johnson, for the very reason that he was full of prejudices, biles, perversities, and eccentricities from which Goethe was free, put on a better show. He is not merely, like Goethe, a great literary man and sage; he is a great comic figure, comparable to Micawber and Falstaff. Goethe's judgments, both of great former writers and of his contemporaries, were nearly always remarkably just and sound. (We must except, of course, his amazing overestimation of Byron, whom he thought "the greatest genius of our century," ranking him in English literature second only to Shakespeare; while so far as any record in these "Conversations" goes, he was unaware even of the existence of Keats, Shelley, and Wordsworth.) Johnson's judgments, on the other hand, were often grotesque; but that does not make them any less interesting to us now. It is delightful to hear him saying, across a century and a half: "Nothing odd will do long. 'Tristram Shandy' did not last."

But one must give Johnson credit for his real superiorities. He was a greater aphorist than Goethe; perhaps the greatest spontaneous aphorist that ever lived. Goethe's general views were wiser and broader; but in conversation he fell short of Johnson's compactness and pungency. And if in Boswell's picture Johnson seems a creature subject to a thousand irritations, a great mammoth constantly swishing and stamping on gadflies, while in Eckermann's picture Goethe seems serene and godlike, one must remember the great differences both in the painters and in the condition of the sittings. For Eckermann's friendship with Goethe, even more than Boswell's with Johnson, was possible only because he was willing to accept a definite status of inferiority; he could seldom venture to speak to Goethe as to an equal. Only once, when the poor fellow, after the most patient and careful observation, and with the greatest reluctance, brought himself to speak to Goethe of a slight difference of opinion with him about his "Theory of Colors," "Goethe's sublimely serene countenance became clouded over, and I saw but too clearly that he did not approve of my objections." Without giving Eckermann an opportunity to elaborate his objections and reasons, Goethe "could not help, with a half-laugh and a half-sneer, throwing in my teeth at the very doorway something about heretics and heresy."

Though Goethe's self-estimate was very high, and though he never troubled to conceal it, it was certainly not higher than the present-day critical estimate of him—he rated himself definitely below Shakespeare, for example. But like so many great men, he had a curious way of priding himself on the wrong thing. "As for what I have done as a poet," he would repeatedly say to Eckermann, "I take no pride whatever in it. Excellent poets have lived at the same time with myself; poets more excellent have lived before me. But that in my century I am the only person who knows the truth in the difficult science of colors—of that, I say, I am not a little proud." But, alas, it is Goethe's theory of colors, based on majestic intuitions, that is now discredited, and the theories of the "stupid" Newtonians, based on experiment, that have triumphed. Yet Goethe confessed that he had spent "half a life" on his theory. And though much of his work in comparative anatomy was sound and useful, the fate of his study of colors throws a revealing light on the ideal of the "all-round," "universal," or "complete" mind, which still appeals so powerfully to us, and of which Goethe, with Leonardo da Vinci, stands as one of the two greatest exemplars. Goethe himself came to doubt the validity of that ideal. He constantly warned Eckermann not to enlarge prematurely the field of his interests. "I myself," he said one day, "have spent too much time on things that did not belong to my department. When I reflect what Lope de Vega accomplished, the number of my poetical productions seems very small. I should have kept more to my own trade."

HENRY HAZLITT

No Men Wanted

Unemployment: A Problem of Industry. By W. H. Beveridge. Longmans, Green and Company. $6.

IN 1909 William (now Sir William) H. Beveridge published his great book on unemployment. It is the foundation on which every student of the subject has built from that day to this. Twenty years have passed, years filled with a rich but bitter experience on the part of Western countries in dealing with unemployment. During those years Beveridge has served as Director of Labor Exchanges for Great Britain, in various capacities in the Ministry of Munitions, the Board of Trade, and the Ministry of Food, as Director of the London School of Economics, and in other important positions both public and private. Out of his unrivaled experience and knowledge of fact, combined with his sound theoretical judgment and unfailing common sense, he has now added to the original work, which happily is reprinted unchanged as Part I of the present volume, a second part, substantially a new book, bringing the statement of facts and the theoretical analysis down to date. The work of 1909 stood in a class by itself; that of 1930, one is tempted to say, is worth all the other books on unemployment ever written. A veritable cyclopedia of all the relevant facts, an extraordinary piece of economic exposition, and a model of sound theory, it contains in addition passages of great literary beauty.

The new features of the British situation since the war have been the development of permanent unemployment on an unexampled scale—a jump from an average of some 4.5 per cent during 1860-1914 to about 12 per cent in 1921-29—and the substitution for unemployment insurance of unemployment relief (the dole), which is not insurance at all. The insurance experiment was inaugurated in 1911 in connection with the nation-wide system of labor exchanges established in 1909. It got into operation smoothly, and by August, 1914, had accumulated a tidy little surplus of £3,185,000. The war overburdened the exchanges and ultimately wrecked the insurance scheme. The calamitous post-war unemployment led in 1921 to the invention of "extended benefit," that is, benefit given those who had exhausted the regular insurance rights, but from the same fund and at the same rates. Relief was thus grafted on insurance, and promptly proceeded to swallow it up. Now there is essentially "a system of general unemployment relief financed mainly by a tax on employment." Yet both labor exchanges and insurance have proved themselves indispensable, and nobody in England wants to go back to the old system of haphazard provision, or none at all except poor relief, for men out of work. Furthermore, the present scheme, for all its faults, has enabled Britain's workers to live through an unparalleled depression without a fatal lowering of their living standards. In so doing, it may well have helped prevent revolution. As for the oft-repeated charges that it has demoralized the population by enabling men to live in idleness when they could get work, Beveridge flatly dismisses them as "idle and irresponsible talk."

What, then, are the real criticisms of the scheme, the points at which correction must be applied? First and fundamentally, the hopeless confusion of insurance and relief. Insurance can and ought to take care of the ordinary ups and downs of employment; but "a state which undertakes to relieve adequately and indefinitely from a bottomless purse all the unemployed will soon find itself subsidizing the manufacture of unemployment, unless it adopts counter-measures." Such counter-measures Beveridge points out. Second may be mentioned the lack of any relation between payments and benefits. Employers are given no financial incentive to stabilize employment. The eight top industries (from the point of view of stability) in 1929, with 1,305,000 workers, drew out only the same amount as "dock, harbor, river, and canal service" alone, with 171,000 workers, though they paid in ten times as much. The other industries simply subsidized unemployment on the docks. There is grave danger of "demoralizing government, employers, and trade unions so that they take less thought for the prevention of unemployment." Coal miners, for example, ought to be moved out of the dying coal industry; it is easier to pay them relief and let them stay where they are. Most interesting of all theoretically, Beveridge concludes that the operation of unemployment relief and other agencies maintaining and advancing real wages has kept up standards of living to a level higher than that warranted by the existing state of British industry, and that a part of the existing unemployment is due to wages too high for productivity. This is a hard saying for advocates of current high-wage doctrines, but it is supported by a body of evidence making it hard to controvert Beveridge's deduction that wages must come down or else productivity must go up. After all, the economists are not always wrong.

Unemployment remains, as Beveridge declared twenty years ago, a problem of industry, not an act of God. Now, as then, the primary essential in dealing with it is the organization of the labor market, and beyond that, of industry itself. In such organization, insurance can play a useful part in tiding workers over temporary periods of unemployment and making for greater rather than less mobility of labor. Neither insurance nor any other device can be used without disaster to provide adequate relief for permanent unemployment; such unemployment must be done away with. But as Beveridge pointed out two decades ago, "it is not practicable for a nation o get a mastery of unemployment without being prepared to ubmit to some changes of industrial methods and customs. . . It needs not money so much as thought and organiza-on." He concludes today:

> The repeated lesson of twenty-one years since those words were penned is how much more abundant is money than thought, how much harder it is, for the cure of social ills, to change men's habits and open their minds than to slit their purses—how much harder and how much more important.

'or such an opening of men's minds nothing could be more seful than a thoughtful perusal of this extraordinary book.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

A Study of Genius

avage Messiah. By H. S. Ede. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

THIS book is really a study of genius; one seldom reads so intimate an account of the emotional intensity which, when genius is there, functions only for the furthering f that genius. The volume is made up very largely of the tters and diaries of two amazing lovers—Henri Gaudier, the ghteen-year-old French sculptor, and Sophie Brzeska, a thirty-ght-year-old Polish woman possessed of acute sensitivity and disorganized but sporadically brilliant mind. These two met Paris when both were very ill and very poor, and they fell love. They remained in love passionately, ascetically, stimu-ting and frustrating each other for five years, until Gaudier as forced to return from London to serve in the French army the beginning of the war. He was killed and Miss Brzeska ved seven long years in a kind of self-accusing madness before e died. It is one of the most curious love stories in literature, d H. S. Ede, the author and editor, does well to use his vn narrative merely as a medium for linking together the tters and the diaries of these two very articulate and exces-vely literary minds. The letters are for the most part audier's; the diaries are Sophie Brzeska's. These she was ychologically compelled to write, and at great length, although e could never organize her life well enough to find time to mpose her "Trilogy," the long novel which both she and r young lover believed would prove, even as have his statues, e work of genius.

Mr. Ede has given us only notes from and summaries of e diaries rather than the original texts. His interest is quite turally in Gaudier, and his emphasis is probably right. We ay feel curious concerning the diaries and note that the book it now stands presents a very much more complete portrait Gaudier and of his genius than of Miss Brzeska, but we ust also grant that her mind is not so interesting as that of e young sculptor, that she possessed no such power and rtainty of direction as he did.

Henri Gaudier-Brzeska, as he called himself from the ne of their union, was perhaps the most brilliant member that curiously intense pre-war group of literary and artistic en living in London. Here he had fled to escape military ity and here he remained, very slowly making friends, until e war snatched him away. He had some tendencies toward e Messianic complex which motivated a number of these tists, notably of course D. H. Lawrence. This fact accounts r the title of the book. He wore, as did several of his quaintances, the Christlike beard, and he had always an plicit faith in his own prophecies. When any thwarting of genius was threatened he could be excessively cruel; at her times he had a kind of divine and self-sacrificing gentle-ss. After the horribly poverty-stricken and lonely years, when came at last to know others of the pre-war group—Katherine Mansfield, J. Middleton Murry, Epstein, and, as one of his best friends, Ezra Pound—he insisted on bringing Sophie along with him into every friendship. She did not always please; once with her morbid and intense asceticism she frightened Katherine Mansfield into an illness. Only a few of Gaudier's friends could appreciate Brzeska's sacrifices for "her son."

Aside from the fascination of so intimate an account of such minds and of such a group of people, the present book has the greater value of affording a direct study of the workings of the creative imagination. We see Gaudier maturing gradually as an artist, we know his influences, his reactions to various pieces of sculpturing and painting. We see his absorption in his own problems and learn of his solutions for them. We learn of his violent reactions to conventional dogma concerning art:

> The Victory is beautiful, not because its silhouette is abominably weak and monotonous, but because the masses of which it is composed have sufficient truth in their disposition to give the sensations of many rhythms: life, movement, wind, water, which are pleasing to the eye.

We watch him frantically modeling, while his nose streams blood in one of his frequent hemorrhages, stopping only to dash to a window to observe a dog fight. The dominating, sometimes seemingly half-mad purpose which controlled all he did is in sharp contrast to the dawdling indirection of Miss Brzeska's lesser mind.

When he was twenty-three he went into the trenches and there, quite undaunted, he continued carving—from the wood of German rifles. He was fascinated by the fighting and found he had models here entirely to his liking. But when he was killed, these last pieces of his, which would today be the collector's greatest joy, were thrown away and lost.

Graves and Aldington Again

But It Still Goes On. By Robert Graves. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $3.

Roads to Glory. By Richard Aldington. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

MOST certainly two poets, Richard Aldington and Robert Graves, have turned tables on the Great War. They themselves would have been the last to dream of any possible advantage gained through four years of what seemed to them blind disaster. Neither was a professional writer in a commercial sense. Up to a little more than a year ago poetry had been their chosen means of expression, but upon the publication of "Good Bye to All That" and "Death of a Hero" the situation changed. Overnight their names were known to a public that had never heard of "Georgian Poetry" or the imagist anthologies. As a corollary to popular success, and possibly because "Good Bye to All That" and "Death of a Hero" are largely autobiographical, these poets are offering their public something in the way of a postscript.

Since Robert Graves evidently enjoys a controversy, it would be well to take him up at once. I, for one, am ready to dismiss Mr. Graves's explanation of the success of "Good Bye to All That" as a piece of cocksure self-rationalization. In the opening section of his new volume (which is, by the way, a miscellany of almost every possible form of writing except poetry and including a three-act play) Mr. Graves says: "That 'Good Bye to All That' is selling well does not surprise me, because I have been able to put into the book all the frank answers to all the inquisitive questions that people like to ask about other people's lives." He goes on to explain how he mentioned food and drink and murders to catch public attention. This is all very well, but I suspect Mr. Graves's frankness. He has a bad habit of shouting that he's an hones fellow and looking straight at you with a hard-boiled, disillusioned eye. I am naive enough to believe that Mr. Graves assertions concerning his behavior, interesting as they may b are superficial and that "Good Bye to All That" is successfu because Mr. Graves had a great deal to say about his persona reaction to the war, and I believe that he felt, for the momen that he was telling the truth. In other words, quite withou deliberation he had learned the trick of exploiting his personality His conception of himself is that of a young man who ha seen everything and, now that the war is over, knows everything. Mr. Graves would have you believe that he is somewha dangerous and knows how to take revenge upon those wh offend him. Among his footnotes to the present volum he offers us a vague outline of his quarrel with his fathe Alfred Percival Graves. The elder Graves has written hi own autobiography in which he used a few letters that h had received from son Robert. Robert speaks of this actio on the part of his father as an infringement of copyright bu does not complain because he himself on occasion has playe the pirate. Mr. Graves is again making a fine show of frankness in which he tells us very little. In the play from whic this Graves miscellany takes its title I discern a rough, schoolboyish caricature of the elder Graves as the villain of th piece. The hero, again a frank, unashamed young man, play practical jokes upon his father, a mild, mid-Victorian man c letters and, of course, the evil genius of the play, which deal with problems of post-war homosexuality.

The father, jealous of his son's reputation as a poet an his ability to handle girls, inadvertently marries a frigid woma The play closes with the death of two homosexual character the suicide of the father, and an attractive girl walking int the arms of the outspoken young hero. The entire play seem as if it were written as part of the little-theater moveme that rose to a fine frenzy of amateur barnstorming som fifteen years ago in our own Middle West. Mr. Graves ha a way of making his family quarrels momentarily entertainin but not of the least importance. As a commentary upon w in general (and this seems to bear some relationship to h personal quarrels) Mr. Graves believes that fighting in man as ineradicable an instinct as love, and that the human desi for war could be made less harmful by a code that woul embody all that is best in savage, medieval, and early moder warfare and in modern sport. This belief, I think, shows u that Mr. Graves is by no means so hard-boiled and disillusione as the self-portrait that he offers for our inspection. He ha however, found a means by which he can attract a wide publi and if he were so inclined he could take advantage of his newl discovered talents by conducting a column of personal gossip i a daily newspaper.

Richard Aldington's collection of short stories in "Roa to Glory" is by no means so important as his semi-autobiographical novel "Death of a Hero," but it shows the gener direction that his creative ability has taken. He has discovere the art of writing attractive fiction. Any one of the thirtee stories contained in this volume could have aroused the intere of an editor in charge of a magazine with a public of mo than a million readers. Like Mr. Graves, Richard Aldingto is at his best in disclosing the character of a specific personality—the sensitive young Englishman of the professional clas usually an artist, confronted with the horrors of modern warfare. Mr. Aldington invariably uses his protagonist as a mouthpiece for anti-war propaganda. Here we see him in vario disguises, but most vividly as the young musician in A Bund of Letters. The young man, an officer, is temperamentally un for active trench warfare; the story of his failure to be removed from his post to a position behind the lines is give us very skilfully through the correspondence of the characte involved—the young man's mother, two commanding officers, and the young man himself. Unlike Mr. Graves, Richard Aldington is never aggressive; there are times when he lacks conviction and the power to drive home the central theme of his arguments. Despite a tendency to abuse his narrative gifts by a frequent use of poetic charm in his prose style, his work is seldom ineffective and, as I have already suggested, shows promise of popular success. Our Vanishing Liberties

This Land of Liberty. By Ernest Sutherland Bates. Harper and Brothers. $3.

AMERICAN liberty is a strange animal. Here are two different views of it that leave the average conscientious reader confused as to whether liberty still lives in this country. According to Mr. Bates, it has been rather effectively done to death by mob justice and by the justice of our law courts. Mr. Johnston, dealing solely with prohibition, finds that personal or human rights still find some protection in the courts, but the citizen must know something of the esoteric ways of lawyers and judges in order to enjoy fully the so-called inalienable rights guaranteed him by the Constitution. An ignorant citizen, he suggests, will often unwittingly sacrifice this protection.

Mr. Bates has on the whole done a brilliant service for the cause of freedom. He has demonstrated in clear and concise fashion the various ways in which the average American has been deprived of liberty of action and liberty of thought. He cites case after case in support of his contention, his exposition ranging all the way from a discussion of the Sedition Act of 1798 and the manner in which it violated the First Amendment to lengthy and able comments upon the San Diego mobs, the Mooney and Billings case, the Centralia case, the Barcoski case, the Sacco and Vanzetti tragedy, the Gastonia trials, the third-degree methods of the police, prohibition, and imperialism. His work omits very little that has an important or concrete bearing upon the decline of individual liberty and human rights in the United States.

Despite the excellence of Mr. Bates's work one feels rather discouraged after reading it, not because of the book itself, but because there appears to be no way, without violating their own personal rights, of compelling the hundreds of thousands of legislators, police officers, school trustees, judges, and other petty members of the organized state to read it, and it is to these persons, rather than to the liberals and radicals, that the book should be addressed. Books in Brief

I'd Like to Do It Again. By Owen Davis. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.

Mr. Davis, who as everyone knows is the author of 300 plays, most of which are melodramas, reveals in this entertaining if chaotic autobiography how nature simply made him that way. Life outside of the theater has always been intolerable to him; he thinks, drinks, and breathes plots; he is a born playwright if there ever was one. His story, whatever one may think of his plays, is impressive; and his understanding of the dramatist's art is really very sound. Any young playwright would do well to read the twelve rules which Mr. Davis has here written down for him.

THE KAISER'S COOLIES

By Theodor Plivier

"What we are given is the experience of the 'coolies,' the common sailors, stokers and marines, throughout the entire length, and during all phases, of the World War. . . . The description is throughout of the most pungent realism. . . . 'All Quiet on the Western Front' may be superior to 'The Kaiser's Coolies' from a literary point of view, but the latter surpasses it in vigor, in its impressiveness as a document."—The New York Times.

ALFRED · A · KNOPF BORZOI BOOKS 730 FIFTH AVE · N · Y ·

Selected Essays of William Hazlitt. Edited by Geoffrey Keynes. Random House. $3.50.

This centenary edition of Hazlitt's selected essays is uniform with the single-volume Nonesuch editions of Blake and Donne, which means that the printing and binding are wholly admirable. It contains more than 800 pages of Hazlitt's vigorous prose, selected with a fresh eye and a sure taste. In his able introduction Mr. Keynes reminds us that not since Alexander Ireland's selection in 1889 has the attempt been made to cover so large a field in one volume as in the present edition, though the range of Hazlitt's intellectual attainments is so wide that it would not be possible to do it justice in a volume of smaller compass.

The Quest for Literature. By Joseph T. Shipley. Richard R. Smith. $3.50.

Dr. Shipley's book seems to be the product of diligence rather than thoughtfulness and of wide rather than careful reading. It discusses the nature of criticism, traces the history of critical theory, and comments upon the various literary forms. The quotations from many authorities, the references to countless others, the elaborate notes, and the long bibliography bear witness to the author's labors, but neither they nor the rather pompous style conceal the essential emptiness of the book.

Life and Literature in the Roman Republic. By Tenney Frank. University of California Press. $3.50.

The high points of Professor Frank's subject matter are of course Ennius, Plautus, Terence, Livy, Cicero, and Lucretius. But in this case, Professor Frank being what he is, we have something more than a recital of literary glories. We have that too, and in a language more suitable to present critical needs than was the language of J. W. Mackail in his "Latin Literature"; but we have in addition an account—the fullest available—of the society in which and for which the literature under examination was produced. Professor Frank does not push his sociology too far; he does not pretend entirely to "explain" Lucretius, for instance; but by showing how these authors responded to their environment no less than to the challenge of their Greek models he emphasizes their originality.

White Nights. By Jessie Lemont. Portland, Maine: The Mosher Press. $2.

Jessie Lemont, whose translations of the poems of Rainer Maria Rilke were so skilfully done as to seem hardly translations at all, has in this volume given us a group of her own personal lyrics as well as a few new and very beautiful translations from Rilke. Miss Lemont has in her own verse been influenced in her choice of subjects by an acute sensitivity to the other arts. Some of the best poems are those describing paintings and sculpture. The lyrics are impersonal; the poet's language is rich with images, and her emotion is conveyed largely through the visual impression. One of the loveliest of the poems, Diana Remembers Actaeon, has in it something of the motion in repose of sculpture itself.

Unemployment Benefits in the United States. By Bryce M. Stewart in Collaboration with Jeanne C. Barber, Mary W. Gilson, and Margaret L. Stecker. New York: Industrial Relations Counselors. $7.50.

That excellent research organization, Industrial Relations Counselors, Inc., has been making a world-wide study of provisions against unemployment. This first volume of a projected series is a study of all the known unemployment-benefit plans in the United States, including trade-union, company, and joint schemes. Such plans in 1928-29 covered only about 107,000 workers, so the importance of the movement consists not in extent but in the lessons that can be derived from it. In e present work three valuable introductory chapters sketching e whole development of American thought and practice in ference to unemployment are followed by five others giving analysis and summary of the methods and results of all e plans in operation. In addition there are nearly five hun- ed pages giving each plan in detail, with abundant statistical d tabular material. The work is admirable in both plan d execution. It is to be followed by corresponding studies the chief European governmental schemes of unemployment ıurance, in connection with which it should contribute ma- ially, as Mr. Stewart hopes, "to careful planning and sound actice in this field."

ırdener of Evil. By Pierre Loving. Brewer and Warren. $2.50.

Had Mr. Loving wholly relied in this biography of Baude- re on his very considerable knowledge of the poet and his ıes, "Gardener of Evil" would have been a useful and portant work. But he unfortunately succumbed to the lure novelizing his material. As a novelist Mr. Loving is con- ntional and not impressive. He has, certainly, the insight a sensitive and intelligent writer, an insight entirely sufficient a biographer dealing with facts. But for the novelist empting nothing less than the creation of the great and ficult figure of Baudelaire, it is not sufficient. It does not pport the claim to omniscience which Mr. Loving as a novelist kes and which as a "pure" biographer he would not have l to make. Within itself the book is plausible in explaining udelaire, but its terms are current psychological folklore and better clichés of modern novel-writing, and they explain udelaire so facilely that he is explained away.

Films

Nature and Artifice

THE time is probably not far off when television tours will be conducted through the most inaccessible parts of the world, and we shall be watching the life of the gle, the desert, and the deep sea as today with the help newspapers we watch the happenings in the capitals of rope. It is possible that we shall become so familiar with t life that we shall not even bother to watch it. Be that it may, and in spite of the numerous films that have already niliarized us with the habits and doings of the wild denizens Asia and Africa, there are few sights today so capable of ding a thrill up our spine as the spectacle of a lion or a er attacking its prey or engaging in mortal combat with ıe other powerful fighter. For that matter, jungle comedy ardly less fascinating than jungle drama, particularly when s provided by those star comedians of the animal world, the s and monkeys.

Mr. Schoedsack's "Rango" (Rivoli), the latest contribu- ı to the subject of jungle life, maintains a happy balance comedy and drama, and succeeds so well, with such direct- s and intimacy, in capturing the fun, the terror, and the vading watchful atmosphere of the jungle that it must un- itatingly be classed with the very best of its kind. It is e that it has not the sweep and action that distinguished its re ambitious predecessor "Chang" (made by the same Mr. oedsack in cooperation with Mr. Cooper), but it is superior the earlier picture in conveying the sense of lurking danger makes the jungle itself into a living thing. The film shows equally well in comparison with "Trader Horn." Though lacking the variety of the latter, it reveals a greater unity mood and theme, and moreover gains immeasurably in power of appeal by confining itself strictly to the facts nature, instead of encumbering itself, as "Trader Horn" dc with an inept love story.

It is the same fidelity to fact, the same document value of a record, that to me, in my ignorance of Germ seems to be the most important feature of the German w film "Comrades of 1918" (Cameo). Scenes of actual fight have perhaps been somewhat overdone on the screen, but in t film they still succeed in making one shudder at the horror the whole ghastly business. One realizes, however, that effect is achieved not so much by a few supremely reveal images, like those unforgettable scenes in "The End of Petersburg" or "The Fragments of an Empire," as by cruder method of piling up the purely physical horrors of cea less bombardment and brutal fighting. The story itself appe to be convincing enough, though in spite of Director Pab preoccupation with psychoanalysis it does not strike one as very subtle or profound study of human behavior.

Once again the primary material of the film—the facts life—proves to be the only relieving feature in an otherw banal and juvenile picture, "The Easiest Way" (Capitol). T struggle of a poor but of course beautiful girl in trying escape from the position of a kept woman and marry the m she loves is just regular Hollywood piffle; but the open scenes, showing the family life in a tenement house, dese praise for incisiveness and color.

No considerations of fidelity to life can enter into discussion of the screen opera "Pagliacci" (Central Par Here, by the very nature of the genre, everything is fra artifice, and from start to finish the characters and the act remain entirely conventional. The main question in a prod tion of this kind is the quality of the music and singing. the present instance all that need be said is that the rep duction of voices is only moderately successful. As a fi experiment the film is important. But a really satisfying scr opera is still in the limbo of the future.

The Road Not Taken

IN a season which latterly has been very lean there was least the hope that Mr. Milne's new play, produced ei years ago in London as "Success," would be free fr clumsiness and manifest untruth. Here was an experien playwright, and though he might have little to say he mi reasonably be expected to say it with a certain grace. Wh ever he could not do he would not try to do; whatever did not know he would conceal beneath a disciplined dialog Then the play came with its new title—"Give Me Yesterd (Charles Hopkins Theater)—and Mr. Milne passed by. also, of all men, was clumsy.

"Give Me Yesterday" showed signs of being success with its first audience, and perhaps it will continue to succe If it is true, as I suppose it is, that every person has m at least one decision which he now sometimes regrets, has come to a place where he can turn and cast a glanc it should be a wistful one—at the road not taken, then M Milne has an audience potentially as vast as the human u verse. And if this audience does not care how the thing said for them, then "Give Me Yesterday" should run forev If it does care, however, it should have something to about Mr. Milne's second act, which I took as an outra upon all my finer feelings.

Mr. Milne obviously wanted to be gentle with tho feelings, even while he aimed directly at them. He tried h lightest touch. But somehow it was not light. Consider tl situation. A member of the British Cabinet once loved girl named Sally. But he was ambitious for a career, so l left her for London, a rich wife, and politics. The play ope with him at the height of his career, a gentleman in Cavendi Square who has quite forgotten his yesterdays. An old frie happens in, however, and reminds him; he departs for the sce of those good old days; he arrives, finds Sally, and is tempte to resume his love; yet in the end we see him once more i Cavendish Square, unable to resist the lure of a chancellorshi That is a good story, and the beginning and end of it are i Mr. Milne's best manner; they are adroitly written, and the are quite convincing. It is the interlude with Sally that found appalling. For what does the politician do, finding himself in Sally's house up there in Yorkshire, except lie down an dream a dream which has no relation either to the first act or t the third, but reminds us of "When We Were Very Young, "Peter Pan," and all that has ever been perpetrated in Londo under the name of Pantomime? The other acts are performe with an especial skill; this bumps along like a home theatrica with Junior in the leading role, and inevitably so, since it i written out of the childish part of Mr. Milne's mind. Th trees in the dream are just full of christopher-robins.

These delicate fellows like Mr. Milne are so often lik that—gross in their treatment of "the finer things." They insult our imaginations. We should so much prefer to drean our own dreams. Therefore, after recommending the firs and third acts of "Give Me Yesterday," I recommend that th second act be endured with the eyes closed. Louis Calhern a the M. P. and Sylvia Field as Sally perform their parts as perfectly as may be; so do Gladys Hanson, the M. P.'s terribl wife, and Eric Blore, the prime minister's secretary.

"A Woman Denied," adapted by Jean Bart from the Italian of Gennaro Mario Curci (Ritz Theater), is a dolorous melodrama about a painter who suffers in his mind from the fact that his inspiration comes too wholly from his model. The battle between the temperaments of these two is fought to the accompaniment of much intrigue by way of seduction, and the conclusion, which involves the strangling of the model, is as loud and lurid as a barrage. Mary Nash rather needlessly overemphasizes the viciousness of the model; McKay Morris does better as the painter. Indeed, his present performance, taken in conjunction with his recent one as Aaron Burr in "Colonel Satan," speaks very well for an actor who seems to possess an extraordinary energy in romantic parts, and who certainly should play Shakespeare more often than he does. One hopes, however, that he will master his mannerisms.

"Greater Love," by Bruce Spaulding and Anthony Baird (Liberty Theater), is a play which asks us to break our hearts over the devotion of a sister (Mary Hay) to her brother (Douglas Gillmore). It is not Miss Hay's fault that we decline to do so; it is the fault rather of a play which tries to accomplish too many climaxes in two hours. The heart is a stubborn thing. It must break at its own pace or never break at all.

MARK VAN DOREN

"Privilege Car" (Forty-eighth Street Theater), rather accurately described on the program as "a melodramatic comedy," concerns the goings-on in a circus troupe composed of dope fiends, adulterers, stool-pigeons, shoplifters, forgers, rapers, a murderer or two, and a hero and heroine who are pure as the driven snow. Though filled with stock types, it is rapidly paced and so crowded with sensation and event that it holds the interest by main force.

The Cuban Dictatorship

By MALWON KAUFMAN

THE abrogation of constitutional rights for an indefinite period in Cuba by President Machado, under a decree dated February 7, has received scant attention in the American press. Thus far, Machado's ability to keep the Cuban army in a complacent frame of mind has succeeded to some extent in allaying anxiety over America's investment of more than a billion and a half dollars in the island. General Machado was elected president of the Republic of Cuba in 1924 on a liberal platform of "water, roads, and schools." In addition to the pledges of this platform, he solemnly promised that he would incur no foreign indebtedness, lest it damage the integrity of the national sovereignty, and that he would oppose the Platt Amendment. He also pledged himself not to run for reelection, since every presidential reelection during the brief history of the republic has precipitated a revolution, in one case resulting in American intervention.

President Machado's record in the face of these pledges is as follows: A year prior to the expiration of his term, through his absolute control of a constitutional convention summoned for the purpose, he had the term of office of the president extended to six years and his reelection prohibited. But under a special provision he himself as the ruling president was empowered to run for a second term. Controlling the polls and the electoral college completely, President Machado succeeded in gaining a second term, which will not expire until 1935. In the matter of foreign debts, he has contracted loans in Wall Street in a total approaching $150,000,000, the total foreign debt today, according to Dr. Max Winkler, standing at $180,000,000. The Carretera Central, a highway which runs from San Antonio, at the western tip of the island, to Santiago de Cuba, at the other end, was undertaken at a cost of $75,680,000. More than $100,000,000 has already been spent on the project, which is still incomplete, and there are portions of the road, particularly in the province of Santa Clara, which have already broken down. Enormous increases in public taxes, suspension of constitutional guaranties—including the right of habeas corpus—the enforced closing of newspaper plants, and the incarceration of hundreds of members of the opposition are all developments of the Machado regime.

The first two years of Machado's government were perhaps the most promising years of Cuba's history, notwithstanding the reports that his trips to the United States were for the purpose of securing American loans, and the appearance before long of ample evidence that money had been obtained from Wall Street. In this way the republic was mortgaged to carry out a plan of public works which in view of the economic limitations of Cuba should have been accomplished not in four or five years, but in forty years. To cover the interest on the loans, import duties were increased and a tax of ten cents was placed on every gallon of gasoline.

In addition to the $100,000,000 roadway across the island, another $20,000,000 was spent in the completion of the national capitol. The existing edifice, partially built in the epoch of Menocal, was entirely demolished to make room for another with different specifications. This magnificent palace is so grand and costly, incidentally, that it is kept closed even during the congressional session because the government cannot afford to pay for its maintenance.

The President's maneuvers to secure a reelection began early. To prevent emergence of any other candidates he formed a coalition with the presidents and leaders of the three existing parties—Conservative, Liberal, and Popular—including Dr. Clemente Vasquez Bello, president of the Senate. This bloc was not difficult to form, as none of the political groups had any definite platform. The coalition, which became known as Cooperativism, announced that if the nation was to be saved from the economic crisis which was approaching, the ruling government must not be hampered by inter-party bickering.

A convention was called in Havana on May 9, 1928, to revise several articles of the constitution. Dr. Antonio Sánchez de Bustamante, member of the International Court of Justice of the Hague, who presided, subsequently declared in the press that the members of the convention had exceeded their functions. As stated in a previous paragraph, the reform established a presidential term of six years, with the president ineligible for reelection. The office of vice-president was abolished, succession devolving upon the secretary of state in case of the president's death or disability. The terms of congressmen were increased to six and nine years, and those of governors of provinces, mayors, and councilmen were also lengthened. President Machado was then reelected unopposed, and his second term, from 1929 to 1935, was inaugurated with a sumptuousness unique in the annals of Latin America. Some thirty-seven nations sent special ambassadors, and the ceremony, taking place in the new capitol, cost about half a million dollars.

Assured of power for another six years, the government saw no reason any longer to keep up appearances. It was soon discovered that the firm known as Mestre y Machado, as early as May, 1925, had received contracts for all food and supplies destined for hospitals, penitentiaries, the army and navy, and all dependencies of the state. Such monopolistic contracts, needless to say, are highly profitable. The same firm also has a monopoly on flour and bread, and has ruined numerous bakery companies. There are even rumors of a proposal to give the corporation a monopoly on newsprint.

The proximity of partial elections in 1930 brought forth a wave of protest. The Nationalist Party, animated by politicians of the opposition, who are the most important foes of the administration, attempted a meeting in Pinar del Rio on May 18, 1930, but it was broken up by the police with serious casualties. Another group, the Brotherhood of Cuban Youth, organized the college students and succeeded in getting expressions from Menocal and Zayas, both ex-presidents, and from former vice-presidents, declaring that they were opposed to the holding of elections because internal peace would be seriously threatened. The majority of the candidates, aside from those already in office, were relatives of President Machado and of Dr. Clemente Vasquez Bello, president of the Liberal Party. In fact, the election was such a family affair that El Pais published the names of the nominees eight months before the elections.

On September 30 last the students of the National University were to hold a meeting of protest. The night before, however, the dean sent word to President Machado, who ordered troops to the campus and hid a corps of artillery in the Chrysanthemum Garden. When the students found they could not meet at the university they tried to gather at the foot of a nearby hill. The army did not attack them, but the police fired off their guns, accidentally killing the vice-president of the alumni association and wounding a number of students.

Street disorders occurred frequently thereafter in spite of strict police supervision. A student manifesto was published in one of the opposition newspapers, El Pais, and a second one was drawn up by the Brotherhood of Cuban Youth. Menocal sought to bring about some kind of conciliation, but Machado remained unbending. On the very eve of elections the government was petitioned to suspend them, but the petition went unheeded. No more than 30 per cent of the citizens, according to competent private advices, appeared at the polls, though the communication of Ambassador Guggenheim to the American government placed the proportion at 90 per cent. The character of the election has already been sufficiently indicated.

A student strike followed in all high schools, normal schools, schools of commerce, and the university. Photographs of street disorders taken by reporters started censorship of all newspapers. The latter immediately protested by shutting down their presses for a period of over two weeks. On November 14, after an agitated night during which ex-President Zayas and the Mayor of Havana had been hailed as defenders of liberty, the republic found itself deprived of its constitutional guaranties for twenty days. Toward the close of this period the Student Council and the Brotherhood prepared a manifesto requesting the President to resign from office. The manifesto created a sensation. Aristocratic societies, labor unions, cultural and professional organizations—everybody backed up the petition, crowding the streets with mobs of demonstrators. Thereupon the President secured the passage of another law suspending the constitutional guaranties for sixty days.

On December 24 the government discovered an alleged plot. This discovery served as occasion for the detention of all unfriendly elements, the closing up of all newspapers, and the renewal of persecution in all forms. Student Council members of both the university and the high schools were imprisoned, the Brotherhood suffered the same fate, and a large number of patriots were compelled to flee from the country. Colonel Aurelio Hevia, who is accused of being the arch-conspirator, is imprisoned in the Cabaña fortress, and it is estimated that the number of persons detained for political reasons is about 800. Provoked by a one-day strike of workers in tobacco and cigarette factories, fishermen, bakers, milkmen, and printers, Machado during January secured the passage of another law permitting him to suspend all rights for an indefinite period whenever he chose. He took such action on February 7.

Throughout the island students have voiced their opposition to the Machado regime, sometimes descending to acts of vandalism. In some places they have organized parades and swooped down on public squares to demolish statues of Machado and others whom they oppose. They have repeatedly drawn the fire of the police, who on one occasion accidentally killed the sister-in-law of a powerful newspaper editor, and on another fatally wounded an American citizen.

There are other real forces that may develop into worthy opponents of the Machado administration. The manifesto requesting the President to resign revealed the fact that vast numbers of people are revolted by the tactics of a man who is molding their republic into a monument of his own dictatorial power. The Nationalists, who are unrecognized, have gained the promise of Menocal to join them in their fight against the government.

Machado's main support comes from the army, which has been regularly paid and feted whenever possible. The army continues with a budget of $16,000,000 annually, leaving the Department of Agriculture with a scant $700,000 and the Department of Public Education with a budget reduced more than $2,000,000. The salaries of all public servants, with the exception of the army, have been reduced 40 per cent.

To help the economic situation there has just been enacted a special economic emergency law increasing first-class postage from two to three cents, placing a 10 per cent tax on theater tickets, and imposing a tax on radios. Among the other items subject to a tax is Bacardi rum, on which the government is to collect eighty cents for every gallon exported. The Bacardi people have protested in vain that they will move their plant to Santo Domingo. One amusing schedule in the tax law may be mentioned. For some time it has been customary for Spaniards who have spent many years in the interior of Cuba as sugar planters to return to Spain for a short time, and with the aid of a small fee to receive a title of nobility at the court. Needless to say, their increased dignity is thoroughly despised by the Cubans. The new tax law reads that each time the word "count," "duke," or "marquis" is used before a man's name in a newspaper story, the man owes the government $10. This will probably reduce the number of bombastic interviews by Count this or Duke that, little sugar-plantation owners, rather than increase the nation's revenue.

Any day now, according to one of the Cuban newspapers which has resumed operations, the red-light district of Havana, known as the "zone of tolerance," will be reopened. This announcement is significant. At the time of the first inauguration of Machado the subject of "regeneration" was widely discussed, and in deference to it the new president ordered the zone of tolerance closed. The recent promise of the government to permit the reopening of the district is unquestionably a gesture to regain the favor of the lower classes, who have been antagonized by the newly imposed taxes.

As things now stand, whenever the government's foes find voice they are thrown into jail, censorship is clapped on the press, and martial law, under the provisions of an act dating back to 1871 and therefore completely unconstitutional, is established in the large cities. When the clamor dies down, a generous hand is outstretched. On Christmas Eve last the army was tendered a dinner by the President, each soldier receiving a dollar bill in wallet on which was engraved a picture of Machado. general amnesty of all political prisoners was promised r National Independence Day, February 24, but when that y came it was found unconstitutional to liberate prisoners arged with sedition. What all this will lead to is difficult say. American intervention seems remote. As long as achado manages to find money to pay soldiers and feed em, he will have them at his beck and call. The neral economic situation gives the government a temporary spite. The student bodies and the Nationalists have exusted every means of immediate protest at their disposal, d many active opponents have been forced to flee the untry. For the time being the opposition elements are at e end of their resources.

Now, for the first time, you can get a clear, straightforward statement of what Atheism is and what it seeks to accomplish. Joseph Lewis, acknowledged leader of the Atheist movement, has prepared this statement on Atheism to satisfy the widespread demand for an authoritative statement of the Atheist philosophy, telling what it is, what it means, and what it seeks to accomplish. Rev. John Haynes Holmes, famous minister of the Community Church, New York City, calls it "BRILLIANT IN THE EXTREME; ALTOGETHER THE BEST STATEMENT ON ATHEISM THAT I HAVE EVER HEARD." Every intelligent man and woman in America should know what this rapidly growing movement believes and what it stands for. MR. HOOVER has decided to inspect some of our colonial possessions in the West Indies. It is well that he should do so, for there are many problems in this section, particularly in Porto Rico, which must be solved, and to which a President who has examined them at first hand might be expected to give more intelligent and sympathetic consideration. The Hoover Administration has already made a definite start in that direction. Its appointee, Governor Theodore Roosevelt of Porto Rico, is reported by Ernest Gruening and other competent observers who lately have visited the territory to be making marked progress in winning the confidence of the people and in dealing with some of their problems. Mr. Hoover recently transferred the administration of the Virgin Islands from the Navy to the Interior Department, and he appointed not a politician but a liberal educator, Dr. Paul Pearson of Swarthmore College, to be governor of the islands. In connection with his tour of inspection it is said that Mr. Hoover is contemplating placing the administration of all the colonial possessions under one office, presumably to be created within the Interior Department. From the standpoint of efficiency there is no reason why some of these territories should be administered by the War Department, others by the Navy, and still others by the Interior Department. Grouping them together under a civilian bureau would remove them from military rule. We question the wisdom, however, of turning them over to the Interior Department, which has already more than it can possibly handle with care and efficiency, and which of late has been subjected to increasing criticism from advocates of good government.

CALVIN COOLIDGE has come to the defense of the Senate. In his daily column he declares that "it would be dangerous for the Senate to impair further its character as a deliberative body." He goes on:

> A good measure can stand discussion. A bad bill ought to be delayed. . . . While the nature of the Senate has been changed by the direct election of its members, it has still remained a citadel of liberty because it has always contained a body of strong men who were able and willing to expose dangerous measures by adequate debate.

This is sound common sense. We should doubtless disagree with Mr. Coolidge as to the specific occasions on which the power he mentions has been most usefully exercised, and we do not believe that the Senate's greatest service consists in blocking bad legislation. We are glad, however, to see Mr. Coolidge, who more than once had his own troubles with the Senate, call attention to the great value of our one remaining deliberative body. We commend his words to that great body of uninformed public opinion which has followed the present White House lead in depreciating the Senate in order to glorify the Presidency.

THE DIFFICULTIES of international cooperation for the control of private industry are plainly indicated in the criticisms of the Chadbourne plan of sugar marketing made by Earl D. Babst, chairman of the board of directors of the American Sugar Refining Company, which is heavily interested in Cuban sugar. Mr. Babst points out that the Chadbourne plan limits Cuban production in 1931 to 3,122,000 tons, against an output of 4,671,000 tons in 1930, 5,156,000 in 1929, and an average of about 4,800,000 tons over the past six years. Restrictions on Cuban exports to the United States under the plan will prevent Cuba from selling in its "normal" market in 1931 much more than half its average crop, and will mean, Mr. Babst maintains, a permanent loss of markets to Cuba, resulting in "a radical destruction of property rights." It is on just such difficulties as this that previous restriction schemes have broken down. "Nationalism everywhere," says Mr. Babst, "in its effort to save local high-cost producers is destroying the producer in low-cost fields, even in Cuba, whose soil and climate are ideal for sugar production." He urges a reestablishment of free marketing and the promotion of low production costs in order to put the Cuban industry again on a sound footing. The problems of international economic control are vastly more difficult than is generally realized, and their successful solution involves a far wider recognition than is yet common of the advantages of international division of labor. If the other countries do not want cheap Cuban sugar, no one can oblige them to take it, but Mr. Chadbourne and his associates certainly have their work cut out for them.

A RETURN TO SANITY is indicated in the airplane-manufacturing industry, which was expanded beyond all reason in the mad days of 1928 and 1929. After the Lindbergh flight to Paris in 1927 aviation went mad, and during the next two years every sort of publicity device known to the modern public-relations counsel helped make the public "air-minded," smoothing the way for the industrious salesman of aviation securities, good, bad, and indifferent. New plants multiplied, and there was wild talk of quantity production, as though the airplane was soon to become as common as the automobile. Of course, the bubble had to burst. In 1929 the principal aviation concerns turned out 6,034 machines—many more than could be sold; last year they produced 3,224 planes, of which 2,514 were for civil use. It is a good thing that the days of ballyhoo in this new industry are over for the time being, at least. The art of flying continues to make progress, though its most substantial achievements are not necessarily those which receive the most attention in the press. The manufacturing end of the business is gradually getting down to a reasonable industrial and financial basis, and there is reason to look for solid and substantial progress now that the industry not only has its wings in the air but has its feet on the ground.

THE DECREE of the District Court of St. Paul giving the government immediate possession of the St. Paul post office which was recently acquired by condemnation proceedings has been affirmed by the Federal Circuit Court of Appeals in Kansas City, Judge Kimbrough Stone presiding. The government, it will be recalled, has been paying $120,000 a year on a long-term contract for a property appraised by a commission of disinterested viewers at $317,502, and awarded to the government at slightly more than that amount. Judge Stone in his opinion held that this "outrageous rental" gave the lessors every possible reason to delay the ultimate determination of the condemnation proceedings—a fact that would seem to be self-evident. The St. Paul lease has been the subject of prolonged inquiry by Senator Blaine's committee on post-office leases. In the course of the investigation Senator Blaine clashed sharply with former Postmaster General New, attempting to show that the latter had not exercised due diligence in purchasing the property after discovering the gross disproportion between rental and selling value, an allegation which Mr. New indignantly denied. The whole question of post-office leases greatly needs clarification, and we trust that the Blaine committee will do a thorough and impartial job.

MORE THAN 9,000,000 peasant families are already associated with Russia's collective and state farms, according to a report by Commissar of Agriculture Yakovlev to the All-Union Congress in Moscow, as reported by the Associated Press. With about 12,500,000 acres in state farms this year, and some 162,500,000 in collectives, the government's scheme of collectivization is going forward with astonishing speed, and the Commissar of Agriculture exclaims in a burst of enthusiasm that the problem of agriculture in the Soviet Union is solved, though there are many and serious difficulties ahead. In this connection Commissar Yakovlev presented to the congress for approval a proposal to introduce a piece-work system into the 85,000 collectives in order to overcome the difficulty that some of the families joining the collectives do as little as possible. Thus, the headlines again announce, the Russians are turning back to capitalist principles. It would not be the first retreat that Moscow has made in the face of practical difficulties, but the Soviet Government has displayed an astonishing ability to stick to its Communist principles in spite of these retreats, which over and over again have proved only temporary. It is a matter of no slight theoretical interest, however, just how far under communism it may prove necessary and desirable to go in payment in proportion to results—certainly not to the absurd lengths that characterize our system. The Russians have one advantage over us: when they find that one thing does not work, they can try another.

STANLEY BALDWIN'S repudiation of the Conservative diehards who would boycott the Irwin-Gandhi truce and solve the great problem of India's future by ignoring India's demands and insulting her leaders apparently has the support of the majority of his party—which insures Conservative participation in the second round-table conference and clears the air generally in England. In India complications are inevitably piling up and nothing is quite clear. The most important event on the horizon is the meeting at Karachi on March 26 of the Congress Party. Rumors of a "disgruntled Nehru," a party split, and the general confusion surrounding the meaning and use of the term "purna swaraj" can best be referred to that meeting, which should bring at least clarification. In the meantime, Gandhi seeks a basis for Hindu-Moslem unity just as the All-India Moslem League, in session in Delhi, makes his task more formidable by reasserting the Aga Khan's demand—put forward in no uncertain terms as the London conference closed—for separate electorates. One could wish that the safeguards projected by Great Britain "in the interests of India" might include a provision for joint electorates—the only sensible and permanent solution. Finally, the chamber of princes assembles in Delhi in all its autocratic splendor as Gandhi, who will join them at the next round-table conference, repeats his march to the sea in the sparse costume which Winston Churchill apparently regards as a mortal insult to the Empire and himself. Of such contrasts is the Indian picture composed.

READING THE RIOT ACT to France is about what the extraordinary speech of Wilhelm Gröner, Minister of Defense, to the Reichstag Committee of Ways and Means on March 9 seems to amount to. The obligation of Germany to disarm, Herr Gröner recalled, is founded upon the provision of the Versailles treaty which makes German disarmament a preliminary to general disarmament. Germany, he declared, has fulfilled its part of the undertaking, but has France? According to André Maginot, French Minister of War, whose recent remarks Herr Gröner recited, France has "taken account of its duty to disarm." It has reduced the number of its army divisions below that of 1913, maintains fewer men with the colors, and has substituted a one-year for a three-year service. As Herr Gröner sees it, however, all this is "only a form of rearmament that has taken account of war experience and the rapid development of war technique not to decrease but to increase the efficiency of the French army." Actually, the French army is nearly as large as it was in 1912, military training has been intensified, the staff is one and one-half times larger, and the budget has climbed steadily to a figure, for 1931, of 18,200,000,000 francs. "Do the thousands of tanks, airplanes, and cannon, the tens of thousands of machine-guns speak the language of disarmament?" Herr Gröner thinks not. His speech makes it clear that if armaments are to continue in spite of the peace treaty, Germany is entitled to an equality with France. It would seem that Great Britain, having exerted itself to bring France and Italy to an accord over their navies, has here a further opportunity for the exercise of its diplomacy.

THE BANK OF UNITED STATES investigation in New York drags its slow length along, apparently overshadowed in public interest, for the moment at least, by the shocking revelations of corruption in the municipal courts and the police force and by the multiplying accusations of neglect and inefficiency leveled against Mayor Walker. It will be a disgrace as well as a public calamity if the responsibility for the wrecking of the bank is not exposed down to the ground. Enough has already been unearthed to show that the trails of personal responsibility lead far and in many directions—so far and so wide, indeed, as to give an air of credibility to the reports that "powerful interests," financial and political, are exerting themselves to block the investigation or render it practically fruitless. The position of Joseph A. Broderick, superintendent of the State Banking Department, has become peculiarly unenviable as his connection with the bank has been shown up, and it will take a very clear body of evidence to convince the stockholders and depositors of the bank that he has not been grossly negligent in safeguarding their interests. In the present situation in New York it is out of the question to think of doing only one thing at a time. The same forces that are organizing the revolt against the mayor, the courts, and the police should see to it that the bank inquiry is not allowed to slacken.

THERE IS A CLASS of persons honestly convinced that most contemporary masterpieces were stolen by hook or crook from the disregarded efforts of their own pens. One cannot know, of course, whether or not to reckon among these Miss Georges Lewys, author of "The Temple of Pallas Athene," who is now bringing suit against Eugene O'Neill in the sum of $2,000,000 for plagiarism in the writing of "Strange Interlude." Miss Lewys quotes examples of verbatim similarity between the two works. These consist of lines like: "I must become a mother."—"You must become a mother." "He is a weakling."—"He is a weakling." "I have been sadly disillusioned."—"I would be disillusioned." "Old Fox."—"Old Fox." From the newspaper accounts it is impossible to determine which author wrote which line. Nor does it greatly matter. It is obvious to any simple person not engaged in conducting a lawsuit, and hence bound by certain rules, that these are similarities of the most trivial and meaningless sort. Alleged similarities of plot are shown to have been used in many other works—for example, in Mr. Philip Barry's play "Tomorrow and Tomorrow," plagiarized from the Bible and now playing unchallenged in New York. Mr. O'Neill deposes that he never saw a copy of Miss Lewys's work. But however the suit is decided, he will have had to spend considerable time and money in defending it. Meanwhile Miss Lewys and her book, which was perhaps not too widely known, is getting a handsome amount of free, full-column newspaper advertising. That being the case, let us confess that our sympathy is with Mr. O'Neill. And when we think how Miss Lewys could have cleaned up on the Bard of Avon, if she had been, by any chance, the author of all his stolen plots, we tremble for any author, the more in danger as he is eminent and admired.

WHEN JOSEPH POTTER COTTON, Undersecretary of State, died in Baltimore on March 10 the State Department lost not only a capable executive officer, but also a force for sanity and stability such as the department had not had for many years. Undersecretary Cotton was intellectually honest and genuinely liberal. He accepted none of the prevailing principles and policies of the State Department merely because they were based upon precedent or had functioned fairly effectively for a number of years. He insisted upon a reexamination of every problem that came before him and was further insistent that the solution of each problem must be based upon its individual merits. It is yet too early to measure or fully appreciate the extent of his influence upon American diplomacy; it must be considered that other persons had a hand in the recent liberalization of American policy in Haiti, Nicaragua, and elsewhere in the Caribbean area; nevertheless, his was the guiding hand in much of the work that the Hoover-Stimson Administration has been undertaking in that section. Moreover, his personal influence was felt throughout the State Department. Washington newspaper correspondents report that his personality worked as a leaven even in the ultra-conservative, tradition-bound Latin American Division of the department. Finally, critics of American foreign policy whose opinions were sound and facts substantial could always obtain a hearing from Joseph Cotton, although other officials were inclined to turn these critics away as cranks. Among other reasons, we regret that Mr. Cotton should have died before his influence could be brought to bear on the Russian question.

WE EXTEND A HEARTY WELCOME to Dr. Judah L. Magnes, chancellor of the Hebrew University at Jerusalem. During the black years of the war this modern prophet made no compromise with the forces of falsehood and hatred, and the soul-searching days of the massacres of 1929 showed that his spirit is still incapable of entertaining any thought of malice or revenge. His abounding energy is now devoted to the task of building up a great Hebrew seat of learning at Jerusalem, to hold aloft the torch of Jewish culture and to serve as a center of better mutual understanding among the people of all races and religions in the little land whose history is so closely linked with East and West alike. "Are the Jews," asks Dr. Magnes, "with their rich background, to say something more in the course of their history? Have they any life left to them? Any intellectual strength? Has Jerusalem, the sacred city, any more to say?" To these questions his own thought and work are answer enough. He may be assured of a warm welcome in his native land on the part of every lover of learning and peace and understanding and good-will among men.

Progressivism Awakes

IN Washington the Progressives and their economic and social advisers have met, talked at great length, and adjourned. It is yet too early to measure the full value of their conference, or to take stock of all its potential results. It is too early to say that the Progressives have at last risen to the grave emergency confronting the country, but in any case the Washington conference did show clearly that they, alone among the various major political groups, are seriously concerned with the economic crisis, and are desirous that something shall be done, not only to relieve the present widespread suffering, but to repair the defects in our economic and social machinery that have brought about this suffering.

Although it was announced that only one question was to be considered at the conference, that of laying the groundwork for a legislative program to be undertaken at the next session of Congress, in fact two problems presented themselves to the Washington meeting. Of these, the legislative program was the lesser, notwithstanding it was undoubtedly of more immediate importance. But the larger problem sprang out of the need for arousing the public conscience against the shameless abandonment of the American people by its present political, industrial, and financial leadership, and out of the necessity for instilling in the vast inert masses of the people a greater degree of confidence than they have had in Progressive leadership and ideas. The conference achieved something, at least, toward these ends. Even if it had served no other purpose, it called the attention of the public sharply, if only for the brief space of a few days, to the scope and seriousness of the problems before the country, and indicated something of the willingness and capacity of the Progressives to deal with this situation. Whether the Progressive group can hold popular confidence, and whether they can answer the questions they themselves put before the people in the conference, only time will tell. If they fail, and if the depression continues much longer (and most of their expert advisers believed prosperity would be long in returning), the Progressives will unquestionably be swept aside and some stronger, and perhaps more radical, group will arise to challenge the present political and economic overlordship of the country.

However that may be, the Washington Progressives, at last stirred into action, have finally taken the step which should have been taken before the opening of the last session of Congress. Further, it must be conceded that the Washington meeting had an unusual significance. A major political conference has been held to deal, not with political problems as such, but with economic and social problems stripped of their political aspects. For the first time a body of political realists has frankly and unashamedly challenged, not the Republican and Democratic parties, but the system that these parties represent and defend. Speaker after speaker, whether politician or expert, radical or conservative, arose and defined the enemy by name; they said little or nothing of Republicans and Democrats; they concentrated their fire on the "system" and on "capitalism." Here is a portent for the immediate future that the Jim Watsons cannot dismiss with their sneers, and that the Herbert Hoovers cannot ignore with their superior silences. Had the conferees been Communists or theoretical Socialists, the Washington meeting might have deserved only passing attention, but they were not; they included practical politicians actually in office, well-known economists upon whom even the capitalists occasionally call for advice, university professors of substantial standing, social workers of international importance, conservative labor leaders who are finally beginning to realize the falsehood and futility of their alliance with the capitalist-entrepreneur class. Their challenge was born out of reality, and not out of vague doctrines. Their message in effect was a warning to the Hoovers, Mellons, Youngs, Schwabs, Insulls, and others that capitalism as at present constituted is being seriously questioned, that the Progressives are prepared to do what they can to rebuild the capitalist structure so that it may be of benefit to the people as a whole and not simply to a restricted few, and that the alternative to Progressive rule may easily be socialism or communism.

Ominous as it may appear at first glance, this was the real message of the Washington conference. The Progressives have not yet established their capacity to solve the problems they discussed. It was not to be expected that forceful leadership and a balanced program should spring at once out of this meeting. The next twelve months will determine whether the potential leadership shown in the conference is strong enough to exert itself effectively, and whether out of the present beginnings there can be developed a genuine and workable program. In the direction of a return to representative government and on the tariff and power questions the conference made some progress; the relatively radical proposals to stabilize industry and remedy unemployment were almost unanimously approved; but on the farm-relief question (and it must not be forgotten that this problem is no less important than the unemployment and power questions) the speakers for the most part came forward with the same old quack remedies. After hearing the present tariff system ably and justifiably denounced as a dole for industry, Senator Borah and others urged the adoption of the export-debenture plan and similar schemes on the ground that the farmers, too, should be subsidized. Other errors of omission and commission could be cited, but the detailed discussion and criticism of a legislative program is a task for the coming months—a task to which the Progressive leaders and their advisers, we assume, will be giving earnest attention. Let them, however, beware lest they go into the next Congress with a program that is nothing but a bundle of resolutions and good intentions. Their program must be put into the form of draft legislation; it must take the shape of definite measures to be introduced into the House or Senate, upon which they are all agreed in advance of the convening of Congress. If they can publicly unite, say at another conference to be held in the autumn, upon concrete bills ready for the Congressional hopper, they will go far toward fusing behind them the public opinion necessary to put their legislative program into effect.

New York's Shame

NEW YORK CITY, it appears at last, is not wholly dead to civic decency. In November, 1929, after four years' experience of the existing administration, it reelected James J. Walker as mayor by a plurality of half a million votes. In so doing the citizens of the metropolis gave their approval to a management of their affairs that has rarely been surpassed in its inefficiency and cynical disregard of the ordinary decencies of government. About the only interpretation that it was possible to put on their action was that they did not care. As the year 1930 passed, with its progressive revelations of rottenness in one branch of public administration after another, yet with no effective public protest, it seemed as though the city had lost all capacity for indignation at civic betrayal. The newspapers published sensational stories of the demoralization of courts, of police, of bureaus and offices throughout the city administration. All such charges the Mayor met with meaningless gestures. Nothing more seemed to be required in view of the indifference or the cynical amusement displayed by the ordinary citizen. Meanwhile the exigencies of partisan politics at Albany, the political needs of a governor anxious to be President and eager not to offend Tammany unduly, the maneuvers of a Republican organization no less corrupt than Tammany—all combined to prevent the initiation of any attack from up the river.

But at last the storm clouds of public wrath began gathering. The city began to be stirred by successive quick disclosures of court and police participation in the "framing" of women on charges of prostitution. Then came the brutal murder of Vivian Gordon to insure her silence—a crime that served to enkindle the indignation that a long train of offenses scarcely less flagitious had failed to arouse, and at last there is arising from important groups a strong demand for a sweeping investigation of the whole intolerable situation in the city government. The Governor has finally acted in one instance, appointing Justice Seabury to investigate charges made by the City Club against District Attorney Crain with a view to his removal. The Society for the Prevention of Crime has appealed to the Governor and the legislature to give Justice Seabury full power for a city-wide investigation, and specifically for an inquisition of Mayor Walker's office, but unfortunately it has not presented specific charges against the city's executive head. The New York City Congregational Church Association, the Presbyterian Union of New York, and the New York City Federation of Churches have all voiced a demand for a sweeping city-wide investigation, as have also the New York Board of Trade and the United Neighborhood Houses of New York. A Committee of One Thousand under the chairmanship of W. J. Schieffelin is forming to aid in pushing such an investigation. The City Affairs Committee, under the chairmanship of John Haynes Holmes, announces its purpose to formulate specific charges against the Mayor and compel the Governor to face the issue of instituting removal proceedings.

In the face of such a gathering storm, Mayor Walker, figuratively speaking, lights a Murad and lights out for California, declaring that he will be back shortly. A few days earlier he had summoned a group of social workers to the City Hall to help him get rid of vice and maintain New York's reputation "as being the cleanest, most moral city in the world"! Confessing himself "more or less shocked" at the stories of corruption in the courts and the police force, the Mayor characteristically left the meeting before anyone had a chance to suggest what to do. His present action in leaving the city at a time when he is actually threatened with formal charges is a fitting climax to a career of irresponsibility hard to match in the annals of New York. We regret it if the Mayor is ill, but his place today is in New York, where Norman Thomas is declaring: "His administration and his office have been incompetent, ineffective, and futile so far as concerns the needs of New York as opposed to the needs of Tammany and Tammany office-holders." There is the whole thing in a nutshell, and we cannot hope too strongly that the aroused conscience of New York will insist on the most rigid investigation of the official acts of its chief executive as well as of the gang of looters and bandits in office whom he has allowed to prey upon the city. If ever charges of neglect against a public officer demanded investigation, we believe they demand it today in the case of Mayor Walker. But any real investigation must plow deep; for it concerns not simply minor courts and policemen who prey on women, not merely subordinate officials in city bureaus, not merely the highest officers in borough and in city administration. It must extend to the political operations of the banks, the building industry, the important commercial concerns, the thousands of great business interests that profit from maintaining a government of the type that disgraces New York today. Let us have an investigation that will show the system in its exact operation. Honest business and honest government are entitled to vindication, and the whole existing growth of inefficiency and corruption must be rooted out.

The Naval Agreement

NOBODY except naval experts and a few government officials is likely to pay much attention to the statistical parts of the British memorandum in which the terms of the Franco-Italian naval agreement are set out. Figures of tonnage or gun caliber are of slight significance to the average man or woman, and even the experts do not always agree about what the figures mean. What most people will want to know is whether the agreement really puts an end to competitive naval building by France and Italy; whether, if it does, it also disposes of the disputed issue of parity between the navies of those two Powers, and whether it paves the way to the general reduction and limitation of armaments of all kinds which an international conference is scheduled to undertake in February, 1932.

The first of these questions may, with some qualification, be answered in the affirmative. It will be recalled that the refusal of France and Italy to accept the tonnage limitations of the London naval treaty because of their dispute about parity resulted in the inclusion in the treaty of a safeguarding provision which permitted either of the three signatory Powers—the United States, Great Britain, and Japan —to increase its tonnage in case the Powers that did not sign increased theirs. The elaborate programs of competitive building which France and Italy have prosecuted made it reasonably certain that Great Britain, at least, would feel compelled to resort to this so-called escalator clause, and it is this danger that the accord recently concluded appears to have averted. France and Italy will continue to build, but the building will be according to a scale and not competitive. The scale, it must be admitted, is liberal, and the British Admiralty is reported as thinking that the tonnage balance will still dip unduly against Great Britain, but we have the government's word for it that the escalator clause will not be invoked.

The parity issue, on the other hand, has been only postponed, to come up again at the latest in 1936 when the London treaty will regularly be reconsidered, but quite probably in 1932 when the whole subject of disarmament is before the international conference. France, meantime, will enjoy the superiority of 150,000 tons more or less upon which it has insisted, the principal difference being that the distribution of tonnage among the various categories of vessels will be somewhat more to Italy's advantage. France can thus claim that it has surrendered nothing important, and Italy can profess satisfaction in the prospect of a fleet better adapted to its special needs, notwithstanding the continued inferiority in global tonnage. The fundamental issue, however, remains almost exactly where it was when Mr. Henderson and Mr. Alexander began their negotiations at Paris and Rome.

Has the outlook for the disarmament conference, then, been improved? In one important respect it has. If, when the conference met, France and Italy had been engaged in a competitive struggle, the former to maintain its naval superiority and the latter to achieve parity, the chances of agreement upon any plan of general naval reduction or limitation would have been appreciably dimmed, while if the navies proved unmanageable the land and air armaments could hardly have been dealt with at all. There is encouragement in the willingness of France and Italy to accept the British good offices and temporarily drop a controversy which was setting all Europe by the ears and affecting public opinion in the United States and Japan. The general subject can now be discussed without at the same time watching the progress of a race. The concession is by no means entirely satisfactory, and it does not, in and of itself, contribute in the slightest degree to the solution of the parity problem, but it nevertheless has the advantage of not complicating the matter by setting it in terms of out-and-out competition building.

The hope that Italy and France, having been helped to an accord at one point, may find a way of harmonizing their differences at another is probably the chief reason for the added interest that is being shown in the preparations for the conference next year. There is certainly need of all the cheerfulness that can be mustered. What with armies, navies, air forces, chemical warfare, budgetary control, parity, offensive and defensive alliances, and all the other issues that war involves, the conference may well turn out to be the most important international meeting since the peace conference at Paris, for the task before it is nothing less than a sweeping reorganization of world policy in one of the most important aspects of international relations.

The Advertiser's Art

As the advertising expert, with his "psychology," "science," and technical jargon, increases in prestige and affluence the outsider begins to wonder whether there has been any corresponding increase in the effectiveness of advertising itself. That it has made enormous advances in attractiveness could hardly be denied by anyone who reads such a magazine as the Saturday Evening Post, with its handsome color reproductions. But how about its effectiveness for its supposedly primary if not sole function of creating a demand for goods?

The truth seems to be that advertising is becoming less a direct device for "selling the stuff" and more and more a game played for its own sake. In the old paleolithic days of Carter's Little Liver Pills and Smith Brothers' Cough Drops, the product at least got the center of the stage; now it is being shoved farther and farther in the corner to make room for other things, chief of which is the pretty girl. A glance around a single subway car reveals twelve advertisements in each of which the main emphasis is on a pretty girl, with an entirely secondary emphasis on the article ostensibly advertised. Included in the posters is a cigarette advertisement in which a pretty girl gazes into a mirror and is neither carrying nor smoking a cigarette; a coffee advertisement in which the center of attraction is a pretty girl with part of her breast discreetly exposed; a shampoo advertisement in which the center of attraction is a pretty girl with a good deal more of her breast indiscreetly exposed; and an advertisement for a corn remover in which the emphasis is thrown on the colored photograph of a lady in step-ins that expose as much as the law allows.

Newspaper advertisements reveal the same situation ten times multiplied, though often with more reason. Two hundred women in various stages of dress and undress walk through the columns. Perhaps the most striking illustration is the series of advertisements being run for a well-known cigarette. They occupy about two-thirds of a page; the space is almost completely dominated by a pretty girl in a bathing suit cut very low in the back. At the top one learns the general truth that "Sunshine Mellows." An alert observer may discover at the bottom what is being advertised.

That such an advertisement does not sell cigarettes we do not contend. We do feel confident that if the same space were swept clean, and the simple name of the cigarette —and nothing else—printed in large type there, the advertisement would be five times as effective in reminding the consumer of the product and presumably getting him to buy it. But an advertising agency that used such a simple device could never convince its clients that it was using "psychology" and all the other arcana of its craft.

Advertising, in truth, seems to be going sex-mad. The pretty girl is emphasized always at the expense of the product; instead of drawing attention to it, she acts as a lightning rod, attracting and channeling attention away from it. What advertisers chiefly suggest is not that a certain cigarette or corn remover is desirable, but that a beautiful girl is. This ought to comfort those who think that America puts business before everything. Business now exists merely to glorify American Womanhood.

The Conference Must Succeed

By VISCOUNT CECIL

THE Disarmament Conference of February, 1932, already dominates the horizon of international politics. I make no apology for reverting to it. It is one of those crucial events in the history of the world that must either succeed or fail. It cannot just be a succession of long-drawn inconclusive discussions which are a matter of indifference to the life of nations. Indeed, I believe that the consequence of failure would be so catastrophic to all who read these lines that I beg them to join with me now in foreseeing them, and next in striving to prevent them.

Let us consider what failure means. First, the conference might break up without reaching any agreement. It is perhaps unlikely that human folly would go as far as this. It ought to be inconceivable that the representatives of sixty "civilized" nations should meet to settle the form of a treaty which they all professedly desire and should separate without even a partial agreement. But remembering the incredible follies of 1914 one must admit that internationally anything may happen.

Even if this supreme stupidity is avoided, there may still be failure. The conference might result in a mere codification of armaments at their present level. There are statesmen and writers, even in some of the most enlightened states, who calmly contemplate such a result as this. They continue to talk of the impossibility of reducing their present armaments, and glibly announce their intention of writing the existing figures for their armies, navies, air forces, and military budgets into the Disarmament Convention. That certainly means failure. Even if more were accomplished, if the mountain, having been in travail for months and months at Geneva with no advantage to anyone except the hotel-keepers, were to bring forth a mouse in the form of some negligible reduction on the part of the great military Powers, that would not meet the case.

Do not let us forget the main reason for disarmament. No doubt it is desirable on many grounds, economic, political, and social. But they are not much more urgent now than they have always been. If they stood alone, the issue might perhaps have been postponed. The consideration that forces us to definite and immediate action is "scrupulous respect for treaty obligations." The pledge originally given by M. Clemenceau on behalf of the Allied and Associated Powers, reinforced by Article 8 of the various treaties of peace, repeated in the final article of the Locarno treaties, and constantly reiterated in resolutions and declarations in the Assembly of the League of Nations, still awaits fulfilment. It is chiefly to give effect to those pledges that, after prolonged preparations, the conference of next February really has been called. If these pledges are to be treated as "scraps of paper," the whole basis on which the organization of peace rests will be undermined.

That is a result which none of us can contemplate with equanimity. Some special consequences will follow directly. We must expect that the demand to rearm by the defeated nations will become insistent. The protests of the present German government, a government of moderation, even the demands of the Nazis and the Stahlhelm are as nothing compared with the uprising of ordinary patriotic opinion in Germany in favor of a recovery of her military position which will occur if the Allies definitely fail to redeem their promises at the Geneva conference of 1932. The very least that can happen will be a renewal of the race in armaments under the worst possible conditions. I know I shall be told that legally the obligation to disarm will still bind the ex-enemy Powers. The point is arguable but not important. Such an obligation, even if it exists, could not in the circumstances be enforced without violence. It would lack sufficient moral validity to secure the support of general world opinion—the only alternative to material coercion; and material coercion means war, with the sympathies of other nations hopelessly divided. Nor is Germany the only country affected. There are Hungary, Austria, and Bulgaria also to be considered, with Russia ever on the watch to seize an opportunity to break up the system of "capitalist" civilization.

It is then no exaggeration to say that the most probable political consequences of an unsuccessful Disarmament Conference next year are that Europe will fall into two armed forces and that the competition in armaments will revive—competition not merely between individual states, but what is far worse, between two powerful groups of states maneuvering for superiority. It is only too likely that this most dangerous development will be accompanied by withdrawals from the League of Nations, a policy of despair of which we have quite recently had a forewarning. I do not believe for a moment that the League, once more tainted with partiality, and with its moral prestige ruined by failure to achieve one of the chief tasks for which it was created, would very long survive. Nothing but the fading reaction against the last war would then stand between Europe and another and far more terrible fratricide.

Let no one imagine from this baneful prophecy that I would encourage or condone any one of the national policies which I foresee as the logical consequence of a collapse of the Geneva conference. On the contrary, I believe that a policy of competition in armaments is always wicked and always mad; I believe that it would be of no real advantage to Germany, Austria, Hungary, and Bulgaria to rearm. It would only mean increase in taxation, a waste of national resources, a turning aside of the thoughts of the manhood of the nation from the essential work of peaceful reconstruction, and a definite lessening of national safety owing to the rivalries which it would provoke. But national pride is still stronger than reason: it is with that dynamic force that we have to reckon in considering the urgent necessity of achieving disarmament.

Succeed we must. The alternative is too sinister for any man or woman of good sense and good-will to contemplate. And there is a way to succeed. Let those who share the convictions which I have expressed refuse to be sidetracked by expert objections about the technical value of this particular form of armament or that, and concentrate upon the one form of reduction of armaments which the ordinary citizen can understand and which comes within the scope of every parliament. Let them demand a definite cut in the total military expenditure of the Powers represented at the conference. I believe that it is perfectly reasonable and possible—with dogged perseverance—to achieve at the 1932 conference an all-round reduction of 25 per cent in the military budgets of those countries which did not have reductions imposed upon them by the treaties. This would be a first step—but a considerable step—toward that international equality which all serious students of European affairs foresee and accept. Further reduction would have to be considered after the first convention expires.

I do not suggest that by itself this will altogether meet the demands for equality put forward by Germany and other Powers. Nor have I forgotten the French case for security as a condition of disarmament. But I would venture to ask those who insist on this condition not to forget the history of the last four years. Not only has an immense advance been made in the moral safeguards of peace by the acceptance of the Optional Clause, the signatures of the General Act, and above all the universal ratification of the Pact of Paris, but much has been done in the direction of material security. There are the Locarno treaties by which the signatories bind themselves to guarantee with the whole of their national forces the settlements there set out. There is the Treaty of Financial Assistance which in return for disarmament sets up a special machinery to give financial assistance to a state attacked. There are the Assembly resolutions giving precision to the steps which may be taken to safeguard peace under Article 11 and the proposals now pending to give to those resolutions the authority of an international treaty. Finally, there are the suggested amendments to the Covenant designed to make the provisions of the Pact of Paris part of the League jurisprudence and thereby close the celebrated gap in Article 15.

Surely the cumulative effect of these international acts is considerably to strengthen the already wide obligations of the Covenant. Is it not time for the advocates of security to show their sincerity by making a real advance in the direction of disarmament? That certainly is the clear opinion of my country expressed by Mr. Henderson at the last Assembly, when he laid it down that we could undertake no further obligations for increasing security except in return for disarmament.

That then is the choice before us: failure of the conference and a return to European anarchy and chaos; success and a definite advance on the road which leads to international organization and peace.

Progressives Turn to the Left

By MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

Washington, March 13

ONE hundred and forty years ago the King of France was put to death by the Jacobins. He had outlived his usefulness and had lost his power. When the guillotine chopped off the head of the sixteenth Louis Capet on that day in January, 1793, more than a man died; with him went an entire system of government. Some days previously the radicals of Paris, sitting in convention, voted to confirm what everyone knew, that the system represented by Louis XVI was no longer of service to France. Later they arose one by one to decide whether the symbol of this system should be preserved or forever abolished; the majority elected death for the king. Here in Washington these last two days a group of some of the most intelligent men and women in the country have been sitting in judgment upon the politico-economic system that now dominates the United States. One by one these persons arose to explain what is apparent to all observant Americans, that our system has ceased to serve the people as a whole. They left the impression upon their hearers that unless something is soon done to overhaul or rebuild this system in effective fashion, another and more violently radical group would in the near future be found voting to put capitalism to death.

It has been characteristic of past periods of depression in the United States that labor leaders have temporarily abandoned their economic weapons in the hope of finding solutions for labor's problems in the political field. At the same time the intellectuals have invariably attempted to seize such opportunities for the purpose of forcing their socialistic or other panaceas upon both the working people and the politicians. Even in more recent years the various groups have refused to make the sacrifices necessary to successful cooperation. In the Progressive conferences of the immediate past, for example, politics and political views have dominated; more emphasis has been placed on potential ways and means of turning the major parties out of office than upon the economic and social problems awaiting solution.

In the conference which closed last night this situation was almost completely reversed. Politics for the sake of politics was entirely suppressed; utopianism and demagoguery raised but a feeble voice; the intellectuals got down to the bedrock of reality in putting forward their various proposals; the labor leaders confessed that they had more to gain by working in harness with other progressive and liberal groups than by continuing their mésalliance with capitalism, and the farm leaders finally acknowledged the close relationship between the interests of the farmers and those of the workers in the industrial centers. Summed up, the conference was the first ever held in this country that was political in form and yet wholly economic in content. It forsook the traditional American way of trying to apply political solutions to economic problems, and frankly adopted the Russian method of attempting to deal with such problems by applying purely economic standards and formulas. To this extent progressive thought in America as represented by the Washington conference has swung decidedly to the left, has become almost revolutionary.

Again and again this note was sounded by conference speakers. Although they spoke in the shadow of the White House (the conference hall being only a block away), very few of the thirty or forty persons who addressed the conference even so much as mentioned the Republican or Democratic parties or referred to Mr. Hoover in a political sense. Similarly, very few of them hesitated to denounce frankly and boldly the "capitalists" and the "present economic system." Senator Borah charged that the depression "has been accentuated and deepened by a coterie of capitalists who inaugurated the most vicious era of speculation and inflation of which the world gives any record." Senator Norris declared that "partisanship is one of the greatest evils of the democratic form of government." Mayor Frank Murphy of Detroit demanded that the federal government awaken to its economic responsibilities in the present crisis. Robert P. Scripps, millionaire newspaper publisher, said he was opposed to socialism, but nevertheless demanded "a much wider distribution of wealth through wages or otherwise." Senator La Follette talked, not of the deficiencies in our party system, but of "the breakdown of industrial, financial, and political leadership."

Among the technical experts, of course, there was not even a suggestion of partisan politics. Leo Wolman, the economist, did not say that this or that political device, or this or that political party, offers the best hope of reducing and preventing unemployment; instead, he outlined the problem with clarity and precision, and was most firm in declaring that it can be solved only by compulsory legislation founded upon practical economics. Sidney Hillman, president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, and a man who has been described as the foremost labor statesman in the world today, told of his success in creating an unemployment-insurance plan in the clothing industry. In other industries, however, "the powerful leaders have shirked their duty," and, therefore, "it is now the task of the government to step in . . . to save the country from drifting into further chaos." Fred W. Sargent, president of the Chicago and North Western Railway, urged the adoption of a realizable farm program based upon "known economic laws." He suggested that to let the agricultural depression run along unchecked until the farmers "are starved out of business" would be "a cruel solution of the problem." Father John A. Ryan, the noted Catholic humanitarian, offered the not altogether new, but nevertheless radical, suggestion that the wealthier citizens be taxed to finance a program for the relief of the unemployed through adoption of a huge public-works program. Stuart Chase, asserting that "the times call for the boldest economic thinking this republic has ever done," suggested the creation of an economic general staff.

Thus it went all down the line. Charles A. Beard, the historian, Donald R. Richberg, the authority on public utilities, W. T. Rawleigh, the tariff expert, Rudolph Spreckels, of the famous sugar family, Fred Brenckman, of the National Grange, an outstanding farm leader, and the many others who addressed the meeting were almost unanimously agreed that the present struggle was above and beyond the strength of the currently dominant political organizations to cope with, that the question stood outside the range of partisan activities, and that the individualism of Mr. Hoover and his friends had utterly failed in the crisis. It was emphasized time and again that in the opinion of the men and women attending the conference the government, as distinguished from the politicians who make up the government, must be forced to take action in the economic field, which heretofore has been left for the most part to private initiative and control. They were, in brief, advocating a course of action that stops but little short of undisguised socialism. The legislative recommendations of three of the committees appointed by the conference followed, though less noticeably, the same tendency.

The conference did not adopt a definite and final program, but five committees were appointed to work at this task through the spring and summer. Senator La Follette's committee on unemployment and industrial stabilization was divided into six sections for the purposes of this study. Senator Costigan's committee on the tariff made a preliminary report to the conference, and is expected to draw up definite measures to submit to the next Congress. Senator Cutting's committee on representative government offered various recommendations to increase the control of Congress over policy and law-making, to democratize the election of Presidents, to simplify legislative procedure, and to liberalize the rules of the House of Representatives. Other committees which will work through the next several months in formulating a program include one on the power question, headed by Senator Norris, and one on agriculture, of which Senator Borah is to be the chairman. In order to coordinate the efforts of these five bodies an informal committee of political and lay Progressives will meet from time to time in Washington during the summer. In this sense it may be said that the Progressives have at last succeeded in setting up a continuing organization, although the organization may prove too loosely woven together to be effective. However, the Progressives adjourned with the feeling that in view of the deep inroads the recent decade of dazzling but deceptive prosperity had made into liberal strength and spirit they, the Progressives, should consider themselves fortunate to have been able to make as much progress as they did in the Washington conference.

One thing that the conference failed to bring out was a single forceful leader. Nevertheless, even here certain marked tendencies must be recorded. The meeting was almost entirely in the hands of a group of elder statesmen, and it was these men, politicians and heads of national organizations, who did most of the talking and who pleaded most earnestly for action. The younger men, including many of the technical experts, remained in the background, coming forward not with demands but with plans for action when they were called upon. Many of the older speakers recognized, Senator Norris openly and the others by inference, that they must soon retire in favor of youth, in favor of the Hillmans, Wolmans, Chases, and La Follettes, who know where they want to go and just how to get there. These men might be said to be already the leaders of the Progressive movement in that they are furnishing it with the ideas necessary to keep it moving forward. It was their suggestions and proposals and their frank discussions of the issues involved that lifted the conference out of politics and put it on a genuine and sincere economic plane. The conference was called to work out a legislative program for 1931-32, a task which can perhaps be most safely left to the older and more experienced politicians; but for the longer haul—and it must be admitted that the goal cannot be reached in a year or two—leadership must devolve upon the younger, more enthusiastic, and more energetic men. At the Washington conference these younger men revealed that they were preparing themselves for this task.

Wisconsin's Experimental College

By ELISEO VIVAS

Madison, Wisconsin, March 6

THIS is perhaps the most inauspicious moment to write on the Experimental College of the University of Wisconsin. The day the editor of The Nation requested an article on it, its chairman, Dr. Alexander Meiklejohn, made a motion at a regular meeting of the faculty of the College of Letters and Science, of which the Experimental College is a part, proposing that no freshman class be admitted for the next academic year. It was further proposed that a committee assess the findings of the experiment with the end in view either of continuing it or so reforming it as to abandon entirely or in part the present scheme. The probable future of the college is the subject of wild guessing in the university and throughout the State; but the opinion of the majority seems to be that the experiment will be abandoned. If Dr. Meiklejohn's motion is the first step toward discontinuing the college, one of the most important and challenging educational experiments of recent years hereby comes to an end.

The Experimental College of the University of Wisconsin, created by recommendation of the faculty of letters and science and action of the regents of the university, admitted its first freshman class in the fall of 1927. At its head was placed a man widely known for his courage and high-minded devotion to the cause of higher education in America. Dr. Meiklejohn had been highly successful as dean of Brown University for about ten years, and later had been forced to resign from the presidency of Amherst College, where he had attempted to carry out a radical educational reform.

Dr. Meiklejohn's dissatisfaction with the current practice in education springs from his belief that its aims are superficial and inadequate, that it is contented with merely imparting information to the student in a passive fashion if the student is unwilling to go himself in search of education. Students come to college to carry away information "like a load of mental furniture for the adorning and equipping of the mental chambers of their minds." Educational procedure as a rule fails to attempt a reconstruction of the individual in which imparted information fuses with his character and effects a radical change in his whole personality. Dr. Meiklejohn does not believe that intellectual improvement, scholarship, or erudition for its own sake should be the final end of education. Education must create wise and intelligent men, not merely well-informed men. For Dr. Meiklejohn is keenly conscious of the urgent need of creating an intellectual democratic leadership, and the consciousness of this need determines his values and the direction of his educational activity. He is one of that dwindling minority who still retain a genuine and effective faith in the possibilities of democracy. Therefore, contrary to current practice, which unconsciously conceives the aim of education to be the shaping of men to achieve supine conformity—adaptation is the euphemism used for the process—he sees the need of building citizens capable of accomplishing the mutual process of reshaping themselves and the environment, a process which alone can make for intelligent and successful living in a democracy. In education, he says:

> . . . our primary task is that of taking all types of young people and discovering of what they are capable. Our scheme of government, our scheme of morals, our scheme of social relations are built upon the view that all normal persons are capable of understanding. The schools of such a social scheme are pledged to develop that understanding if it can be done. A democracy has a right to make that demand upon its teachers, and if teachers give up the task without attempting it, a democracy has a right to condemn them as untrue to their responsibilities.

Two things must be noted in passing. The first is that this faith is for Dr. Meiklejohn not the expression of a rhetorical fancy, but a living, driving force, for which he has already shown himself willing to sacrifice his own personal advantage. The second is that some of the criticisms leveled at the experiment, and at the University of Wisconsin for starting it, spring from the fact that the critics are troubled by a conception of education so deep-going that it appears to the standpatter to contain tendencies subversive of the status quo. It is fitting, however, that the University of the State of Wisconsin should fearlessly foster and give every opportunity, as it has done, to such an experiment, reaffirming once again the spirit of enlightenment and academic progressivism which has always informed it.

Imbedded in his philosophy of education we find, in Dr. Meiklejohn's utterances on the subject, criticisms of the methods of teaching now in operation in American colleges. Therefore his experiment must be said to embody two aims which for the purposes of analysis must be clearly distinguished. Officially the experiment aims to project a tentative direction along which educational reforms can take place. But involved in it will be found implicit Dr. Meiklejohn's conception of the function of a liberal education—the most important aspect of the whole venture, it seems to me. It is possible to disagree with that conception and with the philosophy of life from which it grows, as the trustees of Amherst did when Dr. Meiklejohn attempted to actualize it there. And if one altogether rejects it, very little discussion of the plan is possible. On the other hand, it is possible to agree with his philosophy and to sympathize with the vision of life in which it takes roots and yet to disagree regarding the instrumentalities which Dr. Meiklejohn has devised to realize his vision. It may perhaps be contended that these instrumentalities and these aims necessarily involve each other if properly conceived; and in some cases they patently do. Criticisms of the experiment are often heard which involve the confusion of these two aims.

Purely as an experiment, "the principle by which the college is attempting to adjust the relations of teachers and pupils is that the student must do his own learning"; and some malicious wits have remarked that that has been the radical trouble with the venture. Three features the college was instructed to investigate: the methods of teaching, the content of study, and the determining conditions of undergraduate life. But no brief account can give an adequate idea of all the important aspects of the scheme. Emphasis is put on the individual character of the relations between teachers and pupils. There are no classes or recitations; instruction takes the form of discussion in personal conference. There are lectures, but these consist for the most part of an introduction in which a point of view is presented by the lecturer, followed by a general discussion among the students. And this contrasts with the accent put on "group life" at the college. The scheme was devised with the aim of awakening the students by placing upon them as a group the responsibility for intellectual effort, by making the group conscious of itself as an intellectual unity (a thing which in many instances has justifiably annoyed the rest of the university), and by putting the emphasis of the college years on cooperative activity.

No novelty is claimed for some of the features of the scheme. The conference method of teaching at once recalls the Oxford system of tutorials. "Group living," which is deemed an important aspect of the experiment, was to be found in most American colleges before they grew to their present monstrous size, and may still be found in some small college communities. The innovation here consists only in this—that cooperative activity along cultural lines has been more stimulated and given greater opportunity to flower than if it had sprung spontaneously and unaided from the needs of the students themselves. Another aspect, the prescribed common course of study, is still to be found in our professional schools and was found in all American colleges before the elective system came into favor. In some important respects, however, the experiment involves entirely new departures, among which the most important are the content of the curriculum for the first and second years—the study of Greek and American civilization respectively—and the teaching by non-specialists.

The question then arises of how far, considering its years of operation, the experiment can be said to have succeeded, what positive or negative results can be recorded. Regarding this question there is a wide conflict of opinion, which in some cases amounts to passionate partisanship. Hence, before a judgment of its results can be hazarded by a member of the university, two qualifications must be made. The first involves the freedom of judgment: some simple-minded liberals have taken exception to all criticism of the validity of the experiment on the ground that a judgment which does not please them is an attack on the principles of liberalism. Their attitude can be traced to the confusion between the conception of education involved in the experiment and the means adopted to secure it. The second qualification involves the kind of validity to be attached to any analysis of experiments of this sort. It must be clearly noted that such a judgment cannot claim any objective validity or comprehensiveness. So far as the writer knows, there is no satisfactory "scientific" way of determining the fruits of an educational process, especially of one which has as deep an aim as this one. The only possible way to arrive at a judgment of the experiment must be through a reflective, but none the less impressionistic observation. The writer claims to have made it. The following remarks, which only express his opinions, are the product of reflection and as far as possible of comparison of the opinions of a number of members of the faculty and of the students.

Whatever success may be claimed for the experiment from a deeper view, I believe a majority at Wisconsin and some members of the staff of the college will admit dissatisfaction with the results as an educational experiment—in the instrumental and pedagogical, not the philosophic, sense of education. The chief fault, to which all other faults it seems to me can be traced, takes rise from a divorce, if not in theory certainly in practice, between the emphasis put on vision and stimulation on the one hand and on the other—what no educational plan can afford to neglect—the business of imparting sound information and well-grounded habits of industry, thoroughness, and devotion to work. It is understood throughout the university—and I have my own personal reasons for agreeing with that impression—that during the four years of operation not enough emphasis has been put on scholastic discipline. Life at the college has been too easy for the average student, for whom the personal magnetism of its leader, undeniably great, and that of a select faculty group has not been sufficient as an incentive to work.

Interest in intellectual matters there has been; but the writer has information which confirms the wide suspicion that this interest was one which never hid successfully its dilettante temper. It is then obvious that the end in mind has not been quite accomplished. There can be no wisdom without knowledge, nor can adequate understanding of any civilization come from inadequately informed discussion. At the college too much emphasis has been put on discussion, on stimulation, and relatively to the rest of the university the student cannot be said to have made a solid gain. Now, the average student, coming from an average high school where no work habits have been inculcated in him, needs other incentives to work besides stimulation. The college has abandoned the regular form of examinations and has substituted for these a general information test and, in the form of teachers' reports drawn up at the end of the year, a subjective evaluation of the work done; it has thereby given up the only material means—whatever its defects may be—known to educators for making average students work. The student has been given full freedom and in too many cases, if he has not acquired new bad habits, has carried on those he brought from high school. Officially the claim is made that the staff knows more of the students' personal idiosyncrasies than it could know under the regular system. But if one is in close contact with the college one is led to doubt this. In personal conference as in discussion groups it is all too easy for men who place the emphasis on understanding and minimize the importance of information to deviate from the assigned topic, deriving from the discussion no small measure of pleasure, no doubt, and stimulation of a kind, but also no small measure of confusion, superficiality, and inconclusion. A clever yet lazy or uninterested student does not need to work too hard to make a good impression in discussion.

Dr. Meiklejohn has steadfastly refused to compromise with the current educational procedure. He seems to have unqualified faith in human nature. He wishes to place the responsibility altogether upon the student and stands on his principle that the only way to make him work in a really valuable way is to interest him in some task "which is so important that everybody is going to throw himself heart and soul into the doing of it." In some cases, it will be gladly admitted, he has been eminently successful. His personality, that magnetism and deep appeal of his to the more reflective minds, has done for some students what no number of threatening "flunks" could have done, and perhaps done it better. But even some members of the staff of the college have felt that in a larger number of cases the freedom granted has worked toward a scattered picking up of smatterings of facts and, what is worse, toward fostering intellectual cocksureness in the students—the last thing Dr. Meiklejohn would wish!

Closely allied with this issue is another which I hesitate to broach because it involves a radical break between two attitudes toward life and is therefore too complex to be properly treated in the space of a paragraph—the conflict between the claims of the individual and those of society. The philosophy guiding the experiment has been interpreted to involve a conflict between the specialized pursuits of the individual in terms of culture and learning for its own sake, and desirable social ends. An identification of scholarship with the unimaginative grind that often goes by that name has led to a definite bias against the claims of true learning. This disjunction is here mentioned because it has practical consequences in the quality and matter of the education sought for. As Professor Morris Cohen has recently suggested, to abandon altogether the cultivation of "the inward landscape" (in Santayana's phrase) is to create Spartans, men poor in the fruits of the spirit; it is to abandon satisfactions and high consolations, ineffable sources of happiness, which in a period of religious disintegration are almost all that a great educated majority has to fall back on. Contemplation is one of the intensest forms of living and the vistas a man may find inwardly very often more than make up for the pleasures of activity. There is, besides, an anchorite side to the most extroverted among us. To allow it to flower rationally that we may be complete men must be one of the ends of education. Starve it by turning men into social workers, and it will satisfy itself with either inanities or mysticism, both of which are socially dangerous.

Hardly to be distinguished from this issue is the third question which I wish to discuss. It involves primarily a criticism of one of the instrumentalities devised for the experiment, although in a deeper sense it can be traced to the divorce already mentioned between learning and wisdom. The curriculum calls for the teaching of one civilization for a year, and the teaching is done by "advisers" who have in their charge rotating groups of students with whom they discuss the whole content of the civilization under study, Greek or American. The aim in view is to form "a community of learning" wherein students and teachers work shoulder to shoulder toward a common objective. As a result, the teacher has to teach either Greek or American politics, history, literature, and philosophy, and something of the history of art and science of each civilization. In the case of American civilization, the matter is made more difficult by virtue of the more technical nature of the subjects taught. The result is hardly satisfactory. The obvious weakness of the plan is that it conduces even further toward the acquisition by the student of superficial information. There are few teachers anywhere who can command the exact and encyclopedic knowledge necessary for so large an undertaking. The intellectual capacity of the staff of the Experimental College is not here in question, for it was carefully selected for the difficult task it had before itself. But, on the other hand, the college depends upon a number of younger men who, although eminently able, are not as yet specialists even in any one field. The teaching, then, has been handicapped by the fact that the "advisers" could hardly be expected to master the wide field that they were called upon to teach. Add to this that the time given to each subject is so short—three weeks to Greek philosophy in the first year and as many to science in the second—and one wonders what kind of idea the student will acquire about the civilization he is supposed to be penetrating. I must make it perfectly clear that the advisers have worked tremendously hard in an effort to acquire the competence demanded by their task, but this they have done at the cost of applying an unsparing amount of energy to it. Were it not for Dr. Meiklejohn's magic capacity of drawing devotion and religious loyalty from his associates, the scheme would have failed in this respect altogether. The upshot of all this is that the venture cannot be considered a successful experiment, for even if its results were to be deemed extraordinarily satisfactory, and this is very doubtful, the scheme could not be generally applied. It depends on intangible elements of personal leadership hard to duplicate.

Now the reason for this daring innovation of teaching by non-specialists is that one of the evils which Dr. Meiklejohn wishes to correct in American education is the widely acknowledged tendency toward overspecialization. On account of this tendency the plan has been drawn up to apply only to the first two years of college. Dr. Meiklejohn believes that these years should be dedicated to instruction of a strictly elementary character, in which the student should be confronted with the duty of acquiring a general and broad foundation. Distrusting the specialist's ability to present his subject from a broadly human point of view, and conceiving that the integration of knowledge or at least of the subject matter of education can best be accomplished by a group of men acquainted and interested in a wide field, in close intellectual communion with one another such as is not usually enjoyed by specialists, Dr. Meiklejohn has attempted a remedy that many consider more harmful than the disease it is applied to cure. To escape the evil of overspecialization and narrow scholarship which can appeal only to students of deeply determined interests and aims, he has courted the danger of superficiality. For, of course, the elementary character of the instruction of the first two years is in no way incompatible with thoroughness, exactitude, discipline, and that close-knit thinking based on sufficient facts which is demanded in every field of activity and which must be one of the fundamental aims of a plan for a liberal education.

There are many other important aspects of the Wisconsin experiment which lack of space prevents us from considering. But this article does not pretend to thoroughness, any more than to scientific objectivity and finality. The opinions here presented must be taken for what they are worth. This paper will perhaps create in some readers the impression that the results of the experiment are to be considered negative, but this is not the desired aim. Some unfavorable judgments have been recorded, mainly in respect to instrumentalities. But in any case, on the eve of its assessment and possible discontinuance in its present form, the Experimental College is generally admitted by the university to have been an eminently worth-while venture. Even if the investigating committee should find that its methods are not altogether applicable to the university at large, for the reasons already mentioned and others—such as the prohibitive cost which its operation on a large scale would involve—in no way could an experiment which has raised such tremendously important issues be called a failure. The college fanned into greater activity the interest—at no time dead in Wisconsin, as the inception of the college itself shows—for experiment and salutary reform. It suggested fresh points of view and has given the university added courage to try new ventures.

Rejoinder

By ALEXANDER MEIKLEJOHN

WHATEVER else may be said of the article by Mr. Vivas, no one connected with the Experimental College can question his first sentence. "This is," he says, "perhaps the most inauspicious moment to write on he Experimental College of the University of Wisconsin." The advisers have just been directed by the general faculty to prepare a report on their experiences and findings. While that report is being prepared we lack the authority and the nformation which are needed for the making of public statements about our venture. What, then, shall one do in the face of a story which seems essentially inaccurate as to facts and superficial in its analysis of problems? The situation is a very awkward one.

Under these circumstances it is evident that this brief rejoinder cannot be in the fullest sense a reply to Mr. Vivas. It cannot be in any sense a summary or an estimate of what the Experimental College is doing. Many minds must work hard and work together before those results can be achieved. However, as I read over again the advance copy which Mr. Vivas has kindly sent me, it becomes clear that one can answer him without either describing or estimating the work of the college. This statement implies, of course, that Mr. Vivas has in his argument failed to come into vital contact with either the principles or the practices which the college has followed. He has not really dealt with our problem at all. All that I shall attempt in this rejoinder is the substantiation and explanation of that statement.

Before proceeding to the argument I must express my appreciation of the personal friendliness of attitude which Mr. Vivas shows. I appreciate that attitude and reciprocate it. I must also thank him for trying to "philosophize" the experiment, for calling attention so sharply to the distinction between beliefs and values on the one hand and educational machinery on the other. The suggestion that our venture really has a philosophy is so gratifying that one can almost forgive the failure of Mr. Vivas to understand what philosophy it has. But there is one point at which his dealing with us is harder to accept. It seems to me that he is not accurately informed as to what our actual procedure is, how our teaching is done. I wish that he might have succeeded in providing for his argument a more solid basis of fact.

There are two points on which I should like to rest my contention. Both have to do with the discussion of instrumentalities. The first deals with the inaccuracy just mentioned. The second concerns the failure to understand a problem.

First, Mr. Vivas describes the teaching procedure of the college as one of giving vision and stimulation by means of discussion. And in his account of the process one looks in vain to see what is being discussed. "Emphasis is put," he tells us, "on the individual character of the relations between teachers and pupils. There are no classes or recitations; instruction takes the form of discussion in personal conference. There are lectures, but these consist for the most part of an introduction in which a point of view is presented by the lecturer, followed by general discussion by the students." Neither here nor elsewhere is there any reference to the fact that the course of study is defined by lists of books which are assigned to the student for reading. We are not told that the students are expected to write frequent, usually weekly, papers on their reading. It is not mentioned that the "conferences" between advisers and students are primarily concerned with these written papers and the reading on which they are based. Nor are we told that the "lectures" are attempts at helping and guiding the students in their reading and in their reactions to it. In a word, Mr. Vivas gives us the impression that discussion is conducted in a vacuum. And the suggestion is such as to strike horror into any breast which cares for reality and relevance. But as matter of fact, the whole teaching procedure has a solid basis in reading. It rests upon the reading of books which are great and significant. Our major task in both years of the course has been the selection and organization of this body of reading. About these books all the instruction has centered. Mr. Vivas speaks only of discussions and lectures. When one adds to these the reading of assigned books, the writing of papers, and the teaching criticism of both, one sees how inadequate and misleading the "discussion-stimulation" description is.

But the second point is even more serious than the first. For it seems to me that in his account of the college Mr. Vivas has not really discovered what the problem of the advisers is, has not entered into the thinking which we have tried to do. Three charges he brings against our teaching procedure. First, the students do not get accurate information nor do they develop habits of accurate work. Second, they are not taught by specialists who have mastery of the material. Third, they are not driven by examinations and other compulsions to do work which they would not otherwise do. Now these are serious charges, and they are in large measure valid. But they are also very obvious and very commonly made. Why, then, have not the advisers been influenced by them? Is it assumed by Mr. Vivas that we have been oblivious of difficulties which have been the common talk of campus conversation? Let us apply the question to the study of the Athenian civilization. If we had defined our aim simply as the development of industry and the teaching of facts as such, we could easily have used for this purpose a good, routine, well-organized textbook on Greek history. Why have we not done it? Surely we know both of the existence of textbooks and of the values of accurate information. So, too, we might have used only specialists in Greek culture and history to do the teaching. Why were other men chosen as well? Why did we take men from many different fields of study? And again, we as teachers are not unacquainted with examinations and like devices. Why have we not used them? Now I am not arguing here that the methods which we have followed are better than those which we have discarded. What I am saying is that Mr. Vivas does not seem to have faced the question why we have kept the one set of methods and discarded the other. In fact, he seems to have no sense of that problem at all. He is keenly aware of what we have failed to do, as I trust we are too. But he has, so far as I can judge, no apprehension of what we have been trying to do. Our vigorous and even furious differences of opinion he seizes upon as if they were forms of apostasy from high religion. Apparently he interprets us as having dogmatically tried to demonstrate the virtues of one selected method of teaching. We are for him advocates of a system rather than students of a problem. But as against this I insist that there is a problem with regard to the teaching of the first two college years—a perplexing and bewildering problem of the utmost significance. But in the article here criticized I find no account of it. Does this mean that we have imagined a problem where none exists? Whether or not this is true must, I presume, be left for determination when our reports tell what, if anything, has been going on in our minds. If it should then appear that we have not a problem but only a dogma, Mr. Vivas will be justified. If, on the other hand, we have been doing some thinking about our methods, I am sure that Mr. Vivas gives no adequate account of it. I do not think that he has told his readers what the Experimental College has been trying to do. In this situation it is somewhat idle to inquire whether or not we have succeeded in doing it.

In conclusion may I again remind my reader that this statement is not a reply but only a hurried rejoinder. I have not discussed an argument but have only tried to show why it cannot be discussed just now.

Political Prostitution

By PAUL Y. ANDERSON

Washington, March 14

THE pulling and hauling, the temptation and exhortation, the bribery and admonition which will determine whether Miss Democracy is to embark on a career of open prostitution or cling to the outer garments of respectability are now in full swing. And to make it more edifying, they are in full view. Chairman Raskob rang up the curtain last week when he commended to the National Committee an economic platform calculated to make Joe Grundy look like a Communist. It was an invitation to step in and take possession of the purple boudoir occupied for the last ten years by that now haggard and unhappy female whose lingerie bears the initials G. O. P. It is not likely that Mr. Raskob intended to be so frank in this particular matter. Indeed, seldom has anyone attained such heights of astuteness and such depths of ineptitude in one political speech. His plan to precipitate the inevitable prohibition fracas early enough for the drys to become resigned before the national convention was shrewdly conceived and may succeed. His attempt to make the party solid with big business and sew up the Presidential nomination for Owen D. Young was horribly crude, and has done more to enhance the prospects of Governor Roosevelt than anything else that has happened this year. Mr. Raskob took in too much territory at one time. He should have confined himself to prohibition and party finances. His allusion to power companies "charging 15 cents a kilowatt for current that they should supply for 10 or 12 cents" promises to be one of the classic howlers of the pre-convention campaign. The average domestic rate in the first twenty-five cities of the country is less than 8 cents, and where plants are publicly owned and operated it ranges from 1.6 to 4.5 cents. His proposal to suspend the anti-trust laws to permit more mergers and greater monopolies—made at a time like this—was an exhibition of political naivete and moral obtuseness.

BEING a captain of finance, Mr. Raskob doubtless confines his reading to the market pages of the newspapers. Otherwise he would have known the Progressives were to stage a conference here this week, and he might have realized that his economic pronouncements would provide them with the perfect setting. Or he might not. The mental processes of captains of industry, like those of the three-toed sloth, are mostly inscrutable. At any rate, Bob La Follette and Uncle George Norris read the Raskobian manifesto in favor of twelve-cent power and bigger trusts, and went about their plans like men inspired. The basic theory underlying the conference, of course, was that both the political parties are hopelessly reactionary at the top. In the case of the Republicans, any denial of this charge would have been useless and silly, but up to the time Mr. Raskob exposed himself the Democrats might have been inclined to protest in their own behalf. He made it possible for Borah to plead for "a political party—or if not a political party, then political voices—that will do some worrying about the 96 per cent of the people who own only 20 per cent of the national wealth." He made it logical for Norris to declare that "an attempt is being made to turn the Democratic Party over to the interests that already own the Republican Party." In short, he presented the Progressives with a perfect opportunity to serve notice on the Democrats to adopt a decent platform and forget about Young if they wish to receive any assistance from the enlightened elements of the country in the 1932 campaign. Naturally, they didn't overlook it.

LET no serious person suppose, however, that the effort to rescue Miss Democracy from a harlot's fate was either the major aim or the major accomplishment of the Progressive conference. Such suppositions may be left to political Weisenheimers and to the kindergarten mentalities which take their morning romp in such places as the editorial page of the New York Times. The main objects and achievements of the conference were: to formulate a broad and definite legislative program for which the Progressive members of both parties can work and fight in Congress; to fortify that program with a massive volume of expert scientific knowledge; to expose the intellectual and moral bankruptcy of the men who now control the politics, industry, and finance of the country; to demonstrate that the only constructive leadership which exists in the nation, either actively or latently, resides in the Progressives who are on the firing line in Congress and in the trained and practical men behind the lines who are supplying them with ammunition. These were the objects which certainly were achieved. Another, the ultimate success of which can hardly be foretold now, was to impress on the public the fact that industrial calamity and political chaos of the sort which have swamped the country in the past two years may be avoided through honest, efficient government and intelligent planning, and that their prevalence now is due to the greed and stupidity of business, and to cowardice, favoritism, and incompetence in the government. Whether that will get over to the country, God only knows. If it does, it will be a triumph of popular intelligence over journalistic fogginess and superficiality—with the customary honorable exceptions.

IT is difficult to contemplate the plight of Herbert Hoover without a pang of pity. Unhappy Herbert! Two years in the White House and two more to go before the misery ends! I cannot remember one instance where a great reputation has faded so quickly, and it is a poignant coincidence that he should fail most conspicuously and disastrously in the particular fields where his fame was greatest. Thus the man who fed starving Europe made an issue against feeding starving America. The Great Administrator, the unfailing judge of men, surrounded himself with a pack of adventurers and political hacks whom Coolidge would not have tolerated. The Great Humanitarian bestowed a veto on the Wagner unemployment bill, and concurred in the clammy Wilbur's attempt to destroy the Children's Bureau. The Great Engineer was saved by his opponents from wrecking the Boulder Dam project, and then wrote a veto message on Muscle Shoals filled with pathetic miscalculations and glaring technical misstatements. Heralded as an economist, he signed and defended a tariff which was the product of the most brazen log-rolling and political trading in history, and huddled helpless and trembling in the White House through the economic disaster which followed. Welcomed as the President who would be above politics, he exhibited all the ethics of a ward politician without the ability. The thing has all the elements of classic tragedy. The fates that made him also ruined him. Incidentally, Secretary Mellon made another prediction not long ago. He predicted that if the veterans'-loan bill were passed, the Treasury would be handicapped in the refinancing operation which impended. The bill was passed and last week the Treasury undertook the operation by making a large offer of low-interest bonds. Immediately the issue was oversubscribed four times! It really is time that some close friend or relative spoke to him about this predicting habit. The consequences are becoming too ridiculous to be mentioned even in The Nation.

In the Driftway

NO one seems to care that the ex-Kaiser is seventy-two. To the world he is only another of the unemployed. Ex-royalties are no more interesting than ex-presidents, to the Drifter's way of thinking, and sawing wood is much the same thing at Doorn and in the Herald Tribune. But a good upstanding king of democratic tastes is a fine thing now and then, and a far pleasanter thing than a loud speaker exalted to a dictatorship. A good upstanding king of democratic tastes is Gustav of Sweden. "The sportsman king" the illustrated supplements label him. Why? Because he plays tennis, tennis, tennis, and has played it for forty, fifty, who knows how many years.

* * * * *

WHEN the Drifter was a boy, one of his daily pleasures during an extended stay in Stockholm was to see old King Oscar and his sons Gustav and Karl walking through the town. The three tallest men in the kingdom they were said to be. And that was the only way you knew they were royalty, that and the friendly way in which they lifted their hats to everyone. How they enjoyed the riotous folk-dance the Drifter and some students once did for them in an open meadow! The Drifter is reminded as he looks back now of the old marching carol in which the French children roll their r's so deliciously, "Tr-r-rois gr-r-rands r-r-rois." And every afternoon at three the Drifter would look out the window of the old gymnasium where he took fencing lessons to see if Crown Prince Gustav had come. There he was, always on time, looking up at the window, waiting by the tennis court for the Drifter's fencing master to play with him. Some of the young officers were a bit shy about meeting him; either they feared it might be unmannerly if they should beat him, or he kept them at it too long. But the Drifter's fencing master was as thoroughgoing and as democratic as the Crown Prince, and gave no games to anyone. He was even better at fencing than at tennis. "Fencing?" he used to say; "I'm a mere beginner. I've only been at it eleven years, and can't give more than five hours a day to practice—what can you expect then?" As he made a leisurely change to tennis togs the Drifter would vainly try to hurry him: "Do be quick, old man, the Crown Prince has been walking up and down for ten minutes." "To be sure," was the reply, "he has more time than I. He doesn't have to give lessons—he won't mind waiting."

* * * * *

NO spectators were invited; this was not a demonstration, it was tennis. But the Drifter kept his solitary post at the window as the game began. Or was it a religious service? Apparently Gustav did not play for fun, or for exercise, or for pastime, or because it was the thing to do; to him it was as serious and absorbing, and demanded his best efforts as much as his approaching kingship. If an Englishman's harshest judgment is that a thing is "not cricket," it would surely be equivalent to a death sentence if King Gustav pronounced an act "not tennis."

A Reply from the Professor of Books

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In your issue of February 18 Benjamin Stolberg contributes an extended review of Dr. Abraham Flexner's "Universities—American, English, and German," in which he regrets that Dr. Flexner did not devote more space to "the so-called experimental college." Mr. Stolberg honestly seems to believe that the work of these colleges is based on "a sort of diaphanous self-expression on the part of the student," and he cites as "the most fantastic expression of this sort of education, Rollins College in Winter Park, Florida, where President Hamilton Holt has hired a professor of books . . ."

Since I am that professor of books, may I comment briefly on Mr. Stolberg's and Dr. Flexner's strictures? Dr. Flexner's criticism of my title "professor of books" was based on its 'novelty" and, as he supposed, the "ad-hoc-ness" of the courses offered. Nothing could be farther from their purpose. The three courses offered—one in Recreational Reading, one on the History of the Book, and one on Literary Personalities—are purely cultural courses. They are not in any sense training or vocational courses. Yet Dr. Flexner classifies them and condemns them with courses in "poultry-raising" and "clog-dancing for men" offered at Columbia University and a course in "police administration" which is offered by the University of Chicago.

Dr. Flexner is not quite fair in saying that "the Minneapolis Journal, alive to this absurdity [a professor of books], gravely suggests that one lecture at least should be devoted to the noble art of returning borrowed books." As a matter of fact, the editorial referred to gave extended and serious approval of the idea of a professor of books, and only in the closing sentence humorously, not gravely, remarked that a course on returning books borrowed from friends would be appropriate. The label "this absurdity" was Dr. Flexner's, not the editor's.

The idea of a professor of books is not new, having been first proposed exactly seventy-five years ago by Ralph Waldo Emerson, who said in 1856 that "no chair was so much wanted." In 1876 Frederick Beecher Perkins, then director of the Boston Public Library, and Professor William Matthews, of Chicago University, wrote extended pleas for the immediate establishment of professorships of books in the colleges of the country in order to help develop a love of reading and raise the cultural standards of college students. Both these pleas were given indorsement by the United States Department of Education and were published at government expense, but completely ignored by our colleges.

Rollins, more than any other college I know of, meets Mr. Stolberg's standard: "When he [the teacher] is free, his students will also be free to learn what he knows and to think what they want." Rollins is not concerned with "diaphanous self-expression" on the part of its students. It is greatly concerned with freedom of teaching on the part of its faculty, and with cultural growth, development of self-reliance, and independent thinking on the part of its students. That it is succeeding in its purpose to a remarkable degree will, I believe, be evident to anyone who is open-minded and who will spend a week with the faculty and students on the Rollins College campus.

Those Greek Gerunds

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In Dr. Stolberg's interesting and stimulating article in The Nation of February 18, entitled Ballyhoo and the Higher Learning, I find the following: "One can attack a professor grinding Greek gerunds with quotations from Plato's Republic." Either Dr. Stolberg knows no Greek or he has slipped badly. The Greek language has no gerunds.

Again, in two places Dr. Stolberg uses the word "trivia" apparently in the sense of "trivialities." There would seem to be no English or Latin authority for such use.

Still Without Trial

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In The Nation of February 11, in a letter signed by Dr. Leland H. Jenks referring to rights in Cuba, an editorial note was inserted to the effect that Colonel Aurelio Hevia had at last been charged for trial. This report is not true. Today, February 20, fifty-six days after the arrest of Colonel Hevia, he has not yet been presented for trial or indicted by any judge.

Probably this mistake was made because in October, 1929, Colonel Mendieta, Dr. Torriene, Sr. J. G. Gomez, Sr. Aurelio Alvarez, Dr. Mendez Peñate, and Colonel Hevia issued a manifesto duly signed and distributed on loose sheets since no newspaper would publish it for fear of the government. Machado ordered action against the signers, following his policy of preventing the publication of criticism of his government. In October, 1929, all of them were indicted and have been out on bail ever since. This case has never been brought to trial because the government knows that the defendants would be acquitted; but being under bail they must present themselves at court every fifteen days.

Since my father's arrest the case has been set for trial several times. One such date was February 2, but the trial did not take place because the military authorities refused to present Colonel Hevia.

Answers to Questions

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Two of your editorials in two recent issues end with a question mark, and assuming that you wish to hear from your circle of readers I herewith submit my attempt at answering.

America's Follies, in your issue of March 4, ends with the question: "Will the people listen?" If the passage of the Simmer bill by the Iowa legislature, authorizing the establishment of municipally owned utility plants and payment for these plants out of future earnings, is an acceptable criterion the answer would be in the affirmative. And in view of the fact that the public, because of mergers and other reasons, is practically hand-fed by the press on the viciousness of such a rank violation of "rugged individualism" and very rarely treated to such items as, for instance, the fact that the municipally owned and managed utilities at Ames, Iowa, turned $32,000 into the city treasury last year, the passage of this bill deserves perhaps to be considered as an indication of the turning of the tide.

Heard Across the World, in the issue of February 25, likewise ends with a question: "Shall we have a Catholic revival?" For the sake of expediency permit me to divide the probable answers into three groups: (1) The Catholics may fairly generally have been pleased and heartened because they believed that the pontiff's message, being addressed to all and sundry, would contribute to a better understanding with non-Catholics; (2) Protestants would not be Protestants if they did not resent the Pope's invitation to return to the fold like strayed sheep; (3) Laodiceans who admire the beauty of the church and revere her age will be inclined to question the wisdom of the leader of a venerable institution, reared upon a foundation of assumed first principles and established by deductive reasoning, succumbing to such modernism as the radio; to them the introduction of modern inventions into the Vatican appears about as advisable as the sudden admittance of fresh air into the tomb of an Egyptian king—which causes the treasures to crumble to dust.

Reply to the Dirt Farmer

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The apparent contradiction between the production policies of the Farm Board and the United States Department of Agriculture expressed in Mr. Glenn W. Birkett's article in The Nation of March 4 is, I think, due to a misunderstanding of the position of the United States Department of Agriculture. Both organizations have been working together in the formulation of the recommendations for curtailing the production of certain crops contained in the "Agricultural Outlook for 1931." The United States Department of Agriculture, through the Extension Service, has been urging farmers to increase the efficiency of their production (yield per acre or per animal) but not the total output, except in a very few special cases. The aim has been to produce a volume sufficient for consumption from a smaller acreage and fewer animals, thus giving the farmer time to improve his standard of living through the production of more garden and home products.

The Extension Service in Virginia, which cooperates with the United States Department of Agriculture, has four main points in its extension program: (1) Increase the efficiency of farm production; (2) adjust the volume and quality of farm products to consumptive demand; (3) increase the efficiency of marketing through cooperative associations; (4) increase the efficiency of purchasing for farmers through cooperative associations. Increased efficiency should provide the farmer with more money and more leisure but need not increase his total output, as I have said above.

I am personally adding a fifth: Develop national planning of economic activity and fit agricultural production into this plan.

Right You Are!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In his article True Stories de Luxe, Milton St. John states, "I know of no ambassador who gets anything like $17,000 per annum from our government."

I should like to state that the salary of our ambassadors is $17,500 per annum.

Why Bother?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I do not know Mr. J. B. Priestley. I have no interest in defending him. My interest is in the self-respect of Americans.

Why such organs of American intelligence as The Nation and the New Republic should find it needful to reply (with a definite touch of spleen, of botheredness, of emotional need to justify Us) to the remarks of foreign visitors about American ways, I cannot fathom. If foreigners have no impressions before arrival, they are ill-read. If they get none when here, they are fools. If their impressions make any difference to us, merely because of the name of the person who has the impression (rather than because of the light the impression gives) it is we who are fools, and bad readers.

Why it is conceived to be a self-respecting answer to criticism—which with a traveling foreigner must of necessity be suggestive at best—to quarrel with the foreigner's basis of judgment, or to sneer at the manners of him or his informants, I also fail to fathom. If his impression sheds light, let us reexamine the facts—we know the facts, whether he does or not—in the light of it. If it does not shed light, why the bother?

Why a foreigner should be criticized for answering questions the reporters ask him to answer is again a mystery. They are our reporters, not his. He is entitled to assume that we are interested in his impressions, as impressions. Indeed, in this case, the interest is demonstrated. What is not demonstrated is that the organs of American intelligence have balance and self-confidence enough to shrug benignantly at ill-advised criticism of American intelligence in action.

Which, in view of the level of that intelligence on so many other matters, is worth regretting.

Material on Gorki

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I appeal through your pages for documentary and personal material in connection with Maxim Gorki's sojourn in New York in 1906? I am particularly anxious to clarify the role of the Russian embassy at Washington in the anti-Gorki campaign. A confession by a former official of the embassy was published somewhere, but I have not been able to trace it.

Stephen A. Douglas

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It is my expectation shortly to embark upon the writing of a biography of Stephen A. Douglas, with especial emphasis upon the decade from 1850 through 1860. I would be particularly gratified if any of your readers who happen to be in possession of manuscripts, letters, diaries, or other unused source material concerning Douglas, Franklin Pierce, James Buchanan, Jefferson Davis in the fifties, or other of the great figures of that period would intrust them to me for copying and return. I will assure them prompt reading and safe return.

When the Snow Goes

By DAVID MORTON

The white dream of virginity is over,
And earth awakens to remember, now,
Her womanhood and motherhood, her lover
And all that followed on the thrusting plow;
For yet a little while these early days,
She finds the blue sky grown a tender thing,
As distant and adoring as the gaze
We give to girls across the careless spring.

Almost—almost—it seems, she might forget,
So virginal and inviolate the airs
That blow above her for a little, yet,
Unmindful of the fiery seed she bears
Whose hidden labors, flowering out of pain,
Are heavy fruit and sharp and shining grain.

The Cult of Chaos

The Melody of Chaos. By Houston Peterson. Longmans, Green and Company. $2.50.

THIS book has a dual and perhaps a divided aim; it would be easy to attack it with what Mr. Peterson himself calls "brutal 'either-or'" methods. In his preface he refers to it as a "study in complexity and chaos, with the poetry of Conrad Aiken as my point of departure and principal theme." Considered as a study in complexity and chaos, it surely leans on Aiken with utter disproportion as compared with original and powerful writers like Joyce, Proust, Dostoevski, and Melville, or even as compared with such other American poets as Eliot, Pound, Stevens, and MacLeish. Considered as a critical study of Aiken, it contains too much both about other writers and about certain problems of psychology and philosophy.

But let us grant the author his twofold purpose. As there are many "horizontal studies" of contemporary psychological chaos, Mr. Peterson thinks "it may be illuminating for a change to consider as symptom and symbol the work of one author who is peculiarly typical of the age." But why should that be Conrad Aiken? Because:

> He has embraced his predicament. He has celebrated chaos, faced it frankly, with affection, and consequently his report is more searching than that of those who are trying so desperately to escape, by way of the primitive, the occult, or the Catholic. . . . He has gone as far as possible in the direction of spiritual disorder, without plunging into madness. He has made the case for sensitive living today as bad as possible. His disillusion is fearful and complete, his melancholy incurable.

"The Melody of Chaos," as one may gather from this, is a sort of supplement both to "The Modern Temper" of Mr. Krutch and the recent study of the symbolists by Mr. Wilson. It is adroitly and persuasively argued, and remarkably learned. In the single chapter on the vicissitudes in the conception of the ego, for example, Mr. Peterson ranges through Socrates, St. Paul, Prudentius, Montaigne, Charron, Shakespeare, Burton, Bacon, Descartes, Berkeley, Hume, Richardson, Sterne, Kant, Schopenhauer, Rousseau, Benjamin Constant, Stendhal, La Rochefoucauld, Poe, Melville, Baudelaire, Darwin, Dostoevski, Nietzsche, Strindberg, Charcot, Janet, Dujardin, Mallarmé, Flaubert, Tolstoy, William James, Freud, Bergson, Henry James, Proust, Gide, Joyce, Russell, McDougall, and F. H. Bradley. And this is no mere roll call of great names, but authors actually read and quoted to the point. Mr. Peterson's erudition never becomes pedantry or clogs the flow of his zestful sentences.

But with all his ingratiating exposition he never convinces us that Mr. Aiken is quite as important as he makes him out to be. Mr. Aiken is unquestionably a distinguished poet, and has given perhaps even more promise as a critic and a novelist; he is sincere, sensitive, and acute; his verse is smooth, melodious, technically often admirable. It is remarkably lucid—too lucid, in fact, to be quite the most impressive literary symbol of modern disintegration and chaos. It is even a little facile; there are too many poetic clichés in it, too many familiar images, rhythms, and rhymes. In brief, it lacks the intensity of great poetry, and Mr. Peterson does Mr. Aiken a poor service when he links his name with that of Donne or Webster.

Nor do I find myself able to accept the cult of chaos, disillusion, and skepticism that Mr. Aiken reflects and Mr. Peterson champions. Mr. Aiken, we are told, has reached the "final skepticism" because he "discusses the loss of the ego itself"; he rejects "that which presupposes everything else, . . . that which has rejected everything else." Well, we have seen the ego rejected before, but that does not seem to me the final skepticism. The man who rejects the ego may be putting too much faith in the dubious processes of analysis by which he rejects it. We never hear, indeed, from the complete skeptics at all; final skepticism, as Anatole France reminded us, implies absolute silence. And even a reasonably thorough skeptic will at least sometimes be skeptical of his own skepticism, will sometimes tremble on the verge of belief. It seems to me that a good deal of the skepticism now abroad is much too dogmatic. As for chaos, there is no doubt a great deal of it; but to say that the world is completely chaotic is meaningless: the very notion of chaos could not exist without the notion of order: the terms are correlative. Those who talk so much of chaos, moreover, are usually telling us more about themselves than about nature. "When we are perplexed," remarked the late C. H. Cooley, "we project the disorder of our minds in a belief that the world is anarchical."

Historic perspective as well as psychology should help us to see that the contemporary cult of chaos, with its attendant skepticism and disillusion, has a close kinship with that romantic melancholy which the humanists have traced maliciously from Rousseau through Byron. Indeed, in one paragraph toward the end of the book, Mr. Peterson himself almost gives away the whole show. "In enjoying these darker moods now, we unconsciously and inevitably feel that we are sensitive and delicate, part of a sensitive and delicate tradition, ennobled by such distinguished figures as Hamlet, Byron, Châteaubriand, and Baudelaire." It is fashionable now to be confused about the world; it at least proves that one is not a bond salesman or a Babbitt; and so an increasing number of intellectuals are pretending to be considerably more muddled, more disillusioned, and more unhappy than they are. They tell us that their soul is immensely complex, that their apparently simple personality is really a great seething madhouse of conflicting personalities, that they do not know which impulse will gain control of them next. This self-view is flattering, for to feel immensely complex is to feel somehow important, but when we look at these people from the outside, from the standpoint of crowd psychology or of behaviorism, we usually do not find it difficult to predict what their response will be to a given situation.

These new skeptics, as I have already said, seem to me to make a surprising number of very dogmatic declarations. Defending Mr. Aiken's peculiar propensity for twilight, for example, Mr. Peterson writes:

> Intellectually, philosophically, one may feel most at home in twilight as the essential time of day, when vagueness reigns, when sharp lines disappear and apparent differences merge together. The bright sun of noonday brings out only harsh contrasts, as does the conventional moralist with his terrible antitheses, the old-fashioned logician with his emphasis on contradictory propositions, the brutal "either-or" thinker with his passion for cardinal colors, whereas a more tender mind will achieve a rich synthesis on a higher level or find solutions for his problems in the realm of pastel shades. As Renan once remarked, truth lies in the nuance. Life leads through a murky no-man's-land, through a perpetual twilight amid opposing forces which the tragic poet describes most adequately.

All this is obviously mere reactive thinking. If the Victorians saw sharp contrasts where there were only nuances, Mr. Peterson seems to say, then let us see merely nuances where there are really sharp contrasts; if our fathers saw only blacks and whites, let us see only grays. This will prove that we are much more subtle and sensitive than they were. But will it? Does life lead through a perpetual twilight? Obviously it does nothing of the kind. Like the concept of chaos, the concept of twilight is correlative; it has no meaning except in relation to sunlight and night. The intellectual, like the physical world, is clearly made up of all three. The world will always need its twilight thinkers, but we are beginning to have an embarrassing number. When they have called the current tune—or discord—long enough, someone will go mad and scream for a Macaulay.

HENRY HAZLITT

American Literature Exposed

A Literary History of the American People. Volume I: From 1607 to the Beginning of the Revolutionary Period; Volume II: from 1750 to 1815. By Charles Angoff. Alfred A. Knopf. $10.

MR. ANGOFF'S first two volumes deal with the part of American history which is the least interesting from a literary point of view. He has in preparation two more volumes which will complete the tale to the present time. So far he has made the tale entertaining, fluent, continuous. His physical plan is conventional—the regular divisions in time, geographical sections, types of literature, individuals. His treatment is not conventional, and he is rather lustily aware of it; at least he is not a conformist with respect to most critical and historical books written before our present irreverent age, though he makes abundant use of his predecessors, with full acknowledgments in notes and quotations. In appearance, and largely in substance, his work is quite in the proper scholarly manner. In tone and phrasing it is jaunty, up-to-the-minute, vivacious, sometimes amusing and original, sometimes journalistic and a bit cheap.

It is refreshing—and it would have been more refreshing in the days before the anti-superstitious attitude became a superstition, a ritual, with Mr. Mencken as high priest—it is refreshing to read a man who goes straight to the sources and the accepted interpretations of those sources, takes a look for himself, and reports what he finds. The older critics and historians, mostly inhabitants of the Atlantic States and their Western disciples, liked the colonial and revolutionary writers and showed them up to the best advantage, sometimes letting enthusiasm run away with judgment, and discovering merits which were simply not there. Mr. Angoff takes the other course. He does not like many of the people he deals with in these two volumes, concedes their virtues with evident reluctance, and displays their faults and follies with an air of triumphant satisfaction. He devotes—wastefully, I think—many pages to quotations of poor verse and poor prose, for the sake of showing how poor it is. This is not to say that he does not select many of the best prose passages. But he takes pleasure in crossing out the A's and B's that the older professors have awarded their ancestors and marking them down to D's and E's, with a few C's-minus.

Specifically, he hates Puritanism (and does not understand it), not because he has anything against dead men, but because he holds them responsible for the alleged "puritanism" that oppresses us today. "That the prevailing culture of America is still Puritan at heart is due almost wholly to the writings of the early Calvinistic divines of Massachusetts and Connecticut, and, to a lesser degree, of Rhode Island." Yet he says that when "Jonathan Edwards was buried in the old graveyard at Princeton, Puritanism went with him." How reconcile those statements? Mr. Angoff even attacks Calvinism as if he were a theological pamphleteer. "There is no more devastating argument against Calvinism and all it means than the life and deeds of Jonathan Edwards." It is not the business of criticism and history to find devastating arguments, but to find out what happened, what Calvinism was, and how it was expressed. The game of knocking the steeple hats off the Puritans is as tiresomely played out as the older gesture of taking one's own hat off to them too reverentially. Some recent historians, acutely critical and not weighted by ancient pieties, have given us a moderate and balanced view of the colonists; notably Professor S. E. Morison, to whose admirable "Builders of the Bay Colony" Mr. Angoff makes only one reference in a footnote, to cite Morison's "exaggerated opinion of Anne Bradstreet" as an example of "a deplorable practice among historians" not to "keep clear of literary criticism."

Since Mr. Angoff so often accuses other critics and historians of exaggeration and overstatement, it is fair to take a page from his own book—not the wisest page—and point out that his reversed theological zeal leads him to overemphasis. Calvinism "ruined completely the brilliancy and logical cogency" of Edwards's essay on "Freedom of the Will." At worst, Calvinism weakened the concluding part of the essay, but did not ruin it. The narrow attitude of Massachusetts "nullified all possible good that could have been derived from her educational system." No, not nullified, only diminished it. Some statements are not exaggerated but untrue. With the decline of its authority, the Puritan oligarchy "was impelled to incite the witchcraft madness in order to bolster up the waning allegiance of the public." There is no hint of such a motive in those dead-in-earnest, self-righteous men. The Virginians "tortured quite as many witches as the Salem fanatics." Professor Edward Channing says ("History of the United States," II, 458) that "in Virginia the belief in witchcraft was widespread and sincere, but there were no executions." Perhaps historians should keep clear of literary criticism; literary historians should be wary when they deal with non-literary aspects of history, especially when the literary historian is in an aggressive, challenging, disputative frame of mind.

Mr. Angoff values "Bacon's Epitaph, Made by His Man" ("His Man" cannot mean, as Mr. Angoff suggests, "a menial, a servant, po' white trash," but one of Bacon's followers in the rebellion, as we say "Cromwell's man," "the King's man"). He appreciates Thomas Morton of Merry Mount and Roger Williams and John Wise, because they were rebels. When he gets out of the shadow of Puritanism into the vigorous thought of the Revolution he is on surer ground; his second volume is an alert and judicious appraisal of the orators, pamphleteers, statesmen, and the few merely literary men of the time, from James Otis to Philip Freneau. If he withholds his full approval from some of the admittedly good and great, he lapses into a strangely uncritical use of "great" in the last line of the volume, in which he calls Bryant's "Thanatopsis" "the first great poem in our annals."

It is pleasant to see him stress Jonathan Mayhew and insist on the importance of Madison as thinker and writer; Madison is usually placed in a secondary position, too subordinate to Jefferson and Hamilton. Mr. Angoff falls foul of Franklin in a very unfortunate way. "He had a cheap and shabby soul." "It would be more accurate to call Franklin the father of all the Kiwanians." "Franklin represented the least praiseworthy qualities of the inhabitants of the New World: miserliness, fanatical practicality, and lack of interest in what are usually known as spiritual things. Babbittry was not a new thing in America, but he made a religion of it, and by his tremendous success with it he grafted it upon the American people so securely that the national genius is still suffering from it." "The vulgarity he spread is still with us." (Earlier Mr. Angoff says that Samuel Sewell is "in short, a sort of Ur-Babbitt.") Well, just where does the vulgarity lie? In the writers criticized or in the manner of the criticism? The younger adventurers in the era of Mencken and Sinclair Lewis still have time to ask themselves such delicately critical questions.

Candor About Painters

Modern American Painters. By Samuel M. Kootz. Brewer and Warren. $5.

MR. KOOTZ'S book on modern American art has provoked considerable controversy because of certain aggressive generalizations about our art, and because of the picturesque and brusque manner in which he disposes of most of the favorite painters. As our critics have for years been nurturing an American renaissance, and in this task have been hailing every year several embryonic geniuses, they have quite naturally been perturbed. But in their haste to defend the artists Kootz dislikes they have failed to appreciate the penetrating way he has analyzed the painters he does believe in. His essays on Dove, Kuniyoshi, Marin, O'Keeffe, Sheeler, Sterne, and Weber should be models of perception and prose style for most professional critics. One need not agree with Mr. Kootz, but it is a pleasure to see so intelligent a man looking at paintings, explaining and balancing and thus evoking their qualities.

His tirade also seems to me healthy. What he is trying to do is to establish a standard. One hesitates at this word because it has been used so captiously by aesthetes. But we have real, if somewhat shifting, standards of other than our own present art which have developed through controversy, and the standard which this book is helping to erect is one which will come the same way. We know now that Eakens, Ryder, and Homer were the best American painters of their time. We did not know then. Many of the important men have faded out despite all the good said of them. If a hundred educated persons were to make a list of the six most important contemporary painters of Europe, there would probably be substantial agreement among them. It is certainly likely that Picasso and Matisse would be on every list. These definite feelings have come about through argument. There is plenty of argument about modern American art in private, but there is little in criticism. Most of our critics in an effort to be fair have at one time or another patted everyone on the back. Their zeal to be amiable has sometimes been so extreme that the owners of the galleries have been amazed themselves at the virtues found in their artists. Candid but intelligent criticism is something everyone agrees we need. Mr. Kootz is candid, and to my mind he is also intelligent.

WALTER GUTMAN

A Charming Autobiography

The Grass Roof. By Younghill Kang. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

YOUNGHILL KANG'S autobiographical novel owes its unusual charm not only to its material—the life of a Korean child born just before the time of the Japanese invasion, educated in Korean and Japanese schools, and, when the book closes, en route to a great American college—but also to that beauty of style which is the result probably of the perfect adaptation of language to sentiment—the sentiment here being that idyllic and childlike clarity of perception and recollection which requires an economical and simple poetry in prose. Each scene is exactly visualized and its significance is directly translated as it was felt and beheld by the child himself. To translate one culture into the terms of another is a difficult task, but it is a task which Mr. Kang has accomplished perfectly. One wonders, indeed, how much of the particular kind of naive and lucid beauty which his language commands is the result of a perfect mingling of Oriental and Occidental education. Mr. Kang never allows, as do some interpreters of other cultures, one point of view to cheapen or tarnish another. His contrasts are made with such sympathy and understanding of both Oriental and Occidental life that he points and heightens the charm of both.

This novel swings from one exquisite narrative sketch, like an idyll, to another, but the strand of each sketch is carried forward, and the character of the boy himself and of the members of his family and his friends gradually develops against the background, first, of the small village—

> On the right bank of the river, bordered and interspersed by pine and weeping-willow trees, was the village, and behind it, somewhat lower, the rice fields. On the left bank grew the millet and other grains, and farther over, against the opposite mountain, were to be found the deer, the hawks, the tiger cats, and the fabulous dragons. I can remember in the mornings when the sun was getting up how its beams trembled on dew-drunk foliage of the mountain, then poured down like sparkling bits of glass over the water in the valley—especially when the rice seeds were ripening in the fields. At such a time the whole world seemed to dance and glisten, for the color of the ripe rice was tawny, and lay rippling like a golden fleece under the eye.

And, later, against the revolutionary background of the Japanese invasion, when the boy, realizing the necessity for an education, walks his journey of one thousand lis to enter a Japanese government school. Twice he suffers imprisonment at the hands of the Japanese:

> For the last two weeks I was given the unofficial torture daily: beatings, suspension by thumbs, and questions in between times. It was dreadfully painful, and from one torture to another I could hardly keep my mind on the books I was allowed to study, such as "Hamlet" and the Bible (which I read from Genesis to Revelation for the first time). Taken back to my cell, I was fed exclusively on beans and water, three times a day. Thus arose my prejudice against beans.

When the book closes, the author is on his way to America under the protection of an American missionary. On shipboard he finds peace:

> It is like a revelation into the kingdom of eternity, this night of stars and clear wind in a world apart from other worlds. Above and around on every side move sea-gulls, following the motion of the waves, leading on from mystery to mystery.

The whole of this novel is interspersed, very rightly, with translations (made by the author with Frances Keely) from Korean poetry, and the book as a whole has much the quality of that poetry—simple, symbolic, and delightful.

EDA LOU WALTON

The History of Intelligence

Rational Evolution. By Robert Briffault. The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

THIS is another outline of history, starting with prehistoric man and ending with a preachment for the present. Since we have started with H. G. Wells and allowed ourselves to be taken for a ride with Oswald Spengler, it may be just as well that there are others to see us through. In the end we may have a fairly exhaustive array of possible doctrines and biases, and we shall learn to recognize them even when they are dressed up with the gadgets of scholarship. We may even learn to debunk the debunkers and trust our own judgments and affections. It appears at present that far from presenting synthetic pictures of history Mr. Wells and his successors are showing us how to take history to pieces and see how it works. The outliners are increasingly willing to let us see behind the scenes, and even to point out the particular set of strings they like to pull. We in turn are less easily shocked by bias and happy to take the spectacle for what it has to show us. This book takes orthodox history apart and shows us several very interesting novelties. It states its hypothesis in an early chapter, and that in turn is merely an explication of the title. Then it subsumes very select and very illuminating facts to illustrate the abstraction.

The thesis, or hypothesis, states that there has been very considerable progress in historical times in two respects: first, in material culture, and, second, in social justice. The basis of this progress has been an intellectual honesty which the author chooses to call rationalism. This rationalism is said to be Greek because it first came to light in Greek culture, but it turns out to be the sort of thing we associate with Voltaire or Tom Paine, although the author mentions neither of these as outstanding heroes. I mention them because they serve to point out which aspect of Greek culture he makes his standard.

The Oriental forbears of our civilization could not achieve intellectual honesty because they had priests who made and preserved various cults of irrationalism. The Greeks were never priest-ridden, so they gathered and examined the wisdoms of their neighbors freely and continually, but they made the mistake of ignoring facts, and thus remained pre-scientific in their rationalism. But even then they had the fruitful principles of it, which the Romans used to straighten out European law. The Romans finally fell for irrationalism in the form of an Oriental religion, Christianity, and this made them a prey to barbarism. Hence the Dark Ages. The Arabs preserved the vital principles of Greek rationalism and added an interest in fact. Moslem civilization was the birthplace of modern science and the Moslems were the rebuilders of European civilization. The modern period really begins with the Middle Ages, and the best we have in intellectual and moral culture, even to our ideal of a gentleman, is a legacy from Mohammedanism. This is the great novelty in the book. The rationalism of the Arabs passed into Christian thought and finally dispelled its dogmas, to replace them with the methods and cultural outlook of modern science. We have not yet seen the end of the process, but the vital rational principle is still at work in both our theoretical and practical life. It is to be seen in the scientific basis of industry and in the steady refinements of our social conscience. It is perhaps best seen in our recent shift from good intentions to intelligent opinion as the standard for moral judgments. We are still too tolerant of sincerity which is not expressed in intellect, but since rationalism is the principle of adaptation, we may expect to see any society based on soft liberalism eliminated in the next stages of the course of evolution.

The thesis is not new, nor in itself very interesting, but the use it has been put to in emphasizing the part played by the Moslems in European thought and manners fully justifies it as a historian's prejudice. This is particularly relevant for any students of the history of science who are sophisticated enough to doubt the orthodox nonsense that historians repeat about the relations of theology and science, and the freedom of thought in the Renaissance as compared with the Middle Ages. The minimum credence we can give to the evidence in this book would still make it necessary for historians of science and modern thought in general to look for more than they have seen in medieval theology. It becomes extremely questionable for anyone to conclude anything about the function or even the methods of science if he has not felt some peculiar gap, or, as this author says, some conspiracy of silence, in the account of the Middle Ages that we are asked to accept from the modern historian and student of the modern mind.

This book has many of the obvious faults of outlines of history. It oversimplifies and it preaches, but it also manages to throw light where light has been too long absent. It at least adds to our knowledge of our ignorance.

SCOTT BUCHANAN

Books in Brief

The Golden Grove: Selected Passages from the Sermons and Writings of Jeremy Taylor. Edited by Pearsall Smith. Oxford University Press. $3.50.

The cultural burden that posterity is obliged to carry becomes heavier each year: as a result, when we have decided that it is no longer incumbent upon us to read a given writer, or when the pleasure yielded by him is no longer sufficiently intense or sustained, we tend to neglect him altogether; the weight of his inferior work submerges with it all that is good. This process can be arrested only by critics and editors who can give us compact but discriminating selections. Mr. Logan Pearsall Smith has here performed that service admirably for the seventeenth-century prelate and controversial writer, once called the "Shakespeare of divines," Jeremy Taylor. In Taylor's case this service was peculiarly necessary. Mr. Smith writes in his fine introduction:

> All his works are old cabinets . . . full of trifles, but containing also much that is curious and of value; and if they are to be read at all, they must be read in selected passages and pages. For more than thirty years my eyes have been haunted by the glow of some of these jewels; in my ears have echoed, like the sound of far-off bells, the music of certain of his phrases, and I have long intended to make a selection from his writings.

A Jew in Love. By Ben Hecht. Covici-Friede. $2.50.

Many legends have grown up about Ben Hecht, not all of them to his good as a writer. One of them is that he has an extraordinarily facile pen. In late years his facility has carried him out of the field of serious writing to a large extent, and for a period his product was, in his own words, "peculiar swill" for the movies. With "A Jew in Love" he returns to serious fiction. At least one supposes that the book is a novel even though it is an insecurely constructed performance. It is difficult to be severe with Hecht if one has any taste at all for brilliant phrasing and excoriating analysis. In his study of the lecherous Jo Boshere both of these qualities are to the fore. Unfortunately, one can endure only so much analysis in a novel without becoming a bit bored, especially when analysis is entirely external. Boshere is literally picked to pieces in long analytical passages which slow up the story. The story itself is slight: the sordid love affairs of an egoist who lives in constant hell because he fears that his ladyloves either do not love him or only endure him by thinking of more desirable men. His fear drives him insanely to pry into their minds with all the viciousness of a small boy pulling the legs from flies. Hecht's attitude toward this despicable man seems to the reviewer to be one of hatred and fascination. At any rate he brings all his resources to bear upon his presentation to the reader, whose reaction must be "How brilliant Hecht is! How disgusting Boshere is!" There are remarkable isolated passages in the book, particularly a description of a minor character, Gabe Solomon, which comes nearer to epitomizing the Broadway type than Walter Winchell's column or Skolsky's tintypes.

The Child's Conception of Physical Causality. By Jean Piaget. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $4.

This is the last of a series of three volumes by the same author in the International Library of Psychology, Philosophy, and Scientific Method. The first volume was entitled "The Language and Thought of the Child" and the second "Judgment and Reasoning in the Child." They are remarkable studies of linguistic habits which we all have in various degrees of elaboration, observed as they first appear and analyzed in such a way that we could use them as we use Freud, to classify and recognize our friends. Their unique quality is due to the fact that the author is a psychologist who has achieved a certain degree of philosophical sophistication and has stated his problems in terms of the system of mathematical idealism developed by the French philosopher Brunschvicg. This means that his facts are arranged under an interpretative hypothesis which is clearly enough stated to allow his readers to criticize and reinterpret the results with some degree of precision. This is a new experience in reading psychology, perhaps worth passing on to friends who have been too often disappointed in psychology.

The Inferno of Dante. Translated into English Terza Rima Verse. With Introduction and Notes. By Lacy Lockert. Princeton University Press. $2.50.

The only trouble with this new translation of Dante into terza rima verse is that the translator has no feeling for verse. No advance has been made upon the several nineteenth-century versions in terza rima; and certainly there is no improvement upon the more recent one by Melville Best Anderson, which the present translator justly praises. The verse is halting and stiff, and the division by lines seems usually quite arbitrary. All in all, Norton's prose translation still gives the best impression that the original was the work of a great poet.

Undiplomatic Memories. By William Franklin Sands. The McGraw-Hill Company. $3.

President Cleveland appointed a stripling of twenty named William Franklin Sands to be second secretary of the American legation in Tokio. Thus was founded the diplomatic service of today, Sands becoming the first of our "career diplomats." His book deals in a wandering and highly personal fashion with the author's adventures in the Far East, his years as adviser to the Emperor of Korea, and his efforts to avert the Russo-Japanese war. His account makes excellent, often absorbing, reading.

Music

A Neglected Composer

It is only to be expected that partisans of neglected composers should exaggerate their virtues and gloss over their faults. So it is only natural that on a first hearing the Bruckner Seventh Symphony seemed a less blinding revelation than we had been led by some to expect. I spoke with an Austrian musician recently who told me that for him the three B's of music were Bach, Beethoven, and Bruckner. But I think even a first hearing of this Seventh Symphony makes it fairly clear that we are not likely to make groupings of this sort.

The most surprising thing about this work is that it was written in the 1880's—later, that is, than the most advanced works of Wagner, whom its composer adored—although, except in orchestration, it contains hardly a trace of his influence. Written, too, years after the symphonies of Schumann and the First of Brahms. Written, finally, eighty years after the Beethoven "Eroica," which, in its chordal first theme, in its solemn, elegiac adagio, in its scherzo in typical Beethoven rhythm, it at times recalls. It is surprising because harmonically, rhythmically, contrapuntally it seems considerably less advanced than any of these works.

In preparatory thumbing of a score most of us can take in only the more prominent parts in the orchestral texture. We assume rhythmic and contrapuntal complications that we have not time to explore. This tendency is the stronger in the case of Bruckner because to the eye the pages of his score bear a certain resemblance to those of Brahms, and one takes for granted a somewhat Brahmsian texture. It is a disappointment to find that in performance one hears hardly any more than one saw. There are themes in works of men like Mozart, Schubert, and Chopin that are nearly complete in themselves: the accompaniment may supplement them, but they need no complement. In Bach, Beethoven, Wagner, and Brahms the force of an idea lies more often than not largely in its contrast with other ideas. Bruckner seems to give Schubert treatment to Brahms and Beethoven themes.

It is contrast, chiefly, that is lacking—contrast of one theme with another, contrast of the rhythm of one voice with another, contrast of harmonic and orchestral coloring. When two voices move symmetrically in contrary directions the contrapuntal result is never offensive; but this is a device that can be overused, and Bruckner never tires of it. He makes it his chief means of thematic development: the top voice carries the theme in its original version; the bottom carries its melodic converse, or vice versa. The result is lamentably lacking in rhythmic variety and opposition, and as a consequence, the effect of the whole work is somewhat flat. It is oversimplified, so that essentials as well as non-essentials are omitted.

This rhythmic and contrapuntal flatness contrasts strangely with Bruckner's sonorous Wagnerian orchestration. There are periodic unison outbursts of the entire orchestra—great, resounding statements of ideas essentially lacking in the importance that would warrant such expression. A great, long, sonorous tonic chord, with Bayreuth tubas, trombones, horns, and trumpets blowing fanfares, as at the end of the first movement, can be effective only if there has been something very different from the tonic chord in what has preceded. In this case there has been, unfortunately, nothing of the sort. So that the grandiose orchestration sounds merely inflated.

Great works have often been pronounced platitudinous on first hearing, of course. Many of Brahms's works, and notably the last works of Beethoven, have meant little to many until they were known intimately. It may be that Bruckner's music is, as Josh Billings said of Wagner's, better than it sounds. It may be that the Mass which is said to be slated for performance next year will reveal a significance greater than that of the Seventh Symphony. Bruckner is, in any case—this much is clear from a single performance—not a man to be completely neglected, as he has been hitherto. Like Fauré and Elgar, he has had recognition almost exclusively in his own country, and it may well be that neglect of his works has been due to our shortcomings more than to his. It is to be hoped that the apathy with which the Bruckner work was greeted will not discourage Mr. Toscanini from further exploration in neglected fields. ARTHUR MENDEL

Architecture

In the Cause of a Noble Bridge

SIX hundred feet high, on the tower of the new Hudson Bridge, you can have some experience of the majesty of steel. The openness makes it seem higher than a thousand feet of solid skyscraper. The breeze wafts up from below; and through the lattice work of the great steel members the water shines, far underneath, with a flat rippling dazzle.

I was there on a storm-threatening August day. The sound was the whir and grind of the great cable-drums, and the tsish, tsish, zing of that incredible traveling wire: a wire so hard that you seek in vain to bend a small piece of it in your hand. No friendly ticktack of masons, or mortar smell, but in your nostrils the mixture of metal and warm oil. The Palisades opposite stood clear in the gathering gloom, but the city below was all in haze, and up the Hudson it was already black, and distant booms of thunder mingled with the whispering tsish, tsish, as if to remind you of the eternal grimness of bridges. Of John Roebling killed, his son Washington paralyzed, and scores of workmen lost.

So out on the catwalk under the great cable I found myself struck with awe before a heroic past, much as Rousseau was as he walked the three dizzy levels of the Roman Pont du Gard at Nîmes: "I felt lost like an insect in the immensity of the work. I felt, along with the sense of my own littleness, something nevertheless that seemed to elevate my soul; I said to myself with a sigh: 'Oh, that I had been born a Roman!'" Dream on, Rousseau, of your Mediterranean antiquity: but it's the tide of the great Atlantic we are straddling here; we are Americans; and it was weakness of Rome to require eleven ponderous steps for a distance of 850 feet—less than a sixth of a mile—when this cable before me clears 3,500 feet—two-thirds of a mile—at a single perfect throw.

To every age its own monuments, and its own material. In Rome, the Pantheon and the famous Roman cement. In medieval France, Chartres and Amiens, as last words in stone and glass. In modern America, bridges and steel.

For structural steel as well as modern engineering was born on bridges; the skyscrapers are merely the children; the structural shapes for all of them are still fabricated in the bridge shop. Among bridges the most beautiful are those of the modern suspension type, which are also the special pride of America, having been invented by James Finley in 1796, established by Roebling once for all fifty years ago, and now brought by such men as Modjeski and Amman to their present high perfection. And here, too, is steel in its finest promise: the cable—steel in tension. Twenty times stronger than the girder, the cable may yet liberate and expand all the construction of the twentieth century as the girder did that of the nineteenth.

Yet the perfection of a fine bridge does not flow automatically—as has too often been inferred—from the logic of pure engineering. Something deeper is required. In fifty years we have acquired but one masterpiece: the superb suspension bridge at Camden, of which the architect was Paul Cret. That the new Hudson Bridge should be nearly as fine, just as it stands; that people seeing it should be surprised at their own surprise—all this is one of those rare miracles when arrangement and proportion seem suddenly to strike on a full chord, so that the idea which was implicit comes forth as a revelation, and justifies a century of labor and sacrifice.

The consulting architect of the bridge is Mr. Cass Gilbert. Being a medievalist, he has somewhat of a stone eye. But let us hope he can be persuaded to let his bridge stand impressive and complete as it is. A stone veneer now can do nothing but kill the idea for the sake of a remote dream. Indeed, the genuine stone of the Palisades looks affectionately today at the water of the river, the wood of the trees, and the steel of the cable and towers—for what is steel but earth that has tasted the fierce modern fire?

Drama

Barrie's Problem Play

THE revival of "The Admirable Crichton" by Walter Hampden, Fay Bainter, and an all-star supporting cast (New Amsterdam Theater) is no occasion for discussing the merits of this play. So far as I can see, it never had any beyond the very considerable ones of clarity, symmetry, and a sort of sensible grace. Add that with the passage of a generation the clarity has become transparency, the symmetry has become neatness, and the grace has become innocence, and it will be plain that no one should expect to find himself excited either by the form or by the meaning of the piece as it now makes itself known. A generation of novels and plays which have shown society standing upside down might be thought a preparation for this return of "The Admirable Crichton," wherein Barrie once flirted with the notion of an equivalent upheaval. But he suffers by the preparation, and by the comparison. Lady Mary's speech at the close—"So much the worse for England!"—might once have sounded important, even a trifle daring. It is now the merest whisper after a storm. No, one may go to see Mr. Hampden and his cast with complete assurance that one's mind and heart will suffer no assault. Every situation, almost every speech, will be anticipated long before it arrives, and when it arrives, it will make only the meagerest demands upon one's powers of attention.

To say as much is to say, in fact, that "The Admirable Crichton" is perfectly suited for an all-star revival. On such an occasion it is obviously the acting that we go to see; and it will be well if we do not have to think or feel too strenuously, if in other words we do not have to become absorbed in the play itself. So was it a few years ago when John Drew, Pauline Lord, and a dozen others performed "Trelawney of the Wells." So is it now. I could sit through a long performance the other night and never for a moment wish it shorter. The pace was leisurely and deliberate. Each member of the cast was given all the time he wished for making this gesture, for raising that eyebrow, for intoning some phrase or other. Every actor was good; therefore he had the confidence of the audience from the beginning; therefore he could endlessly indulge his love of the miming art. It was as if a group of experts had gathered themselves privately together for the purpose of giving pleasure to connoisseurs. The connoisseurs could lean back through a slow evening, sipping the various excellences as they were carried on. I have rarely been so much delighted in the theater. Mr. Hampden was at his best as Crichton, and I think his best is very good. He has been accused of solemnity in the part. But the part is solemn. And I should like to know who else could have made the exits that Mr. Hampden made from the reception room of Lord Loam—the back of his head expressing something different every time, and expressing it with a wonderful skill. Miss Bainter as Lady Mary was proud and scornful in exactly the proper degree. Hubert Druce as Lord Loam was always a joy to behold. And Effie Shannon as Lady Brocklehurst injected just the amount of electricity into the fourth act that the fourth act needed.

The new comedy by Rachel Crothers, "As Husbands Go" (John Golden Theater), will undoubtedly have the success that Miss Crothers usually has. It is full of clever lines, nice people, clear sentiments, and intelligent perceptions. But I fancy that it will go the way of its predecessors—out of the memory. Somehow or other the works of this gifted playwright are more ephemeral than they ought to be—or than they ought apparently to be, for the laws of forgetfulness are probably as just as they are inexorable. Pressed for a reason in the present case, I should perhaps say that Miss Crothers has everything a comic writer ought to have except a dash of madness in her laughter. She is too simply wise. She knows as much at the beginning of a play as she does at the end, and so the impression at the end is that she has done no more than work out certain details of truth. Her situation here is rich in possibilities, and it is easy to imagine a vulgar writer doing awful things with it. Two ladies of Iowa return from a summer in Paris during which they have fallen in love not only with Paris but with two European gentlemen. The gentlemen follow them home, and we are treated to the spectacle of Europe and America looking at each other. It i easy, as I have said, to imagine a vulgar writer taking sides Miss Crothers does not take sides. But in the very levelnes with which she scrutinizes the scene there is a lack of tha passion which is quite as necessary in comedy as it is in tragedy and which makes the best comedy one of the best things in th human world.

Ed Wynn has returned to the Majestic Theater with hi fine piece of utter foolishness, "Simple Simon," and at th New Yorker Theater there has opened a rather dull myster play called "Gray Shadow," by Roger Wheeler.

THAT
CROPS UP AGAIN!

THE ancient dialogue is annually revived. "Where can we go this summer?" "We must take the baby away!" "We can't afford to spend too much!" What? When? How?

Perhaps the Stonybrook Colony at Westport, Conn. is the answer. Stonybrook is composed of a group of intelligent, modern, youthful families. Here the children may safely roam over 70 acres of lovely woodland. Here is a private lake. Here are tennis and handball courts. Golf and salt water bathing are nearby. Here is convenient commuting to New York.

Here are charming studio dwellings widely spaced in wooded nooks and on hilltops to insure privacy. Electricity, modern plumbing, food deliveries. Stone fireplaces and sleeping porches. Practical kitchens and tasteful furnishings. Here you may rent for a modest sum—or buy and own on a financially painless basis.

May we drive you up soon some sunny day?

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: Nation, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE NEW YORK SENATE, by a strictly party vote of twenty-six to twenty-four, has passed a resolution for a sweeping investigation, by a legislative committee, of the government of New York City. A Republican majority in the Assembly makes the investigation seem assured, with Justice Samuel Seabury as counsel. Never was a thorough-going and non-partisan inquiry worse needed. The authorizing of this investigation may well save Governor Roosevelt from serious embarrassment. When charges were presented to him recently asking the removal of District Attorney Crain from office, he acted within a day by appointing Mr. Seabury commissioner to investigate the charges, having had the advantage in the meanwhile, however, of a conference with Mr. Crain and John F. Curry, leader of Tammany. When the City Affairs Committee, however, presented charges against Mayor Walker similar in substance and even in language, the matter was more serious, and after some days the Governor sent a copy of the charges to the Mayor in California, asking him to make such reply as he chose promptly on his return to New York, which was expected in about ten days. The unexpected passage of the resolution for a legislative inquiry may make it unnecessary for the Governor to take action on the Walker charges, which result would doubtless not be entirely unwelcome to the leading contender for the Democratic Presidential nomination. Notwithstanding the great power of Tammany, however, the Governor, if he hopes for progressive support in his national political ambitions, would be well advised to free himself of all suspicion of alliance with that organization.

IT IS GOOD NEWS that the Farm Board will not speculate in the 1931 wheat crop. In making this announcement the board declares that "it cannot follow a regular policy of buying at prices above the market, paying heavy storage charges, and selling below cost"—a conclusion which it might have reached eighteen months ago. So it urges farmers to reduce wheat acreage by 20 per cent in order to cut output to domestic requirements and make it possible with the aid of the tariff to keep American above world prices—another unsound policy. The board contends that its emergency "stabilization" operations have made millions of dollars for the wheat-growers by keeping American prices from twenty to thirty-five cents above the world market; but it does not tell what will happen to prices and the supposed gains of the farmer when it unloads its holdings of possibly 200,000,000 bushels. It does not and cannot tell us what its losses on those holdings are going to be, but we do learn that it does not intend to sell wheat in a way that would adversely affect the market. If so, it is likely to hold it a long time. Even the announcement of the new policy made prices drop. Farm Board speculation has been an inevitable and disastrous failure, and has not even fooled the farmer. We shall be glad to see it brought to an end.

MR. HOOVER has more than once been guilty of shabbiness, but never more so than in his treatment of Senator Wagner, Democrat, of New York. The Senator is one of the few men in the upper house who has made a serious study of unemployment. He is the author of the unemployment bills first introduced in the Senate three years ago and reintroduced in 1930. Mr. Hoover found it necessary to veto these bills, in a statement whose facts were contradicted by a number of responsible and well-informed persons, among them Industrial Commissioner Frances Perkins, Mary Van Kleeck, Paul U. Kellogg, and John B. Andrews. But he had finally come to the conclusion that something should be done about unemployment—or employment, as the Administration prefers to call it. He favored an investigation. To this end he appointed John J. Leary, formerly labor reporter on the New York World, to study conditions in Europe, except Russia; and for the Senate committee proposed to survey the problem in this country we see as chairman Senator Hebert of Rhode Island and as second Republican member Senator Glenn of Illinois, both of whom have shown themselves to be hostile to Senator Wagner's ideas concerning unemployment insurance. Oh, yes; the minority member is to be Senator Wagner, Democrat, of New York.

WHILE EUROPE has been debating the possibilities of a general customs union and apparently concluding that the thing won't work, Germany and Austria have quietly arranged a customs agreement of their own and are holding it up to their neighbors as an example. The plan, in its main features at least, seems extremely simple. Both import and export duties up to 90 per cent of the trade between the two countries are to be abolished, and the remaining 10 per cent are to disappear within three years. Each country, meantime, will continue to collect tariff duties on other imports, but the net proceeds, after making provision for the service of the Dawes Plan loan and the League of Nations loan to Austria, will constitute a common fund and be divided between the two countries on some plan to be agreed upon. The right of each country to conclude trade treaties with other countries is reserved, as long as the Austro-German agreement is unimpaired. If other nations want to join, they will be welcomed. France, of course, sees the tariff agreement as a long step toward the forbidden union of Germany and Austria, and the documents will be attentively studied to see if anything should be done about it, but it seems a safe guess that the agreement will stand. It is rather hard on M. Briand and the League, however, to have the Central Powers step out briskly before the rest of Europe has even got into line.

THE TREASURY SITUATION is causing concern in Washington. In the budget message the President, on the basis of Treasury figures, estimated the probable deficit for the fiscal year ending June 30 next at $180,000,000. The Treasury some time ago raised this figure to $500,000,000, and latest indications are that it may reach $700,000,000 or more. Mr. Mellon has little better luck in figuring deficits than he had in estimating surpluses in the good old days of Coolidge prosperity. Income-tax collections due March 15, as thus far reported, have proved highly disappointing. Customs receipts during the fiscal year up to March 19 were only $278,000,000, leaving a long way to go to reach Secretary Mellon's estimate of $502,000,000 for the year. The situation clearly suggests the need for an increase of taxes, but with a Presidential campaign casting its shadow before, the Republicans will strain every nerve to avoid it. The suggestion is already being considered of reducing sinking-fund payments on the public debt, despite the opposition to such action expressed by the President in his budget message. It is an unsound procedure that ought not to be adopted. If the needed tax revision should actually be undertaken, the legislators ought not to overlook the large measure of success that has attended Mr. Mellon's years of work in taking income and inheritance taxes off the wealthier citizens.

THE NATIONAL WEALTH of the United States in 1929, according to the estimates of the National Industrial Conference Board, was $361,800,000,000, or $2,977 per capita, and the income $84,000,000,000, or $692 per capita. The board's income figure for 1928 was $78,000,000,000, compared with an estimate of $89,000,000,000 by the National Bureau of Economic Research. Such figures vary widely according to different methods of estimation, yet they are useful as giving some suggestion of the possible level of economic well-being. Assuming that all income were available for consumption, which it is not, the Conference Board's figures would give us less than $700 each to live on in the year of peak prosperity. This figure makes the 504 incomes of $1,000,000 and upward reported in that year appear a bit high by comparison. The way to get the most out of wealth, however, is not to try to divide it up with crude equality, but to take a steadily growing proportion of the national income to make adequate communal provision for all our universal needs, such as health and education, for example. We need to get rid of our absurd idea of the utility of the enormous incomes with which we overpay a few people, and begin to tax such incomes out of existence, if we are not ingenious enough to make them otherwise impossible. At the same time, we must realize that we are rich enough to meet adequately and regularly the fundamental needs of all our people, provided we are prepared to organize our economic and social scheme to that end. But we shall have to do some hard thinking first.

A FREE SPAIN, as far at least as participation in the municipal elections scheduled for April 12 is concerned, should be the result of King Alfonso's London decree, provided, of course, the King does not change his mind and again clamp on a censorship. In eleven words the decree reestablished constitutional guaranties in all the provinces of Spain. Freedom of the press and of public meeting and discussion had already been granted in the last days of the Berenguer Government, but the search of domiciles without a warrant remained, and that has now been abolished. The restoration of constitutional privileges probably means that all parties will take part in the elections. Whether they will all take part in the later national election will depend, apparently, upon the result of the voting on April 12. If the municipal vote shows a strong Republican trend, it is to be feared that the King, naturally averse to jeopardizing his throne, may again impose a censorship, in which case the Socialists and Republicans would undoubtedly persist in their decision to boycott the national elections. On the other hand, a distinct monarchist trend in the municipal elections would increase the influence of the Constitutionalists, a center party moderately favorable to the Crown, insistent upon constitutional procedure, and unfriendly to republicanism. The events of the next two weeks may decide whether the London decree is to stand, or is only to mark an interlude in a long course of political repression.

IN THE CORRESPONDENCE COLUMN of The Nation for March 18 was published a letter from Portland, Oregon, telling of the confinement in an insane asylum of an eighteen-year-old schoolboy, Mike Kulikoff, as punishment for having been caught reading two of Lenin's works. Since then, we are informed by the International Labor Defense, a strong campaign for his release resulted in having him placed in the custody of the Portland attorney for this organization. After a few brief hours of freedom, the boy was recommitted to the insane asylum. It appears that the Kulikoff case is but one example of the excesses to which Oregon officials are resorting in the new red scare sweeping that State. According to the International Labor Defense, numerous persons known to be or suspected of being Communists have been arrested in recent weeks; seventeen of these persons are now awaiting deportation; thirteen others are being tried under the criminal-syndicalism law. One man, Ben Boloff, has already been convicted and sentenced to ten years' imprisonment. Another, Fred Walker, organizer for the Young Communist League, was acquitted. The Oregon newspapers are said to be supporting the drive against the Communists with a strong editorial campaign denouncing "convict labor" in Russia.

A "MYSTERIOUS PEACE," according to the Federated Press, has been effected between the outlaw miners of Illinois headed by Alexander Howat and the United Mine Workers of America headed by John L. Lewis. Under the terms of the truce, so far as they have been disclosed, it appears that the Illinois organization has been turned over to the rebel officials, with the exception of Howat, and this group is to rejoin the international union upon the understanding that Lewis is to remain the international president. In other words, the two-year fight to break down the reactionary control of the United Mine Workers has failed. Lewis has surrendered the Illinois district, which is to remain under the control of the rebel officials, with the exception of Howat, in return for increased security as the head of the larger organization. The Illinois organization as a separate group has been broken up by its officials, John H. Walker and Harry Fishwick, who have asked the rank and file of the miners of that district to renew their allegiance to the international union as represented by Lewis. They have at the same time abandoned their efforts to establish a rival international, doing so on the ground that such a course could lead only to the destruction of the mine workers' solidarity in this country. It may be noted, however, that the peace was arranged without Howat, who was the real leader of the movement to break up the Lewis machine by creating a rival union. That he will feel encouraged to go on with his fight, in the face of his desertion by his strongest supporters, the Illinois miners, is questionable.

THE KNOWLEDGE that an operation of the most complicated sort could be had for not more than $253.50, including the surgeon's bill, thirteen days of hospital care in a private room, and operating and anaesthesia fees, would do much to remove the financial dread of hospitals and illness that now exists in every middle-class mind. The Baker Memorial Hospital, newest addition to the Massachusetts General Hospital in Boston, guarantees just that; and in practice it offers even more favorable economic terms to that great majority of people who desire and are able to pay a reasonable price for medical service—those who do not want charity and cannot afford the fancy prices that at present make a surgical operation seem like nothing so much as grand larceny, except that it is the victim who receives the punishment. The Baker Memorial, with a capacity of 330 beds, provides ward care for from $4 to $5.50 a day; a private room costs $6.50. But the most interesting point about this new haven for "white-collar" patients is the fact that no doctor is allowed to charge more than $150, no matter what operation he performs—and since practice in the Baker Memorial is restricted to the staff of the Massachusetts General, good care is assured. The maximum figure of $253.30 is arrived at on the basis of a fee of $150. As a matter of fact, the average cost for each of the 1,973 patients cared for during the hospital's first ten months was $158.94, divided into averages of $94.49 for hospital charges for thirteen days and $55.71 for professional fees. To those out of range of the Baker Memorial the most remarkable thing about it is the fact that, although well endowed, it plans to be self-supporting.

THE FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES, in approving, through a majority of the members of its Committee on Marriage and the Home, the use of contraceptives, is bringing the Protestant church into line with the prevailing modern thought. For it is idle to deny that whatever they publicly profess, the majority of intelligent and informed men and women do contravene the law against the use of contraceptives. The Catholic church, almost single-handed, persists in denouncing any form of birth control short of complete continence. The Federal Council of Churches committee was composed of twenty-eight persons, of whom all but six subscribed to the majority view, as follows:

> Whatever the final conclusion may be, the committee is strongly of the opinion that the church should not seek to impose its point of view as to the use of contraceptives upon the public by legislation or any other form of coercion; and especially should not seek to prohibit physicians from imparting such information to those who in the judgment of the medical profession are entitled to receive it.

This is temperate, sensible, enlightened. Many thousands of persons believe it already. Of these, a number will undoubtedly be grateful for sanction by the church of a course of conduct that economic or other necessity prescribes. They will agree also with the committee's answer to the time-honored objection that a widespread knowledge of contraceptives will result in promiscuous relations. The committee feels that such relations will not be indulged in by most people. They might have added that not only the Catholic church but the whole face of society is set against promiscuity; that irregular relations antedate contraceptives and will postdate them; and that the good afforded to the many by the proper knowledge of their use will wipe out the "illicit pleasure" they will afford to a few.

THE DEATH ON MARCH 20 of Hermann Müller, twice Chancellor of the German Republic and for many years chairman of the Social Democratic Party of that country, has removed from the German scene another moderate leader whose services Germany so badly needs in these difficult times. Less brilliant and less capable than Gustav Stresemann, Müller nevertheless greatly resembled the late Foreign Minister in his endeavors to bring peace and stability to his country. Stresemann came from the conservative right to counsel moderation in the foreign field; Müller came from the radical left to follow a similar course in domestic politics. The son of an industrialist, Hermann Müller turned to socialism early in his youth. As Foreign Minister in the Bauer Cabinet in 1919, however, he tempered his radicalism sufficiently to permit him to sign the Versailles treaty for Germany. Nine months later, at the time of the abortive Kapp Putsch, he was named Chancellor, and again he took a discreetly moderate stand. The Socialists resorted to a general strike to defeat the purpose of the monarchist coup, a move that a confirmed Socialist leader such as Müller could well have used to turn Germany into a Socialist state. Instead, he restored the republican government to an even keel, and then resigned. In 1928 Müller again became Chancellor. He was not equal to the economic crisis that developed in the following year, however, and in March, 1930, he resigned. From that time until his death he threw the support of his party to the Brüning Government.

The Unemployment Disaster

AT least seven million persons in the United States who want to work cannot get work. The Census Bureau at the end of the week gave out the results of its enumeration of unemployed workers in January, indicating a total for the country at large of 6,050,000 persons wholly without work, to whom at least another million must be added from other categories of the unemployed. The nineteen cities in which this special unemployment census was taken reported at the time of the regular census last April a trifle less than one-third of the total number of unemployed persons counted in the whole country, so there will be little question of the adequacy of the sample on which the present estimate is based. The enumerators found in these nineteen cities in January last a total of 1,930,666 persons in the so-called Class A, consisting of "persons out of a job, able to work, and looking for work." On this basis the corresponding number for the whole country is put by the Census Bureau at 6,050,000. But in addition there were counted in the nineteen cities 368,149 persons in Class B (persons having jobs, but on lay-off without pay). These included those part-time workers who were not employed on the day preceding the enumeration (evidently only part of the total number of part-time workers) and workers on temporary lay-off. For the country as a whole, then, there must be added three times that number, or at least another 1,100,000 workers, involuntarily idle at the time of the special census. We thus reach the appalling total of more than 7,000,000 persons wanting to work and unable to get work on the day of the count. This, be it noted, is a rock-bottom figure, resting on the Census Bureau's enumeration covering nearly a third of the workers. On the most favorable interpretation it indicates that out of all the persons in any way gainfully employed in the United States, one in six was vainly trying to get work last January. The actual situation in the industrial districts, of course, is distinctly worse than this. Detailed comparisons are given for sixteen of the nineteen cities, Boston, New York, and Chicago being omitted. Of the sixteen, only three show as small a proportion as one-sixth of their gainful workers "out of a job, able to work, and looking for work," while nine show a fifth or more of their gainful workers in that category, the proportion in Detroit and Cleveland, indeed, running above one-fourth. If the numbers out of work because of short time or lay-offs be added, six of the cities show a full quarter of the people without work. We prefer to use these minimum figures, resting on the sober count and calculation of the Census Bureau, rather than the larger ones put forward with a good deal of credibility in responsible quarters.

Even more striking than the absolute figures are the comparative numbers of April, 1930, and January, 1931. The Administration's handling of the Census Bureau's unemployment returns of April last, it will be remembered, was severely and justifiably criticized as tending to minimize the actual numbers out of work. No such criticism can lie against the actual comparison of returns at the two periods, and they show the startling result of an increase of unemployment during the nine intervening months of no less than 149 per cent. There were two and a half times as many people out of work in January last as in the preceding April, disastrous as was the situation at that time. No attempt is made in giving out the figures, as indeed none could be made, to gloss over or break the force of this stark comparison, although Secretary Lamont, as usual, cheerfully gives us reasons for thinking that January marked the actual bottom of the depression.

These, then, are the stubborn facts to be set off against the talk about the results of conferences with business leaders, promises of the return of prosperity, of enormous public-works programs, and all the rest of the uninterrupted ballyhoo with which a do-nothing Administration has sought to divert the public attention, to quiet the public mind, and thus to prevent direct federal action either for the relief of distress or for measures of future prevention. The Administration and the business leaders in whom it pathetically reposes its trust have had eighteen months in which to make their remedies work, and this is the result. Today they can do nothing better than defend themselves with talk of "world-wide business depression," which is a plain confession of failure. They have abdicated their proud position of years past as makers and dispensers of prosperity to the rest of us humble folk who know nothing better than to work for a living, and now that they cannot even give us a chance to do that, they acknowledge themselves helpless in the presence of world-wide forces too strong for them. Accordingly they profess themselves in no way responsible for our present plight. But if they and their system are not responsible for our disaster, neither were they responsible for the prosperity it is claimed that they created. In truth, our gods have tumbled themselves off their throne. If the American people exercise any intelligence, those gods will not be set up again. One need not be a Communist to feel a profound significance in the present intense and widespread interest in Russia in all parts of this country. Great numbers of Americans are wondering whether it is impossible to plan and organize our economic life so as to meet the fundamental needs of all the people and not simply to give profits to the few. Let the President and his supporters give heed before it is too late.

We have repeatedly and sharply criticized President Hoover and his associates for an unrealistic, unsound, inadequate, and, as it seemed to us, dishonest handling of the situation in respect to depression and unemployment. In view of the present census revelations we again ask in all seriousness what is to be hoped for from the man who as late as December in his annual message was still crying down the notorious facts of unemployment, who incontinently vetoed the carefully devised Wagner employment-exchange bill, who has stubbornly resisted every move toward assumption of any federal responsibility for citizens now plunged into distress by the operation of the economic system to which his whole fealty is pledged, and who has yet not brought forward a single idea containing real promise of making that system work better for the common man.

Labor or a Coalition

IN a letter tendering his resignation as Minister of Education in the MacDonald Government on March 2 Sir Charles Trevelyan said: "In the present disastrous condition of trade it seems to me that the crisis requires big Socialist measures as the only hope rather than painful and ineffective economies." It was possible, he added, that such a policy might mean a short life for the Government because of the failure of Liberal support, but since it was clear from the fate of the education bill that all the Government measures would "have short shrift" in the Lords, he was more than ever of the opinion "that we ought to be occupied in demonstrating to the country the alternative to economy and protection. Our value as a Government today should be to make people realize that socialism is that alternative. But as time goes on and the situation gets worse we show less and less intention to rely on socialism for the salvation of the country."

Sir Charles doubtless expressed the opinion of the Labor radicals. Mr. MacDonald, to be sure, calls himself a Socialist, but he is quite content to await the coming of socialism in some remote future, whereas the Labor radicals want a definite approach to socialism in their own day. Yet it is difficult to see how Mr. MacDonald, as the leader of a minority party, could have continued in office without compromise and makeshift. To win in the House of Commons on any major issue by the votes of his own party alone is out of the question. His Government must legislate, if it is to legislate at all, with the aid of Conservatives or Liberals, and since the Conservatives are least likely to sympathize with a Socialist policy, it is upon the Liberals that he has had mainly to rely.

The dependence has been the greater because the Labor Party itself has been disintegrating. The obligations of party discipline appear to be less and less regarded in the Labor ranks. On March 16, when the Government was defeated on the electoral-reform bill, two Labor members voted against the Government and sixteen were absent without being paired. When, in a party conference the next day, Mr. MacDonald took his followers to task, he is reported to have been told bluntly that he was not giving the party "the right kind of leadership" and that he would "get loyal teamwork as soon as he adopted the socialistic policies to which the party was pledged, and not before."

Now, apparently, his Liberal support is threatened, for the Liberals, like Labor, are menaced by a split. Notwithstanding an agreement by the party to support the electoral-reform bill—a bill which was brought forward as a sop to the Liberals and from which they were most obviously to benefit—when the clause abolishing university representation came to be voted on only nineteen of the fifty-eight Liberal members sided with the Government, ten voted against it, and six more were paired in opposition. The chief Liberal whip, Sir Archibald Sinclair, resigned his office in disgust, and Mr. Lloyd George, with his leadership hanging in balance, ventured nothing more than an announcement that resolutions defining the future course of the party would shortly be presented.

The suggestion that matters may be straightened out by reconstructing the MacDonald Ministry, with Mr. Lloyd George as Lord Privy Seal to look after unemployment, seems fantastic when the political careers of Ramsay MacDonald and Lloyd George are recalled. Moreover, such a coalition would be of no value to Mr. MacDonald unless it enabled him to count more surely than at present upon Liberal aid; and with the existing state of feeling among the Liberals it seems improbable that the party would allow Mr. Lloyd George or anyone else to deliver its vote bodily unless it knew pretty clearly in advance what policies it was expected to support. No more among Liberals than among Conservatives is there fundamental sympathy for socialism, and if the Labor radicals are dissatisfied with Mr. MacDonald now for his compromising and shifting, he could hardly hope for greater loyalty if he trimmed his sails further to catch a Liberal breeze.

Stranger things might happen, however, than that Mr. MacDonald should do just that and take the chances. He loves high office and is in no haste to relinquish it. He knows that the Conservatives, however vigorously they may attack him, are not really anxious to turn him out and take over his job. If he could count with certainty upon forty Liberal votes he might with some assurance let the Labor radicals go their way, confident that the Conservatives, at least, would not get their help and that the remaining Liberals would not long persist in remaining out in the cold. We may yet see a Labor-Liberal coalition in which the voice will be that of Ramsay MacDonald but the hand that of Lloyd George. It would not be necessary to take Mr. Lloyd George into the Cabinet. All that would be needed would be to make a few more compromises.

A Model Prison

THE new prison at Stateville, Illinois, an adjunct of and a reproach to Joliet Penitentiary, four miles away, is a "model" prison. Instead of the old cell block, where the corridors only were exposed to sunlight and air, Stateville consists of a series of circular buildings in which every cell receives the sun. The cells themselves are commodious, equipped with toilet facilities and electric light; even chairs with arm rests are provided to afford comfort to the prisoners. The food at Stateville is reported to be good, as prison food goes. In view of these facts, it is all the more unfortunate to have to report that the prisoners at Stateville, unappreciative of their little luxuries, set fire to the prison on March 18 with a resulting damage of some half a million dollars.

Must we, then, attribute the latest Illinois prison riot to the innate depravity of man, and particularly of men convicted of crime? Must we offer as remedy the proposal of Warden Hill of Joliet, who announced, after the latest riot had been subdued, that every prisoner in both penitentiaries would be deprived indefinitely of all privileges; that there would be no shows, no radios, no good-conduct marks; and of course that every prisoner even remotely considered an instigator of the disorder would be kept in solitary confinement at the Warden's pleasure? In deciding how to deal with the Joliet disturbance it might be illuminating to recapitulate events at Joliet since the first of the year. A few weeks ago three convicts, unarmed, were shot and killed by guards with machine-guns as they were attempting to scale the walls and make their escape. On March 8 Joseph Coakley, a prisoner who had been handcuffed to his cell in solitary confinement as punishment for his outspoken resentment against the above killing, died from a heart lesion. It is reported that Coakley was just recovering from a severe attack of influenza, but the authorities were sure that the heart weakness and not the handcuffing was the cause of death. On March 17 three convicts tried to start a riot in the mess hall, but were stopped and thrown into solitary before the disturbance became general. The next day the successful riot took place, during which prisoners, unarmed, set fire to various buildings, destroyed what equipment they could, and received the gunfire of the guards, with the death of one of the rioters. We submit that in the face of these difficulties the Warden's promise of more force, more machine-guns, more solitary confinement, more bread and water seems somehow not quite to meet the situation. A model prison cannot keep prisoners from rebellion; evidently more severe treatment cannot do so. What can?

What do the prisoners at Joliet complain of? During the latest riot they shouted, "Give us a new parole board!" All over the country there has been manifest an attitude which prisoners resent in Illinois. First, the imposition of the maximum sentence for a given crime—and in the United States, sentences, crime for crime, are several times more severe than in England or Germany, for example; second, a refusal of parole boards to allow time off for good behavior, to release prisoners after the minimum number of years of an indeterminate sentence has been served. The prisoner on entering prison has only one thought—that of the day when he will be released. Precedent has taught him that he may expect to serve a certain length of time for a certain offense. When the parole board disregards that precedent, as more and more is becoming the case, he is rendered desperate. Not comforts in prison but liberty are what concerns him. When liberty seems impossible, he will defy all force to express his desperation, his revolt.

There will be more prison riots. There will undoubtedly be more at Joliet. The prison is overcrowded by about 100 per cent. The model prison at Stateville is built, with all its comforts, to accommodate 2,500 men, when every intelligent penologist in the country has for years insisted that no prison group with more than 1,000 men in it is workable, can be either managed in prison or cured of its antisocial bias. The warden at Joliet is not very different from most prison wardens. If force fails him he will try more force. If that fails, as inevitably it must, he will try it yet again. The public at large will applaud him for refusing to "coddle" the inmates; judges will continue to impose heavy sentences, ten, twenty, thirty, forty years, with small hope of earlier release. And men in prison, deprived of that vital hope, will still be driven to desperate revolt. It is estimated that in a little over a year prison riots have resulted not only in the death of thirty men, but in the destruction of more than a million dollars' worth of property. It is barely possible that if property damage becomes great enough, we shall be forced to some drastic reconsideration of our national prison policy, to a realization that it is not to society's best interest to keep men in prison without hope. Otherwise the outlook is not encouraging.

The Harvard Memorial

THE Harvard Crimson has made a sharp protest against the proposal of the corporation to build a great new chapel as a war memorial. The New York Times ridicules the protest, saying: "Some of the children are bawling in the college papers"; "So the infants bleat"; and more to the same effect. One of the editors of the Harkness Hoot, in a letter to the Yale Daily News, strongly supports the Crimson. The honors, in our judgment, rest with the younger generation. The grounds of objection to the proposed memorial actually set forth by both the editors and the contributors of the Crimson seem to us evidence of a sound and serious concern with a question of real educational interest, and we congratulate them on their protest. The letter of Selden Rodman to the Yale Daily News supporting the stand of the Crimson raises at least three questions deserving of serious thought. He objects to the assumption of most of our war memorials that we were right and our enemies were wrong; he questions incidentally the right of universities to spend vast sums in unnecessary building; and, most striking of all, he declares: "The very gesture of sinking a million dollars in a Protestant chapel when the validity of Protestantism (and Christianity in general as a solution for contemporary problems) is being questioned must, to the unprejudiced observer, appear at least extravagant."

Now these protesting young men, if we understand them, are not objecting to religion as such, however much they may be questioning some of its current manifestations. They do seem to object, however, to the assumption that God is Nordic, Protestant, capitalistic, and pro-Ally. And they do not believe that the universities have the right to use the millions they can so easily command for the uncritical propagation of accepted ideas and beliefs. The students seem to be doing honest and genuine thinking, and in their thought we see far more of hope both for the universities and for the religion of the future than we can see in the action of a corporation that would build an unneeded chapel in the midst of a living university, or in the ideas of a great newspaper that finds it possible to defend such a waste provided only that the proposed building is "beautiful."

The controversy brings up another question that cries out for answer. Is it not full time to stop setting up religious war memorials of any kind? The churches, with a few honorable exceptions, blessed the last war, just as they have blessed every preceding one—and just as they will bless the next one, we are tempted to add. But during the past few years some of our prominent religious leaders have professed repentance, and have declared that they will be on the side of peace next time even when the drums beat. If their professions mean anything, they ought to fight every attempt to associate religion and war, even in retrospect. Let us build memorials, if we must, to our war dead, and let them express our grief at our folly and wickedness in sending these young men to death; but let us not help prepare another war by sanctifying the last one through associating its losses and sacrifices with the service of God instead of the devil.

The New Drive Against Russia

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Berlin, February 27

NOT a day passes but there is fresh evidence of a new drive against Russia. Indeed, it is impossible to pick up a copy of the London Times without finding from one to three items dealing with the menace of the Soviets. Thus we learn that no less than two leagues have been formed, with the usual complement of titled gentlemen, admirals, and generals, to protect the English public and English industry from the contamination of slave-made goods. It is declared that practically all Russian labor is enslaved by Stalin, and therefore everything that comes out of Russia should be boycotted. The action of the United States government in shutting out timber and pulpwood from northern Russia unless the importer can prove that it was not produced by convict labor and the complete boycott proclaimed by Canada are heartily acclaimed in London and elsewhere. The intense British anti-Russians wish and demand that the MacDonald Government take the same course. They rejoiced to learn that the recent visit of Mr. Bennett, the Prime Minister of Canada, to Washington was exclusively concerned with the question of joint action of Canada and the United States against Russian imports.

This campaign against Russian exports comes at a welcome moment. The excitement over the anti-religious attitude of the Soviets which reached such great heights about a year ago is dying down. None the less, the Christian Protest Movement formed in England in December, 1929, under the chairmanship of Prebendary Gough, Vicar of Brompton, has just reported that during its first year it held some 270 meetings in London and elsewhere, and that it has cooperated with similar protest movements in twelve Continental countries. It declares that its effort has been to keep its campaign entirely within religious lines. Nevertheless, if resentment can be aroused against Russia on the trade side, it will not hurt this other movement; on the contrary, it will help to keep it alive. The Catholic Women's League of England is not so careful to separate politics from religion, for it has sent a resolution to the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Mr. Henderson, to the effect that the league, representing the organized body of Catholic women of England, "in view of the pitiless cruelty of the present rulers of Soviet Russia toward the workers employed in their timber industry, as revealed by the sworn statements of escaped nationals now resident in England, . . . calls upon His Majesty's government to denounce these inhuman practices and to use every resource available to procure an alleviation of sufferings unjustly inflicted on helpless victims."

In the recent by-election in Fareham this vital question of Russian slave labor naturally came to the front, since Fareham is a glove-making center. The successful Conservative candidate reported that his audiences were "increasingly interested" in the dumping of timber, gloves, and other goods produced by slaves and forced laborers in Russia. It is, of course, too good an issue for Winston Churchill to neglect, and in his long speech of February 19 in Parliament he not only declared that the Five-Year Plan in Russia "would succeed in so far as it made for the economic ill-usage of other people," although it would fail to help the economic welfare of the Russians, but he asserted the "impossibility of standing against exportation by a state irrespective of profit and cost of production" to be a clear reason why England should turn from free trade to protection. Even more significant was his statement that "the government ought to take counsel with every friendly Power" to "try to concert joint action against the uneconomic exportations which were in increasing measure to be apprehended from Russia." Despite his break with Baldwin on the Indian question, there is no doubt that Churchill here voiced the prevailing sentiment in the Conservative Party. When it comes into power again it may be relied upon to take the lead against Russia.

The French are already at work. Not only are the conservative and reactionary forces in France taking exactly the same position; two important officials are touring Central Europe with a view to seeing how far the various countries, such as Czecho-Slovakia, Jugoslavia, and others, will go toward an international action against Russia along economic lines. There is plenty of evidence elsewhere that there is a systematic effort on foot to bring about an international economic boycott. One of the vice-presidents of the International Chamber of Commerce has been circulating widely a rather lengthy document urging business men to get behind such a boycott. I need not rehearse here to the readers of The Nation what has been suggested in Congress this winter, but I look within a year for the organization of American anti-Russian societies like those in England, and I expect soon to hear the cry raised that no more American engineers or workers be allowed to go to Moscow to aid in building up the system which is so hostile to the capitalist world. We shall hear more and more of Russian dumping as time passes. Louis Fischer dealt admirably with that subject in The Nation of December 17. I cannot add to what he has said or do else than stress the humor of the situation. Whereas until recently all the wiseacres of the capitalist world in politics and industry were certain that Russia could be ignored because the Five-Year Plan would fail and communism, as Mr. Hoover has so often assured us, was totally unworkable, they have now all suddenly discovered that the Five-Year Plan is to be such a howling success as to menace the very existence of capitalist society. Needless to say, these gentlemen would be just as excited about the Russian menace if the convict-labor issue had never arisen at all. Incidentally, they are quite oblivious of the fact, especially in the United States, that if times get worse in Germany and that country is to continue to pay reparations, it will have to dump harder to get any income from abroad, and that that dumping will be far more serious than the comparatively little which Russia is undertaking to do.

Please do not underestimate the seriousness of this move for a united economic boycott of Russia. It would unquestionably block effectively the development of Russia all along the line. That country would undoubtedly be able to carry on, precisely as it found itself able to get ahead slowly without the aid of foreign capital after its efforts to borrow abroad were effectively scotched. But it would take years to industrialize Russia, and the cost would be infinite.

There are, of course, certain obstacles to be overcome before there will be a united circle of impassable walls erected against Russia—an economic circle this time rather than the cordon of bayonets which was drawn around her, with the approval of the Allies and of America, at the time of the making of the Treaty of Versailles. Communists with whom I have talked here share the belief prevalent in Russia that any economic boycott will be a prelude to a united military attack upon the Soviets. The suggestion is absurd today. With Germany in the hole in which it is industrially, agriculturally, and financially, a war is utterly out of the question. You not only could not enlist Englishmen for such an armed attack upon Russia, but I have pretty good evidence that the present British government does not intend to allow itself to be led into an economic boycott or to the voicing of protests of the kind that the Catholic women have just asked for, despite its intense feeling of opposition to the Bolshevists. The industry of Europe, moreover, is collapsing, and more than one state will refuse to give up its Russian business which it needs so badly this year. In Germany the labor leaders will oppose a boycott if only because they are being driven to believe that for a long time to come about 3,000,000 Germans will be normally idle.

It is an interesting fact that six of the most prominent German big-business men left for Russia yesterday at the invitation of the Soviet Government to study conditions in Russia and see what plums can be picked up there to keep German factories at work. There is plenty of other evidence that in the existing emergency Germany is more and more turning to Russia and is looking with jealous eyes upon the huge contracts given out in Moscow to American engineering firms and engineers.

On the other hand, I find many sincere and honest people of Socialist leanings who are not ill-disposed toward Russia but who think Germany has troubles enough without being bothered by Russian propaganda. They are perfectly willing that Russia shall do within her own borders whatever she sees fit, but they are growing very uneasy about the influence that Russia may have over Germany's fate in the years to come. For example, I have just talked with a prominent business man who feels that his whole future and that of his family and his country are jeopardized by the Russian industrial menace. He is much less worried by the dumping today than by his fear of what Russia will be doing to the world ten or fifteen years from now, and he feels that there is justification for any and every economic action against Russia. He admits, however, that so far as he knows it has not yet been possible to bring about an agreement on any one policy to be pursued. But he says that sentiment is crystallizing to the effect that no special favors should be shown to the Russians in the way of special or long-term credits. The drift is to treat Russia in this respect precisely like any other country. None the less, the nearer we come to the end of the Five-Year Plan, now compressed to four years, the greater will be the alarm in Europe.

In Berlin one has many chances to get first-hand reports from Russia, for Americans are coming in and out all the time and passing through Berlin, and so are Englishmen and Germans. The situation as portrayed by these travelers, some of whom have lived in Russia for many years, can be summed up as follows: There is no doubt that the plan is going through and that it will be acclaimed by the Russian government as a triumphant success, no matter in what degree it succeeds. It is, of course, unthinkable that Stalin and his associates will admit failure, and as the preparation of figures of their "achievement" is in their hands they can do what they like with them. Since they have repeatedly changed the plan since its inception, it remains to be seen what they will decide to have been their real objective. What will happen after the program is "finished" is an entirely different question. The American engineers with whom I have talked, who are now working in Russia, believe that the experience of the Stalingrad tractor factory is typical of what will take place. It was well and quickly built by Americans, but the Russians to whom it was turned over could do nothing with it, so that a hurried call had to be sent for some thirty-five American mechanics and engineers to come and run it. It is reported that they have not yet been able to get the production up to maximum. A German manufacturer who is supplying Russia with a large amount of machinery was being condoled with by a friend on the ground that he would lose his present prosperity in two years more, when the Five-Year Plan would be complete. The German laughed and said, "Don't worry. The Russians are wearing out and using up my machines within two or three years after their installation." These instances could be multiplied indefinitely. The hasty summoning of American railroad men to take hold of the railroads is further proof of the point I am making. A German who has lived ten years in Russia showed a group of persons within a week what purported to be official figures recording that there had been 13,000 accidents, large and small, on the railroads within twelve months. An engineer who handles enormous quantities of raw material in Russia spoke of the unending delays and difficulties he had with his shipments. He was, by the way, quite certain that if the Soviet leaders had allowed themselves ten years to do the job they are trying to put through in four years, they would have made a tremendous success of it at much less expense and without having put their people to the torture of undernourishment and general misery in the meantime.

There is no variance in the descriptions of the suffering of the people. As to food supplies, there can be no question that the situation has grown much worse since the summer of 1929 when I made my visit there. Bread alone seems to be adequately supplied. The allowance of milk for a child in Moscow is twenty-four glasses a month. A letter has just been received from an American woman who returned to Moscow in January after a vacation in Europe. She writes that she can hardly stand residence in Moscow, so tremendous are the appeals to her sympathy and to her indignation. The requests for help are unending.

If this is the correct picture it certainly does not portray a triumphant Russia so successful at home as to have money, time, and energy left for propaganda abroad on a large scale. As every intelligent person knows, the Russian government is not dumping because it wants to or because of any malign plan to wreck European capitalism. They are ruthlessly depriving their people of what we should consider absolute necessities of life in an attempt to obtain foreign moneys. It is quite possible that in two years more they will be dumping much less in the effort to make good their promises to their own people to supply them by that time with adequate clothing, shoes, furniture, bedding, and food. This possibility will not weigh with those who are engineering the new drive against Russia. Nor will the fact that any obstacle put in the way of the free movement of trade from one country to another is certain to come back as a boomerang upon those who created it. Witness the effect of the reparations payments upon the American people; witness our enhanced tariffs which are checking our imports and exports and decreasing the purchasing power of Europe in the markets of the United States.

Is California Civilized?

By ROBERT WHITAKER

La Crescenta, California, March 14

IT will be forty-three years in August of this year since I first saw California, after a long ride through the desert. If heaven is as satisfying to me as was my initial experience of Southern California's fertility and beauty and unspeakable comfort, I shall have no complaint against the dreams of the delectable country which our fathers and mothers dreamed of old. Nor did San Francisco disappoint me when I waked to its coolness and invigorating sea winds the next morning; nor yet shall I ever forget the wonderful weeks which followed in the Santa Clara Valley. For more than four decades I have been privileged to live in one of the fairest and kindliest of all the regions of the earth. California is, indeed, a marvelous land, beyond anything the passing tourist can ever know, and many of its people are among the choicest fruits of human evolution.

All this only accentuates the bewilderment and bitter disappointment which must be felt by any thinking man at the social barbarism of California, provided he has any knowledge beyond what the pitiful public press gives of our ignorance, our intolerance, and above all our complacent social inertia. It is, I think, no accident that an American author here of international reputation, himself well acquainted with all other sections of the land, and American in his ancestry for many generations, confessed in public print some years ago: "It is my deliberate conviction that the American people are the most ignorant, and the most complacently ignorant people in the world." Nor is it strange that a prominent California editor admitted his assent to the indictment when I quoted the words to him.

California's reaction to the Chinese, the Japanese, the Hindus, and the Filipinos is a fourfold story of prejudice, ill-governed and lawless passion, class provincialism, and domination of the supposedly intellectual and moral leaders of our society by mob spirit and mercenary interests. It is hardly to be matched anywhere in America, if anywhere in the world. It is not, however, without fairly obvious explanation in certain features of our economic life which are peculiar to this semi-tropical land, just as the long continuance of slavery south of Mason and Dixon's line was due to economic conditions peculiar to that region. In both instances the exploitation of imported labor from lower levels of economic life abroad, that is, from Africa and Asia, and the consequent conflict induced by the defense development of more typically Western industrialism explain in large part the overriding of that idealism and legalism which we like to think our special claims to the consideration of mankind. What we have called the race problem is in both instances really a labor problem, as will be quite widely admitted now. What will be much more reluctantly admitted in California is that the dominant people here are affected with the same disposition that black slavery induced in the South, and for similar reasons, and that labor here has something of the same inferiority complex which operated among the Southern whites who were in competition with slave labor. On the higher levels of wealth control the Californian is willing to have the Asiatic here, and to fatten on him economically with slight regard for either the imported or the native article of human brawn and blood. On the lower levels of economic control American labor in California reacts to the foreigner from Asia, or for that matter from Mexico, with something of the same hatred, born of fear and injury, which white labor in the South had toward the exploited black man. California's race problem is a reflex in its major features of the older and more obvious race problem of the South.

California's brutality and respectable lawlessness toward the I. W. W. and later toward the Communists are of the same character in the main. It is the dependence of the State upon migratory labor and occasional service of a semi-servile character which makes this Pacific paradise so ruthless in overriding decency and justice and all considerations of civilization in its dealings with unskilled labor and with those who challenge the exploitation of such labor. More than a hundred members of the I. W. W. have been sent to the California penitentiaries for considerable terms of wholly unjustifiable imprisonment, without so much as any charge of actual violence, or even of personal advocacy of violence, being registered against them. In Oakland, over a period of several years, Anita Whitney, a real Jane Addams in the dignity and beauty of her character and in the distinguished social service which she has done, was allowed to be hounded by sleuths and officials not worthy to black her shoes. Others whose names were spared the publicity which hers drew, but who in character and social spirit and service were her peers, were thrown into jail, subjected to all manner of legal and official persecution, and finally sent to the penitentiary unless they were saved from that fate by their own extraordinary skill in defense. Anita Whitney escaped partly because of the tradition of her high social connections and imagined wealth. Besides, certain very powerful individuals had been drawn to her aid, despite her refusal to seek their intervention for herself, by the vast unselfishness with which she had served the cause of Irish freedom, for instance, and other neglected but not economically disreputable issues. But on the whole the public attitude toward her was not so different from that toward the persons who were jailed in Oakland for having actively interceded in behalf of the exploited workers around San Francisco Bay. Oakland was a little more tolerant toward them than South Carolina would have been toward William Lloyd Garrison and his fellow-Abolitionists, but felt very much as respectable Boston felt toward those New England agitators a hundred years ago, and for substantially the same reasons. California is, industrially, a sort of seasonal slave State, and whoever touches upon this situation so as to imperil the "institution" will be railroaded to the penitentiary by any possible means. And whoever dares say anything about it risks his living, if not his life.

Los Angeles, accordingly, is undisturbed when a cordon of police break into a privately owned hall where a banquet has been prepared for William Z. Foster, recently candidate of the Workers' Party of America for the Presidency of the United States. Not only do they drive out the guests and hosts with gas fumes, but they proceed to wreck tables, to smash chairs into fragments, to destroy the piano and other valuable furnishings, and to tear the very light fixtures from the ceiling, in such a fury of lawlessness that even the Communists, accustomed to official disregard of law and Constitution, are abashed at the frenzy which they behold. Not a church mentions the incident, so far as I have heard or read, unless it be that certain respectable Jews have protested against this invasion of a neighborhood wherein their kindred abound. Our Christian mayor is apparently unconcerned.

Worse than the Mooney-Billings case, which belongs in the same category, is the more recent but as yet unadvertised case of Frank Spector and his fellows, sent to the San Quentin Penitentiary a few months ago for terms of from three to forty-two years for having attempted the industrial organization of the exploited labor of the Imperial Valley. The case has not stirred a breath of protest among the churches or in respectable circles generally. The exploitation of field labor in California in 1931 is accepted as casually and deliberately as ever African slavery was in the South; when attacked, it is as virulently and as tyrannically defended. At Christmas of last year I stood in a cotton field near Brawley and watched men, women, and young children picking cotton under conditions that would be incredible to most of the American people. The manager himself volunteered to show me the hardships of the work, and informed me, with evidently honest sympathy, that it took eight hours of hard labor to pick a hundred pounds of cotton, and that the work was paid for at the rate of seventy-five cents a hundred pounds. Frank Spector I know personally, and Garrison himself was not a more unselfish, devoted, or heroic man. The trial was on a level with the meanest manifestations of legalized mobbery of the anti-slavery agitators of a century ago. Yet the "best people" of the Imperial Valley, as I know by more than one season of sojourning among them, are charming people, as charming as the aristocracy of the South ever was.

Yes, California is civilized. That is what is the matter with it; its civilization, economically considered, is the legal, political, and disciplinary ascendancy of a ruling class which lives by the exploitation of labor, and especially of unskilled labor. It shows plainly how amiable and charming in personal relations the ruling class may be in a civilization like this, which yet rests upon conditions of labor exploitation that cannot be changed without serious disturbance of the established order. However inhuman those conditions, then, no one may say anything about them without paying a price—a price which in this Lenten season our most cultivated and companionable church people are celebrating in a pleasantly vicarious way.

How to Control Public Utilities

By GUIDO H. MARX

THERE is no other field of public interest in which there is so complete, effective, and continuously operating machinery for the dissemination of misinformation and silencing of opposition as in the domain of the public utilities. Despite the revelations of the Federal Trade Commission's investigation, the public mind on many crucial points is ill-informed and confused. This is noticeably true in regard to the question of federal control versus State regulation. That there are honest advocates of State regulation, particularly among those who hold to an unquestioning States'-rights doctrine, it would be folly to deny. But what is more to the point is that this policy is advocated also by all those whose purpose it is to defeat genuine efforts at adequate regulation, and this precisely because they recognize the demonstrated inability of the individual States to cope with the problem.

A glance at the scope of the jurisdiction of State regulatory commissions over privately owned electric light and power companies will disclose the chaotic condition. One State, Delaware, has no commission. State regulation cannot apply to the District of Columbia, the territories, or what we politely term our dependencies. According to Mosher's standard book on "Electric Utilities," twenty-two of the State commissions have no jurisdiction over capitalization and issue of securities; seven have none over valuation for rate-making; seven, none over rates and rate schedules; fourteen, none over accounting; eleven, none over annual reports; seven, none over service; and so it goes. There is no need of elaborating the confusion. The possibility of getting uniform State codes of law and procedure, and in addition effective ones, may be set down as zero. Nothing in the past history of regulatory legislation justifies belief that those who profit by this situation of confusion and twilight zones would, without a bitter, prolonged, and adroit fight, permit the adoption of any measures to rectify it.

But even assuming that uniformly adequate powers were won, State regulatory bodies would still have no jurisdiction over companies engaged in interstate transmission (a matter of continually increasing importance in these days of developing super-power systems), and no effective control over those with financial affiliations (operating, management, or holding corporations) of an interstate or extrastate character. In brief, there would be left to them for exercise of their regulative powers only strictly local enterprises. It does not take a vivid imagination to picture how many of these there would be in a field where they are already a disappearing factor.

We have also a whole series of other elements tending to limit or defeat the protection of the rights and interests of the general public. As a rule the State commissions have inadequate funds and staffs to make the necessary and thorough investigations of accounts and physical properties. This may be one of the reasons for a growing tendency on their part to refuse to initiate proceedings and to confine themselves to an exercise of judicial functions, thus helping to bring about the very condition they were created to correct and placing the effort and cost of extensive case preparation and presentation on private individuals or municipalities. Court decisions—particularly in the matter of valuations based on reproduction cost, new, less depreciation—in a world of continuing fluctuation of prices have also set the stage for an endless series of entanglements.

Next we have a very great likelihood of the control of these minor commissioners by the very utilities they are supposed to regulate, and this whether they hold office by appointment or by election. The salaries in all but a very few cases, as New York and Pennsylvania, are not such as to attract outstanding men, nor can the large group of appointees be subjected to such public scrutiny as might be given to the few members of a single federal body. There have been, and are, many able and devoted men serving at considerable sacrifice on these State commissions, and the present writer would not have these paragraphs reflect in any manner upon them. Some of the commissions have outstanding records, but even a State which has been able to boast of an Eshelman and a Seavey has had others less conspicuous. It has not been outside the range of experience in some States that governors have felt obligated to appoint commissioners at the behest of utilities in return for financed campaign deficits. Separate local bodies of limited jurisdiction, staff, and financial resources are more easily dealt with by great national organizations. In brief, the advocates of State regulation are not unacquainted with the merits of separating your faggots.

The policies of the national organization of State utility commissioners have scarcely been such as to inspire one with great respect for their zeal for the general public interest. To quote Mosher: "It cannot be denied that the association has great potential value, but to date its social usefulness has been limited." "In reading the annual reports one is struck with the lack of discernment in passing judgment on defects and limitations of the existing methods of control." What living interest in the public welfare is to be expected from an organization which has no keener sense of the proprieties than to accept financial support, according to the Federal Trade Commission hearings, from the National Electric Light Association, one of the chief propaganda instruments of the utilities to be regulated? (In passing, it might be stated that the national societies of both the electrical and the mechanical engineers appear to be dominated by large corporate and utility groups and not to be as sensitive to the interests of their membership at large as could be wished. Engineers should throw off this pall of fear and intimidation.)

Even such a brief summary as the foregoing, which could be indefinitely expanded and documented, shows conclusively why those who do not want adequate regulation are all for "State regulation."

There is nothing of more widespread importance to a modern industrial nation than energy, commonly spoken of as power, whether it be derived from coal, oil, gas, water, oil shale, or peat. Whoever controls the energy resources, economically controls the nation. The problem of energy supply in our country is rapidly becoming one of interlocking super-power systems using both water and fuel sources. This is a national problem which can and must be handled nationally as a unified problem. Matters of valuation and rate regulation, vitally important to general welfare as they are, are only some of its elements. A national planning system must be devised for national resources irrespective of artificial political barriers such as State lines. But the first step would be to make all physically or financially interlocked groups directly and strictly amenable to federal control, and to broaden the powers and enlarge the staff of the Federal Power Commission to enable it to handle this large task as well as those already placed on its shoulders by present laws. The utmost vigilance should be exercised in scrutinizing the men nominated to perform so important a function, to insure that they be men of capacity and social vision, dominated by zeal for the general welfare, and absolutely free from all purpose to sabotage the laws they are set to enforce. "Put all your eggs in one basket," said Andrew Carnegie, "and watch the basket." Advocates of States' rights, sincere and insincere alike, can be counted upon to fight this plan to the last ditch. The plan, if adopted, would work only if there were on the part of the utilities an honest and sincere acceptance of effective regulation. Otherwise it would work until the utilities, twenty-four hours on the job each day, either captured the regulators, wore down their morale, or adroitly devised other means of beating the game. From our national experience with anti-trust legislation, the latter course is what is more reasonably to be expected, and this for two reasons. The first is that the temptations of the opportunities of exploitation that lie in the domain of private ownership of natural monopolies are too strong for men of business enterprise to resist. The second may be stated in the form of a question: Can one man really regulate another man's business? Such a question, to be sure, completely overlooks the fact that the public-utility business is really a partnership between capital and the public—a partnership to which the public makes contributions of the most essential and valuable character, in return for which it demands, with entire justice, complete knowledge of all the facts of the business together with full protection of its interests. In many cases it may be said with practical truth that it furnishes the capital as well. But these are facts which the so-called private owners wish to have forgotten, and it is probably unkind to mention them.

Federal regulation and national planning are undoubtedly the next steps, but I have no belief that they offer anything like a stable solution. Rather I would say: The right of eminent domain and the taxing power, to which it is closely related, are both distinctive features of government. Human history has taught us that these powers can never safely be alienated from the state and transferred into private hands. The farming-out of taxes, direct or disguised, has always led to oppression and disaster.

There are certain enterprises which by their very nature require the right of eminent domain, using that term in a broad sense—enterprises such as highways, bridges, railways, and those whose systems of pipes, cables, or wires require continuity over broad areas and, in especial, right of way under, in, or over the publicly owned roadways. All such enterprises require a concession of some of the sovereign functions of government, many of them necessarily exclusive and monopolistic. Such concessions once granted, call them franchises or what you will, are an alienation of sovereignty and carry with them indirectly but inevitably the taxing power. This is a power which should never pass out of the hands of government—even with the specious but deceptive check of regulation. All those enterprises which, dealing with essentials of modern existence, require the more or less exclusive use of the public property for their operation, and are thereby naturally sovereign in character, should be publicly owned and operated. And this because all other means of economic control for the general welfare exercised by legislatures, courts, or commissions have proved inadequate to protect the public at large—in brief the state sovereign—against the evasions, exactions, and anti-social actions of highly organized, controlling groups operating under the dominant motive of private profit.

Literature and the Reds

By CHARLES J. FINGER

NOT so long ago a certain silly man whose folly must leave him nameless—why use the public trumpets to herald stupidity?—delivered himself of a speech at a certain university, and told those who listened, or pretended to listen, or were too polite to show their impatience, that it was a good sign for young people to keep their eyes on the main chance, and not fill their heads with revolutionary stuff. There was much more of it, all nonsense.

I say that it was all nonsense, advisedly, talking from experience. For I, as I told the readers of the American Mercury recently, was of that happy crowd which had lived in the Age of Literary Appreciation in the latter 1880's, what time we interested ourselves in Home Rule; and in the Haymarket affair; and in Socialism with and under the leadership of William Morris, and Prince Kropotkin, and G. B. Shaw, and H. M. Hyndman; and in much more. We were hail-fellow-well-met with many—Annie Besant, Benjamin R. Tucker of Boston and "Liberty," Carpenter of "Toward Democracy," Henry George of "Progress and Poverty," Lawrence Gronlund, and many more besides. So we were busy, and if anyone had asked our opinion of Money, let us say, he might have received for an answer some saying from Thoreau relative to the ways of money-making leading directly downwards. Our heroes were Thoreau, who had written "Civil Disobedience"; and Walt Whitman, of "There the Great City Stands"; and Washington, who had said something about the possibility of government being a dangerous servant and a fearful master; and Jefferson, who had referred to a bloody watering of the tree of liberty; and Shelley, who had written incandescent pamphlets, distributing them by throwing them from windows at "likely-looking persons."

Now many are the professors who will tell you that the revolutionary Shelley is not the real Shelley, and that to follow the one is to miss the other, and much more; but I know otherwise. True it is, it may seem a far cry from the burning poem which begins

> . . . wherefore plow
> For the lords that lay ye low?
> Wherefore weave, with toil and care
> The rich robes your tyrants wear?

to "Prometheus Unbound," with all its subtle beauty and grandeur, a poem that rolls on like the finest orchestral music. But "one step upwards lowers the Andes," say the Chileans. Many of us, burning with enthusiasm for a new and a better society, took the step in those days of literary appreciation. True, we had not read Aeschylus, but what matter? We knew, as we knew patches of Homer, that Prometheus stood as friend of man and opponent of tyranny; that Zeus had chained him to a rock for his daring. So we were prepared for the allegory, and could follow much, identifying ourselves with Demogorgon, and determining to do that which might be done to dethrone the tyrant. We could, and did, set "Queen Mab" on a higher plane than critics said it should be set, and we did so because we found it a handy weapon to use against the enthroned tyrant of privilege. Because we revolted against things as they were, we read, and also understood, "The Revolt of Islam." And there is this: Shelley awoke in us the emotion he had experienced when he wrote; because of the reading of his poetry we were stirred to thought; because of an appetite awakened we opened vast volumes which we would certainly not otherwise have opened. And therein, I hold, lies at least part of the mission of great poetry.

The course lay clear then to Byron's "Childe Harold," to his "Corsair," to his "Cain," and to his iconoclastic "Don Juan." We rejoiced because Byron had left England for Greece to head the revolutionary forces there and we were glad when we read that he had visited the robber chieftain, Ali Pasha. To Southey, too, we went; and to Coleridge by consequence, because of their social enthusiasm—then, coming to "The Ancient Mariner" and to "Kubla Khan," we entered freely and simply into the land of fantasy, nor could ever after forget "caverns measureless to man," or ice that came floating by "as green as emerald." For we had come to discern beauty, as one discerns beauty in the sunrise, with no thought of the labor that the day would bring, but nevertheless fortified for that labor.

From revolution to literature! It reads queerly to bat-blind respectables, but such was the path for many. Because George Washington had said, "Government is not reason, it is not eloquence—it is force. Like fire it is a dangerous servant and a fearful master; never for a moment should it be left to irresponsible action"; and because Jefferson had said, "The tree of liberty must be refreshed from time to time with the blood of patriots and tyrants"; therefore we were revolutionists at heart. And because we were revolutionists, we thrilled at William Morris's line, "We who once were fools and dreamers, then shall be the brave and wise," and searching farther came to his "Defense of Guinevere" and his "Life and Death of Jason." Because William Wordsworth touched us with his sonnets to Toussaint L'Ouverture and to Andreas Hofer, both of whom had played a part in the unbinding of Prometheus and the dethroning of Zeus in the shape of Napoleon, therefore, by what may seem devious ways, we came to the "Ode to Immortality," and to "Tintern Abbey." William Cullen Bryant caught our hearts with his sonnet "William Tell" and thereby won us to "Thanatopsis," and to other graceful poems born of his love of quiet. As for Robert Burns, so close was he to us that it was as if we might meet him at the next corner. Then there was Keats, with his passionate poem written to Leigh Hunt on the occasion of Hunt's release from prison; and there was Hunt himself, turbulent and gloriously disrespectful of intrenched authority; and Walt Whitman, trumpet voiced; and Joaquin Miller, with his white-hot poem to the Czar, and his "Riel, the Rebel," glowing with divine hate; and Edward Carpenter, whom we knew, and whose "Toward Democracy" we knew and loved; and the Australian, Francis Adams, whose "Songs of the Army of the Night" was like a host with banners.

Singers of democracy they all were, and into strange lands and noble they led us. For it does not serve any wise purpose to frown upon the revolutionary spirit in youth. That spirit is hope, and hope is a herald. It is a spirit that means magnanimity, and single-mindedness, and enthusiasm, and watchfulness. It means a lively taste for ideas. It is significant of an ideal that is life. It means all things that make for manhood, good-will, sympathy, education, strength. It means the possession and cultivation of those virtues which make true patriots. It means a very life-current of interest in affairs, an interest in national behavior, a proper assimilation of that nourishment which is the sustenance of a live people who would achieve order and resist invasion and build character. It means the development of noblest faculties.

Turn youth from these aspirations which are bound up with the revolutionary spirit and you have a sullen people, a people with its heart set upon that basest of human desires—mere acquisition. You will have a people that is a mass of apathy and indifference, whose government shall become, indeed, a dangerous servant and a fearful master.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter knew, when he admitted, even by implication, that he trafficked with safety razors, that from some corner of the world would come a cry of outrage, scorn, or pity. It has come.

> I have been in the advertising business, employed in it rather, for about five years, attempting to harness an education really Pegasus-like to the dirty business of destroying words, good words, the blessed English words of Carlyle and Ruskin and Meredith—doing exactly what you so heartily inveigh against. Of course, I agree with you. Good Lord, how I agree with you! It is not only that the words die on the paper; the decay must commence in the minds of the poor unfortunates who give birth to them.
> That, however, is not my point—you know as much as I do about that. What made me feel concerned, sufficiently so to sit down and write this letter, is the thought that you, of all people, should stoop to shave yourself with a safety razor, a makeshift tool designed originally for the use of women, as if you were a man of no classical background whatsoever. Can you remember your father shaving, or any man whom as a boy you admired? Do you recall, in Conrad's stories, the fine, hard, close-shaven men who kept their pairs of English razors like rapiers in a case, their faithful companions through life?
> No gentleman should, no man of character ever would, rise each morning to go about a dull and slavish scraping of his face with the cheap little knick-knack known as a "safety razor." There is only one excuse, so far as it can go, and that is ignorance—ignorance of what our fathers took the trouble to find out for us about shaving. Did you, sir, ever try to shave with a razor, a shining blade of the finest, purest steel that with patient search a man is able to buy, even in this day of Hoover? Have you ever seen one used?
> You have been too busy or too careless, possibly too Bohemian, to learn and to help perpetuate one of the heritages of man's civilization, one in imminent danger of being lost, like our words, at the hands of the advertising cutthroat. Let me be the one to call your attention to your fault. Go to a good old-fashioned barber; get him to talk about razors, about real Nizhni leather strops—spend fifteen or twenty dollars for the very best. Then, if your nerves are steady enough mornings—if not, you had better wait until you can get them so—begin a higher philosophy, a sterner discipline, of shaving. Within a year you will be a new man for the first ten minutes of each of your allotted days. You will learn that it is still possible for a man to love and cherish a piece of steel. And from that you may, as I did, pass on to discoveries similar—that there are girls still at large in the world whose mothers taught them to bake bread. And once a week will bake it.
> Our personal existence must become more and more a struggle against the destroyers of steel, of bread, and of words. One can only organize one's own life, after the first surrender, as completely as possible in opposition. We must do more than exercise mere discrimination. If a man is to live as either a philosopher or a gentleman, he must show his scorn for the imitation. What could be better than an Anti-Safety-Razor League, for example, with a program including use of advertisements—well, not necessarily advertisements? At any rate, I hope that you are going to consider this letter very carefully.

* * * * *

CERTAINLY no safety razor ever invaded the domain of the mighty blade that the Drifter's father used. The Drifter can offer, in fact, no excuse for his defection, unless he might plead previous conditions of youth and innocence and the glamor of a new gadget. And since he has no excuse, either, for continuing his evil days, he is trembling on the verge of a resolve to eschew the safety razor forever. If his nerves were found wanting he could grow a beard—and he has been for years in search of a good excuse for growing a beard. But before he embarks upon an undecided future he wishes to acknowledge another letter which may be of comfort and assistance to those who persist in safety razors—those timid ones who lack the Drifter's anonymous courage.

May a late fellow-sufferer assure you that you have no need to live in bondage to the American safety-razor blade? You can get steel blades in this country. True, they are made in England, Germany, or Sweden—backward lands that have never accepted the gospel of mass production with its corollary of obsolescence by deterioration in quality—and the protective tariff compels you to pay twice as much for them as you pay for blades of domestic manufacture, assuming that you are so old-fashioned as to buy your blades instead of getting them as a bonus with a package of cigarettes or a remaindered book. But they last three times as long as American blades, so you can afford the extra price.

The Milk Monopoly

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A beautiful example of how sensitive prices are to the revered laws of supply and demand is afforded by the milk situation in New York City.

Late last summer the drought—which incidentally did not visit the legally restricted area from which the city must draw its supply—served as the pretext for boosting the retail price of milk one cent a quart. Yet only a few weeks previously the heads of two great milk companies, when called upon by a deputy attorney general to explain why prices were higher in New York than anywhere else in the United States, and why the abnormally low rates paid to the dairy farmer were not being reflected in a corresponding reduction to the consumer, testily insisted that the cost of raw milk had little bearing on retail prices, that the expense of distribution was the controlling factor. Unfortunately for this hypothesis the price of milk products continued to decline so greatly that the one-cent increase was reluctantly rescinded.

Butter is now selling in New York at pre-war prices, but bottled milk clings to its lofty perch. Grade A milk, which costs eighteen cents a quart—twenty cents for some occult reason on Long Island—brings fifteen cents in Jersey City just across the river, thirteen cents in Philadelphia and Chicago, twelve cents in St. Louis, and ten cents in Milwaukee. One might naively assume that density of population had some relation to cost of distribution, that delivery would be cheaper in the Bronx where a driver leaves more bottles in a single apartment building than he could in five blocks in Milwaukee.

Exploitation of basic food products—that of milk is but a flagrant example—is not confined to New York City. But citizens of the metropolis are politically more helpless to contend against this condition. Reformers complain that it is difficult to arouse people against corruption and glaring social evils because these are intangibles which the common man cannot conceive as having more than a remote effect on his welfare. But the price of milk or bread so plainly touches his purse that every inquiry has evoked immediate and sustained support from the public. Yet each such attack, launched with a great ballyhoo, has either pounded itself to pieces, been strangely silenced, or been deflected into the prosecution of some minor racketeer. Small wonder that thinking people, hopeless of any change as long as the sale of milk remains an uncontrolled monopoly, are beginning to talk either of its regulation as a public utility or of outright distribution by the State itself as the last remaining form of relief.

Or Your Money Back

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Recently, on the back cover of The Nation, a publishing house with high traditions advertised a course in mastery of good English. In less than two inches of the advertisement I found these sentences:

> All who heard them couldn't help feeling that they were not accustomed to associating with people of culture and refinement. . . . You use them first to check and correct your present mistakes and then for handy reference—showing you always, to meet all situations, the correct thing to say and how to say it! . . . Then see how quickly and easily you can master this way every phase of written and spoken English.

Will the advertised volumes teach me to use that kind of English?

Higher Education

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The official Calendar of the University of California for the week of February 16, 1931, contained the subjoined items. Do you think the question of the second is answered by the others? Or is this merely a malicious sampling of our admirably varied modern educational menu?

> MONDAY, FEBRUARY 16
> 1 p. m. Meeting of the Home Club at the home of Mrs. E. O. Essig, 910 Hilldale. Luncheon will be served and the afternoon will be spent in sewing.
> TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 17
> [illegible] p. m. Debate on the question, Is Modern Education a Failure? between Dr. Frederic P. Woellner of the University of California at Los Angeles and Professor Graham Allen Laing of the California Institute of Technology. Wheeler Auditorium. Admission 50 cents.
> THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 19
> 11 a. m. University Meeting. Harmon Gymnasium. William B. Stout, President of the Stout Air Service, Inc., Air Division of the Ford Motor Company; and Knute Rockne, Professor of Physical Education and Football Coach at the University of Notre Dame, will speak. All other university exercises will be suspended at this hour. The faculty is cordially invited to make use of the chairs on the platform.

Hunger in Chicago

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: On January 15 the Census Bureau, under the direction of the President's Commission on Unemployment, started a check on the number out of work in twenty cities of the country. The survey was supposed to be finished by February 15, and the results were to be made public by March 1. To date not one result has reached the public.

Meanwhile, Acting Police Commissioner Alcock in explaining the big increase of burglaries and stick-ups is reported by the press to have said: "With 400,000 men out of work and walking the streets, some increase in crime is to be expected." Chicago's male working population is slightly over 800,000. Today, United Charities of Chicago sent 25,000 requests to patrons for more funds. Each week sees more requests for aid, and the treasury is almost empty. Two months ago the presence of women and children in bread lines was cause for comment. Last Sunday one church organization reported 350 women and children among its 5,000 applicants for bread and soup.

I did not see Chicago mentioned in your country-wide survey of unemployment published in the issue of March 11. The policy of the press in this city of famine and destitution is one of discreet silence in regard to unemployment. I hope your correspondent here makes a survey of the situation. The Nation is about all we can depend upon for the facts of the disaster.

The French Loan

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have never been able to understand The Nation's attitude toward the money question and the role the bankers are playing. When, sometime ago, The Nation patted the bankers on the back for their evident desire to keep the peace of the world by opposing international trade barriers, I became convinced that The Nation apparently does not see straight. Now, again, you see a favorable sign in the French loan to Germany, because it "seems to suggest that German credit is believed to be good and that serious political difficulties between the two countries are not expected."

The true state of affairs between France and Germany, and also between America and Germany, is unfortunately of a totally different nature. For by French and American loans Germany is to be enslaved and crippled permanently. This is not a war cry, but a cold fact. As you know very well, Germany had to surrender part of her ownership in the national railroads to a mixed concern of foreigners, largely American. The city of Berlin had to surrender quite recently part of its public utilities to a group of Allied bankers. These money transactions simply mean the replacement of public stewardship by the private exploiter. The war which ended not with the war, Anglo-Saxon exploitation against German administration, is just beginning. The World War merely made the victim helpless.

Inquest

By NORMAN MACLEOD

In the cup of earth shelved by the pyramids of mountains the penitente towns are quiet, immovable, dark in the pale of distant sunlight,
shadows thrown into the pit of living darkness.
The thought of villages that cycle seasons until the cry of Easter is a welt upon the body and the land. Time goes over with the song of sadness and against the incontrovertible years the adobes hold the color of sun within the walls until the wine of life evaporates and the heart is still and the cactus creeps upon the sand and flowers redder than any lash upon the breast of a forest fire.

How Novels Get Bad Marx

IN the last ten pages of a pamphlet called "American Literature at the Crossroads,"* Mr. V. F. Calverton does me the honor of replying at length to my criticism of Michael Gold's attack on Thornton Wilder. As Mr. Calverton so astonishingly misinterprets my position and hence (though I am sure unintentionally) so profoundly misrepresents it, and as the critical issues involved, moreover, seem to me of central importance, I am permitting myself a few remarks in rejoinder.

The article that Mr. Calverton replies to appeared in The Nation of November 26. In the first paragraph of that article I remarked:

> Hardly have we emerged from a wave of humanist criticism, which rated a work of fiction low or high in direct ratio to the amount of will-to-refrain exhibited by its hero, than we are hit by a wave of Communist criticism, which hoots or hails a work of art in proportion as it seems to oppose, ignore, or support the opinions of a German economist who died in 1883.

In the last paragraph I concluded:

> The economic standards of the Communists fail disastrously in criticism for the same reason that the conventionally moral standards of the new humanists fail. Literary values are too comprehensive, too delicate, too complex, too profound, to be tested by such narrow and too, too simple standards.

Returning to the subject in an article called Standards (Loud Cheers) in The Nation of December 3, I wrote:

> If [the critic] assumes that there are in literature rules, standards, or canons arbitrarily set off in a special compartment from the rest of life he will make the mistake of pedants and mandarins. . . . All his experience, all his reading, all his knowledge of art, science, society, will enter into his judgment of a book as it enters into his judgment of a man. His standards in literature, in brief, will not be essentially different from his standards in life.

Surely it would have been difficult for me to state more clearly that I did not believe in what is called "pure" literature, or "pure" art; surely this was an obvious acknowledgment—even insistence—that art and literature have, among other things, a "social significance." Yet in the teeth of all this, Mr. Calverton, along with the New Masses of last January, persists in regarding me as an art-for-art's-saker. Mr. Calverton even writes, as if he were answering me: "Art then must be conceived of as a part of life, a living part of it and not an embroidered excrescence." My objection to Michael Gold's type of criticism, he remarks, springs from the fact that I am "primarily an aesthetic critic." Now so far am I from being an aesthetic critic in the sense Mr. Calverton implies, that I cannot even imagine—except possibly as applied to abstract decoration or a piece of music, and even these exceptions are dubious—what a purely "aesthetic" judgment means. It is Mr. Calverton who in this sense is the "aesthetic" critic, as I shall presently show.

I may point out here that so far from dismissing my main criticism of Mr. Gold's Wilder review Mr. Calverton ends by indorsing it. "[Mr. Gold's] review as it now stands," he writes, "reads more like a moral indictment than a critical attack. It is an indictment of Wilder's philosophy but not a criticism of Wilder's work. In other words, the literary qualities involved in Wilder's novels are scarcely touched upon at all." This is pretty close to the point I was making; I added that it was the application of the same sort of standard that led Mr. Gold not only to denounce Mr. Wilder's work but into such extravagances as that of hailing a novel called "Strike!" as "a burning and imperishable epic."

Mr. Calverton, though more or less Communist in spirit and doctrine, knows better than to apply such a standard when he criticizes a book himself. He is not carried off his feet by the propagandistic novels of Upton Sinclair because he recognizes, to put it bluntly, that most of Mr. Sinclair's characters are wax dummies. The novels of Mr. Gold and Mr. Dos Passos are far better from this standpoint; and it would be absurd to deny their value because they are "proletarian" in spirit: the fact even adds to their interest, though it does not raise them from good novels to masterpieces.

Mr. Calverton thinks he has hit upon the justification for his own sensible critical practice in a neat division which he finds in literary work between "social significance" and "craftsmanship." This division he takes from an article in the New Republic (which, though unsigned, I assume to have come from the hand of Edmund Wilson) also commenting on Mr. Gold's review: "When we consider a work of art," the article declared, "we must consider it not only from the point of view of its social significance, but also from the point of view of its craft. A Communist critic who, in reviewing a book, ignores the author's status as a craftsman is really denying the dignity of human work for purposes of political propaganda." Now there is only one reason why I cannot accept this neat division: it is altogether too simple, too tidy. It would be valid only if "social significance" meant one definite thing, and "craftsmanship" meant everything else that one could find in a novel: not only its structure, its "style"—with all that implies—but its character delineation, its psychological insight or profundity, its knowledge of special subjects, countries, regions, its knowledge of the world, its entire outlook on life, its humor, intensity, originality, flavor, force. Long before one can stretch the word "craftsmanship" to cover all these meanings it has snapped. "Craftsmanship," as commonly used, implies a mere technical or structural excellence—as when we speak of the craftsmanship of Pope's verse or Ibsen's plays —and it scarcely promotes clarity of thought to strain the word out of this common meaning. That Mr. Calverton unconsciously does use "craftsmanship" in this narrower sense—and thereby unintentionally reveals its inadequacy as a comprehensive literary standard—is shown by the following remark:

* University of Washington Chapbooks.

> While [the critic] may regret much that [the older classical authors] have written in scorn of the masses—Shakespeare for instance—he cannot but admire their genius as craftsmen in their art. The revolutionary critic, however, does not want to turn back to the ideas of these men for his inspiration. He is perfectly willing to learn from them as craftsmen, building upon the additions that they made to the writing craft in order to perfect his own contribution, but he is not willing to adopt their philosophy.

Mr. Calverton, in other words, imagines that he can draw a line through a great writer and put his "ideas" on the right and his "craftsmanship" on the left. To see just how naive this assumption is, let us give it an application quite concrete. I hope I may be forgiven if I take for this purpose Macbeth's almost too familiar:

Tomorrow, and tomorrow, and tomorrow,
Creeps in this petty pace from day to day,
To the last syllable of recorded time;
And all our yesterdays have lighted fools
The way to dusty death. Out, out, brief candle!
Life's but a walking shadow; a poor player,
That struts and frets his hour upon the stage,
And then is heard no more: it is a tale
Told by an idiot, full of sound and fury,
Signifying nothing.

What part of this, would Mr. Calverton say, is "craftsmanship" (which the revolutionary critic would accept) and what part "ideas" (which he would reject)? Has the first any important meaning except in relation to the second? What becomes of the tidy bifurcation?

A work of art, in brief, is a unit; the critic's judgment of it must be based, not on any single quality, but on all its qualities taken together. For convenience of discussion the critic may sometimes emphasize this or that aspect almost as if it existed in isolation—provided he remembers constantly that it really does nothing of the kind. And though, in a work of imaginative literature, whether play or poem or novel, the special political or economic views expressed or implied are not strictly speaking irrelevant, we come back to the fact that they are in the end of very little importance in their bearing on that play's or poem's or novel's ultimate literary value. No intelligent critic really gives a tinker's dam today whether or not Shakespeare was sound on democracy. No one of sense withholds his estimate of Joyce as novelist until he learns his ideas on socially necessary labor time or the Five-Year Plan. Such standards would not only be narrow; they would be in the strictest sense fanatical.

Henry Hazlitt

O Pioneers!

Jonathan Gentry. By Mark Van Doren. Albert and Charles Boni. $2.50.

WITH the interest in our American tradition and in the significance of American history has come a revival of narrative poetry, the only modern form for summing up the meaning of a people. For the older epic came always at a turning-point in the history of a race or a religion, and our American history is but begun. Moreover, we are today psychologically incapable of looking upon human beings as akin to the gods or as men of heroic proportions, and the machinery of the epic, therefore, is inapt. Allegory too is largely a lost art; any meaningful allegory of the present, for one thing, would be far too complex to follow. Straightforward narrative remains, and story-telling in verse allows for a heightening of the subject not permissible to prose—for more lyricism and more intensity. It is this medium that Mark Van Doren has chosen in his romantic account of the pattern through which which the American pioneer and his sons and grandsons move.

"Jonathan Gentry" is a narrative poem which treats of five generations of the same family on this continent: the first Jonathan pioneered in the days of the settlements and explorations of the Ohio River valley in 1800, escaped from a dead past to a living present; the third Jonathan fought through the Civil War, not so much to free the slaves as because it was his own Civil War, threatening, as it did, his land and the deep peace of his land; the fifth Jonathan engages this very day in the struggle of the farm against the encroachment of the city.

Mr. Van Doren has given his story a unity by keeping within the history of a single family; he is enabled thus to indicate the strain which differentiates this family from other pioneers, for these are gentle and thoughtful men who love their land with a somber and convincing passion. The poet has chosen to present his materials lyrically and reflectively rather than dramatically. In his work, as in the work of most lyric poets who turn to the longer narrative forms, we find the employment of lyrical devices—devices which heighten the meaning of the narrative: a symbolic interpretation of the story is introduced, and the Ohio River becomes the river of life flowing into death; the monologue is employed here and again that we may know the innermost thoughts of the characters. Jonathan the first, watching the sea-gulls wheeling overhead, speaks:

Shore-birds,
Dwellers upon the dead edge,
Criers above the white line of salt and beaten sand around the world,
Wing Watchers
Sick of the old sameness—
Gulls it is not you I sailed to see.
Lead me to the land again and go again
Ruefully rising, rising,
Desolate up and up forever behind me.
Birds of an old world,
My eyes are shaped for newness, and for wings
Of Paradise above an inland river.

And when the fifth generation comes on and the last Jonathan watches his Love drift past him toward the magnet of the City, his emotion, too, is a lyrical emotion.

Other technical lyric devices are employed; the poem as a whole is written in free verse curving naturally to the curve of the feeling, swinging now and then into the exactly patterned lyric:

No answer; but the sun upon the full unconscious river
Spread a sudden purple; then the empty west.
The people move away now and dumbly toward the cabin
As sheep before a shepherd, driven into rest.

No whisper told him, tall by the low bow,
What his mind desired; nor could he hope to hear.
All he had was silence, slipping up the river,
All he had was night, lapping from the rear.

The old fiddler on the Ohio River sings songs about the new life to be explored; the soldiers marching keep step to crude tunes expressive of their own simple feelings, and the half-witted hired man of the last Jonathan Gentry interprets the distortion of life under the modern influences of jazz and the city when he bursts into irresponsible and crazy rhymes. Thus, although the poet never speaks save through a character, these devices serve to give his interpretation of the men he portrays and to shape the poem to an emotional unity. Gradually the story grows more dramatic as we move out of the past into the present, the poet evidently identifying himself more and more with the emotions expressed. The last portion of the book is, therefore, dramatically at highest pitch and certainly the most exciting chapter of the narrative.

Mr. Van Doren understands his form and its limitations; he prefers subjective intensity to objective melodrama. His characters think and feel far more than they act, and we come to understand them rather through their minds than through their deeds. In this Mr. Van Doren differs sharply from Jeffers and is rather in agreement with Robinson.

It is not at all unlikely that the poem "Jonathan Gentry" came to Mr. Van Doren as an offshoot from his work on "An Autobiography of America." Everywhere today there is this interest in our own background: critics like Constance Rourke have turned to explore it; poets like MacLeish have come to acknowledge the necessity of having roots. The spirit of Whitman seems to be abroad again, now that we have proceeded far enough to take some account of the road over which we have traveled, and for the future history of American thought and literature this is very important. This poem of Mr. Van Doren's proceeds from and marks a new feeling for America.

Walter de la Mare

On the Edge. By Walter de la Mare. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

ALTHOUGH his talent is not of the kind that demands critical evaluation, by this time we have had the opportunity to form an opinion of Walter de la Mare. We know the obvious things: his fantastic vein, his interest in the supernatural, his love of children. We also know that his work is not of the kind that is called major, that it is inclined to be bookish, to address itself to the literary connoisseur, to indulge in a questionable persiflage, and to wander far from the simple, important emotions. If we have read him with any love we know further that in spite of his limitations he is a genuine artist, that his sense of people and places is not bookish but real, that to exceptional narrative and verbal gifts he has joined a most scrupulous integrity, that his work is truly finished, each word being the product of both sensibility and imagination. He is thus able to provide us with a definite and enjoyable experience, which might be described as an adventure in good manners. And for this adventure we are indebted to a peculiar inward struggle, to a duel between two conflicting forces in his soul: between an exquisite romanticism on one hand, which would give carte blanche to his heart, and between a British sense of propriety on the other hand, which requires his heart to justify every beat.

Most of his old interests are to be found once more in this collection of eight new short stories. The supernatural, for instance, plays its part in three of them; literature, in two. One has for its hero a child. One is a sentimental fantasy recalling "Memoirs of a Midget." Only one, so far as I am aware, is new in type. That is The Orgy: An Idyll, which is a slowly unbuttoning farce with an idea that I at least have never before encountered. As a whole the collection seems up to his standard. I doubt, in fact, if any other stories of comparable workmanship have been published this season.

Since space is limited, let us confine ourselves to the story entitled At First Sight, which falls into the class of sentimental fantasy and recalls "Memoirs of a Midget." This is the longest story in the volume and reveals most clearly the creative drama which takes place within Mr. de la Mare. It is the story of a young man who at first sight appears to be blind, because of a green silk shade that he wears, but in reality is merely unable to lift his eyes off the ground. Thus, of course—as we might expect from Mr. de la Mare—he becomes "a connoisseur of horses' hoofs, boots and shoes, socks and laces, of the nether portion of trouser legs, and of feminine skirts, shoes, and ankles." Though closely guarded by his "Grummumma," he manages to meet a shopgirl (with the sensibilities of a princess) and falls in love with her. It would be impossible to find a better example of Mr. de la Mare's method. The design of his story is to be affecting. And affecting it is: we feel the pain in our own skull when poor Cecil tries to lift his eyes; we weep for his friendlessness; we are enraged by his Grummumma—"like an immense well-fed cat at a mouse's hole"—as she tries to frustrate his first shy move toward happiness; and we hope bitterly that he will get the girl. But we know from the start that he never will. We know that he is fighting a losing battle—and not against fate or his Grummumma, but against a mighty and unfair force (unfair because it exists not in himself or in the situation but in the soul of his creator), the mighty force, in fact, of British propriety. For the truth is that Mr. de la Mare would never have been able to lift his eyes if he had permitted Cecil to get the girl. He is a sentimentalist and—such is the weight of convention upon him—he is ashamed of his sentimentality. His method, therefore, is to begin with a sentimental idea and thereafter to justify it by systematically defeating it. (We find this principle at work not only in the general scheme of his story but in every page, every paragraph.)

This is the drama that takes place within Mr. de la Mare. We respect it since it has produced such exquisite art, such exquisite good manners. At the same time we regret that convention has been allowed to intrude in these matters. We think of another sentimentalist, Sterne, at a time when the British sense of propriety was not so strong, who did not consume so much of his energy in defeating his own genius, and produced a body of work that is lasting and universal.

The Hope of Equality

Equality. By R. H. Tawney. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.25.

DESPITE the broad sweep of current economic and political reaction, Mr. Tawney remains an absolutely unterrified, even if thoroughly reasonable, equalitarian. He is in favor of getting, just as fast as we can, just as large a measure as possible of equality, in order to give just as wide scope as can be attained to those innate human differences which are often alleged as a defense of inequality. Our grossly unequal distribution of wealth and income depends largely on our institutions, which are determined, "not by immutable economic laws, but by the values, preferences, interests, and ideals which rule at any moment in a given society." Who disagrees with Mr. Tawney, let him look at Russia. We have inequality because most people believe economic, if not political, inequality a good thing. But Mr. Tawney would get rid of it so far as possible, as the only means of letting individual differences between people flower, and of setting up the relations between classes that are essential to a happy and civilized community. As it stands today, riches tyrannize over the poor because the poor revere riches; wealth does open the doors of opportunity, and poverty closes them. The only way of getting rid of that fatal reverence for riches is to make impossible "the existence of a class which is important merely because it is rich." Not in a long time has there been as keen an attack as this on inequality, supported with as great a weight of artillery.

When political equality entered modern life, the liberal movement that brought it in sanctified the inequalities of wealth and power that rested on economic differences, assuming that under the new political conditions wealth and property would be distributed in accordance with human deserts. The present equalitarian movement rightly denies that assumption. It undertakes to make the material conditions of culture and civilization available to all people, not simply to a minority; and it is determined to base industrial government on consent, not on the will of property-owners and their agents. Not only does Mr. Tawney give the movement his blessing, but he holds it possible for us to attain the ends it sets forth, if we really want to. His common-sense hopefulness is a welcome contrast to the bleak economic determination of the apostles of inevitable class struggle, and his hope is not without ground.

How are we to move toward equality? The Communists have one way, which most of us do not like. Mr. Tawney rightly counters the silly statement that equal division of present income would simply leave everyone poor, by pointing out that nobody outside a Communist state, or indeed in it, attempts or contemplates such a method. The line of progress outside communism lies in providing, by progressive taxation, out of the social surplus the essential conditions of health, education, and civilization for all members of society "irrespective of their income, occupation, or social position." Society has got to make collective provision because the citizen individually, even with generous income, cannot do it himself. The history of such provision has given the lie to the predictions of disaster that have preceded every extension of social services.

Having carried his argument to this point, Mr. Tawney takes up the notion that such social services ruin industry by necessitating heavy taxes. His discussion may be commended to those timid souls, many of them highly placed in government and industry, who fear to see American industry destroyed and the American spirit enfeebled by any policy which contemplates putting at the disposal of every member of the community by public action the material essentials of good living. His argument is animated by courage and common sense.

Even such communal provision of necessaries, Mr. Tawney points out, will not take us far on the road to equality unless economic power is to be shifted from its present holders—those who happen to own—to a group who will exercise it with social responsibility. Economic government must become a public matter. Mr. Tawney looks forward to a time when final authority on organization and policy in the industries will rest in the hands of groups nominated by the state, by organizations of consumers, and by the workers of all grades. In view of recent revelations in coal and cotton, he points out very effectively that "the pretense that the capitalist is the heaven-inspired guardian of economic efficiency is a bluff too unplausible even to be entertaining." Recognizing the advantages of nationalization in the necessary processes of reorganization, Mr. Tawney is ready to provide for a wide variety of plans of organization and control, but he is insistent on driving forward with the process of socializing—that is, organizing in behalf of the general welfare, not the profits of investors—the key industries, banking, transport, power, coal, and land and agriculture.

The purpose of the attempt to equalize the externals of life is not "to pamper the gross bodily appetites of the envious multitude, but to free the spirit of all." The argument is a keen one. The chief enemy of the life of the spirit "is itself a religion . . . the idolatry of wealth, with . . . its strong sense of the sanctity of possessions and weak sense of the dignity of human beings, and its consequent emphasis, not on the common interests which unite men, but on the accidents of property and circumstance and economic condition which divide them." To destroy that faith we must make haste toward the equality of wealth, not because wealth intrinsically is highly important, for it is not; but because under our present organization its possession means opportunity and its lack denial of opportunity, and because equalization offers our only practicable means of changing that stubborn fact. Mr. Tawney's equalitarianism rests on a firm spiritual foundation.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

Books in Brief

Revolt in the Arts. By Oliver M. Sayler. With Contributions by Thirty-six Representative Authorities. Brentano's. $3.50.

Of the two almost equal parts that make up this book, one, the work of Mr. Sayler, gives a general review of the subject, and the other represents a symposium by a number of "authorities" dealing with their respective arts. There is not much evidence of revolt in these shorter contributions, with the exception, perhaps, of the characteristically iconoclastic proclamation by Frank Lloyd Wright. Nor is it to be wondered at, seeing that the aesthetic revolt has definitely subsided in most of the arts and that we are now passing through a period of stock-taking. Even in the wider sense in which Mr. Sayler uses the term—the sense of a revolution in the conditions of art work due to the growing prominence of machine-made art—the essays of the symposium reveal no particular state of disturbance except in the fields of the theater and concert music, where the talking picture and the radio have made important conquests. But there can be no question of the importance of the problem itself. In fact, there are two problems here: that of the influence of the machine on the creative processes of art, and that of the commercial methods of "selling" art to the masses. While it is theoretically possible for the artist to become the master of the machine, it is extremely doubtful that under the present economic system he will ever succeed in imposing his will on the business organizations engaged in large-scale manufacture and distribution of art. Mr. Sayler's optimism in this respect is incredibly naive. Not only does he welcome the growing influence of the machine-made art, but he even hopes to see the "hand-made" art saved for the American public by generous endowments to be provided, "with no strings attached to them," by the self-same big business that cultivates Hollywood atrocities and advertisers' programs on the radio.

Francis Dana. By W. P. Cresson. The Dial Press. $5.

A somewhat reactionary, moderately able, high-minded man, Francis Dana served his country in several offices of contemporary importance from 1780 until his death. Chief among his services were those as diplomatic representative of the Continental Congress at the Russian court, and as an associate justice of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts after independence was won. In this somewhat discursive biography by Mr. Cresson, who has himself been a diplomat, it is the Russian mission which looms largest. The results of that mission were, happily for us, of a purely negative sort, and Dana displayed a "masterful inactivity." This first full-length biography of him is based upon a considerable amount of manuscript sources, though some important ones known to have existed at one time have been lost. A careful study of the Russian negotiations, based on the sources and by a trained scholar and diplomatist, makes an excellent footnote to history, though the abortive mission was never of the first importance. Dana, however, as a public servant and as a personality, cannot be considered as entitled to a 400-page biography. Both his modest achievements and his somewhat colorless mind and character have to be spread too thin. American mental standardization seems to require that a biography to be serious or salable has to be of octavo size and one and a half inches thick. This is not Mr. Cresson's fault, and the remark is not intended to discredit his book, which contains some new and interesting material. Dana, his work, and the new material, however, would all stand out more clearly in a book half the size and better proportioned to the subject.

A Year on the Great Barrier Reef. By C. M. Yonge. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $6.

Not the least remarkable natural feature of Australia is the great coral reef which parallels the coast of Queensland for hundreds of miles. The first description of it we have is that in Cook's "Voyages." Cook got inside the reef, much to the complication of his navigation problems in unknown seas. The problem of coral formations has engaged the attention of many minds, but the really fruitful study of the subject seems to have been started by Charles Darwin, whose observations and speculations began during the voyage of the Beagle. The present book is the popular account of the Great Barrier Reef expedition of 1928-29, sent out from England by the British Association for the Advancement of Science. The scientific reports are in the process of being printed elsewhere. Mr. Yonge, the leader of the expedition, has written his book with two ideas in mind: first, to tell what corals really are and something about the reefs and islands they have built, and, second, to describe the Great Barrier Reef. In both purposes he has succeeded admirably, for his book is an excellent mixture of a popular account of a scientific expedition and a statement of what the reef is and what it looks like, in terms the layman can follow. Without pretending to be a finished literary document, the book is clearly written. Mr. Yonge does not stop at the narrow bounds of his subject, but ventures into the economic significance of the reef and makes short excursions into such subjects as the pearling industry which centers at Thursday Island in the Torres Strait. Altogether this is one of the very best books of its kind and a distinct contribution to Australiana.

Discords Mingled. By Carl Engel. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

A scholar and a wit are companionate in the person of the chief of the music division of the Library of Congress. Both speak in these fifteen essays, which range from occasional papers on the Schubert and Beethoven centenaries to discussions of Schönberg, Antheil, and our omnipresent enfant terrible—jazz. As an advocate Mr. Engel is most persuasive—witness his argument leading to the conclusion that good jazz is "chaos in order—orchestral technique of master-craftsmen—music that is recklessly fantastic, joyously grotesque." How formidable an opponent he can be stands patent in his skilful demolition of Ernest Newman's "The Unconscious Beethoven."

Federal India. By Colonel K. N. Haksar, C.I.E., and K. M. Panikkar. London: Martin Hopkinson. 10s. 6d.

An important problem in reorganizing the government of India is that of the semi-independent Indian states, which are not within the purview of direct British administration although they are scattered throughout the country like the colored sections of variegated marble. No plan for India will be feasible that does not include them, and the Round Table Conference in London aimed to arrive at an understanding between them and British India. In this book is presented to those interested a description of the federal form of government that would satisfy these states, which asks many safeguards for the rights of the states and offers the surrender of few prerogatives.

Firebird and Other Poems. By Herbert J. Seligmann. Privately Printed. $2.

It is a pity that Mr. Seligmann has not yet mastered a verse form for his severe, sensitive, and personal poetry. His individuality is not to be questioned, but while the matter is interesting the form is not. Its rhythms are shapeless and indecisive. One reads heavily through them. The carelessness for form extends to the punctuation. Several of the poems have none at all. The effect, intended perhaps to simplify meaning and structure, succeeds only in dulling both.

The Quest of Pan. By Chard Powers Smith. Coward-McCann. $2.50.

This book, the beginning of a trilogy on evolution, attempts he epic style and for the most part fails to achieve it. Pan s made symbol of the body of man and its progress toward erfection. We meet the god first as a furry, animal-like baby-;od formed in the image of the monkey tribe. He grows in tature and experience, and comes at last into the realization of eauty. Through this beauty, which, psychologically, is the lesire to return to the source, the womb of life, the first ;reat step toward man's physical greatness is achieved. The deas of this epic, however, and the symbolism are often a bit 'ague; and the poetry, although at times rather vaguely majestic, s often very dull.

Three Thousand Years of Rome. By Dunbar von Kalckreuth. Translated from the German by Caroline Frederick. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

Their eminences Thomas Mann, Stefan Zweig, Emil Ludvig, and Viscount Lord Haldane praise this book excessively. t has no more than a novelty of method to recommend it. The ovelty is to summon up contemporaries in all the successive eriods to show the reader around the town and discuss current ffairs. The method gives immediacy to the pages, and renders solid book readable. Its style, however, is insensitively hetorical; its apostrophes to the Eternal City are both hysteri-:al and trite; and its history depends too heavily on allusion .

Films

With Benefit of Music

SINCE its earliest days the moving picture has always appeared before the public arm in arm with music. There has never been a satisfactory explanation of this alliance, lthough, on the face of it, it has often seemed not a little ncongruous. Why should a silent film need music at all? Clearly, a film that finds its complete expression in visual mages can gain nothing through the addition of musical ac-:ompaniment. More likely it will even suffer from such intru-ion of a foreign medium, for music will be either repeating what is already present in the film, or adding something of its wn to what in itself is a complete and perfectly balanced :omposition. To see a silent film "cold," that is, unaccom-anied by music, has been the recognized test of its success r failure in standing on its own feet. Needless to say, the vast majority of silent films never passed this test. Denied he support of music, they appeared emaciated, bloodless, lack-ng in emotional appeal and dramatic accent. It was to cover hese sins of artistic incompetence that music was dragged in as a ready dispenser of emotional stimuli.

But if music supplied poor films with what they lacked—and apart from realistic sound effects, the thing they lacked nost was intrinsic dramatic rhythm—it seemed natural to con-lude that better music would add further to the appeal of the ilm. To be sure, the musical exercises of the movie orchestras, ot to mention the young ladies who earned their livelihood by strumming the movie pianos, could stand a great deal of im-provement. A more intelligent selection, arrangement, and synchronization of the musical material would have been a lecided step forward. Paradoxically enough, it has been the much-maligned talking picture that has accomplished this im-provement, even if it has been far from perfect in its repro-luction of sound. But this still left much to be desired in the eyes, or rather ears, of the devotees of music. The younger composers of the more advanced school have been attracted by the problem, and at the recent Copland-Sessions concert at the Broadhurst Theater the public was given the opportunity to appraise some of their efforts in this direction.

It is not for me to pass an opinion on the music that accompanied the showing of the five films on that occasion. The fact that was more important than the quality of the music was its utter irrelevancy to the films shown. It was almost incredible. Here were three composers obviously appreciative of their own medium—one of them, Darius Milhaud, already enjoying a world-wide fame—deciding to lend their talents to the creation of a composite form of art, the musical film. And how did they go about it? First, they chose films that were the least suitable for musical treatment (and in the case of Milhaud, unworthy of any attention at all); and, secondly, having chosen the films, they proceeded to ignore the very foundation of the moving picture as a medium, its inner dynamics, its rhythm. In the face of this obvious blindness to the inner structure of the film, one can only wonder why they ever bothered to try their hand at something so far from their special interests and comprehension as the art of the film.

The pity of it all is that three of the films shown, the works of Mr. Ralph Steiner, deserved better consideration. Mr. Steiner has not yet developed into a cinematic artist. He is still essentially a photographer of still subjects. He has an excellent eye for the graphic form and pattern, but has not yet learned the importance of dynamic organization of the raw material of the camera. In "H_2O," his first picture, the variety of patterns was so amazingly effective that it made up for the lack of dynamic unity in the picture as a whole. His two other little pictures, "Surf and Seaweed" and "Mechanical Principles," were less interesting in their material and even more spineless in their cinematic structure. The accompanying music only emphasized their shortcomings.

Great-Heart in West Hills

"THE HOUSE BEAUTIFUL," Channing Pollock's new play at the Apollo Theater, tells a story which any retelling would make ridiculous. Yet I must retell it. Archibald, a timid and commonplace young bond salesman, marries Jennifer, a good and beautiful and earnest maiden, in the first year of the twentieth century. Looking for a home to grow up and old in, they are persuaded by a real-estate agent to buy and build in the wilderness of West Hills, New Jersey. They do so; a few friends do likewise; thirty years pass; and in the end we are aware that another suburb exists, with trains, pavements, drug-stores, and a mayor. Meanwhile, Archibald and Jennifer have lived and died like heroes. Archibald, without losing his commonplaceness, keeps a kind of sheeplike honesty which prevents him from getting ahead very far in the world. His less scrupulous friends prosper by deeds which he will not do—such, for instance, as selling questionable bonds. He hardly ever takes a drink, and he is a perfectly faithful husband. So is Jennifer a perfectly faithful wife; she refuses even to run in for matinees with her rather flighty neighbor, Mrs. Baxter; charged with indifference to romance, she replies that it is romantic to keep her little home safe and beautiful for her good husband and her good son—for in time there is a son. She performs the further function of reassuring Archibald at those moments when he doubts that he has done right by being a good man; of course he has—holding his hand; as a matter of fact, he is the salt of the earth, a great as well as a good man, a knight in shining armor. He remarks that if he is a great man, then there are millions of great men in the world. She says that is true. And she is wonderful at the crisis of his life, which is the climax of the play. He is mayor of West Hills now, and must fight a proposal to repeal the zoning law according to which houses worth less than $8,000 cannot be built in West Hills. Guy Stayton, the villain of the piece and Archibald's employer, proposes to kill the law and start building houses worth $4,000. Archibald, who has been elected on an anti-repeal platform, holds out; Stayton discharges him; and shortly he fades away in Jennifer's arms. But she makes it clear to him as he dies that he has fought a good fight. A few years later she joins him in the death he has so honorably earned, and the son carries on the battle against $4,000 homes.

Ridiculous, yes; and I can imagine that a reading of the text would make it seem equally so. Yet in the theater the other night I was curiously interested and moved. This glorification of all the virtues we have been taught in our best literature to despise, this sentimentalization of all that is average and dull—well, in spite of everything I found myself rather respectful. I had been assured that it would be a Ladies' Home Journal play, but it turned out to be better than that. It was a "Pilgrim's Progress" play. For Mr. Pollock seems to have been possessed with more than the mere idea, which anyone else might have had, of defending the average American against our satirists; he has been possessed with a passion for the material he treats, and with a vision of it which can scarcely fail to give it some sort of importance. He has been humorous, too, which helps. But above all he has had the courage of his sentimentality, he has gone the whole way; and I cannot help respecting such a gesture. He owes much, it should be said, to the performance he got; Jo Mielziner's sets were convincing as well as ingenious; the acting of Mary Phillips as Jennifer and of James Bell as Archibald was heroically complete; and the little interpolated moments of darkness when at the back of the stage, somewhere in the clouds, we saw ramparts with knights on them (these being the visions of Jennifer) and heard trumpets calling to battle against the repeal of zoning laws—well, absurd as they were, I liked them. I do not say that "The House Beautiful" is an important play; I simply say that it would be silly to dismiss it in the terms that almost automatically, our best literature being what it is, spring to one's lips.

It is vastly more interesting than "Miracle at Verdun," the stunt which the Theater Guild has imported from the German of Hans Chlumberg (Martin Beck Theater). This, with all its technique of triple projections and synchronized sounds, with all its brilliantly massed scenes in the Chamber of Deputies and elsewhere, leaves me deathly cold. The idea of the play, for one thing, seems to have nothing in it. Thirteen million dead men rise from their graves in France and march home—to find that the world is none the better for their sacrifice. But we knew that, and I cannot see that anything is added by having thirteen million men find it out. The irony is superfluous and excessive. At least the play adds nothing to our knowledge of past or present; and so I sat unmoved. I could of course take a certain interest in the elaborate and probably costly technique; but I could not feel that it had been worth while, or even applied with imagination.

"Napi," a comedy by Brian Marlow from the German of Julius Berstl (Longacre Theater), is the thinnest of farces about a little shopkeeper in 1805 who looked so much like Napoleon that he substituted for him in the bed of La George of the Comédie Française. Its only excuse is that it furnishes a vehicle for the acting of Ernest Truex; but even that wore thin.

Haiti Marches Toward Freedom

By ERNEST GRUENING

TEN and a half years ago, in the early fall of 1920, three Haitians came to the United States to plead their country's cause. It was their first opportunity after five years of military rule and still-continuing martial law. For the first time word of what had happened had passed the strict naval censorship, and The Nation, with the articles of Herbert J. Seligmann and James Weldon Johnson, had in the preceding summer made the facts concerning our crudest imperialistic venture known to the world. Presidential Candidate Warren G. Harding, whose attention had been called to The Nation's articles and to Major General Barnett's criticism of "indiscriminate killings" in Haiti, made the matter a campaign issue and denounced the "jamming" of a constitution made in the United States "down the throats . . . of helpless neighbors in the West Indies . . . at the points of bayonets borne by the United States marines." A Senatorial inquiry was pending. It was the psychological moment to present the Haitian case.

The three representatives of the Union Patriotique d'Haïti delegated with this important mission came to the offices of The Nation filled with the cumulative injustices, brutalities, and killings of the military occupation. Scarcely a year before, the uprising brought about by the ruthless application of the corvée—the forced road labor—had been bloodily put down by marine airplanes and machine-guns, with the death of some 2,500 Haitians, including women and children. "Bandits," the Occupation called them.

The three Haitian delegates were Sténio Vincent, Pauléus Sannon, and Perceval Thoby. Sannon was one of the two Cabinet members immortalized, though anonymously, in Admiral Caperton's famous message of September 8, 1915:

> Successful negotiation of treaty is predominant part of present mission. After encountering many difficulties, treaty situation at present looks more favorable than usual. This has been effected by the exercising of military pressure at propitious moments in negotiations. Yesterday two members of Cabinet who had blocked negotiations resigned. . . .

Sannon was one of the two who refused to assent to the signing away of their country's independence. Since his resignation fifteen years ago, he has steadfastly declined to countenance by word or deed the invasion and conquest of his country or to cooperate with the invaders—in consequence suffering personal privation and hardship which only an unflinching devotion to principle and a rare patriotism would have endured.

Last spring, given the first opportunity to register their will—in the first free and honest election in fifteen years—the Haitians elected Sténio Vincent President of Haiti. Pauléus Sannon is Secretary of Foreign Relations, back in the post which he so honorably quit fifteen years ago, and now charged with the pleasant, important, and delicate task of negotiating with United States Minister Dana Munro the "disoccupation" of Haiti by the Americans. Perceval Thoby is likewise in the Cabinet—as Secretary of Financ The Congressional elections were a clean sweep for thos who had never ceased to protest against the illicit imposition of a treaty and constitution on their country by forc majeure. In the new Senate are Price-Mars, the distinguished littérateur; David Jeannot and Léon Nau of th executive committee of the Union Patriotique; Fouchar Martineau, who as a senator in 1915 steadfastly voted agains the "pressure treaty"; Antoine Telemaque, imprisoned fo his convictions; and Pierre Hudicourt, who, following th return of the Union Patriotique delegates, came to th United States, addressed public meetings, told Haiti's stor to Senators like Borah, Norris, King, and the elder La Follette, and in 1923 journeyed to Santiago de Chile to the Fift Pan-American Conference, where with Manuel Morillo o the Dominican Republic he called aloud for justice for thos two small countries—an unscheduled interruption in th smoothly functioning palaver of official Pan-Americanism.

Finally, the president of the Chamber of Deputies i none other than Joseph Jolibois, fils, most-imprisoned o Haitian journalists—and indeed of all Haitians—whose unceasing protests have netted him seventeen jail terms totaling four years and seven months. Like William Lloyd Garrison, he would not compromise, he would not equivocate and he would be heard. When I saw Jolibois ten years ag in Haiti, it was through iron bars. My fellow-journalis wore stripes. In a few weeks he will preside, gavel i hand, in the lower house, when the Congress of Haiti reconvenes for the first time in thirteen years since it was dissolved by General Cole for refusing to vote a constitutio which gave foreigners the right to own land and placed th courts martial of the U. S. M. C. above the Haitian courts It has been said that republics are ungrateful, but no suc ingratitude has been in evidence since the Hoover Commission put an end to the collusive dictatorship of Russell an Borno.

I had expected to find universal satisfaction among th Haitians that the evacuation had been definitely set for 1936 and that the realization of the "Haiti joyeuse" of whic Dantes Bellegarde has written so eloquently was not far off But I found public sentiment among the elite curiousl apprehensive and tense. Would the Occupation really ge out? Could American promises be trusted after so man betrayals? And suppose Mr. Hoover should not be reelecte in 1932, might not his successor reverse his policy? T which it seemed obvious to reply, as a personal convictio firmly held, that the United States had publicly promised t retire from Haiti in the course of the next five years, an that likewise the trend of present United States policy, a shown by events in Mexico, the announcement of withdrawa of the marines from Nicaragua, and recent declarations b Secretary Stimson, was all away from coercion and towar friendliness and arbitration.

Why, then, it was asked, did "Haitianization"—th turning over of the so-called treaty services to a Haitia

A Fiction Work of a New Sort—

MIGRANTS OF THE STARS—The story of a daring exploration and adventure;—of the discovery of the secret of the stars.

MIGRANTS OF THE STARS is a story of the human before birth, during life, and after death: woven into this fantastic tale are wholly new, logical appealing answers to the questions: Where do we come from?—why are we here?—Where do we go after death?—based on Kabbalistic sources.

MIGRANTS OF THE STARS is an important addition to the literature of the English language. Departing boldly from all the rules of fictional literature, it is free to take its readers on an unparalelled journey into the fields of nearest human interest.

personnel—not proceed more rapidly? Mr. Dana Munro, the American Minister, had been there three months, and nothing had happened. Moreover, why, if the Hoover Administration really wished to change things, had it not removed some of the objectionable (to the Haitians) officials and substituted others with a new outlook? Why had Washington sent Mr. Munro, "un nourrisson du département d'état"—a nursling of the State Department—a former assistant chief of the Latin American Division, an official brought up and steeped in the ways of Caribbean imperialism? As was to be expected, he was getting his viewpoint from the Occupation officials. Why had President Hoover not sent Monsieur William Allen White, for instance, who had so rapidly won the Haitians' affection and esteem, and seemed to understand their point of view?

To which the obvious answer was to repeat that the "disoccupation" policy had been pledged; that the Forbes Commission might easily have been loaded with members favorable to continued occupation; that, finally, President Hoover would not have needed to accept its recommendations. Likewise, that three months was too short a time to expect material progress in turning over a complicated administrative structure that for fifteen years had been directed by Americans. Why not be a little patient?

The fact is that a state of psychic tension exists among the Haitians. It is easily understandable after what they have endured for fifteen years. The bloodshed of a year ago last December, arising from the students' strike in the vocational schools, was an ominous warning that the repression could not be endured much longer. The Forbes Commission found a highly inflamed state of public mind. Had it not acted with promptness and effectiveness there would unquestionably have been a widespread uprising with a reckless disregard of fatal consequences. And despite the break in that intolerable tension and the great relief brought about by the elimination of the "puppet President," Borno, the abolition of the High Commissionership with the withdrawal of General Russell, and the restoration of Haitian self-government to the extent of a free election of legislature and president, the tension continues. The passage from Rostand's "L'Aiglon" in which Dietrichstein, the preceptor of Napoleon's son at the Austrian court, declares "Le prince n'est pas prisonnier, mais . . ." is bandied about as descriptive of Haiti's plight today. "Haiti is free—but . . ." And indeed the Haitian state of mind resembles that of a man long imprisoned who a few weeks before the end of his term risks all by making a break for liberty.

The official American point of view is that the United States has an obligation to the people of Haiti which it must discharge, that the continuation of "efficient and stable government" must be insured before withdrawal in 1936. In the words of one important United States official: "We want to be sure once we go out that we don't have to come back." From this follows logically the assumption that the United States through its representatives in Haiti shall determine when and how—within the next five years—the "Haitianization" of the treaty services shall take place. There, precisely, lies the arena of existing tension and disagreement.

The Haitians are unanimous in their desire to have the "Haitianization" completed at the earliest moment. Addressing the members of the "First Seminar in the Caribbean," President Vincent declared his belief that the Haitian who during the last fifteen years had been employed in th treaty services had sufficiently mastered their routine an were prepared to assume full responsibilities. In the opinio of his government the Department of Public Works and th Collector Receiver General's department ought to be turne over in not less than a year, and the Public Health Servic and agricultural schools in not less than two years, whil various services not formally comprehended in the treat should be transferred at once. (These had been graduall taken over by the Americans with the connivance of Borno. A counter-proposal which fixes limits less definitely and i apparently dependent on the speed with which Haitian qualify—in the opinion of the American authorities—embodies the official United States attitude.

Unofficially Haitians express the view that with th whole Occupation based on a treaty and constitution impose by force and fraud, the treaty should be annulled and, i necessary, a new treaty negotiated. Indeed, from the American standpoint, such would seem to be the proper and honorable course. It will be recalled, and is pertinent, that i 1922 twenty-four eminent American lawyers, including th late Moorfield Storey, Louis Marshall, and Adelbert Moot as well as Charles C. Burlingham, Raymond B. Fosdick Charles P. Howland, George W. Kirchwey, Tyrrell Williams, and Zechariah Chafee, Jr., issued a brief which, afte reviewing the circumstances of the United States' entry int Haiti, came to the following conclusion:

> We declare without qualification that the honor and good name of the United States, the preservation of the sovereignty and the cherished liberty of Haiti and her right to fair dealing on the part of the United States, as well as the possibility of assuring the continuance in the future of honorable and amicable relations between our country and Latin America based on trust and confidence, all require:
> (a) The immediate abrogation by the United States of the treaty of 1915, unconditionally and without qualification.
> (b) The holding of elections of representatives to the legislative bodies of Haiti and of a president by the free will of the people at an early day.
> (c) The negotiation of a new treaty with a new Haitian administration for friendly cooperation between the United States and Haiti upon such terms as shall be mutually satisfactory to both countries and by the methods that obtain between free and independent sovereign states.

The second of these three recommendations has bee carried out. Whether it is possible for a government virtually to confess error, as abrogation of the treaty would implicitly do, is another question. Governments, unfortunately seldom act that way. In my judgment the recommendation of the twenty-four lawyers are as valid today as nine year ago. It is probable that the very tension and misunderstanding in Haiti might be relieved by negotiating with th Haitians from this day forward as with a sovereign an equal nation. Certainly Haiti now has a truly representative and popular government with which we could deal And it is possible that once it was freely "up to" the Haitian to decide in what manner and how fast their public service should be "Haitianized," their tempo would be a little slowe than that which they now seem to require. In thus reaffirming an attitude which unbiased and disinterested American of standing have publicly proclaimed, I desire, first, to disclaim any desire to cast any monkey-wrench into the somewhat delicate processes of adjustment now under way in Haiti, for which certainly everyone, American or Haitian, of every shade of opinion should earnestly desire success; and, second, I wish to reemphasize the fact that I am viewing such abrogation of the treaty exclusively from the standpoint of the United States—the standpoint of our honor, repute, and good name. As far as Haiti is concerned, the question is, I believe, now largely academic, since we are on our way out, since five years is a very short time in the history of a country, since with their own President and Congress the Occupation will weigh less heavily henceforth, and since, moreover, whatever may be the convictions of Haitians of their ability to take over all the "treaty" services in short order, the process is not quite so simple.

The present differences between official Haiti and official United States derive from a divergent psychological approach. We have the tutelary complex. The Haitians resent it. Privately Americans will tell you that "Haiti is bound to relapse the minute we take our hands off." To which the Haitians reply in substance: (a) Nothing of the kind; or (b) well, if things go wrong it's because the Americans don't want us to succeed and will sabotage on the way out; or (c) that's our own lookout; it's our country.

The suspicion of a lack of sincerity in the carrying out of the evacuation is an unfortunate and inevitable product of the past. The Americans assert, on the other hand, that as soon as they get out the Haitian government will discharge all trained Haitians—on the spoils theory that these will have had good jobs for years and that it is time for others who have been "out" for a corresponding period to connect with the pay roll. Both these suspicions I hope and firmly believe are unfounded.

Typical of the absence of understanding, and the chief bone of contention just now, is "l'affaire Colvin." Carl Colvin was nominated by President Hoover last July to head the Service Technique, the system of vocational schools which the Haitians have objected to so bitterly. Their opposition has been due not so much to lack of appreciation of the need of agricultural and vocational training as to the Occupation's overemphasis and overexpenditure upon this service at the expense of the school system on the French model to which the Haitians had been accustomed. It was, from the Haitian standpoint, an importation, an imposition. Personally, I think it has much to commend it. But dictatorship makes inevitably for lack of understanding and lack of cooperation from those dictated to. The strike of December, 1929, broke out as a cumulative protest against certain changes in the school program and against the director, Dr. Freeman. After the riot and bloodshed the Collège de Damien, the normal school of the Service Technique, remained without pupils. Dr. Freeman resigned and left the island. Colvin, his immediate subordinate, was appointed to take his place. From the American standpoint the appointment was excellent. Colvin had been in Haiti eight years. He had acquired complete familiarity with his work and with the needs of vocational and agricultural education there. But the Haitians declared him to be the man "behind" the unpopular Freeman policies. The pupils have remained on strike. Actually Mr. Colvin supported his superior's policies as any subordinate should. He differed with Dr. Freeman on some important issues, particularly those which offended the Haitians. But the situation had become psychological. Nearly three hundred prospective teachers have received no training for over a year. The school stands empty. The American government insists that it would be a gross personal injustice to Mr. Colvin to withdraw him, and the impasse continues. How much better to have sounded out Haitian opinion before making the appointment! And how absurd to hold up the education of a people because of a single individual! It is unfair and unfortunate for Mr. Colvin. He is the victim not so much of Haitian misunderstanding, as of a state of mind which the Occupation created fifteen years ago and for which he vicariously, suffers.

Considerable philosophic implications underlie the struggle to insure "efficiency" before we leave. The Haitian may not—undoubtedly will not—be quite so "efficient" in the conduct of certain of the services. "Efficiency," "mass production," and various other technological improvement are our specialties. It remains to be seen whether they make the world or ourselves any happier. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that they make us happier, which is disputable, it is even more dubious whether they would make the Haitians happier. It is highly pertinent that the highways buil by the Occupation, invariably pointed to as an achievemen and the justification of our invasion, have ruined the smal Haitian cane grower and the small Haitian distiller. Both these represented a considerable industry, indigenous, responsive to the Haitians' needs. The cane was brought by the small growers on the backs of donkeys following long existing trails to local distilleries scattered throughout th country. Highways have enabled the three great sugar- and rum-producing companies, the largest of which is th American-owned Haitian-American Sugar Company, by th use of automobiles, to put the little fellows—natives—out of business. It was not so intended. But it happened.

And so—apart from the fundamental fact that we neve had right in Haiti except that which might confers—possibly the strongest argument against our whole Haitian venture from start to finish, including our now really well intentioned efforts to "do it for their good," is, I believe, to be found in the assurance of the most convinced interventionists that the Haitians will "relapse after we get out."

To which I am tempted to ask in reply: What do you mean by "relapse"? If they are happier with us out, i won't be a relapse.

I am sure they will be happier.

Likewise, fifteen years of American occupation suppor convincingly the truth uttered a generation ago, when American imperialism was in its infancy, by Thomas Bracket Reed: "The best government of which a people is capabl is a government which they establish for themselves. Wit all its imperfections, with all its shortcomings, it is alway better adapted to them than any other government, even though invented by wiser men."

And are we even "wiser men"? We might have though so—in 1928. But today! Seven million unemployed with no effective measures for relief; crime rampant—our larger cities helpless before the violence and corruption of gangster and racketeer; our "justice" exemplified on the Atlantic coast b the Tammany magistracy, on the Pacific by the Californi Supreme Court . . . and the rest. How capable are we in the management of even our own affairs?

HOW DO WE JUDGE the value of our colonial possessions? There are doubtless several different ways, and of these President Hoover has given voice to one. After hurried visits to Porto Rico and the Virgin Islands he issued a statement setting forth his observations. Porto Rico he found to have been making "magnificent progress" both in government and in business. Moreover, he learned that the demand for independence had dwindled down to a feeble cry. Hence it was essential that the federal government cooperate with Porto Rico in such matters as education, health, agriculture, "and expansion of industry and markets." Thus is obedient democracy in our colonies to be rewarded, but presumably only when these colonies have industry and markets worth expanding. From this point of view the Virgin Islands find themselves in a rather unhappy position. Said Mr. Hoover: "When we paid $25,000,000 for them, we acquired an effective poorhouse, comprising 90 per cent of the population. The people cannot be self-supporting either in living or government without the discovery of new methods and resources." Clearly, we struck a bad bargain here—particularly when we remember that while Porto Rico was part of the booty of war, we had to pay hard cash for the Virgin Islands. At any rate Mr. Hoover considered it "unfortunate that we ever acquired these islands." He said we must, of course, "do our best to assist the inhabitants," but it was plain from his statement that he was not of a mind to extend to these islands that munificent measure of cooperation he promised Porto Rico. Obviously, there is little that the United States can ever hope to get out of the Virgin Islands, and therefore it is hardly worth our while to shower them with a great deal of attention either in the way of financial cooperation or sympathy.

DANIEL WILLARD delivered a notable address at the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Wharton School of Commerce and Finance of the University of Pennsylvania. Matters which in his youth were held as fixed beyond question, he declared, such as the superiority of our form of government, the authority of religion, and the soundness of the capitalistic system, are now all under criticism, and the process of questioning will certainly result in modification. The capitalistic system Mr. Willard believes to be the best economic scheme yet devised and tested by man; nevertheless he admits that its critics "may be as honest and well-meaning in their intentions as I think I am; even so I believe they are mistaken." This rare tolerance is coupled with a candid admission that a system which makes it possible for 6,000,000 workers to be unemployed has failed in at least one important particular. Of course, the press picked up Mr. Willard's frank statement that if unemployed he would steal rather than starve—a doctrine reminiscent of St. Thomas Aquinas; but it commonly failed to note the revolutionary social implications of such a theory.

THE DROP IN THE NET PROFITS of the Cunard Steamship Company from $4,048,195 in 1929 to $93,005 in 1930 and the fall in the gross earnings of the two great German companies from $27,000,000 in 1929 to $19,000,000 in 1930 are striking indications of the effect of the business depression on world shipping. The annual report of the German lines was especially interesting as embodying the results of the first year's joint operation of the Hamburg-American and North German Lloyd companies. Of course the maximum gains could not be attained in the first year, but certain advantages of the merger are reflected. The heavy loss of income due to the falling off of freight handled by the Hamburg-American lines was offset in some measure by the passenger earnings of the North German Lloyd fleet, notably its new fliers, the Europa and the Bremen. Speed and luxury apparently bring business despite the depression—a fact that helps explain continued new construction. On the other hand, the Cunard line reports a continued increase in the demand for tourist third-cabin accommodations. The sharp reduction in earnings led the Cunard directors to reduce salaries and to pass the ordinary dividend, which had been paid at the rate of 7½ per cent during the past three years. The ability of the German lines to pay a 6 per cent dividend was due partly to the payment during the year by the United States to the North German Lloyd Company of nearly $4,000,000 out of the $27,249,000 awarded by the arbitrator for ships confiscated during the war. In view of the success thus far obtained by the German unification, we may yet hear renewed discussion of the possibility of British combinations.

WHEAT IS FRONT-PAGE NEWS these days, even if the price to the American farmer does not represent much more than a month's subscription to a two-cent daily. The Department of Agriculture, after forecasting on March 26 a reduction in spring-wheat acreage of from 12 to 24 per cent according to the kind of grain—a prediction which caused Secretary Hyde to emit an exclamation of delight and declare that the Administration program of a 20 per cent reduction may actually be achieved—had to admit on March 28 that if the winter wheat already planted were allowed for, the reduction would be only about 3 per cent. At Rome, a conference attended by representatives of forty-six nations or colonies has been considering the world wheat situation, and the opposing forces of reduced production and increased consumption are trying to find common ground. Premier Mussolini, who congratulated the conference on meeting "in the calm political atmosphere of the moment," is for increasing consumption, being, apparently, much moved by the number of people in the world who are "poverty-stricken and grievously distressed." The great fight is over the question of preferential tariffs against overseas wheat in favor of wheat grown in the Danubian countries, the Rumanian Minister of Agriculture going so far as to predict that unless the overseas producing countries waive their most-favored-nation privilege, there will be a European union which will effectually exclude overseas wheat from European markets. The union scheme is so logical a corollary of high protection and discriminating tariffs that the United States and Argentina, both of which produce more wheat than they need for themselves, can hardly in decency object if Europe tries a protective device.

FOUR OF THE FRENCH POLITICIANS involved in the Oustric financial scandal of last autumn have been cited for trial before the Senate sitting as a high court of justice. It is doubtful, however, whether the Senate will agree to try the four men—Raoul Péret, former Minister of Justice; René Besnard, former Ambassador to Italy; and Gaston Vidal and Albert Favre, former Undersecretaries of State. The present government of France is adverse to pressing the charges at this time, while the Senate majority has shown itself out of sympathy with the opposition in the latter's efforts to bring the men to trial. Albert Oustric, a banker, had acquired control of several industrial undertakings, and upon these he pyramided a number of holding companies whose financial foundations were anything but secure. He succeeded none the less in getting the shares of these companies listed on the Paris stock exchange. When the pyramid collapsed six months ago it threw all these companies into bankruptcy, brought the conservative and venerable Banque Adam down with it, and came close to precipitating a financial crisis in France. Only the intervention of the government averted a panic. Subsequent inquiry revealed that two of the accused men had at one time been associated with Oustric, and it was charged that they later used their official positions to promote his interests within the government and in the financial community. The othe two men were said to have been instrumental in getting th shares of an Italian rayon firm, in which Oustric was heavil interested and which failed soon after the Oustric crash listed on the Paris exchange, which for years has barre trading in all foreign stocks except those of a few carefull selected companies.

THE LABOR-LIBERAL SCHISM not only continue but appears to have been aggravated by Mr. Lloy George's efforts to heal it. The Liberal leader is for wha he calls "a policy of cooperation, not frustration," while respectable minority of the party, led by Sir John Simon will have no more of cooperation and are for turning ou the MacDonald Government at the first opportunity. Th seven-point policy which the members were prevailed upon to indorse, calling for greater effort to master unemployment, the promotion of general disarmament, financia economy, an Indian settlement on the lines of the Londo Round Table Conference, the continuance of free trad the passage of the electoral-reform bill, and the developmen of agriculture and land settlement, reads like a counsel o perfection when one remembers that only thirty-three Liberal or slightly more than half the party membership in th Commons, voted for it. The dissent of Sir John Simon an his followers means that Mr. MacDonald can no longe count certainly upon the forty Liberal votes that he need to enable him to go on, but if the Liberals really want t put an end to such importance as their party still possesse a party split is a first-rate way to do it. The Labor Government, meantime, has been granted a further lease of lif until April 14, at which time Parliament will reconven after the Easter holidays.

PRESIDENT VON HINDENBURG has decided, a the request of the Brüning Cabinet, to rule German until the Reichstag meets again next October, under a emergency decree that gives him sweeping dictatorial power The decree is based upon the so-called "dictatorship clause in Article 48 of the Weimar Constitution. Under th measure local police authorities have been empowered t suppress public or private mass-meetings, assemblies, parade demonstrations, speeches, and publications whenever in the opinion any of these threaten public order and safety. On can readily understand, if not directly sympathize with, th motive behind Hindenburg's decree, particularly when on recalls the great number of disturbances, street fights, an political assassinations that lately have attended the econom unrest in Germany. A recent estimate placed the numbe of deaths due to street fighting and political murders i the past year at more than 300. If it were allowed to continue unchecked, this state of affairs might conceivably lea to open civil warfare. Persons arrested under the decre may, if they feel they have been unjustly dealt with, appea to the courts for redress. Thus the Hindenburg dictatorship will be considerably qualified. Moreover, the Germa President's action is directed against the extremists and to ward the preservation of government by the moderates, an to this extent differs from the usual European dictatorship Nevertheless, the assumption by one man of the power t control or suppress constitutional rights of free speech, fre press, and free assembly is a dangerous thing. Hindenbur will be a strong man indeed if he succeeds in using this new authority without impairing such democratic institutions as now exist in Germany.

CITIZENS OF CHICAGO may vote for Republicans, Democrats, or even Communists at the municipal elections to be held April 7, but they will not be allowed to vote for Socialists or for the candidates of three other minor parties. Interpreting the Illinois election law in their own way, the Chicago Board of Election Commissioners, after a perfunctory hearing, ruled the Socialists off the ticket. The Socialists contended that the law specifically provides for nomination by caucus, but counsel for the board replied that the legislature in passing the law did not mean it that way. They declared that minor-party candidates must also present petitions signed by a prescribed number of voters, and this the Socialist candidates had failed to do. At the moment the leaders of the Socialist Party, which has been legally recognized in Chicago and Illinois for thirty years, are fighting in the courts to have their candidates restored to the ticket. Incidentally, the action of the Election Board for one reason or another got no publicity whatever in the daily press of the country.

IN COMMENTING LAST WEEK on the "mysterious peace" patched up between the outlaw miners in Illinois and the United Mine Workers of America, The Nation said it was questionable whether Alexander Howat, who had led the campaign of the Illinois and other miners seeking to reorganize the international union and to oust John L. Lewis from his present dominant position, would "feel encouraged to go on with his fight." Since then Howat has issued a call, signed among others by Powers Hapgood, Frank Keeney, and William Stevenson, for a mine workers' convention to be held in St. Louis on April 15. The call, signed by hundreds of rank-and-file miners, declared that "the most outrageous factor in the whole situation is that the miners who made the Reorganized Movement were never consulted as to whether they desired it to be dissolved, and wished to 'go back to Lewis.' A small group of officials have totally and absolutely dissolved the Reorganized U. M. W. A. . . . without even showing common courtesy to the membership." The letter adds that as a result of the unexpected peace agreement "the miners are overwhelmed with confusion and disgust, and thousands of them have already stopped paying dues to any organization until this situation is cleared up."

FOR DIVERSION read the New York Times—preferably the front page. We say this not in jest but in sober earnest; or rather in pious appreciation of life at its dramatic best. Consider the Times front page on Saturday, March 28. Among the headlines were: "Elinor Smith Falls Five Miles Unhurt"; "Jewish Merchant to Be Vatican Librarian; Hebrew Scholar Will Have Kosher Kitchen"; "$886,360 Race Prize Won by Buffalo Man"; "Gandhi Triumphant at Indian Congress"; "Finds Mother Love Dies as Manganese Is Lost from Diet." In addition to these there were the usual stories about cleaning up Tammany Hall and finding a new chairman for the Republican National Committee, but we pass from these to the Times of a day later—again the front page: "Five Children Perish in Bus in Colorado Snowdrift"; "Bank's Siren Scares Off Midday Bandits"; "S O S Viewed as Hoax or Rum-Runner Ruse"; "Von Hindenburg to Rule; Puts Curb on Civil Rights"; and "Robber's Confession Will Save Innocent Man from Going to Prison for Twenty Years." If this is not drama and romance we miss our guess. And surely this is a fitting answer to those critics of Mr. Ochs's estimable sheet who urge a feature page or a comic section or something else to make the paper more lively and more readable. All the Times needs to do, apparently, is to print what happens to people; if it could at the same time get over the bad habit of telling every story three times it would be even more of a blessing to mankind than it now is.

HOPE HAS FINALLY been abandoned for the twenty-six men not yet found after the explosion and burning of the sealer Viking on March 15. The ship was anchored off Newfoundland, several miles off shore and surrounded by slushy ice cakes; the stories of the bewildered survivors agree that the disaster was somehow due to the explosion of powder stored in the after hull; but they were hurled out on the ice without warning and those who were alive could only stand by helplessly and watch the ship blaze up and sink. Irony is contributed to the story by the tragic death of Varick Frissell and A. E. Penrod of New York, who were on board with their cameras to take scenes for "White Thunder," Mr. Frissell's talking picture of the sealing industry. They were anxious for dramatic shots, vivid pictures of the dangerous life of the seal catcher. They themselves were part of the drama—but the pictures will never be shown. Hope for young Frissell—himself a splendid Viking type and a youth of great industry and eagerness—was held out long because of the rescue of three of his companions who were picked up by a rescue ship as they floated on an ice floe. But careful search has brought no sight or news of the missing.

ARNOLD BENNETT, who died in London on March 27 at the age of sixty-three, was novelist, critic, journalist, man of affairs. He was born a comparatively poor boy in the Five Towns district of England which he later made famous; and he was furiously motivated by the double desire not to be idle and not to be poor. The result, as Horatio Alger would have predicted, was that he died both famous and rich, richer than any living author, probably, unless it is Mr. Shaw, and assured of a high place in English letters. He was a prolific author, noting in his diary for the last day of December, 1899, that he had in the year just ended written 335,340 words, or nearly 1,000 a day. His career was a blinding contradiction of the theory that it is necessary to have leisure to "write." For Mr. Bennett was, at the same time that he was writing so many novels, stories, and articles, also editor of a woman's magazine and a constant reviewer of contemporary literature. His industry brought him a suite in one of the grand hotels he always admired, a yacht, all the comforts he could buy—and it brought the world "The Old Wives' Tale" and the four novels of the "Clayhanger" series, which are hardly surpassed by any English novel of the nineteenth or twentieth centuries. It is the greatest pity that when he was hardly past middle life and still writing steadily, Arnold Bennett should have had to depart from the literary scene.

Cleaning Up New York

WE cannot share the indifference with which some sophisticated observers profess to view present attempts to clean up the government of New York City. It is true that corruption and inefficiency in New York are nothing new; nor is New York's position in that respect unique. The conditions that in recent weeks have been brought forcibly to public attention have existed with brief interruptions for generations, and the New York situation can be duplicated in essentials in almost every other important American city. Municipal government in the United States today is scarcely less a failure than it was when James Bryce called attention to the shame of our cities more than forty years ago. The same forces are at work today that were at work then, and they are producing the same results. It is just these facts that give something more than local and temporary interest to the present struggle in New York.

As is always the case, local, State, and national politics are all inextricably intertwined in the situation. The rapacious appetite of the district leaders of Tammany, to an extent curbed during the years of Alfred E. Smith's dominance, has been given free rein once more in these later days of Curry-McCooey-Walker control. Public thievery has been widespread, and local political and municipal leadership has been utterly irresponsible. A Republican legislature and a Democratic governor, the latter betraying in every move his eagerness to attain a yet higher office, have played against each other, and as there has been no effective threat of interference from Albany, the local organizations have had their way pretty much unchecked. The people of New York have been indifferent and cynical; not only have they failed hitherto to make any real protest against the present misgovernment, but in the election less than a year and a half ago they gave it overwhelming approval.

The present uprising has grown out of a series of revelations culminating in the exposure of shocking conditions in the courts and among the police. Charges against District Attorney Crain were lodged by the City Club with the Governor, who under the law has entire power to remove that official on charges. Within twenty-four hours, after a conference with Mr. Crain and John F. Curry, leader of Tammany, Governor Roosevelt appointed Justice Samuel Seabury to investigate the charges. Ten days later the City Affairs Committee presented to the Governor similar charges against Mayor Walker, asking for his removal under powers vested in the governor by the city charter. As the Walker charges were aimed at the center of the Tammany administration of the city, the Governor faced a difficult political problem. Instead of acting immediately, as in the Crain case, he held the charges for some days and then sent them to the Mayor in California, asking him to reply promptly on his return to the city, but giving no indication of his own intended course. Giving the Governor full credit for good intentions, how is his differing treatment of the two cases to be explained on other than political grounds? It is not unfriendly critics alone who are pointing out that his undoubted concern for good government in New York City has not operated in entire isolation from his own ambitions.

Herein lies one of the dangers of that summary power of removing the mayor of New York City, as well as certain county officers throughout the State, which is vested in the governor of New York. The governor's power to remove without appeal local elective officials responsible to a local electorate is a doubtful power at best, violating the principle of home rule. Very possibly it would be better to let the local community—in this case the city—stew in its own juice if it chooses to elect and support an inefficient or corrupt official, but that aside, such a power, as is indicated in New York today, is likely to be complicated even in the case of a conscientious governor by his political prospects. The tenure of office of District Attorney Crain and of Mayor Walker certainly ought not to depend in any way on the Presidential ambitions of Governor Roosevelt.

In the present case the legislature has changed the whole situation by passing a resolution for a sweeping investigation of the entire government of New York, with the understanding that Justice Seabury is to act as counsel to the legislative investigating committee. The Governor has announced that such action will not affect his consideration of the charges already lodged with him against Mayor Walker, but nevertheless he may ultimately find it advisable to turn over to the legislative committee the investigation of such charges. In any case, it is imperative that the Mayor's place in the scheme of organized corruption that constitutes Tammany government in New York today be made clear, and we trust that the legislative investigation will be specially searching in all that concerns the City Hall and the man who has played so prominent a part in bringing the present government into contempt. If the Governor, faced with the responsibility that is actually imposed on him by the charter, should decline to act on the Walker charges as he has already acted on the Crain charges, he must make it perfectly clear that the ground of his refusal lies in actual differences between the two cases or else in the possibility of new and better action opened to him by the initiation of the legislative inquiry. He cannot evade responsibility.

It is not a question simply of turning a few rascals out. The important thing is to make clear to everyone the actual meaning of present-day Tammany rule. For in New York, as in every other city, corruption flourishes because of the ignorance and indifference of the body of the people themselves. The people of New York today are getting just exactly what they deserve, for they reelected James J. Walker mayor by a half-million plurality on the basis of four years' experience of the very kind of government they are now enjoying, and it is far from certain that the popularity of that government has ended even today. But it is also a fair question whether that popularity could survive a genuine public understanding of the methods and meaning of the present system. It is a system of organized public plunder for the benefit of favored business groups and their political agents. While that system continues, there is nothing for it but to wage eternal war on it by turning the light constantly on its operations.

Pan-Europe on Trial

BY their decision to set up a customs union which later would be expanded to embrace other European states wishing to join, Germany and Austria have issued a challenge to the rest of the Continent that will have far-reaching consequences. Whether their action leads to a period of strained international relations such as Europe has not seen since the World War or proves to be the necessary first step toward the creation of an economically united Europe appears to depend very largely on the attitude of France and her satellites. If France continues hostile, there is every likelihood that the new customs union will either be smothered a-borning or will bind the two German nations into a joint defiance of the rest of Europe, whatever the results of that defiance might be. If France, on the other hand, should modify her position and agree to the customs union in so far as her own economic and domestic interests are not encroached upon, her action might very well prove the beginning of genuine European cooperation.

The significance of the Berlin-Vienna move may be better understood in the light of recent European developments. Even to politicians it has become more and more evident in the last ten years that Europe must cooperate, if not unite, in order to maintain its position in the increasingly intensified world economic struggle. Two years ago the growing strength of this opinion prompted Foreign Minister Briand to launch his campaign for the organization of a United States of Europe. The Pan-Europe plan was to be based first upon economic cooperation, and was intended later to bring about some sort of political confederation. The movement also took other forms, as was indicated by the series of conferences held in the Balkans and Eastern Europe during the summer and autumn of 1930, all of which were convened with a view to increased cooperation among the agrarian states of those regions. Lastly, there have been efforts made under the auspices of the League of Nations to deal cooperatively with various special economic problems, one of these being the tariff truce that now has admittedly collapsed. Thus far none of these moves has produced anything concrete in the way of international cooperation, and this failure, though it may be only temporary, has come at a time when Europe is in the depths of a depression that has more clearly than ever before shown the need of such cooperation.

Briand can, of course, attack the projected German-Austrian customs union on political grounds, but whether he is wise in so doing is another question. There is no good reason to suppose from their published statements that Chancellor Brüning and Foreign Minister Schober are insincere in declaring the proposed union wholly economic in character. Europe may recall that a somewhat similar customs federation preceded the formation of the German Empire in 1871, but the political situation today is very different from that of two generations ago. Then France was relatively a weak country, and the German states were not defeated and disarmed but had just come through two successful wars, and in uniting had established themselves as one of the strongest political units on the Continent. No rational observer believes that a union of disarmed Germany and dismembered Austria could be much of a threat to any other group of Powers in Europe today. By shifting the emphasis from the economic to the political aspects of the proposed customs union, however, Briand might indeed force Germany and Austria as a matter of political defense into the arms of other dissatisfied Powers, including Russia, and then he would have created that opposition bloc of states which France and the Little Entente so greatly fear.

Nor can France question the union on economic grounds. This would suggest that there were other motives behind Briand's Pan-Europe scheme than the commonly accepted one of an unselfish desire on the part of France to help Europe on the way to economic stability and sanity; for what Germany and Austria have started out to do in their small way is precisely what Briand proposed to do on a Continent-wide scale. Lastly, Western Europe must realize before it is too late that the European economic structure cannot remain healthy and sound unless the heart of the Continent—Central Europe—is also healthy and sound. It would behoove M. Briand and his colleagues to examine the projected customs union in this light rather than to spend their time casting suspicion upon the motives of Germany and Austria. Surely if these two so closely related Powers are not to be permitted to work together in peace, there cannot be much real hope of getting all the other nations, with their marked racial and cultural differences, to unite in any Pan-European scheme.

A Library Experiment

THOSE persons with comfortably filled bookshelves of their own, or those to whom the public library around the corner is a source of profit and satisfaction, rarely give a thought to many hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions, of others in the United States who have literally no acquaintance or contact with books. In 1925 the Carnegie Corporation offered $50,000 to the League of Library Commissions to see how much could be done with a comparatively small sum in a libraryless community. After considerable cogitation, Louisiana was chosen as the field of experiment. And for five years Louisiana has been in process of being exposed to books.

The rate of literacy in Louisiana is low. It is not surprising that library facilities are correspondingly meager. The preliminary survey undertaken by the group chosen to make the experiment showed that except in New Orleans and Baton Rouge there were but three free public libraries in the State; that no city in the State outside New Orleans could boast a bookstore; that in New Orleans there were possibly five librarians with either a summer course or longer training; and that in the State at large only one State institutional library had a librarian with a year's training.

This, then, was at least a field that wanted working. Whether or not it was fertile, time would show. After five years of work, the Library Commission is enthusiastically convinced that it is. The total sum of money expended was $92,000, $17,000 of which was given by the State. Three parish or county libraries were established and are flourishing, partly supported by local funds; half a dozen others are projected. A traveling library covered many hundreds of miles and reached thousands of people. Illiteracy courses for adults drew 109,000 applicants, who were supplied with a special list of books that they learned to read. Everywhere response to the work was eager, spontaneous, numerically amazing. One woman who at first protested her hatred of books was won over when she discovered that all books were not about gasoline engines—the reading matter of her garage-mechanic husband. A little boy who professed a passion for books although he could barely read or write was found to cherish an ambition to be the letter-writer for his completely illiterate family. The third year of the experiment was the terrible flood year of 1927. It was difficult to talk about books to a man whose fields were under water; yet even with these setbacks the work went steadily on. More persons asking for loans; more sums obtainable from local public funds. The people wanted books—not belles-lettres, not modern fiction or poetry, to be sure. Books about accounting, floriculture, finance, interior decoration, public speaking, workers' education, tick eradication, broom manufacture, Louisiana history. But still unmistakably books. Among the Negroes the response was as gratifying as among the whites.

We submit that this book adventure is one of the most interesting educational experiments we have heard of lately. There seems to be no question that the work so generously stimulated will go on. We offer congratulations all around: to the Carnegie Corporation for furnishing the funds; to the citizens of Louisiana who so ably spent them; to the other citizens who for the first time fell into the way of reading or thinking about books. For them the world is widening; once it starts to widen, who can say where it will stop?

The Triumph of Gandhi

GANDHI has won even the left wing of his party to his truce with Lord Irwin as a basis for future negotiations. As a result, Gandhi will attend the second round-table conference as chief representative of the Congress Party. This is excellent news. It is particularly gratifying in the face of most recent events in India. The execution of Bhagat Singh and two other Indians for the murder, in 1928, of a British police officer, and the consequent attacks by the young radicals on Gandhi, who apparently did not feel justified in interceding in behalf of the three men, seemed likely for a time to upset the good work of Gandhi and Lord Irwin. It is to the great credit of the working committee which drew up the Congress resolutions that its members by a bold and intelligent stroke turned what was certainly a tactical blunder on the part of the government into a convincing argument against violence of any sort—against the original violence of Bhagat Singh and the final violence of the king's executioners.

The resolutions with which the Congress delegation faces the round-table conference are at once far-reaching and conciliatory. The most important is the first, which ratifies the Gandhi-Irwin truce and authorizes Congress participation in the conference. It declares that complete independence as the Congress goal remains intact, but that Congress delegates "will be free to accept such adjustments [i. e., safeguards] as may be demonstrably necessary in the interests of India." The resolution is, in fact, a carte blanche issued to Mahatma Gandhi and his fellow-delegates. What he will be able to achieve in London remains to be seen. That he will achieve more than any other Indian could is obvious. As for Britain, it is to be hoped that Tory and Laborite alike will read very carefully a speech made by Lord Irwin recently at New Delhi, which runs in part as follows:

> There are those who see in the present stirring of thought in India merely a movement engineered by a negligible minority which ought never to have been allowed to attain its present importance because much of it is frankly seditious and could readily have been suppressed by a firm government. . . . That diagnosis I believe to be superficial and distorted and wholly divorced from reality. Nobody will deny that there is sedition. It is also true that the numbers who are politically minded are a fractional minority of the whole, but these things are not the whole or most important part of the picture. . . .
> Great Britain will delude herself if she does not recognize that beneath all distinctions of community, class, and social circumstances, there is a growing intellectual consciousness, or more truly self-consciousness, which is very closely akin to what we generally term nationalism.

This would seem to indicate the "change of heart" Gandhi has so often asked for. Assured of that change of heart, Gandhi will submit even to safeguards, though it is certain that the safeguards projected at the first round-table conference will have to be greatly modified to win his approval; just as it is also certain that he will stand firm against granting to the princes and to the landlords the power they would have if the recommendations of the Sankey report were strictly followed.

The test in London, however, will be preceded by another test at home. The recent riots at Cawnpore point up tragically the importance of the Hindu-Moslem problem which Gandhi has pledged himself to solve. He has said truly that it would be a humiliation if India, demanding independence, were forced at the same time to ask Great Britain to settle such a purely internal question. Despite these communal riots, however, and in view of what has happened within the past few weeks, it seems certain that India is moving steadily toward self-government. That this recent progress represents a personal triumph for Gandhi cannot be denied. The triumph reached its climax at Karachi, where Gandhi, in a speech lasting an hour, so stated his position that Subhas Chandra Bose, leader of the Youth League, immediately afterward announced his allegiance to Gandhi and the truce, and where 50,000 delegates, a day later, demonstrated how complete and secure his leadership has become. But this personal triumph is the least significant aspect of the meeting at Karachi. It is much more significant that India, even despite communal difficulties, is at present united as it has never been before; it is united, moreover, behind a man whose power is no greater than his integrity and whose most sacred principle is his belief in non-violence. If one-sixth of the world's population succeeds in achieving self-government without resort to violence, force as a technique may be recognized for the obsolete futility it has in fact become.

Secretary Wilbur and the Cancer Cure

By MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

SOME months ago the American medical profession was aroused by the announcement that a cancer cure, or at least an improved method of cancer treatment, had been discovered by two San Francisco surgeons, Dr. Walter B. Coffey, chief surgeon for the Southern Pacific Railway, and Dr. John D. Humber. The genuineness of the discovery was indicated by the grant to Drs. Coffey and Humber of a patent, Number 1,771,976, covering the invention of a "therapeutic substance and method of preparing the same." The inventors established a clinic in California. Several hundred cancer sufferers, more than could be handled, applied for treatment.

Meanwhile, the medical profession as a whole reserved its judgment as to the value of the discovery. Cancer experts and other research students throughout the country likewise withheld their indorsement. Eager to welcome any definite and authentic advance in the fight against cancer, but at the same time alert to guard unfortunate cancer victims against exploitation by inventors or discoverers of alleged cures and treatments of unproved worth, these scientific authorities turned to the task of investigating the Coffey-Humber "cure." Today they have reached the virtually unanimous agreement that the Coffey-Humber discovery is neither novel nor effective. Conservative experts have rejected the evidence put forward by the two California surgeons as invalid or unscientific, and have announced that they are still awaiting acceptable proof that the treatment can cure or check cancerous growths. Other authorities have declared that the Coffey-Humber method actually is embarrassing the real fight against cancer, while still others have publicly denounced the Coffey-Humber patent and the claims upon which it was based as "preposterous" and "astounding." Nowhere, except perhaps in the case of the California Medical Association, has the new treatment been accepted as a genuine or valuable contribution to the campaign against cancer. It was an examiner in the United States Patent Office who first exposed the weakness of the Coffey-Humber claims, and he did so in devastating fashion. In the Patent Office records may be found an eleven-page document wherein this examiner, F. M. Hopkins, refuted, point by point, the various claims of the two surgeons. Upon the strength of his findings he refused to approve the granting of a patent. Farther down in the records one may find that notwithstanding this masterly report on the extremely dubious worth of the Coffey-Humber discovery, a patent was afterwards issued. When an amended application was submitted a month or two later it was handled, not by Examiner Hopkins, but by a new examiner, P. M. Nash by name, who somehow or other found himself able to recommend a patent within less than twenty-four hours after the new application had been received. Most significant among the items on record, however, is one showing that Ray Lyman Wilbur, Doctor of Medicine, President of Leland Stanford University, and Secretary of the Interior, acted as official sponsor for the inventors of this new method of cancer treatment. In a letter addressed to the Commissioner of Patents (which is printed on the next page) Dr. Wilbur stands revealed as having thrown the full weight of his official position behind the petition for a patent.

Byrnes, Townsend, and Potter, leading Washington patent attorneys, represented Drs. Coffey and Humber. The original application prepared by this firm was received by Division 43 of the Patent Office on March 19, 1930, and was referred to Examiner Hopkins for action. It began with a declaration that "our invention relates to a therapeutic substance having the property of stabilizing tissue growth and which by virtue of this property is capable of controlling and/or destroying carcinoma, sarcoma, and other malignancies, and to a method of preparing the same." Carcinoma and sarcoma are, of course, technical names for cancer, and the statement that the substance mentioned will control "and/or destroy" such malignancies can only mean that the discoverers were claiming for their invention the property of curing cancer. All medical authorities the present writer has consulted are in agreement on this point notwithstanding that the two surgeons have denied that their treatment is a "cure" as commonly understood. No documentary or other proof that the reaction does take place as described, or that the injection of the therapeutic substance referred to has any permanent effect upon cancerous growths, was offered in the original application.

On April 29 the patent lawyers received the Hopkins report rejecting the application in toto. Mr. Hopkins cited twenty-six published books or papers, the work of prominent authorities on the cancer problem, which had anticipated all the various major phases of the Coffey-Humber method. Moreover, he called attention to the existence of six prior patents covering many, if not all, of the points involved in the Coffey-Humber invention. Lastly, he declared the claims rejected "for lack of utility, as there appears to be no convincing basis for the allegations set forth in the specification that applicants' preparation stabilizes tissue growth, controls and destroys carcinoma, sarcoma, and other malignancies." In other words, the extract Drs. Coffey and Humber were seeking to have patented did not accomplish its avowed purpose, that of curing or checking cancer.

Following personal conversations with officials of the Patent Office, the lawyers submitted an amended application, which was received by Division 43 on July 1, and referred to Examiner Nash. The new specifications challenged some of the citations included in the Hopkins report, and made certain changes in the phrasing of statements in the original application, but apparently set forth no fundamental change in the method of preparing the extract in question. However, there were appended to the new application the affidavits of nine persons, purporting to establish the utility of the process and product, and also the case history of one of these persons, Roy W. Buick. The record of the Buick case showed that a sarcoma had been removed by surgery and that thereafter the patient was given regular doses of the Coffey-Humber extracts. The record further showed that the cancer did not return, but it failed to make clear whether the surgical operation or the extract was responsible. An affidavit submitted by the two surgeons likewise was appended. This document consisted of the replies of 672 anonymous patients to questions addressed to them during treatment for cancer. The replies revealed that in 71.5 per cent of the cases the Coffey-Humber extract had "greatly or entirely relieved pain"; that in 88.9 per cent of the cases general improvement had been noted without regard to pain; and that in 10.9 per cent there was either no improvement or doubt as to improvement. No information of what other treatment was given, whether surgical or by radium, no indications as to the diagnostic method or results, and no clinical indications whatever were contained in this affidavit. In short, there was nothing to show that the Coffey-Humber treatment was responsible for the improvement noted. Nevertheless, with this additional information—it can hardly be called proof—Examiner Nash was able to decide within a few hours that the Coffey-Humber substance and method were patentable.

Completing the record, there is Secretary Wilbur's letter, which runs, in full, as follows:

> April 5, 1930
> My dear Mr. Commissioner:
> Because of the interest of this department in medical and health matters through the administration of St. Elizabeth's Hospital, Howard University, Freedmen's Hospital, and our medical and health work among the Indians of this country and the Alaska natives, I wish to express my extreme interest in the application for patent filed by Drs. W. R. Coffey and John D. Humber on March 12, 1930, on their treatment for cancer. Their treatment is also of widespread public interest.
> I should be glad if you could make their application special under Rule 63 of the Rules of Practice in the United States Patent Office, so that consideration of their application may be expedited and that they may receive the benefit of the protection afforded by a patent at the earliest possible moment that they are successful in prosecuting their claim before your office.
> I designate Mr. E. C. Finney, solicitor of this department, to represent me before the Commissioner in order to prevent the improper issuance of a patent.
> [Signed] Ray Lyman Wilbur

The record, therefore, is clear that Secretary Wilbur officially interceded on behalf of Drs. Coffey and Humber in their efforts to obtain the approval of the Patent Office for their invention.

But what, one may ask, is the verdict of the known cancer experts and the medical profession in general with respect to the merits of the new method of cancer treatment? All but one of the medical associations that have expressed themselves have questioned the value of the Coffey-Humber treatment, the California Medical Association being the only organization of its kind that has indorsed this method—and even its indorsement is highly qualified. On November 1, 1930, the Journal of the American Medical Association said of the Coffey-Humber method that it "is in no sense of the word a 'cure' and even its efficiency in treatment is exceedingly doubtful. . . . In the period of six months during which the treatment has been used, 13.5 per cent of the patients have died, about as many as would have died without the treatment." The Journal also questioned the validity of the proofs offered by Drs. Coffey and Humber, saying that "the evidence might be better controlled." Less reserved was the resolution adopted by the New York Academy of Medicine last January. This statement in part said:

> The announcement in California that they [Drs. Coffey and Humber] would treat cancer led to much suffering. Many hopelessly sick persons spent much or all of their money to get to the clinic of Drs. Coffey and Humber, and yet were not much benefited by the treatment. In fact, many died in a short time. In addition, people abandoned treatments which are known to be beneficial, such as X-ray, radium, or surgery, which they were taking under the care of their own physicians. This is in accordance with the well-known fact that a cancer patient will grasp at any straw, and will often go to any expense or trouble in order to obtain some hoped-for benefit.

In another place the same resolution said:

> Some thousands of patients were treated in California during the past two years, but no claims have been made by Drs. Coffey and Humber that any of these patients were really cured. The only claim which has been made was to the effect that certain patients had less pain and that occasionally ulcerating surfaces cleared up, and in some instances healed.

Numerous other physicians and societies could be quoted in the same way. So much for the general profession. The cancer experts have been far more outspoken in their criticism of the Coffey-Humber discovery. Dr. Francis Carter Wood, editor of the American Journal of Cancer, official organ of the American Association for Cancer Research and of the American Society for Control of Cancer, and himself head of the Institute for Cancer Research at Columbia University, declared that he was "unalterably opposed to experimentation on human beings as planned by Drs. Coffey and Humber," and further that these men "have not given any proof that they have a 'potent' extract." (In the patent the substance these men claim to have invented is described as "a potent extract.") Dr. Ellice McDonald, Director of Cancer Research at the University of Pennsylvania Graduate School of Medicine, has written:

> Dr. Coffey has repeatedly stated in the public press that he and Dr. Humber make no claim for a cure, yet in the United States patent Number 1,771,976, signed by Walter B. Coffey and John D. Humber, there is the following opening statement: "Our invention relates to a therapeutic substance having the property of stabilizing tissue growth and which by virtue of this property is capable of controlling and/or destroying carcinoma, sarcoma, and other malignancies." Obviously these two statements are contradictory.
> This patent claims that the Coffey-Humber extract is an adrenal-cortex extract, stabilizing growth, and that it controls or destroys cancer. These claims may be easily proved untrue . . . time unfortunately is telling us that it is not "capable of controlling and/or destroying carcinoma, sarcoma, and other malignancies." How such a patent was ever allowed by the United States Patent Office is a matter of astonishment. It is a very dangerous precedent, if such casual, pseudo-scientific, unproved claims to so-called cancer cures are allowed by the Patent Office. . . . How any medical man could advise the Coffey-Humber treatment after reading this patent staggers my imagination.

Dr. John M. Rehfisch, radiologist and assistant professor of clinical medicine at Stanford University (of which Dr. Wilbur is president in absentia and Herbert Hoover a trustee), suggests that Dr. McDonald look up the record in the case, saying he would find that in April, 1930, the Patent Office > . . . had refused to grant the patent in a masterly report on Coffey's preposterous claims, which were annihilated one by one by a patent examiner who dealt with them in a truly scientific fashion. He will also see (and it may surprise and shock him as it did me) that Ray Lyman Wilbur wrote the Patent Office requesting specially expeditious handling of the matter on account of his responsibility for the medical care of the American Indian and the Alaskan Eskimos. His next interesting discovery will be that Dr. Coffey's claims were resubmitted, July 1, 1930, and the patent granted on July 2—an example of speed and efficiency which is a true tribute to the Great Engineer and his strong, silent way of getting things done.

That Dr. Rehfisch would thus dare to court dismissal from the faculty of Stanford University gives some indication of the feeling of the cancer and medical experts toward the Coffey-Humber invention. A layman might be excused on the grounds of ignorance for intercession upon behalf of this widely repudiated method of cancer treatment. But Secretary Wilbur is a doctor of medicine (Cooper Medical College, San Francisco, 1899); he was for seven years professor of medicine at Stanford University, and for five of these years dean of its Medical College; he is a member and former president of the California Academy of Medicine; he is chairman of the medical council of the United States Veterans' Bureau; he is a member and former president of the American Association of Medical Colleges; he is a former president of the American Medical Association and at present chairman of its council on medical education and hospitals; he is a trustee of the Rockefeller Foundation; and, lastly, he is a fellow of the American Association for the Advancement of Science.

Surely a man of Secretary Wilbur's high standing in the medical profession can hardly afford to identify himself with a questionable cancer cure, let alone act as official sponsor for the inventors of that specific.

The Vanishing Job

By H. O. ROGERS

UNDOUBTEDLY one of the most significant industrial developments of the post-war decade has been the marked reduction in the number of workers engaged in the so-called "basic" industries. In mining, manufactures, rail transportation, and agriculture there has been an absolute and outright loss in the number of persons gainfully employed. The shrinkage in the demand for farm labor and the drift cityward have, of course, long been evident. But as far as American experience is concerned, it is an entirely new development in the other major branches of industry, and involves problems of the utmost importance.

Particularly striking has been the decline in the number of wage-earners employed in manufacturing industry. Prior to 1920 year after year witnessed a sharp rise in the demand for factory labor. Although for the most part the increase in factory employment has lagged somewhat behind the growth in the physical volume of production, during certain years of rapid industrial expansion the increase in the average number of wage-earners not only kept pace with advancing output but even exceeded it. Thus, between 1909 and 1914 both the index of physical production and the average number of factory workers showed an increase of 16.4 per cent, while between 1914 and 1919 the number of wage-earners increased even more rapidly than the volume of production. The upward movement in the demand for factory labor that had characterized the pre-war years came to an abrupt end in 1920. Since then the trend has been unmistakably downward.

This sudden shift has been due primarily to the world-wide process of industrial readjustment that has lately been labeled by Continental economists as rationalization. In this country, as elsewhere, rationalization has meant, simply, reduced production costs. Various methods have been adopted to accomplish this end, but in the United States it has been achieved principally by reducing the quantity of labor required per unit of product. The success of this movement in manufacturing may be judged from statistics recently released by the Bureau of the Census.

The census figures show that in 1929 there were 8,742,761 wage-earners engaged in manufacturing industry. In comparison with 1919, this is a net reduction of 296,410 workers. But every close observer of industrial trends is aware that the output of fabricated products mounted steadily during the intervening period, culminating in the high-water mark of 1929. Just how great the increase has been is a matter of considerable speculation, but probably the best measurement at hand is the index constructed by E. E. Day and Woodlief Thomas, covering the period 1899-1925, and carried forward through 1929 by the Federal Reserve Board. If this is accepted as a trustworthy indicator of the growth, then the volume of output increased nearly 45 per cent between 1919 and 1929. Thus, in 1929, with a labor force reduced by 3.2 per cent, nearly half again as large a quantity of manufactured goods was produced as ten years before.

Another factor to be kept clearly in mind in considering the census figures is that, in spite of the collapse of Hoover prosperity in late October, the year 1929 marked the peak of the post-war prosperity era. With industry moving at high speed, factory managers were inclined to be much less economical with respect to labor than in times of stringency. The figures for 1929, therefore, show employment in the most favorable light. In years of ordinary industrial activity, to say nothing of years of acute depression such as 1930, one would find the working force at much lower levels.

By far the most spectacular reduction in man power has occurred in the transportation-equipment industry. This is a group of violent contrasts. It includes, on the one hand, industries such as automobile and aircraft manufacture, which have shown phenomenal expansion, and, on the other, industries such as shipbuilding and wagon- and carriage-making, which have declined almost to the vanishing-point. As far as employment is concerned, the gains in the automotive field have failed to offset the losses sustained by other branches and the industry group as a whole shows a decrease of 285,000 workers since 1919.

Other industry groups that show a decline in employment since 1919 are the leather, rubber, and chemical industries, the railroad repair shops, and the group manufacturing miscellaneous products not elsewhere classified. Of these, the greatest reduction is reported by the railroad repair shops, where employment fell off 23 per cent as compared with 1919.

The next largest decline occurred in the miscellaneous group, which shows a reduction of 19 per cent in the number of employees. This item is particularly surprising because in this group are included such products as phonographs, photographic equipment and supplies (including motion pictures), cigarettes and cigars, soda-water apparatus, sporting and athletic goods, musical instruments, and many other so-called luxury goods, whose sales have been sky-rocketing in recent years. That the chemical industry reports a decline of 17 per cent in employment in spite of the enormous increase in the use of rayon and nearly all other chemical products is due chiefly to the prohibition amendment, which has thrown out of work large numbers who were formerly employed in the production of distilled, fermented, and vinous liquors. Substantial reductions in the number of wage-earners are also shown by the leather and rubber industries. In the leather industry the decline is largely explained by the severe depression in the boot and shoe industry, but the rubber industry has been booming along with the automotive industry, and its reduced pay rolls represent almost exclusively technological advances in replacing hand labor with mechanical methods of production. In all, about 320,000 workers have been displaced in these industries—a reduction which, when added to the number released in the transportation-equipment industry, brings the total to 605,000.

The losses in these branches of manufacturing, however, were partly offset by increases elsewhere. In the printing and publishing industries, thanks to the public's voracious appetite for literature in the form of tabloids and confession magazines and also to the prolific typewriters of our current crop of popular novelists, some 84,000 new jobs have been created during the last ten years. Closely related to the gain in the publishing business has been the concomitant increase in the number of wage-earners employed by manufacturers of paper and paper products. In this industry employment has increased from 208,518 workers in 1919 to 225,820 in 1929.

Employment has also increased in industries manufacturing what is known as producers' goods, that is, materials to be used for further production. The manufacturing groups producing such materials fall under the following census classifications: iron and steel and their products, not including machinery; products of petroleum and coal; machinery, not including transportation equipment; non-ferrous metals and their products. Each of these groups shows substantial increases in the number of wage-earners employed. But the expansion of these industries goes a long way toward explaining the decline in employment in other branches, as their products are the materials used in the process of mechanization. Moreover, employment in these industries increased at a much more moderate pace than the growth in the physical volume of output, and the four groups combined added only 131,000 workers to their pay rolls.

Small gains in employment have been registered in the food, textile, and lumber industries also. Of these the largest is shown by the manufacturers of textiles, whose pay rolls have been increased by 2.4 per cent during the past decade. This increase has taken place in spite of the serious depression that has prevailed in the textile industry throughout most of the period. It may be partly explained, however, by the migration of the industry toward sources of cheap labor supply. In the manufacture of food and kindred products employment has increased slightly less than 1 per cent, while in the depressed lumber industry employment has barely held its own.

To summarize, the manufacturing industries reporting an increase in employment have absorbed about 305,000 new workers, but this falls considerably short of balancing the 605,000 workers displaced in other branches of manufacturing. Thus, for manufacturing industry as a whole the total firing rate has been approximately double the total hiring rate. Meanwhile, the working population of the country has been increasing at the rate of almost a million a year.

The optimistic school of economists have been inclined to discount the importance of this displacement and have held that the "newer" industries that have recently made their appearance have not only been able to absorb the workers that have been discharged by the factories, mines, and railroads but have also been able to provide employment for a large part of the increase in the population of working ages. Dr. E. Dana Durand, statistical assistant to the Secretary of Commerce and former director of the United States Bureau of the Census, in his "American Industry and Commerce," just from the press, makes the following statement:

> The major explanation of the decline in workers in factories is simply that the United States, first among nations to reach that position, has now become so efficient in the production of goods that it can afford to cut down the number who make them for the sake of increasing the number who render incorporeal services.

Again in the same opus a little farther on:

> It is obvious, however, that save for the short-lived depression that followed the immediate post-war boom, the cutting down of the numbers in agriculture, manufactures, and transportation during recent years cannot have resulted in any widespread lack of employment. The best evidence is the fact that the steadily swelling volume of output of commodities has, after all, found a market, and the great bulk of it a market within the country itself. A man out of a job is not a good buyer.

It is, of course, true that large numbers have been absorbed in the domestic and personal-service industries, such as hotels, restaurants, beauty parlors, and roadside "hot-dog" stands. There has likewise been a tremendous increase in sales forces and professional workers to provide for the needs of the mounting population, but just how many workers the service industries have absorbed nobody knows. The fact that unemployment is with us now and was with us also even back in the halcyon days of the prosperity epoch seems to indicate conclusively that the absorptive capacity of the service industries is definitely limited, and the demand for labor in the existing body of industries is likely to decline still farther in proportion to the population in the future. To deny the existence of the unemployment problem simply because goods are being produced and sold in increasing volume and because the man without a job makes a poor customer presents a process of faulty reasoning that even the statistical assistant to the Secretary of Commerce might be expected to detect. Even if it were merely a problem of transfer from production to service industries, as Dr. Durand suggests, the process has resulted in considerable friction that calls for intelligent action. For this reason the complete census returns on employment in other major branches of industry in 1929 are anxiously awaited in order to determine just what has taken place during the past decade.

Going Through the Rye

Germany's Food Tariffs

By HERBERT KLEIN

Berlin, March 12

THE choice between low foodstuff prices, in a time when they are needed as never before, and preferential protection for the benefit of habitually pampered interests disguised as needy German agriculture may well become a Waterloo for the Brüning Government. The situation at the moment of writing is a serious one; it is crucial in the sense that it supplies a touchstone to test the contention of extreme left elements that the present regime is basically reactionary in its aims, and also to determine whether the Social Democratic Party has turned its back completely on the principles which once distinguished it.

From the same Reichstag rostrum from which Chancellor Brüning had not long before announced his intention of securing reduced prices for all necessities of life, Minister of Agriculture and Foodstuffs Schiele made his eagerly awaited speech outlining the government's proposed "tariff dictatorship" and other measures on the program of agricultural relief that he and the Cabinet as a whole had threshed out and were prepared to push through the Reichstag. That speech may properly be connected with the sittings of the Reichstag commission which is undertaking to investigate the causes and circumstances of the collapse of the Roggenpreis Stützungsaktion (measure for maintaining prices for rye) last September. And it is thereby linked with the habitually distressed state of German agriculture—an agriculture almost unbelievably inefficient, backward, and disorganized and—and with the almost equally habitual attempts to relieve the distress by patching up the tottering, out-dated old system and making life easier for the big landowners, the Junkers, who still wield an influence out of all proportion to their numbers or their needs. These attempts have been made at the general expense through (1) desperately high tariffs on food products produced in Germany; (2) loans, subventions, and tax reductions designed to reduce farmer indebtedness; and (3) price maintenance—or "stabilization"—by direct purchases on the market, along the lines of the recent activity of the American Farm Board in wheat and cotton. The Roggenpreis action was of this last category; the current investigation has shown that between the middle of last summer and a few days after the Reichstag elections of September 14, $5,000,000 was lost. The scheme, born of the active mind of Herr Fritz Baade, prominent agricultural theorist and member of the Social Democratic Party, and godfathered by Minister Schiele, may be said to have been still born. Herr Baade lays all the blame on Russian dumping of rye. The pity of it all is that the money which was lost would have served agriculture and the nation so much better if it had been used in assisting one-crop, grain-growing farmers to change over to the so-called "Greenland plan" (dairying with blooded stock, egg production with pedigreed fowl, and diversified vegetable production), which is rightly being hailed in progressive quarters as the one logical "way out" for the farmers.

The other two methods of propping German agriculture have been carried on at a cost to a hungering people which makes the $5,000,000 seem paltry. With practically five million unemployed, plus their dependents, in the country, it is the bitter truth that at least one person out of every four has less to eat than he requires — because he hasn't enough money to pay for more. At such a time a metric ton (2,205 pounds) of wheat costs in the neighborhood of $73 in Germany, while the same amount could be purchased in Holland or England for $27.50! The tariff here is $62.50 per ton. In spite of the fact that Germany is one of the few nations raising more rye than it can normally consume—the others are Poland and Russia—a metric ton of that grain costs $45 in Berlin; the tariff amounts to $37.50. Rye can be bought, delivered, in a Scandinavian port for $16 to $17. Germany's industrial competitors can feed their people much more cheaply than can Germany. The result of the tariff policy has been, as Dr. Baade is compelled to admit in his book "Deutsche Roggenpolitik," that "Germany must pay double or even treble as much for bread as some of her neighbor nations." Small wonder when rye and oats are the only grains whose production exceeds needs. Every man, woman, and child in the land who still has enough pfennigs to buy bread is paying a subvention to the farmers who sell bread-making grains, a tribute from the great majority of the population for the benefit of a minority class. Tariffs have boosted food prices—or anchored them, which has the same result in a time of sinking world prices—so that a sum far greater than the annual reparations tribute is extorted from the masses. Between eight hundred million and a billion of dollars is one estimate that seems to check with statistics.

Who gets the benefit of this? To answer, one must examine the ownership of agricultural land in Germany. There are, roughly, 64,000,000 acres of productive land in the Reich (approximately one acre for each German citizen) and some 5,000,000 farms. More than three-quarters of these are of 12½-acre size or smaller; about a fifth are between 12½ and 50 acres; 4 per cent of all farms are of 50 to 450 acres; and a mere one-tenth of 1 per cent are larger than 450 acres. More than 46 per cent of the total cultivated area is in the hands of the last two classes of owners. These, numbering just 4.1 per cent of all the farmers in Germany, are the big landowners. The other 95.9 per cent of the farmers divide the remaining land between them. More than that, the three-quarters of all farmers who have the smallest farms have well under one-fifth of the total acreage to call their own. More than nineteen out of every twenty farmers who live from the soil have so little land that it is out of the question for them to raise grain in sufficient quantities to bring it to the market. What little they have is fed to their cattle, pigs, or poultry—or is consumed by themselves. Actually, a great many of the small farmers have to buy grain over and above what they raise to keep their animals alive, just as they have to buy bread.

Keeping in mind the distribution of land, let us examine the other kind of agricultural aid, namely, direct subvention. More than $650,000,000 of public money has been poured into this seemingly bottomless hole since the end of the inflation period. It would be quite safe to say that the most impoverished and needy nine-tenths of the farm population have never got the benefit of a tenth of it, and they would do no better in the case of the new $213,750,000 "East-help" bill which Schiele and the present administration of the state of Prussia are working for. In 1927 $15,000,000 "East help" was voted for exactly similar purposes in Prussia. Only a tenth of this money found its way to farms of 45 acres or less, while estates of 450 to 1,250 acres got almost a third, and a good 15 per cent went to "ranches" of still greater expanse. Such is the summary of 577 cases. There is not the slightest reason for assuming that the benefits of the new subventions and long-term, interest-free credits would be differently divided—unless legislation were specially shaped to that end. Moreover, while this money, extracted painfully from almost-depleted treasuries, is finding its way safely to the hands of Count von This, Prince That, and other Junker landowners to enable them to perpetuate inefficient agricultural practice on an almost feudal basis, the neediest class of all, the agricultural worker-slaves of East Prussia, Silesia, and adjacent regions, continue to get wages of between one and one-quarter and five cents an hour, if indeed they find work at all.

How the Junkers maintain their favored position is another subject. But it will not be entirely incomprehensible to those Americans who know something of how their government has learned to nurse its perpetually "infant" industries by means of a tariff from which there is no retreat. The Junkers, through the million-membered Reichslandbund which they dominate, and the money which they (not the peasants!) are able to lay out, have a terrific political influence. Their hold in Prussia and in the nation did not end with the war. Their habits are unchanged. George Ihering, a young German journalist, once delved into old files and emerged with typical quotations for every year of the last quarter-century in which big landowners or their representatives announced the imminent ruin of the entire system of German agriculture unless something were done for it at once. That something has never been enough. The Junkers, unlike Oliver Twist, do not even say "Please, sir" when asking for more; they demand it, and at the present time they are greatly dissatisfied with Schiele, former president of the Reichslandbund and thoroughgoing Junker, because he has not yet managed to secure enough.

This might seem ungrateful, were it taken with utter seriousness, because Schiele has gone the whole way in his new measures and demands nothing less than an unchecked dictatorship by the Cabinet as a whole over all food tariffs for at least a year to come. Nor does he seem to quail before the consequences which would almost certainly ensue from his plan to raise rates on eggs, dairy products, fruits, meats, wheat, barley, and other products which Germany imports to the value of more than three-quarters of a billion dollars annually, even in these times of reduced consumption. Those foods which were named specifically in the preceding sentence account for more than half this total; they are just the ones on which the greatest tariff increases would fall. Germany is a consumer nation. Industrialized and densely populated, she is obliged to import an important percentage of all her foodstuffs. A rational change to "Greenland" agriculture, following in the sensible footsteps of Holland, whose climate and soil are no better than Germany's, would eventually make possible a Germany which would supply itself with all the eggs, beef, butter, cheese, and milk consumed, in place of a Germany which has an excess of rye and oats almost every year and deficiencies in other products. Such a rational change would of course require technical and credit aid from government, but in order to merit the term "rational" it ought not to be produced by the method of high protective tariffs. Tariffs such as Schiele seeks to empower the Cabinet to impose would, unchecked, raise food prices in Germany cruelly. They would, moreover, do tremendous, perhaps irreparable, damage to Germany's export trade and commercial relations with neighboring nations, and very probably further increase unemployment.

It is all quite simple and inevitable. Denmark, Sweden, and Norway between them purchase three-quarters of a million dollars' worth of German machinery each year—fully a quarter of a million dollars more than the value of the butter and meat they send to Germany. (Incidentally, this butter and meat are of better quality than farms in the Reich yet produce, because the Scandinavians have intelligently rationalized their dairying and cattle-raising through exclusive use of blooded stock, scientifically fed. The Teutons have not yet done this, any more than they have learned, as Holland has learned, that the right sort of hen with the right sort of feeding will lay 130 good eggs a year, instead of the scant 75 nondescripts which the average hen lays in the Reich—precisely the difference between profitable poultrying and haphazard, hit-or-miss hen-keeping.) If the three Scandinavian countries are hit by the proposed Schiele tariffs they will answer with retaliatory tariffs on German manufactures, which is almost certain to mean another few hundred thousand men attempting to exist on the fifteen-odd dollars a month which unemployment insurance yields. It is no secret that the nations which have been exporting foodstuffs to Germany and, in return, have been buying German machinery and manufactured goods are ready with retaliatory tariff measures which would strike sharp blows at German industry. Among these nations are Holland, Latvia, Finland, and Italy, in addition to the three already named. The Polish government has suspended all action toward ratifying the recently framed commercial treaty with Germany, waiting to see what is going to happen. Spain, as well as Italy, would be seriously affected by the government monopoly of southern fruits which Schiele would like to introduce, even at the cost of having to abrogate the existing commercial treaty with Italy. So the situation stands. Small wonder that the Reich's industrialists have been protesting so bitterly against the proposed moves.

But the most sinister note in the entire situation—sinister because it suggests an utter blindness to facts coupled with a willingness to sacrifice human beings for purely vindictive ends—is the suggestion which comes from circles very close to both Schiele and Finance Minister Dietrich (himself a former Minister of Agriculture and Foodstuffs) that the real aim of the Cabinet-controlled tariffs would be so to develop German agriculture that it could become a weapon for forcing cancelation of reparations demands. The idea is that if the growth of agriculture in Germany can be forced, that country will become so poor a customer for the food products of foreign nations that the exporters of those nations will turn to their governments with the despairing plea that German markets be somehow opened to them again, even though reparations have to go by the board. A fantastic idea, surely, and one which seems as short-sighted as it is unlikely of success. It is an unhealthy growth from the unhealthy soil of an unhealthy farm situation.

With the Hitlerite delegates out of the Reichstag and agitating in all corners of the republic, the Social Democrats plus the Communists have a majority. The Communists hate the very sight of Schiele; they call him "Hunger Minister" and "Underfeeding Minister" and heckle him unmercifully, and they will vote and filibuster against his every proposal. Everything depends on the Social Democrats, for the parties of the center are on the whole back of Schiele. The more radical Social Democrats have already protested against the Schiele program, which they find neither social nor democratic. Can the party which is responsible for unemployment insurance and the other social legislation of Germany bring itself to support negations of its principles, even to avoid the change of government which might result were the Cabinet to decide that it would not brook defeat on that issue? It remains to be seen.

Post Office Censorship Again

By LAWRENCE ROGIN

POLITICAL censorship of the press has received much attention in the United States ever since the Federalist government, trying by every possible means to keep power, passed the Alien and Sedition Acts. While Congressional interference with the freedom of the press would seem to be prevented by the First Amendment to the Constitution, Congress has in fact established a political censorship through its power over the mails.

Congress, under its power to establish post offices and post roads, has done two things that seriously affect the press. First of all, it has classified the mails and provided for lower rates, in class two, for regularly published periodicals, such rates being only one-seventh to one-fifteenth the ordinary rates for printed matter. The rates are said to be about one-seventh of the cost of carrying. Furthermore, Congress has made certain classes of matter unmailable, including lotteries, obscene matter, contraceptive information, and, what is most important, anything inciting sedition or treason. The hysteria accompanying the late war was responsible for the inclusion of the last-named.

The responsibility for carrying out the provisions of the law is delegated to the Postmaster General. And the courts have so interpreted the law as to give the Postmaster General a good deal of discretion in his administrative rulings and have decided that his decisions shall not be reversed unless they are clearly wrong. As a result, an extensive power of censorship has been placed in the hands of the Post Office Department. This censorship operates in two ways: (1) The Post Office can refuse to admit to the mails any issue of a publication it deems objectionable; (2) it can revoke the second-class mailing privileges of any publication on the ground that that publication has previously printed objectionable material and may do so again in the future. The courts upheld both methods in Masses vs. Patten and in the case of the Milwaukee Leader.

The first extensive use of Post Office censorship occurred during the World War. According to figures prepared by Roger Baldwin for the "American Labor Year Book," twenty-six newspapers had their second-class mailing privileges revoked, including the New York Call and the Milwaukee Leader, two Socialist and labor dailies with comparatively large circulations; sixteen papers had one or more issues held; four papers were entirely barred from the mails; seven were cited by the Post Office Department for revocation of the second-class mailing privilege; and seventeen other papers were interfered with in some manner or other.

These persecutions can be understood if not forgiven on the ground of war hysteria. In the past year, however, the persecution of the radical press has been started again, in a manner not so spectacular, perhaps, but quite as thorough. During this period at least five publications have either had their second-class mailing privilege revoked or have been refused it altogether, and one paper can mail only those issues which are specifically approved. These publications are Revolutionary Age, weekly organ of an opposition Communist group; the Young Worker, organ of the Young Workers League, a Communist youth organization; the Young Pioneer, organ of the Young Pioneers, also Communist; Sport and Play, organ of the Labor Sports Union of America; and Vida Obrera, a Spanish Communist weekly. A brief history of two of the cases will show just how the postal censorship operates.

Revolutionary Age was established in November, 1929, by a group which split off from the official Communist Party. The paper applied for second-class mailing privileges, and provisional rights were given until the case should be decided.

Some months after issue number six had been published the Post Office notified the publishers that second-class rights would be denied because that issue had contained seditious material and had been non-mailable, although the publishers claim that the issue had gone through the mails. At any rate, that very issue was republished as part of issue number seventeen, dated July 15, 1930, and an unsuccessful attempt was made to send it through the mails. Thereupon the publishers went to court, with the aid of the American Civil Liberties Union. The case was tried before Judge Wolsey of the Southern New York District. He did what precedent required and upheld the Post Office, on the ground that he could not reverse the department unless it was clearly wrong, and in this case he could not find it wrong. At present the case is on appeal.

In the meantime the paper was being mailed as third-class matter, at a much higher rate, but issues of it were being held up regularly for examination by the Post Office before being sent out. In its issue of February 21 of this year the paper protested against this treatment by the Post Office. This issue was held up almost a week and finally declared unmailable, and the publishers were notified that in the future the paper would be admitted to the mails only after the solicitor of the Post Office at Washington had approved of the contents of each issue. The paper is a national weekly published in New York City and at least 75 per cent of its circulation goes through the mails. The additional cost entailed by the postal censorship could not be estimated.

The case of the Young Worker is somewhat different. The paper has had second-class mailing rights ever since its establishment some eight years ago. On March 3, 1930, its office of publication was moved from New York City to Worcester, Massachusetts. A transfer of mailing rights was asked for. The paper had moved several times before and had had no trouble in transferring its second-class rights. This time, however, the paper was notified that its second-class mailing rights had been revoked because of objectionable matter in its issues of May 1, May 19, and June 2, 1930. The Post Office did not specify just what was wrong with those issues of the paper and up to date neither the publishers nor their counsel have been able to find out. They are represented by the American Civil Liberties Union and the International Labor Defense. The Young Worker is a national weekly published, now, in New York. About 80 per cent of its circulation goes through the mails. The paper has requested a hearing in its attempt to regain its second-class rights.

Unquestionably, the Post Office has been within its legal rights in all its acts, with the possible exception that it should have notified the Young Worker in what particulars it was violating the law. In other words, the faults of postal censorship as it now exists are not due to any perversion of the law by the Post Office, but rather to the law itself, as interpreted by the Supreme Court. The remedy for the situation lies in the repeal by Congress of Section 344 of the criminal code of the United States, that section which ostensibly prohibits the sending of treasonable and seditious matter through the mails.

Political censorship of any sort in a democracy is an anomaly. To vest the power of such censorship in one official whose decisions, for all practical purposes, are final, is to introduce autocracy in extreme form. Obviously, the Postmaster General can make or break the radical press. Through the power to refuse second-class mailing privileges the Post Office can so raise the cost of publication as to make it impossible for a paper to continue its existence, and it must be remembered that the type of paper most often affected by the censorship is not the paper published for profit, but rather propagandist organs which are usually supported by donations from those who have but little to contribute.

The further power of the Post Office to bar the paper from the mails entirely is a more serious evil. The judicial mind may satisfy itself with such phrases as those uttered by Judge Wolsey in his decision in respect to the Revolutionary Age, that ". . . the freedom of the press is not interfered with except by the suppression of a newspaper before publication," but anyone with an open mind must recognize that freedom to publish means nothing unless it is joined with the freedom to circulate. The value of the press is not that it puts down on paper certain facts and opinions to form a record, but that people read these facts and opinions. Any procedure which hinders the latter process must be considered in fact an infringement on the freedom of the press.

In the Driftway

F. J. SCHLINK, indefatigable discriminator and technical director of Consumers' Research, is hurt because the Drifter failed to mention that admirable and going concern when he held forth recently upon the shortcomings of razor blades and the complete breakdown of the staff of life. Mr. Schlink is hurt and the Drifter is sorry. In apology the Drifter will now turn the column over to Mr. Schlink, whose letter reads as follows:

> We were disappointed to discover from your column of February 25 that you are clearly unaware of the existence of Consumers' Research. I trust we may be pardoned for our disappointment that a magazine like The Nation, which should be among the first to know about an effective cooperative activity of 14,000 ultimate consumers in educating themselves to cope with the complexities of the modern market, should have been out of touch with this development, which is well known to a rather large proportion of your readers, since our subscribers and your readers come from pretty much the same social and intellectual classes.
> It would be hard to quarrel with your caustic criticism of customary goods, but it is nevertheless true that if you wish to know where good razor blades are made and by whom sold, you can do so with very little trouble. Even on coffee we can give you an array of numerical measures of quality that really mean something, and in regard to which not a single manufacturer has ventured to offer a criticism or correction. It is, of course, only an accident, but it turns out that we have useful and available information upon every item which you mention in your article with the exception of bread, and even on that a little can be done. If you very much want good bread and can arrange to have it baked to order, you can do so by availing yourself of some quite definite and critical data on the flour from which it might best be made. The last paragraph of your column might well be rewritten thus:
> > As for weapons in his crusade, the Drifter knows of only one effective blade — discrimination—and that is > wielded by but a single organization—Consumers' Research. Unfortunately, critical judgment by consumers has been so deeply buried in this democracy of ours under the weight of snob advertising that a long period of testing and encouragement will be required before the fight is on anything like even terms. Consumers' Research has rescued discrimination—long known in some of its forms as sales resistance and considered subtly unpatriotic—and set it to work. Given time and a sufficient number of consumers who care a tinker's dam about what they eat and wear and use, we may have bread instead of paper pulp, and steel instead of advertising copy in our razor blades.

* * * * *

THE Drifter accepts the emendations. He does more. He urges every disciple of discrimination to subscribe to the publications of Consumers' Research. (The address is 340 West Twenty-third Street, New York.) Its monthly broadsides are not only useful for their information; as literature they have the output of any book club backed off the library table. They mention names without fear or favor. Opposite each the truth is set down in cold print. And it is strange but true that the "lowdown" on the products which occupy the highest-priced space in our most fashionable magazines can be just as exciting as the "inside dope" on the celebrity of the moment. Only the other day the Drifter met a friend of his, a tired intellectual, whose eyes were shining as they had not shone since "Ulysses" was published. "What is it?" asked the Drifter, expecting nothing less than the news of a new literary genius. "Have you seen," questioned the tired intellectual, "have you ever seen the booklet of Consumers' Research?"

We Also Became Librarians

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your recent contributor in I Became a Librarian gives us something of the wistful wonder that we feel in reading—if we still can—"St. Elmo" or "Elsie Dinsmore." So much of the gentility that during its earlier years hovered over librarianship came through the easy entrance into libraries of those who, like your contributor, were "casting about rather aimlessly for a career." In her enjoyment of literary delicacies, she declares, she lacked all desire "to dish them up to others." Fortunately, better organization of libraries, more thorough training, and spirited personnel officers have almost prevented the admission of the drooping genteel female who seeks a supposedly easy berth because she has always been "such a bookworm."

Lutie E. Stearns was about that time rampaging up and down the State of Wisconsin in her famous bearskin coat, storming at legislators until they made some provision for books for farm wives. It may have been a bit later that Anne Wallace was building up the Atlanta Public Library with an unquenchable vivacity and a perseverance that brought her to New York to besiege Mr. Andrew Carnegie until he succumbed and gave Atlanta a proper library. Sarah Askew was and is still giving books and a good time to New Jersey and refusing to regard the "Silence" sign that town boards like to hoist when library budgets are insisted upon. Eliza Willard was putting her rare gifts of learning, humor, and exquisite understanding at the service of all the eager and awkward young men and women of Pittsburgh who sought her out. Anne Carroll Moore in New York was brushing out with a relentless broom the musty remains of Sunday School libraries that had been good enough for children until Miss Hewins of Hartford insisted in no still, small voice that cast-off books and colorless women would not do. Mary E. Plummer was developing a library school in Brooklyn to train men and women for a broadening and changing profession.

Your contributor's experience was evidently entirely with women, so that she had no contact with some of the scholarly and charming, and even practical, men in the profession. But how unfortunate that Miss Auer seems not to have encountered a single one of the vivid women who refused to accept libraries as they found them.

New York, February 26 ESTHER JOHNSTON

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have read the article I Became a Librarian with considerable surprise and amusement: surprise that only partially true observations evidently made a number of years ago should be accepted as fact today; and amusement that anyone should believe that the lot of the librarian is as pathetic as it is there pictured.

Thanks to the work of the American Library Association and the efforts of individual librarians, library salaries have been, or are on the way to being, raised to meet increasingly high standards of training for librarianship. The day is past when "a love of books" qualifies its possessor for a position in a library. The beginning librarian today is a college graduate, frequently further qualified by graduate study in a library school, and her salary indicates a recognition of her qualifications.

She is not oppressed by a maze of detail and routine tasks, for in the modern library details have been reduced to a minimum and routine has been lightened by the adoption of practically all of the mechanical devices known to business, with the addition of others, such as the charging machine, designed especially to meet the needs of libraries.

Nor is she a slow-paced worker inured to boredom in a convent-like atmosphere. The public library is a busy place these days. It is a vital part of the community and reflects the heightened tempo of the age. It is an educational institution supplementary to the public-school system, and continuing beyond it into the field of adult education. Its crowded lobbies and special rooms are no place for the quiet personality who shrinks from the public gaze. The modern librarian is one of the most observed of public servants, and is known to a large proportion of her community, not only through her contacts with them inside the library, where as readers' adviser she helps those who rely upon her expert knowledge, but outside the walls as well, for she frequently appears before civic and literary groups as a speaker.

She is no more bound by rules and tradition than are doctors, lawyers, ministers, or teachers. Exceptions are as freely honored in the library as elsewhere. As for the responsibility of using her judgment, she is under the necessity of making instant decisions many times a day, and if they lead her to consult more mature experience and authority the fact is no reflection on her judgment or the power given her for its use.

She is under no restrictions as to the expression of her opinion. Most libraries conduct some form of staff assembly which is an open forum for the exchange of ideas. Originality counts here as elsewhere, and few really able junior librarians remain an unreasonably long time in subordinate positions.

To say that librarians read less than any other professional group is to make a broad statement not well founded. Admittedly the librarian is "a lover of books." In nine cases out of ten she comes from a home and school environment where the reading of the classics and the best of current literature is a matter of course. She cannot continue long in her chosen work without a pretty intimate knowledge of the tools of her profession—books. If she does not read because she wants to, she reads because she has to. At any rate she reads—and her reading often includes The Nation.

Mathilde D. Williams

Washington, D. C., February 28

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The members of the staff of our library have been both amused and irritated by the article in your issue of February 25, I Became a Librarian. We are amused by the picture of the foibles of the librarian who is now as obsolete as the country doctor who carried his potions in saddle bags as he went from patient to patient. And we are irritated to find The Nation printing so false and out-of-date an article.

She who became a librarian because it seemed the line of least resistance seems quite uninformed as to what has happened in the library profession in "the length of years which lie between the library and myself." No longer are "quiet, quiescence, and acquiescence . . . the triune principle of the library order." Rather, we find alert sympathy with the needs of the readers, resourcefulness to meet these needs, and joy (frequent merry laughs) in the service.

If you are skeptical of this picture of the librarian of today, we invite you to drop into our library almost any day.

The Staff of the Kalamazoo Public Library

Kalamazoo, Mich., March 1

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Whatever the gay nineties were gay in, it was not libraries, if we are to judge from Miss Auer's article in The Nation of February 25. Since, to use her own words, "only the length of years which lie between the library and myself gives me the temerity to speak of the librarian," she should be enlightened. The library of today is no more like the one in the nineties than the lines of a modern skyscraper are like those of one of that period. In the first place, the library does not want and will not take a person who applies for a position merely because she has no other resources to fall back on. She must be fully trained for her job.

No librarian has time to sit down for a "heart-to-heart talk" about the Dewey System of Classification with green young things who have been shunted to her from other fields of activity. A would-be assistant must learn the trade before she goes into it. As Miss Auer admitted toward the end of her article, educational qualifications have advanced.

There are plodders in every profession. There are still some in the library. But the race is thinning out. There is routine. In every efficient business there is routine. And there are details. A modern librarian acknowledges all of them, masters them, and uses them automatically as her library technique. She knows also that a ship at sea would flounder without rules. Likewise in a library, with perhaps fifteen assistants dealing with a public several thousand strong, there would be chaos without rules.

The modern librarian has evidently made strides in her reading habits. In Miss Auer's time her aim was "to read the reviews of books, rather than the books themselves." Today it is to read the reviews of books, certainly, but also to read the books. Many librarians require intelligent book reviews at each staff meeting. A glance at a list of books read by the staff members in their own time shows—besides fiction—travel, literature, sociology, history, art. Many of the assistants are taking courses after hours. A casual questioning in a New York library the other day found one assistant studying etching at the Art Students' League. Another was taking Robert Frost's poetry course at the New School for Social Research. Another was studying political science at Columbia. Still another was planning to study sculpture at the De Medici school on the East River. Most of them go to the theater and many to opera. An astounding number spend their vacations in Europe.

I assure you, the librarian of today has little in common with the "subdued, toned-down" sister of the gay nineties. And she resents, with all due respect to Miss Auer, being classed with her.

New York, March 6 Lois Clarke

"Black No More"

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Since Mr. Schuyler is abroad, I feel that I should reply to some of the statements made by Dorothy Van Doren in her review of "Black No More" in your issue of February 25. Mr. Schuyler did not, contrary to Mrs. Van Doren's opinion, write "Black No More" to show how his people had "betrayed their race," and he does not consider the average Negro any more primitive than the average white, but thinks them both equally childish, superstitious, and full of fantastic prejudices. "Black No More" was an attempt to expose the ridiculous, confused, and almost insane ramifications of the American color problem.

Mrs. Van Doren calls the book "white satire" and this apparently is intended to condemn the book and its author. It is rather surprising that well-read people still assume that there is such a thing as a distinct Negro literature. There is not, and never has been, such a thing as "racial" literature; there is only national or sectional literature. Skin coloring, hair, or features do not mold either character or thought, which are the products of environment. Otherwise, the Turk, the Armenian, and the Jew, all of the Semitic race, would worship and think alike. It is noteworthy that Disraeli acted like an Englishman, Karl Marx like a German, Trotzky like a Russian, and Rabbi Wise certainly thinks and acts like an American. Yet the Jew has a distinct language and religion, which the American Negro has not, to aid him in remaining differentiated. Dumas, of Negro extraction, wrote as a Frenchman; Pushkin as a Russian. Why expect the American Negro not to write like an American? The sooner the white liberal accepts the Negro for what he is, just a dark-skinned, more exploited American, and not for a simple, primitive, exotic being to be alternately pitied and patronized, the sooner the American color problem will be solved.

Hour of the Lizard

By LESLIE NELSON JENNINGS

Now is the hour when yellow eyes relax
Their watchfulness and lizards bask unseen,
Wearing the color of dust upon their backs,
While a hawk sentinels the dry ravine.
The pulse of noonday pauses on a beat
Of panting somnolence, unroused by one
Poor ghost of shade that fled on burning feet—
Only the sky, the sagebrush, and the sun.

And if the lizard find another use
For this implacable, consuming hour,
Giving, for all his mask of sleep, no truce
To any midge below the cactus flower,
How can we think the desert sand would be Less treacherous, less vigilant than he?

Is Folklore Literature?

Folk-Say: A Regional Miscellany. University of Oklahoma Press. $5.

THE first issue of the regional yearbook "Folk-Say" appeared in 1929. It ran approximately 150 pages, numbered among its contributors Stanley Vestal, J. Frank Dobie, George Milburn, Paul Horgan, and Maurice Kelley, and contained a significant essay on The New Regionalism by its editor, B. A. Botkin. Familiarity with this essay is really a prerequisite to an understanding of what Mr. Botkin hopes to accomplish with "Folk-Say." The 1930 issue represents a definite advance, in every respect, over the previous volume. It contains about 500 pages, is handsomely published, and includes many phases of its subject which were neglected in the first volume. Mr. Botkin again contributes an interesting introduction, in which he raises several important queries but is careful to leave them unanswered.

The volume is divided into seven sections, the contents of which, despite their poetic titles, might be said to correspond roughly with the divisions in any standard text on folklore. The Wind Rides By consists of adaptations from Indian sources by William Haskell Simpson, Ina Sizer Cassidy, and Leonora F. Curtin, together with a few desert poems by Norman Macleod. None of this work is successful. Macleod's verse is highly individual and represents a point of view antithetical to that espoused by Mr. Botkin; hence its inclusion seems rather fortuitous. The adaptations illustrate the difficulties inherent in such an experimental publication, difficulties which involve not only questions of folklore as such, but of ethnology, psychology, and anthropology as well. Most adaptations from Indian sources are unimpressive for the reason that they are so obviously adaptations; the forced effort to adopt the point of view of the Indian is so apparent as to dispel imaginative assent.

Old Timers contains some interesting folk tales, particularly a collection by Ross McLaury. These paragraphic yarns, told in the vernacular, are genuinely of the "folk." They are quite a cut above the stories of George Milburn, which are usually so highly spiced with Sinclair Lewis and Ring Lardner as to be unpalatable. In the same section an "old-timer," Frank Neff, relates a "tall tale" of the "health-bringin', cavortin', purairie winds" of west Texas that is an excellent specimen of the worth of folk material in the hands of an intelligent investigator.

One Foot in the Road heads another collection of folk yarns. A Song of the Pipeline, by Daniel M. Garrison, a report of the racy talk of a few loquacious pipeliners while joining one buckle of pipe, is an authentic piece of work; the identification of the author with his material is not that of the cold and practiced manipulator of folk material, but the easy and effortless rendering born of sympathy and imagination. In Flete, by S. Omar Barker, the basic folk substance is permitted to become rather tenuous in the telling, while H. L. Davis, for some inexplicable reason, struggles manfully to be mystical in a poem about a Threshing Crew Woman with a tattooed navel.

Many Voices represents the work of Christy MacKaye, Ruth Bass, Charles Morrow Wilson, Walter R. Smith, L. S. M. Curtin, Paul Horgan, Frank G. Applegate, and Arvia MacKaye. Of this group, Fern Seed—for Peace, by Ruth Bass, a remarkable yarn of the beliefs of a Negro herb doctor, is one of the notable contributions to the present volume. Any professional folklorist would be grateful for the plant lore woven into this story, yet it is redeemed from the scientific by the very human character of the old Negress. The fifth section of the volume is delivered over bodily to the folklorists, with riddles, folk songs, descriptions of the pioneer dances, and the Oklahoma Literary Society. Wide River contains "blues" by Sterling A. Brown, Waring Cuney, Lewis Alexander, and Langston Hughes, whose Ma Lawd is particularly effective.

In Folk Backgrounds Mr. Botkin drafts the theorists into service and attempts a rationale of the folk and regionalism with important contributions by Mary Austin, Alexander Haggerty Krappe, Barrett H. Clark, and Thomas Hornsby Ferril. Mr. Ferril's Rocky Mountain Metaphysics is a shrewd and penetrating article on the psychological difficulties with which the artist in the West must contend. To these contributors Mr. Botkin had propounded the query: "What (or who) is (or are) the 'folk' in America, and what can it (or they) contribute to American literature and language?" In addition to the considered articles on this question, there are special notes by Percy MacKaye, Louise Pound, Carl Sandburg, J. Frank Dobie, and Philip Stevenson; a large section on Genres and Media, with work by Sterling A. Brown, Alain Locke, and Frank Shay; and two excellent articles, The Speech of the Negro, and Folk Values in Recent Literature on the Negro, by Guy B. Johnson; while as Marginalia Henry Roth presents an interesting, if rather premature, article on Lynn Riggs and the Individual, and Maurice Kelley tracks down a legend in John Rollin Ridge and the Autochthonous in Poetry. There are also bibliographical notes and reviews of recent publications which have a folk or regional interest.

Mr. Botkin in his introductory comment suggests that the problem is not so much to define the "folk" and "folklore" as to determine what they can do for our culture and literature. Viewed from this standpoint, he thinks the matter can be reduced to three issues: (1) Can folk material be converted into literary art without losing its folk interest and value? (2) To what extent can the individual artist lose his self-consciousness in order to merge his individuality with that of the group? (3) What are the legitimate folk and artistic limitations upon the use, in this literature about the folk, of local allusions and traditions, local color, dialect, and the like? What is the proper ratio of character to background, of "pace" to character, and of universal to local elements in both character and background? His introduction ends with the hope that the book will stimulate the discussion of these problems.

It must be admitted that the theoretical discussion of these questions in "Folk-Say" is inadequate. Some of the contributors do attempt definitions of the folk and of folklore, but they are almost uniformly silent on the question of what contributions the use of folk material can make to our culture and literature. Even their definitions are widely divergent; one learns, all in a single breath, that the American "folk" may be the Negro, the Indian, the Plain People, and that there is no such thing as an "American folk" or an "American folklore" and that the very terms are misnomers. The problem is, of course, related to the basic consideration: What is the relation between folklore and literature—is it a question of degree or of kind? Even the professional folklorists give various answers to this question. G. E. Gomme maintains that the folk tale may be lent on occasion to the artist, but that it does not belong to art but to science; that it is artistic in form is an addition to its characteristics but has nothing to do with its fundamental features. The same authority would have us believe that "survivals" in folk material have a purely scientific interest, and that there is, strictly speaking, no "continuity" between modern and primitive culture. Even partisans of the "literary school" insist that folklore is primarily a historical science and that any contribution that the use and study of folk material might make to literature and language would be incidental and collateral to its chief function, which is to fill certain vacuums created by the inadequacy of the purely historical method. One is impressed with the fact that the theoretical discussion of such a problem, from so varied a field of contributors, is apt to prove fruitless. Each views the matter from a special department of knowledge and with reference to a special experience, and each employs a vocabulary in which the terms all of them use are variously defined.

On the other hand, a reading of the folk material collected in the volume warrants certain conclusions that go far toward answering Mr. Botkin's question. It is quite apparent, regardless of how the matter may be theoretically phrased, that the method and attitude fostered by Mr. Botkin do bring forth significant creative work. If the American hinterland is ever to be redeemed from the twin evils of imported culture and cheap standardization, it will probably be by the diligent cultivation of such an attitude.

An American Diplomat

Henry White. Thirty Years of American Diplomacy. By Allan Nevins. Harper and Brothers. $5.

THIS is an excellent biography, though its subtitle may be misleading, as our diplomatic history treated in it is only such history as White himself took part in. Professor Nevins was also ill-advised in making so much of Roosevelt's and Colonel House's exaggerated appraisals of White's importance. He is a bold historian who would take Roosevelt's impetuous appraisal of any man as final, and the Colonel's statement that White was the most accomplished diplomat America has ever produced is simply not so. Except for this unfortunate first page, the book is scholarly from beginning to end, and also readable. Of its 518 pages, the first 335 cover White's career as secretary of our embassy in London and as ambassador to Italy and France. The rest of the volume is concerned with White's service as a member of the Commission to Negotiate Peace after the end of the Great War, and it is this part that is most important and of most interest at present. The series of letters which passed between White and Senator Lodge, from which long quotations are given, are of special value. The author also sheds considerable light, or perhaps one should say casts considerable shadow on Colonel House, and explains the origin of the break between him and Wilson. Professor Nevins had access to all the White papers and other manuscript material, and has made a genuine contribution to history for the scholar as well as an entertaining book for the general reader. It is the best book he has yet written. It is thoroughly impartial, although sympathetic. As we follow White through his entire career, he grows into much more of a man than he has been popularly considered. On the other hand, even after Nevins has done his best for him, it is a little hard to see how at London, Rome, or Paris he should be considered the ablest diplomat in our history, though he was undoubtedly an able and serviceable one. The only valid criticism against the author might be—and it is made because more and more is coming to be expected of him—that he does not make his subject live for us in one of the aspects most stressed, as "the most lovable of men." Undoubtedly White was lovable—so many different people are so quoted by Nevins. But in a perfect biography White would have been so built up in the pages as to appear directly and irresistibly lovable to us. Perhaps this is hypercriticism of a book which in almost all respects deserves such hearty praise.

Wordsworth's Great Decade

Wordsworth. The Clark Lectures, 1929-1930. By Herbert Read. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $3.

Wordsworth. By C. H. Herford. The Republic of Letters. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.

THE reputation of Wordsworth, which seemed at one time to have reached its peak in Wordsworth's own century, seems now to be climbing toward another peak—one much higher, and certainly more exciting. The man who could be worshiped then as a poet and prophet has come to be admired merely as a poet. The artist with a valuable message stands before us now quite naked as an artist, and his value is seen to consist in his art.

As evidence of this I take not merely the fact that both Mr. Read and Professor Herford—the first a distinguished poet and critic and the second a distinguished literary historian—assign a high rank to Wordsworth, Mr. Read placing him in at least one respect just after Shakespeare and Professor Herford declining to deny him the position often given him this side of Milton. I take rather the fact that both authors catch fire with the wish to explain his marvelous excellence during the ten years when he was excellent at all. For Wordsworth, although he lived from 1770 to 1850, wrote practically all of his important poetry between 1797 and 1807. Before that decade he was not kindled; after it he was cold. It is a nice problem, explaining such a phenomenon. But what impresses me is the excitement generated in any imaginative person who studies the documents involved. Here is a great story to be told about a great man.

H. W. Garrod, who made Wordsworth the subject of his brilliant lectures as Professor of Poetry at Oxford in 1919, had a very simple explanation for the phenomenon in question—the influence of Coleridge. Mr. Read, while recognizing that influence, rejects it as an explanation, preferring to say of Wordsworth that he was a man of tremendous emotions who repressed those emotions throughout all of his years except the famous ten. Mr. Read stresses the significance of Wordsworth's revolutionary period and of his natural daughter, whose birth falls within that period. Not that he wrote his great poetry then. He wrote it, says Mr. Read, in the attempt a little later to conquer the memory of a too violent experience. The conquest was difficult and absorbed the whole—including the intellectual—man. Hence the great poetry, since the whole man happened to be a great poet. But the battle was soon over, and afterwards we have only the imitation of the whole man by a relatively insignificant part of him.

Mr. Read's explanation, incomplete as it probably is, interests me more than Professor Herford's does. Professor Herford, true to his profession, is eclectic and sane. He canvasses all the theories and maintains a wholesome skepticism toward them all. His attempt is to be comprehensive about Wordsworth, and his success is considerable. But I prefer the somewhat fanatical narrowness of Mr. Read, who may be wrong about Wordsworth but who cannot help hinting behind every word he speaks that Wordsworth is one of the most interesting poets—and persons—who ever lived. In addition to this Mr. Read has rendered the best account so far, it seems to me, of Wordsworth's "philosophy." The disciples of 1840 overrated it. Matthew Arnold underrated it. Mr. Read quite plausibly places it where it belongs, at the dead center of Wordsworth's emotional career. It was "felt thought," says Mr. Read, and I can imagine no better phrase for it.

Concerning the Negro

Negro. National Asset or Liability? By John Louis Hill. Literary Associates, Inc. $2.

The Negro Wage Earner. By Lorenzo J. Greene and Carter G. Woodson. Washington: The Association for the Study of Negro Life and History. $3.25.

The Black Worker. By Sterling E. Spero and Abram L. Harris. Columbia University Press. $4.50.

THESE three books represent three different stages in the discussion of the Negro problem in the United States, of which the last is by far the most significant. The first book is an emotional tract, well-meaning, full of trite platitudes, but quite suited to the comprehension of the average American. The second is an encyclopedia of Negro occupations, especially between the years 1890 and 1920. It is crammed with figures but is naturally difficult to read. The third is one of the first attempts in the economic field to make a synthesis of the labor movement and the Negro problem so as to interpret each in the light of the other and show them to be one question of American economics.

John Louis Hill is a Southern white man who has written a number of books on racial contacts, and perhaps the personal equation as revealed in this book is its most interesting contribution. He says that his attitude toward Negroes has experienced three separate and distinct steps: first, as a born Southerner he endured Negroes and regarded them as useful "in their place"; then, moving North, he became very sympathetic toward the Negro; he wanted to help him. Finally, however, he passed beyond that point and sought to regard Negroes solely as men and women, no better or worse "than men and women of other races limited by the same opportunities and laboring under the same handicaps." His book is not intrinsically important or new, but it does tell a straight story of racial attitudes with a clear belief in the common humanity of Americans and the possibility of the Negro being fully received into American citizenship. The average reader will probably get more out of this book than out of either of the other two.

The "Negro Wage Earner" is the first product of a three-year survey of social and economic conditions of the Negroes in the United States made by the Association for Negro Life and History, and its purpose is to show the various occupations in which Negroes have been employed, with the increase or decrease of their numbers in each. It suffers, as such works are likely to, from the very exactitude of its detail and from the fact that the editors have not helped the ordinary reader quite enough in selecting and emphasizing the significant facts. Its importance, however, rests upon its wide use of original sources and its careful references, and there are summaries here and there that are significant. The final summary on page 345 is worth quoting:

> First, is the tendency of the Negroes to constitute a greater percentage of all persons gainfully occupied than of the total population; secondly, the tendency to maintain since 1890 a higher proportion of persons gainfully employed within their group than any other large element of the population; thirdly, the participation relatively of a greater number of Negro females in occupations than the females of any other group in the population. Interwoven, however, throughout all these tendencies, yet affecting and overshadowing them all, is a more significant movement —a tremendous, irresistible, though irregular march away from employment in agricultural pursuits and domestic and personal service toward manufacturing and mechanical pursuits and trade and transportation. It was this later tendency, attaining its highest point between 1914 and 1920, which decidedly changed the aspect of Negroes in occupations, wrought a greater equilibration in their employments, stamped them as efficient industrial workers, caused the transplanting of over a million Negroes to the North, and thus greatly altered the entire social structure of a large part of the Negro population.

The significance of Spero and Harris's book lies in the fact that it abandons the conventional attempt to study the Negro in vacuo just as though the black population of America were entirely segregated from its surroundings or at least could be so regarded for purposes of study. Spero and Harris are studying the Negro as part of the modern labor movement and studying the labor movement as it is exemplified and affected by the freed American slave.

There is a short study of the relation of black and white workers during the slave regime. Then the rise of trade unionism is followed: half-hearted attempts to include the freed Negro in this movement resulted in the building up of white craft unionism, largely excluding Negro workers, and the development of a colored group-consciousness which tried to advance without reference to the great cleft between employer and employee as exemplified in the white world.

The World War marked a turning-point in this development. The Negro took the place of the white immigrant as the great labor reserve. He was brought into industry. Before this he had been a miner; now he became a steel worker, a worker in the stockyards, a worker on the railroads. And yet he remained very largely excluded from the main labor-union movement.

What is the future development of the labor movement in the United States, particularly among Negro laborers? There are two proposals: one is the ideal of an independent black economy within the confines of the white. This ideal is a living force, and yet how can it survive as long as the white world controls credit and basic industry and is the dominant force in the state? It will have to be the gift of white philanthropy, and, as such, at the mercy of white philanthropy. On the other hand:

> A labor movement built upon the principle of working-class unity would of course take the Negro into its ranks and fight to raise the general standard. Self-protection alone should dictate such a course. But the white worker, sharing the prejudices of the rest of the white world, balks at the bugaboo of "social equality" and persists in relegating the black laborer to a place of permanent inferiority.

> But side by side with all these forces are tendencies in other directions which in time may destroy their potency. Most important is the machine, which is rapidly changing the meaning of skill and obliterating old craft lines. The machine, rather than any concept of working-class unity or industrial brotherhood, will compel the official labor movement to change its structure and policy if it is not to degenerate into a mere social relic. Ultimately, this will probably redound to the Negro's benefit, but during transitional stages technical changes which reduce the personnel will hurt him along with other workers.

The book is, on the whole, the most thought-awakening of recent publications on the Negro and points to interests and new developments along the color line. Especially does it pave the way for a new consideration of the Negro, not as a group apart, but as a group of millions affecting the economic and social development of America and affecting it to such an extent that no complete picture of America can be made without considering it. W. E. B. Du Bois

Narrative Poetry

The Serpent in the Cloud. By Theodore Morrison. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

Of the comparatively few poems that Mr. Morrison has published in the magazines in the last six or seven years it could be said that they were excellent in the way that he presumably wanted them to be excellent. "The Serpent in the Cloud" is a different matter. Quite unpredictably he has written a long narrative poem involving the realistic treatment of a dilemma of the scientific age. On its weaker side, the poem is, as Mr. Morrison's other work has never been, awkward and almost amateurish; but on its stronger side it has virtues previously unsuspected and a distinction hardly to have been anticipated.

The general structure of the story is to be counted as a major source of its strength. In telling this story of Bruce Herrick, of his love for Rose Leighton, of his fear lest a strain of insanity in his family forbid their marriage, of her device for banishing his fear, and of the effect of that device, Morrison has built his narrative solidly, presenting his characters clearly, selecting and ordering his incidents with the hand of a craftsman, and achieving a climax that avoids both melodrama and platitudinous philosophy. Though at times he shifts his point of view without the justification that the practiced novelist might demand, and though occasionally he introduces passages that serve only a decorative purpose, he on the whole conducts his narrative with a sureness and economy of method that, judging the poem as one would judge a piece of prose fiction, one finds altogether admirable.

All this is important because many narrative poems fail so completely as narratives that such poetic virtues as they may have seem almost irrelevant. But sound narrative is obviously not enough, and certainly it is not all that one finds in Morrison's poem. Two qualities are worth special notice. In the first place, many passages reach through simplicity and dignity a certain kind of fineness. And in the second place, there are a few passages, such as the following, whose original figures of speech suggest a rich poetic endowment:

> Bruce halted, and suddenly his voice began
> To speak as one who has been hypnotized.
> She strained to catch these modeled forms of air
> Launched from his teeth like ships to bear their freight
> Across the unseen vibratory waves
> To her mind's port. Strange that the ether could
> So bend to the sculpture of his lips, and carry
> The shape of the heart's fear and passion!

But certainly it cannot be said that the whole poem is on so successful a level, nor even that there is any one level on which all of it moves. Edwin Arlington Robinson—of whose work "The Serpent in the Cloud" contains, all things considered, surprisingly few echoes—moves from the less to the more emotional moments without, in any of his better poems, losing the essential unity of tone. Robinson Jeffers, less skilful at transitions, often achieves a kind of unity by forcing the tone of every portion of a poem up to the level of the most intense episode. Morrison's poem abruptly rises and abruptly falls, now stumbling under the burden of a flat and unconnotative vocabulary, now moving smoothly and gracefully; now lurching through awkward circumlocutions, now soaring with power and exaltation.

The poem also suffers from the kind of reticence that presumably lay behind the gentleness of Mr. Morrison's earlier work. The theme demands that the love between the hero and the heroine be considerably more human than the passion that might be suitably commemorated in a delicate sonnet. The passage about the lord of life is rather fine in itself, but unfortunately it is also, in view of the nature of the poem, a seriously detrimental evasion. If "The Serpent in the Cloud" indicates, as I hope it does, the path Mr. Morrison is to take, he not only has technical problems to solve, but also certain problems involving more personal elements in the relation between the poet and his materials. That he should solve these problems now, for perhaps the first time, seems important.

Books in Brief

The White Paternoster and Other Stories. By T. F. Powys. The Viking Press. $2.50.

Mr. T. F. Powys is one of the most thoroughly delightful writers alive. This book is perhaps not so bland as "Kindness in a Corner" or so penetrating as "Mr. Weston's Good Wine." But, like them, it tastes of the earth, it is filled with the innocence of man, with his follies, with his almost unbearable goodness and equally unbearable brutishness. And as in the other books, here is a small corner of England illuminated with the utmost skill, the terrain and the speech made familiar to us, the taste of the food brought to our mouths, the bouquet of the wine, the smell of the beer sharp and fresh. Nothing is shocking to Mr. Powys, nothing is so lovely as to be strange. Except for an occasional too obvious use of the supernatural, here is a book that is completely what it tries to be. There could hardly be higher praise.

Mackerel Sky. By Helen Ashton. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.

"Mackerel Sky" is not so unusual or important a novel as was "Dr. Serocold," by the same author. But the same clean-cut virtues are there. The characters stand out clearly, economically but surely etched against the background; the dialogue is accurate and shows deftness in selection; the problem is intelligently chosen and intelligently carried through. There is good craftsmanship and good sense in this study of the married life of two modern young people passing through quite recognizable difficulties, and there is something more. The magic of story-telling does creep in, though one would be at a loss to discover how and where.

Wide Open Town. By Myron Brinig. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

This is the second novel by a brilliant young American writer who will bear watching for the freshness and resourcefulness of his style and the richness of his insight into his chosen characters. "Singermann" was an unusual first novel. Its successor, the present volume, is perhaps the best novel yet written of a wide-open Rocky Mountain mining city before the war. Mr. Brinig brings a fresh approach, an approach which does not avoid or rationalize the lurid, the melodramatic, the cheaply emotional, but which, on the other hand, never loses sight of the relative importance in place and time and human destiny of the little melodrama which he is bringing to us. He lets us sense the paradoxical fact that the people in this Montana town are at the same time both unimportant and tremendously important.

East of the Hudson. By J. Brooks Atkinson. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

The dramatic critic of the New York Times has here collected a group of extraordinarily diverse little essays which lead us from old Park Row, through curious streets, to Greenwich Village, Times Square, to city parks, and from there out into the wilds of Long Island and Westchester. Mr. Atkinson's piece on the theater called Buffoons, treating of Lillie, Cook, Wynn, and the Marxes, is highly polished, but seems labored—not so good as the pieces one may read every day in the Times. He has written better on the New York Chinese and Yiddish theaters. For while he views these last more or less serious efforts with amusement and writes of them entertainingly if a bit superciliously, he approaches his Broadway clowns with a portentous seriousness that leaves them less amusing than we had always thought them. The nature studies are pleasant, some of them delightful. Mr. Atkinson is probably, though he denies it, an excellent amateur ornithologist. His best pieces in this volume are about birds—birds that visit the city and birds he has happened upon within a radius of fifty miles of it. But Mr. Atkinson cannot fool anybody. He is no country man. An old hermit who "looked as though he had not bathed for a year" makes our fastidious urban essayist shudder.

The International Mandates. By Aaron M. Margalith. The Johns Hopkins Press. $2.50.

Dr. Margalith's book, the first part of a projected larger work, is not properly to be compared with the elaborate study of the mandate system lately published by Professor Quincy Wright, since it is limited in the main to an inquiry into the nature of a mandate and an examination of certain legal and administrative questions which the mandate system involves. The author reviews the historical background of the system and the making of Article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations, describes some of the factors in mandate administration, and discusses the terms of the mandates and their interpretation of the three classes of mandated territory. Two chapters are devoted to the question of sovereignty and other legal issues. Dr. Margalith concludes that while the system is a delicate one to manage, it would be improved in practice if the powers of the Permanent Mandates Commission were enlarged, particularly so as to allow it to hear petitioners or visit a mandated territory, and that a determination of the seat of sovereignty is of primary importance. He sees no prospective "change, loss, transfer, or annexation of any territory in any category" in any near future save where a mandated area may reach the stage of development which would secure for it admission to the League.

After the O'Keeffe Show

HOW much time must still elapse before the achievement of the Stieglitz group of painters and photographers is generally appreciated? It has been before us in its stark originality for many years, and show after show and season after season have magnified its importance. One would have thought it plain to the point of obviousness at the O'Keeffe exhibition which has just closed: it remains wonderful that there at last America did not recognize that under its star-pointing nose an advance in the plastic arts second to none in the contemporary world had been effected by the members of this solid New York group.

The majestic paintings lustrous upon the walls of An American Place all February added another link to a chain of pure manipulations of the artistic media and approaches to art completely objectified. Not that Georgia O'Keeffe has ever been anything but an out-and-out colorist; or that her peculiarly intense sense of life has ever taken form as anything but a subtle dialectic of hue, shape, and texture: plastic antitheses generating syntheses: an original dialectic emotionally created, not intellectually invented. From the beginning of her meteoric career this extraordinary girl has been giving us paintings elevated in their immediate, daring, and harmonious relations of the elements of the spectrum to each other and to pure white; their fresh, breath-taking, positive juxtapositions of complexly varied chords and tones. Few of her fellows have achieved such lyrical combinations of extreme opposites; few have raced the gamut of a single color from intensest cold to intensest heat with equal rapidity and in areas as small as hers. The oppositions have invariably been subtle, implied rather than bold. Instead of obvious counterpoints, of complementary hues and hot and cold tones, her canvases have exhibited oppositions of warm triads of tones, or of cool ones. Oblique, tart harmonies and juxtapositions of proximate tones and shades of the same color are frequent. These close harmonies are none the less rugged. Nor have O'Keeffe's rapid scales made sacrifice of subtlety. Her most exquisite gradations have been distinct and pure; and even her tiniest forms have the rotundity obtained by other painters only in larger volumes.

The antitheses of textures and of lines and shapes match the coloristic ones in mixed boldness and subtlety. Heavily varnished passages nimbly complement blotting-paper-like segments, and severe, harsh shapes and lines strangely sensitive and flowery ones. What, however, even before the recent show, was always most striking in this painting was the decisiveness, the rapid and unfaltering precision. O'Keeffe's color actually had an edge like a line's, a nicety like that of fine machine-cut products: no painting seemed purer. Hence the spaciousness of even the smaller of O'Keeffe's canvases, the intense volumes taking on a value, a dynamism, disproportionate to their actual dimensions.

Nevertheless, the recent show revealed a new level of achievement. An emotionally kindled technique has reached a kind of perfection at the hands of matured ability. The marvelous antitheses and interfusions of color, of the sensual and the spiritual, the almost material and the quick in shape and line and rhythm, are if anything more definite in these new paintings: the rhythms if anything more majestic and broad. But a new detachment has evidently permitted the painter to control her medium and conceive her paintings more completely than ever before in terms of the plastic problem. (It is significant that O'Keeffe's latest successes are chiefly mountain landscapes, great concepts of the impenetrable, the abiding, the impersonal.)

There is absolutely no "imitation" of nature in these singularly calm, simple, spacious Southwestern pictures, works of a veritable modern Fra Angelico or Suor Angelica. Strictly conceived as decorations, as possible spots upon a possible wall, they are actually nothing save manipulations and combinations of materials: rough-grained canvases and pigment plus emotion. The colored segments and planes appear mere strips of silken or woolly stuff laid and folded upon each other. Indeed, one can say that in these later reserved and glowing canvases of the painter the medium exists in its own right and for its own sake, as something dense, vibrant, delicious—a statement not at all incongruous with the fact that a large, serene, tragic, and enthusiastic feeling of life pervades the canvases. And while the far more intellectual inventions of Picasso and Matisse may seem to exceed O'Keeffe's work in power and complexity, this is certain: no contemporary handles oil paint more absolutely than she; or communicates therewith a feeling of life more ardent and more deep.

Again, it is incredible that this achievement of hers should have failed to illuminate once and for all the achievement of the illustrious group of which she is a member. In purifying and liberating the medium of color to the degree which we have seen, what has she done save accentuate the similar purification and liberation of their mediums effected by Stieglitz and Marin and Dove, under the leadership of Stieglitz himself? In making demands upon their artistic media never made before, all these people, indeed, have developed and broadened them, and shown their capacities beyond the dreams of the past. They are a group of explorers, inventors, originals, finders. The photographic process in the hands of Stieglitz had become a complete aesthetic medium, as able to express an inner world in a series of relationships as stone, tone, words, or any other means seized upon by man in his moments of lyricism. Marin has given absolute water color a body it has not had since the days of the great Chinese; and his wonderfully complete forms have a complexity and a romantic American spirit foreign to theirs. Dove likewise has conquered new territory, new effects for color, with his metallic and none the less surprisingly warm painting.

These are probably a group of universal people, automatically directed to black and white, water color, and pigment as means for the formal expression of their broad, intricate comprehension of creation: their expansion and refinement of their media flowing from the necessity they labor under.

Their feelings are extremely complex, involving extremely complex matters. The world they focus from their centers is fuller, swifter, a more dizzy relativity, than any that has previously existed; and the swiftness of process, the rapid scales and supersubtle gradations, the close and complex antitheses which characterize all their work, the small, powerful volumes, the high tempo and dizzy equilibrations are but the result of their need of finding equivalents for a whirling, abyssal reality in the limits of small spaces.

Consanguineous, they have done their work together. And their works stand together as one of the great unifications of life that have come out of America, one of the deeds of the modern world that have brought satisfaction to man's metaphysical mind.

SOCIAL FORCES IN SOCIAL WORK

The trained social worker regards the individual, family and community he serves as centers of convergence of racial, religious, economic and other social forces which hark back to the past and must be utilized to fashion the future. This view is especially important if the worker's field lies in such a highly distinctive group as the Jews.

If the Metropolitan Should Go Musical

AFTER the events of the past few weeks, to point out the faults of the Metropolitan Opera management is like shooting at a barn door. The trouble is that the Metropolitan is so wide a target that no one bothers to shoot at it any more. Its singers and its conductors call forth individual critical condemnation—often for lacks that are inherent in them and that they can in no way remedy. But the sins of the Metropolitan are not at all inherent or inevitable—other opera houses avoid many or all of them. They are to be attributed to timid, tasteless, and inept management: timid and inept in the choice of works and often of artists; tasteless and inept in the production of the works chosen.

It does not take second sight, for example, to see that Alban Berg's "Wozzeck," for which several hundred New Yorkers had to journey to Philadelphia the other night, cannot be kept off the Metropolitan stage forever, even though, like "Pelléas" before it, it may be long delayed. It has been playing successfully in Berlin for seven years or so. It has been repeatedly proclaimed a milestone in operatic and musical history by everyone who has heard it. One needs hardly more than a glance at its vivid libretto to suspect the power of the work; hardly more than a glimpse of its bewildering piano score to realize that, whatever else may be said of it, it is a work strikingly different from any that one knows; hardly any imagination to guess at what possibilities it offers for striking visual effects. To tell the truth, one can know very little more than these things about it before one has witnessed a performance; but even that opportunity has been waiting for anyone from Broadway and Fortieth Street who cared to visit Unter den Linden or any of a dozen other German opera houses. Nor, if in those houses it had a fraction of the power it had in the excellent Philadelphia performance, could even an opera scout easily have remained unstirred.

After that performance one wondered who at the Metropolitan, with all its galaxies, could have taken part in it. Mr. Stokowski—of whom I am not ordinarily an admirer—need not fear that the authority and imagination he brought to it will soon be equaled. Miss Ann Roselle will never feel uncomfortable listening to a Metropolitan Marie. Nor need Messrs. Ivantzoff, Radamsky, and the rest fear the competition of a cast of their more expensive colleagues.

The Metropolitan neither considers itself nor apparently wishes to be considered primarily a musical institution. The accounts of the première of "Peter Ibbetson" looked like stories of the Beaux-Arts ball. Mr. Downes's comment on the music was lost under columns of type about the brilliance of the audience. "Vast Audience Deeply Moved and Some Weep" was one of the headlines for which the Times reserved page 1, column 1. Nobody seemed to care whether it was a good opera or not except Mr. Walter Damrosch. He, being himself the composer of a similarly American opera, "Cyrano de Bergerac," took indignant exception to Mr. Lawrence Gilman's very mild statement that while "Peter Ibbetson" was neither unpleasant nor unskilful it was not quite a good or an important opera. Never having seen "Peter Ibbetson" as a play I do not know whether in that form it is as silly as in the current version. The latter contains some amiable and well-written music, and as an opera written in America was perhaps entitled to the very good performance it received.

But to produce "The Fair of Sorotchintzy," of which only portions are by Moussorgsky, when "Khovantchina," a work of much greater importance and musical value, and one completed—except for the orchestration—by the composer himself, was available, was one of the Metropolitan's characteristic missteps. The Philadelphia company gave "Khovantchina" its America première a season or two ago, but in New York it remained for a company assembled for the occasion to show us how bad a choice the "Fair" had been. For "Khovantchina," as this Russkaya Opera Company gave it, with an inadequate orchestra and an uneven cast, is a moving work despite its dramatic incoherence; while the "Fair" leaves the impression of a potpourri of familiar Moussorgsky tunes.

If the Metropolitan should ever go musical—which, in view of the box-office success it enjoys under its present management, is an extremely unlikely event—it could learn much from less opulent institutions: young ones like the Philadelphia, old and poor ones like the Comique, vigorous and bold ones like a dozen in Germany and Austria. It could learn by going no farther than Fifty-fifth Street, where a German Grand Opera Company has been giving very creditable performances, that Melchior is not the only acceptable Wagnerian tenor, nor Bodanzky the only conductor. It could learn that Weber, Gluck, and Handel were of more than historical importance; that before "Luisa Miller" there was "Orfeo"; that Fauré's "Pénélope" and Massenet's "Jongleur" are better works than Mascagni's "Iris," and "Dido and Aeneas" than "Romeo and Juliet"; that Mozart wrote more than one opera, and that at least five of them are good shows; that Ravel's "L'Enfant et les Sortilèges" would be a better curtain-raiser than Lattuada's "Preziose Ridicole"; that there are contemporary operas outside Italy, like Vaughan Williams's "Hugh the Drover," Roussel's "Padmavati," Pfitzner's "Palestrina," each as well worth trying as the "Sunken Bell."

It would learn that good music is better than bad, and simple and imaginative settings better than lavish and dull ones; that the aesthetic significance of an operatic performance is not necessarily in direct proportion to its box-office value; that some opera houses even sacrifice the latter on occasion; that applause is an art practiced better by amateurs than by professionals; that in some cities singers get along without applause for a whole act at a time; that an opera can be a success without curtain calls; that opera patrons can be made to arrive on time, and late-comers excluded until intermissions; and that comparatively little is added to the effectiveness of the first act of "Pelléas" by the punctuation of falling seats.

The Limits of Suspense

THE lean season of Lent came almost to its end last week, our starvation diet consisting merely of one play, and that a mystery melodrama. We were ushered toward Easter, in other words, by a piece about a murder. The incongruity of this will appear somewhat less glaring when it is said that "The Silent Witness" (Morosco Theater) tells the story of a father who chooses to be tried for a murder which his son has presumably committed. There is thus a sacrifice, or an attempt at one—the conclusion of the play being something which I shall not disclose. That is the code where mystery melodramas are concerned, and it is a good code.

For the only thing to be gained from this sort of play is a knowledge of how it ends. The whole effort of the author is to arouse and sustain our suspense. In the present case a pair of authors, Jack de Leon and Jack Celestin, turn the trick with unusual skill. Not only have they invented a novel situation, the situation of a man being tried for a murder which the audience knows he did not commit; they have written their lines with intelligence and intensity, and they have dispensed with much of the machinery that slows up the average thriller. The average thriller is too cumbersome to be thrilling, whereas "The Silent Witness" moves with all the neatness of a knife. There is the advantage also that Lionel Atwill as the father does a very fine piece of acting; so does Anthony Kemble-Cooper as his son, and so does Kay Strozzi as the bad woman who gets strangled.

But the limits of suspense as a device for capturing our attention are the more apparent the more successful a melodrama is. It is as if the play were whispering to us between the lines: "Wait! Wait! Something is coming that will be worth your while." The only trouble is that when it does come we gulp and swallow air. The discovery we make in the last few minutes is after all nothing but a discovery. Little in the earlier passages of the drama has served any other purpose than that of leading us up to this. Well, here we are; and our hands, not to speak of our minds, seem strangely empty. We have held our breath for two hours; now that we can breathe again, we simply go on breathing as if nothing had happened. And quite literally nothing has. I like mystery plays, but I must confess that I always leave them with a touch of that deep disappointment which comes in this imperfect world from one's having got exactly what one wanted.

I happened the same week to go again to see "Once in a Lifetime," and I must seize the occasion to say that I think it much the best play in New York this year. I have heard that it is not even being considered for the Pulitzer Prize—probably because the committee which decides such things feels that it is "merely funny." It is so perfect a piece of comedy, however, that I wish the committee could lose its seriousness for at least a season. And for that matter the play is deserving of the most serious consideration. There is genius in it of an extraordinarily opulent sort; the invention is great, and the dialogue, while free and full, is managed with a vicious economy. Furthermore, "Once in a Lifetime" is much more than a satire on Hollywood, since it leaves us delighted that such a thing as Hollywood exists. Like the best tragedy, the best comedy convinces us that the human race is glorious. Glorious in its folly, to be sure. But, then, the tragic hero is in some aspects a fool. And what is folly? We can never be sure about that. Yet a comedy like "Once in a Lifetime" leaves us in no doubt about the glory.

Gandhi Counsels His Followers

WE print here the text of a speech delivered at New Delhi on February 20 by Mahatma Gandhi while his conversations with Lord Irwin were still in progress. The Bombay Free Press Journal, from which the address is reprinted, reports that more than 100,000 people heard Mr. Gandhi make his forceful restatement of devotion to the principle of non-violence. His principle and his leadership have since been overwhelmingly upheld by the Congress Party in convention at Karachi.

I know you are all anxious to hear something from me of the talks I am having with the Viceroy. I am afraid I may not take the public into confidence about what has happened between His Excellency and me . . . but I may say this much—that these talks have been conducted in a most friendly manner and with much sweetness. What will be the result I cannot say. The result is in the hands of God. It is His Will that will prevail. Your duty is that you must continue to do what India expects of you.

Dr. Ansari, belonging as he does to Delhi, has naturally spoken highly of the part played by Delhi, but I am witness to the great sacrifices that have been made throughout India. . . . Here, as elsewhere, the part played by women is indescribable. When the history of this movement comes to be written, the sacrifices made by the women of India will occupy the foremost place, and just as with women, so also with children. Their wonderful awakening has fortified me in my faith that God is with us in this struggle. These young folk had never been organized for such work, had never been trained for it. How they came to achieve all this, I have not been able to divine, nor has anyone else whom I have consulted been able to enlighten me as to who guided them. Only God could have done so, but remember in the second battle that whatever sacrifices you have made are trifling. Let them not puff you up with pride. What we want for India is purna swaraj, and who can calculate what further sacrifices India will have to make to achieve that goal! I assure you that I am doing as much as is humanly possible to bring about peace, so that people may not have to go through further suffering and sacrifices, but everything is in God's hands, and if it be not His Will that any understanding be arrived at, then I will have to tell the people that they must be ready for much further suffering. The sacrifices that we have made are as nothing beside the sacrifices other nations have made for the sake of freedom. But there is a reason why we have not had to suffer as much as other nations. It is as clear to me as daylight.

The reason is that when we pledged ourselves to achieve purna swaraj, we also took the vow that whatever we did in attainment of the goal would be in consonance with truth and non-violence, and when I think of the part played by the whole of India, especially by the rural population, I think we have substantially fulfilled the pledge of truth and non-violence. But I cannot deceive myself, nor will I permit you to deceive yourselves. We have followed truth and non-violence, but we have not made them an article of faith. They have been to some a matter of policy, but even if you have accepted it only as a policy, you may not act or think in terms of violence. So long as you adhere to the policy, the very thought of untruth or violence is a breach of pledge. . . . I may tolerate the allegation that Indians are not fit for swaraj, but I could not for a moment tolerate the allegation, if it were true [sic], that my countrymen were untrue or dishonest. I cannot think of a greater tragedy than that those who believed in God were ungodly and guilty of breach of faith. Such people are not fit for freedom; they are fit for slavery and worse. For this reason I have always laid the greatest stress on the point that it was open to you to abandon the policy and adopt a different one, but so long as you pin your faith to truth and non-violence, do not deceive yourselves or the world. Therefore, when I heard that there had been some excesses on the part of our people in the picketing of foreign cloth, I was deeply pained. I have not been able to investigate the allegations, but you know that in 1921-22 I expiated for the excesses by suspending the movement. That sort of expiation is today out of the question. But I must say that wherever these excesses are going on they must stop.

It is better that dealers in foreign cloth should continue to sell it and those addicted to drink continue to drink than that we should resort to excesses in picketing. But there is another danger I wish to warn you against. If we take to these excesses, we shall be opening the door for self-destruction when we have swaraj, for there will then be no third power with machine-guns to intervene and restore peace. We shall be fighting one another and fratricidal war will spell destruction. If, therefore, you have the slightest apprehension in your mind that picketing cannot be done without resorting to excesses, you had better be done with it.

I want you to remember that I am an expert in these matters. I am sure we have in the past done considerable picketing without the slightest resort to violence. Do not be afraid that the moment we eschew the excesses our work will fall through. I would ask you not to worry. Rest assured that the man who is asking you today to keep to your moorings must have some alternative to suggest, but I shall not dwell on it today. I have received letters of complaint and I am making inquiries. It is possible that we have committed mistakes. I will ask all Congress workers to consider these carefully, and correct whatever mistakes we may have been guilty of. I appeal to you to eschew all excesses. You may like to know what I mean by excesses. I invite the curious to come to me for the explanation.

And now a word to the foreign-cloth dealers. Do not deceive yourselves or the country by thinking that you have done your duty by refraining from selling foreign cloth for a few months. This foreign-cloth trade must stop forever, because it is only by this means that we can promote the well-being of millions of our countrymen. I will respectfully submit to foreign-cloth dealers that complete boycott of foreign cloth is their dharma [religious duty]. Sacrifices they will have to make, but what are those sacrifices compared to the great sacrifices that are being made by other sections of the public?

Citizens of Delhi, I do not flatter myself that you have gathered here in your thousands to do honor to me. You have come to proclaim to the world that you are all determined to achieve purna swaraj. Let not my talks with the Viceroy worry you for a moment. Do not think of them, but go on with your work. Only remember that the result is not in my hands, not in the hands of Dr. Ansari or Pandit Malaviya, but in your hands. I am but an instrument and I am acting only as your humble ambassador. Everything will depend upon what you do and what you will fail to do. May God give you strength to keep the pledge of truth and non-violence.

RUMORS AFLOAT in New York and Washington say that a campaign to cut wages generally throughout the country has been organized by a powerful but unidentified group of banks. Perhaps the depression and the unusually large surplus of labor available have made such a drive inevitable. Under our imperfect system supply and demand govern the price of labor as they do that of other commodities. In times of depression there is always present a tendency on the part of the owners of industry to slash pay rolls as the first move toward reducing costs, and contributing in no small measure to this tendency is the pressure exerted by the increasing supply of unemployed labor. Both of these influences are at work today, and although they may not yet have brought about a general wage cut, it appears likely that such a reduction may take place on a wide scale should the depression continue much longer; but it is a question whether financiers or owners of industry would be wise in initiating an organized wage-reduction campaign. A campaign of this character would have its greatest effect in those industries where labor is weakest. But if labor costs in any industry comprise a relatively small part of the total costs of production, the reduction of costs and consequent stimulation of sales in such a case will be relatively small. In industries where labor is organized and enjoys high wages, on the other hand, the campaign will have much less chance of succeeding.

HENCE THE HOPE of restoring prosperity by resorting to an indiscriminate drive for wage reduction is vain. This is not to say that labor's earnings have not already been greatly reduced. Mr. Hoover is only playing with words when he declares that the principal industries have supported him in his request that wage scales be maintained. Wage scales have to a certain extent been maintained, but this does not mean, as Mr. Hoover seems to suggest, that labor's income has at the same time been maintained. In fact, it has fallen off sharply in the last year through part-time employment. The Standard Statistics Company estimates the decrease in 1930 at $8,853,000,000 as compared with 1929. Replies from mayors and other municipal officials to The Nation's recent questionnaire show that in almost every city part-time employment has resulted in decreased labor income, and hence in decreased purchasing power. It is altogether doubtful that industry will be helped by piling on top of this already drastic reduction in labor's earnings another considerable reduction in the shape of indiscriminate wage cuts. The consequent reduction in production costs may stimulate industrial activity, but industry will at the same time have to contend with an equally large cut in consuming power. The return to prosperity for business depends then to a large degree upon the question of whether the benefits of the former outweigh the evils of the latter. In any event it would behoove the President to devote more attention to this problem, and stop boasting about the maintenance of wage scales.

SECRETARY STIMSON'S selection of William R. Castle, Jr., to succeed Joseph P. Cotton as Undersecretary of State may presage a return to a more conservative administration of our foreign affairs. It is true that Mr. Castle has many important qualities that are always valuable to the diplomatic service. He is a "career man," a man with years of actual experience behind him, and he is perhaps better acquainted with the technical side of foreign-office management than any other person in the State Department. Furthermore, he is extremely capable, intelligent, and shrewd; it has been said of him that he is the cleverest diplomat in the service, and he has upon several occasions in the past proved himself more than a match for the most able of European diplomatists stationed in Washington. On the other side of the picture we find that Mr. Castle has invariably lined up with the most conservative element in the foreign service. He lacks the enlightened liberal approach that distinguished his predecessor; his training and his personal associations have inclined him toward strict observance of conventional procedure; he is likely to be found following precedent rather than venturing upon unbeaten paths of diplomacy, as Mr. Cotton was not afraid to do.

WHETHER THE DECISION of the Federal Power Commission in the Appalachian Electric Power Company case is good law will probably not be known until the courts have passed on the question; but it seems to be good sense. At the request of the President, Attorney General Mitchell in September rendered an opinion that the company was entitled to apply for a "minor-part" license, on the ground that the New River is not navigable. Such a license would free the company from the accounting and valuation provisions of the Power Act. The Power Commission has denied the application and required the company to take out a standard license if it wishes to proceed. It passes the question of navigability on to the courts and rests its jurisdiction on Section 23 of the act, which gives it power to require a license if the proposed construction would affect the interests of interstate or foreign commerce. Five States, it will be remembered, joined with the company in denying federal jurisdiction. The practical point is that the company, under the commission's decision, will be subject to the provisions of the Federal Power Act respecting accounting and capitalization, and not to the looser control or lack of control of the States. The case, it would seem, will almost certainly be carried to the courts, where it is to be hoped that the position of the commission may be sustained.

NAVAL AGREEMENTS of any kind will soon become a hissing and a byword if they continue to develop such contentious misunderstandings as have followed recent ones. A few weeks ago it was announced, with a flourish of trumpets, that the Franco-Italian controversy over tonnage parity had been amicably settled and that a treaty supplementing the London accord would soon be signed. Now, however, comes the demand of France for a volume of replacement tonnage by 1936 which Italy regards as preposterous, and Mr. Arthur Henderson's diplomatic hands are tied because the British Admiralty agrees with Italy. Further to aggravate the unsettlement of the settlement, Italy is reported to be kindly disposed toward the Austro-German customs union, and France sees red at the new menace to its security. With Franco-Italian parity up in the air, France and Italy join hands and announce that warships exceeding 20,000 to 25,000 tons are out of date and should be abandoned; which leads Washington to declare that the United States cannot possibly undertake to defend the Panama Canal with vessels of a paltry 20,000 or 25,000 tons and that the 35,000-ton battleship is still necessary. We have not heard that any Power was getting ready to attack the canal, and we seem to remember that not so long ago the United States and a considerable number of other Powers agreed to abolish war as an instrument of national policy. Just why, then, the United States should stand out as the champion of the biggest and costliest war machine afloat is something that Mr. Hoover ought to explain. Is he really expecting another war?

GANDHI IN LONDON will be an interesting spectacle in more ways than one. He intends to brave British weather and British statesmanship alike in his customary dress—a loin-cloth; the sessions of the second round-table conference will have to be accommodated to his habit of observing Monday as a day of complete silence; he will take along his spinning wheel, and he will, of course, adhere to his negligible diet, which would contribute nothing to a state dinner but must be prepared by religious formula. It is more important that Gandhi and his advisers—if he does really act as sole delegate—will go to London not at government expense but at the expense of the Congress Party. By all these gestures, the personal ones as well as the political, Gandhi strengthens a position which was already very strong by reason of his truce with Lord Irwin and his complete dominance of the Congress Party convention. If he can add the prestige that would result from settlement of the Hindu-Moslem problem, he will be in an even better position to press for realization of the bill of rights adopted by the Congress convention. The British, being notorious for their own insistence on taking their customs and their tea with them wherever they go, can scarcely object with logic to Gandhi's personal preferences. The real importance of the London conference lies in the British reaction to Gandhi's political demands.

ADOLF HITLER, the man who was to reform Germany by turning its government over to men of chemically pure Teutonic blood, is meeting with many difficulties. Last September the election victories of his National Socialist Party momentarily frightened the chancelleries of Europe, and for a time threatened Germany's credit standing in Wall Street and elsewhere. The fear of Hitler remained for months, although in his inexperience he began making costly political mistakes almost immediately after the convening of the Reichstag in October. He thought he would overcome the effect of these mistakes by staging a dramatic walkout of his party delegates in the parliament. This, too, missed fire, and since then his followers have taken to quarreling among themselves. The signal for open dissension came when Hitler revealed that he was not strong enough to retain Dr. Wilhelm Frick in power as Thuringian Minister of the Interior. Frick was the only National Socialist to attain to an important government office. Hitler's most serious mistake came in training the Nazi "storm troops" for positive revolutionary action. The storm battalions, having tired of waiting for Hitler to lead them into action, have now rebelled against him. The faction led by Captain Walter Stennes, whom Hitler tried to dismiss from the movement, has captured the party's headquarters and newspaper offices in Berlin, but Hitler still holds the party funds, which were kept in Munich, and this in the end may save him. Even though Hitler should fall, however, the danger of a fascist outbreak will not have been removed.

G. PIATAKOV, a high Soviet official, according to newspaper dispatches has just arrived in Berlin to place $75,000,000 worth of orders with German firms. When M. Piatakov wished to come to this country, he was refused a visa. These two facts deserve notice, as does the further fact that American exports to all countries fell off by one-quarter in 1930, while our exports to Russia rose by practically one-half despite all obstacles. The Russians are eager to buy from us; but as Louis Fischer points out in his new book "Why Recognize Russia?" the uncertain political basis of Soviet-American trade and the frequent attacks on Russia by Hamilton Fish and others have already reduced the amount of buying Russians are doing here. Trade is not fostered by an atmosphere of hostility, by the spread of false news of Soviet conditions, or by the denial of credit facilities equal to those being offered elsewhere.

OUR YEARLY REMINDER of the repudiated State debts of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, and South Carolina is at hand in the annual report of the Council of Foreign Bondholders. It sets down the principal of those debts at $75,000,000, largely incurred for railroad guaranties, and adds an estimated $262,000,000 for interest. The federal government has steadfastly refused to assume any responsibility for these debts. While the cases are by no means parallel, there is an interesting contrast in the recent action of the Australian Commonwealth government in paying the interest due from New South Wales in London on April 1, which New South Wales refused to meet. A special dispatch to the New York Times says: "At a conference at The Hague this month the consensus of international opinion on the question generally, without special reference to America, was in favor of federal responsibility for the acts of component states." The United States cites Russian repudiation as a reason for refusing recognition; the Soviet government retorts by citing American State precedents; and the Council of Foreign Bondholders with a singular inability to make fine moral distinctions comments: "The council has pointed out that that abuse of state powers which takes the form of repudiation of public debt is found only in parts of the United States and in Communist Russia."

GOVERNOR ROOSEVELT'S recent judicial appointments in New York State have met with general commendation. In naming Edward R. Finch, senior member of the Appellate Division, as presiding justice he has disregarded partisanship—a course that ought to be taken for granted in choosing judges but unfortunately cannot be. Justice Townley is promoted from the Supreme Court to the Appellate Division, and Edward S. Dore, a prominent member of Tammany, indorsed by both the Bar Association and the judiciary committee of the New York County Lawyers' Association, is appointed to the Supreme Court. Chief Magistrate Joseph E. Corrigan of New York City, of like political affiliations with Mr. Dore and similarly indorsed, receives a well-deserved promotion to the Court of General Sessions. Chief Magistrate Corrigan has been doing admirable work in the hard and thankless task of cleaning up the magistrates' courts of New York City, not hesitating, if necessary, to offend political leaders in the process. There will be general approval of his promotion, but coupled with it a feeling of regret that both his professional associates and the Governor should have felt constrained to call him from his present important work in the very midst of his activities.

A PREPOSTEROUS PERFORMANCE is now being staged by the American consul at Vancouver, B. C., in the case of Miss Ella Young, who seeks admission to the United States. Miss Young is an Irish poet and lecturer, an authority on Celtic mythology, and the author of several books published in this country. From October, 1925, to November, 1930, she remained in the United States on a visa that was extended from time to time; last November, believing that she might cross over into Canada and be readmitted under the British quota, she voluntarily left California seven months before her latest permit should expire. When she attempted to reenter she was refused a visa on the ground that she might become a public charge, although for five years she had supported herself very competently here. Various influential citizens of California, including Senator Shortridge, M. Fleishhacker, president of the Anglo-California Trust Company, Bertram E. Alanson, president of the San Francisco Stock Exchange, Colonel Charles Erskine Scott Wood, and other well-known professional and business men have issued a statement declaring that it is their earnest belief that there is not "the slightest risk of her ever becoming a public charge on the United States or any State or any one." To these protests A. Dana Hodgdon, chief of the Visa Division of the State Department, replies first that consular officers are left substantially to their own discretion and adds:

> After a careful consideration of Miss Young's case, the conclusion reached by the responsible consular officer was that in the light of the present economic situation in the United States she was not in a position to overcome the presumption that . . . she was likely to become a public charge. . . . Although due consideration was given to the fact that Miss Young's cash assets amounted to $1,500 and her income to $500 a year from royalties [and $1,300 from lectures], these amounts could not be considered sufficient inasmuch as at her age [66 years] she might become helpless through illness . . . resulting in a rapid consumption of her assets and a depletion of her earning capacity.

And there, for the moment, the matter rests. One would like at least to be able to believe Miss Young's case an extraordinary one. But apparently it is merely an example of our everyday treatment of aliens who seek admission to and naturalization in the United States.

THE MOST INTERESTING feature about the million dollars just given by Gustav Oberlaender to further American-German understanding and amity is that the principal and interest of the fund is to be entirely expended in twenty-five years. Mr. Oberlaender desires his money to be spent by students and public men who wish to engage "in research work that is of special interest to the American people, and those who are interested in such subjects as employment insurance, old-age insurance, public health, race relations, music, art, or any other activities of a kindred nature, and who will profit by a period of study in a German-speaking country." These stipulations cover an almost unlimited field and doubtless will result in the completion of much valuable work. The fund is to be administered under the Carl Schurz Foundation, and under the immediate trusteeship, in addition to that of Mr. Oberlaender himself, of Carl W. Ackerman, dean of the Columbia School of Journalism, Dr. Haven Emerson, Henry Allen Moe, secretary of the Guggenheim Foundation, and Wilbur K. Thomas, executive director of the Carl Schurz Fund. But Mr. Oberlaender has wisely refused to give his money in perpetuum. No one can tell what the future may have in store; indeed, such a fund, given twenty-five years ago, would have suffered sad sea-changes in the succeeding quarter-century. International amity can best be furthered during peace time.

Deficits or Taxes

THE position of the Treasury grows continually worse. The original budget estimates forecast a surplus of $123,000,000 for the present fiscal year. By the beginning of December the Treasury had discovered that there would be a deficit of $180,000,000 instead, and now, with three-fourths of the year gone, it is agreed that the deficit will approach $800,000,000. Receipts during the first nine months of the year have been $510,000,000 less than in the corresponding period of 1929-30, and expenditures about $194,000,000 greater, and the remaining three months are certain to add heavily to the $600,000,000 deficit that now exists. The long period of Treasury surpluses is plainly over. From 1920 to 1930 they totaled about $4,000,000,000, nearly all of which was wisely devoted to reducing the public debt. During the present year we shall actually increase public indebtedness. It is plainly time for a serious consideration of fiscal policy.

Unfortunately, instead of facing the situation like a statesman, and inviting his countrymen to think soberly what ought to be done, the President makes a political plea. On March 31 he said:

> There will be no increase of taxes if the next Congress imposes no increases upon the budget which the Administration will present. But for Congress to do this, the people must cooperate to effectively discourage and postpone consideration of sectional and group interests.

This is political claptrap, and nothing else. The President knows, just as everybody else does, that there will almost certainly be another deficit in 1931-32 despite all reasonable care in expenditures; just as he knows, or ought to know, that Congress in the past session actually appropriated some $28,000,000 less than the budget officers recommended. The President's statement is simply an attempt, and a shabby one, to shift to Congress in advance the blame for the anticipated deficit, and an effort to prejudice public opinion in advance against any expenditures the President may see fit to oppose, whether unemployment or farm relief or something else, as "the demands of sectional and group interests." It is a time, certainly, for the most careful weighing of all expenditures, but no time for refusing to make socially necessary outgo because it may necessitate tax increase. It is no time for giving heed to Calvin Coolidge's parrot cry of "no extra Congress, no extra taxes, and no extra politics."

The President and his supporters propose a policy of drift in the hope that things will turn for the better. This is fatuous action. Interest payments of foreign governments have already been diverted from debt payment to current expenditures, and there is disturbing talk of cutting down the cumulative sinking-fund requirement by means of which we are now wisely clearing away $400,000,000 a year of the public debt. Nothing could be more foolish in a rich country like this. We have no need, and we cannot afford, in any way to injure public credit, thus raising the rate of interest on public securities and the consequent burden of interest on the public debt. Let the Treasury meet this year's deficit by short-term borrowing as it must; it will simply face another shortage next year. This cannot go on indefinitely. It is a time for tax increase, despite the politicians' anxiety to avoid it.

Where should the increased revenue come from? Out of higher individual income and estate taxes. We have really only started to use these powerful modern fiscal engines. In 1929 customs yielded $602,000,000, miscellaneous internal-revenue taxes (mostly on tobacco) $480,000,000, the corporation income tax $1,236,000,000, individual income tax $1,095,000,000, and estate tax (on inheritances) $65,000,000. Taxes on consumption (customs and tobacco taxes) and corporation income taxes thus yield two-thirds of the federal revenue. Their ultimate incidence has no discoverable relation to individual ability to pay; but individual income and inheritance taxes rest chiefly on the richer part of the community.

Estate taxes are too low. On the 8,582 estates reported in 1929 the total taxes, both State and federal, averaged less than 4½ per cent, and even on the 16 estates of more than $10,000,000 they amounted to less than 18 per cent. Foreign experience indicates clearly the advantage of distinctly higher rates.

The income-tax situation is no less striking. In 1928 4,070,851 persons filed returns, of whom 2,523,063 paid income taxes in a total amount of $1,164,000,000. At the outside, not one family in ten paid any income tax. But out of the four millions reporting, the more than three millions whose net income was less than $5,000 paid only $13,000,000 tax, and the added 628,000 with incomes between $5,000 and $10,000 paid but $23,000,000 more, so that actually 97 per cent of the entire income tax was paid by persons with net incomes of $10,000 up. In fact, $909,000,000, or four-fifths of the whole, was paid by those with net incomes in excess of $50,000. Our income tax today is in truth a tax on the rich, and in minor degree on the well-to-do; as such, it contrasts favorably, in its effects on distribution, with the other federal taxes, the bulk of which come ultimately from the great mass of the poor and the less well-to-do. We are not within sight of the limit of its possibilities. Notwithstanding all the buncombe spread abroad by Mr. Mellon and his newspaper allies during the years when he was reducing rates, there is not a shred of evidence to show that rates could not be markedly raised without appreciably increasing evasion. The tax even on our 511 income millionaires in 1928 was not equal to 17 per cent of their income. Compare the British rates if there is any question what taxes can be collected. Our surtax rates ought to be graded upward more sharply, and we ought to get a larger proportion of federal revenue from the personal income tax, practically the whole burden of which, as we have indicated, is borne today by the well-to-do and the wealthy, and the greater part of it by the very rich. An intelligent democracy will consider not only the revenue results, but also the inevitable social consequences of its taxes. From that point of view, the income tax is a good tax. It remains to be seen whether the people will yield to the clamor of the President and his supporters and let themselves be prevented from making further intelligent use of it.

Mr. Hoover in Action

WE had just about given up hope that Mr. Hoover would ever again respond sympathetically and intelligently to the needs of his suffering fellowmen when along came the Nicaraguan earthquake and presented him with an opportunity to prove that he is still the world's greatest living humanitarian. Said the New York Times in a Washington dispatch the morning after the Managua tragedy:

> President Hoover had no sooner been informed of the disaster at Managua than he took personal charge of relief measures. This was right in line with his experience in relieving distress in Belgium, Russia, and other countries in Europe and in the flood-stricken area of the Mississippi Valley. Within a few minutes after word came that the Nicaraguan capital had been destroyed by earthquake, the machinery of the government and the American Red Cross was in operation.

Here is an example of the great humanitarian at his best. From a foreign shore comes a cry for help, and Mr. Hoover swings immediately into action, asks no one's permission, tarries not a moment to examine into the theoretical side of his decision, does not even stop to inquire whether "self-help" would not be better than American dollars in relieving the suffering in Nicaragua. We wonder just what it is in the appeal of a foreigner that manages to strike a responsive chord in Mr. Hoover's heart, when millions of Americans can go clamoring for food without drawing more from the President than an impatient reminder that Americans must take care of themselves. Why should Belgians, or Russians, or Nicaraguans receive more consideration from this man, who is acting not in the role of an independent philanthropist but as President of the United States, than do the millions of jobless workers and distressed farmers in his own country? These people, too, are in trouble; they, too, are suffering from lack of food and clothing. Is their predicament not also a calamity, and a calamity that is much closer to home? If Mr. Hoover would examine their situation more closely and honestly, he would find it so, and he would further find that their suffering is of a character that bodes no good for the existing order (of which Mr. Hoover is the staunchest defender), should adequate relief and assistance much longer be withheld from them.

Mr. Hoover's moment for action in the domestic situation came immediately after the stock-market crash in the fall of 1929. It is true, of course, that he did initiate certain "voluntary measures of cooperation," to use his own words, "to make certain that fundamental businesses of the country shall continue as usual," and "that wages and therefore consuming power shall not be reduced." But this hardly sounds like the man of action pictured in the Times dispatch quoted above. Furthermore, in his message to Congress on December 3, 1929, he asserted that "the test and the rightfulness of our decisions must be whether we have sustained and advanced... prosperity and the lessening of poverty." Certainly not even Mr. Hoover will argue that we are more prosperous today than we were on December 3, 1929. By his own standards, the action taken eighteen months ago was wholly inadequate to cope with the ever-widening needs of the depression. A year later Senators La Follette and Walsh collected and published an immense volume of indisputable proof that millions of Americans were in pressing need of relief. Did Mr. Hoover, when informed of this disaster, take "personal charge of relief measures"? He did nothing of the kind. Instead, he did everything he could to block relief, until his evasive tactics could no longer withstand the adverse publicity he thereby drew down upon his head. Finally, he vetoed the Wagner employment-exchange bill, the only measure that could have passed the Hoover-controlled House of Representatives in the last Congress that would in any way have helped in the present situation.

Thus has the President hastened to help his fellow-countrymen. Yet there is still an opportunity, though a rapidly vanishing one, for him to take that spirited and generous action which the American crisis demands. For the moment, with Congress in recess, Mr. Hoover enjoys powers that verge on the dictatorial. His is the sole responsibility; he no longer shares it with Congress. Now let him show the country what he can do in an emergency; let him prove to us that he is big enough and capable enough to initiate and encourage relief for the six million unemployed, the seven or eight additional million who are working on part time and at greatly reduced wages, and their twenty or twenty-five million dependents. Let him start doing this, not in May, or June, or September, but now. If he has no plan of action, if his expansive promises of eighteen months ago were just so much buncombe, then let him surrender his power at once by calling Congress into session. Any other course will be a betrayal of the people that may prove perilous for Herbert Hoover and his kind.

Talking About Wheat

ONLY a confirmed optimist could have expected that the world wheat conference which closed its sessions at Rome on April 2 would be able to dispose of the difficulties presented by the world wheat situation. The wheat problem, whatever it is, is obviously too complicated to be solved in a few days of deliberation, even with representatives of forty-six countries devoting themselves to the task. There should be no surprise, then, that the recommendations of the conference went no farther than well-meant suggestions likely, if adopted, to ease the strain a little without answering any really primary question.

The most important result of the conference was its revelation of the complete lack of agreement among the wheat-producing and wheat-consuming nations regarding either the causes of the present crisis or the means by which it might be dispelled and its recurrence avoided. Before the conference began, preliminary discussions made clear a wide rift, amounting virtually to an impasse, between those who insisted that the world was growing too much wheat and those who insisted that it was using too little. Premier Mussolini, in his opening address, aligned himself with those who maintained that the trouble was not with overproduction but with underconsumption, and warned the conference to be cautious about recommending a general reduction of acreage, especially while so many people were suffering from want of food. The Russians, on the other hand, not only declared firmly that Russia would not restrict production, but ridiculed the idea of urging people to use more wheat when they had nothing with which to buy it; while the Canadian representative pointed out that even if a reduction of acreage were desirable, no democratic country could bring it about by governmental fiat. The upshot of the debate at this point was a gentle pronouncement in favor of persuasion—a harmless counsel to which no one could object.

The question of underconsumption, though less contentious, did not lend itself any more easily to practical treatment. The Russian gibe that unemployment, business depression, and an "eat-more-wheat" policy did not go well together was unanswerable. The only hopeful outlook lay in the possibility of developing a demand for wheat in countries which, like China, do not now use it to any great extent. The conference, accordingly, gave its approval to propaganda, attaching thereto a suggestion that surplus wheat might well be sold to China at a very low price. Just how this mixture of economics and humanitarianism was to be handled was not indicated.

Faced with the conclusion that unrestricted production, save for voluntary curtailment, was likely to go on and that increased consumption offered no immediate remedy, the conference turned to the question of regulating the wheat trade. The Danubian countries demanded preferential tariffs as a protection against Russian dumping and disastrous importations from Argentina and other overseas producing countries. The Rumanian Minister of Agriculture went so far as to predict a united closing of European markets if overseas countries did not waive their most-favored-nation privileges and allow preferential tariffs to be set up. The tariff suggestion proved especially irritating to the Russians, and led the Argentine ambassador at Rome to remind the conference that the world wheat crisis, while attributable in part to Russia, was also to be charged to the economic derangement of Europe by the World War and to the European policy of high protection. The conference could only decide that, not being an international tariff commission, it must leave the tariff issue to the regular course of diplomatic negotiation.

The Russian shadow overhung the conference from the beginning, and it was Russia that stood out most conspicuously and threateningly at the close. Back of the resentment at Russian dumping was a recognition of the fact that Russia, by abolishing the middleman, had gained an impressive advantage over all its competitors, and that as long as Russia was compelled to export large quantities of wheat to pay for manufactured articles bought abroad, the competition of low-priced Russian wheat would have to be reckoned with. Western capitalism and Russian collectivism, in other words, locked horns, and in the presence of that conflict the conference was helpless. The only practical suggestion was the approval of financial aid to wheat-growers to enable them to carry their crops through periods of exceptionally low prices—a proposal which, save for its restriction to short-term credits instead of credits of longer term, appears to run on all fours with the International Institute for Agricultural Credits which the League of Nations is promoting. Whether the conference of wheat-producing nations which is to meet at London in May will be able to get any farther remains to be seen.

The Layman Rebels

When it was first announced that John D. Rockefeller, Jr., had appropriated $250,000,000 for the building of an amusement center covering three blocks in the heart of New York City, many a harassed metropolite dived into his subway hole with a lighter heart. His city's irresponsible hodge-podge of unplanned brick and stone that took any shape it pleased and changed its shape half a dozen times within a short block ceased to trouble him so much. Let Chrysler wave its silly silver plume; let them spoil the Empire State building with a trick mooring mast. In the midst of New York would rise a miniature model city to show the way. There would be a skyscraper, of course, but not more than one, and that one would be set like a jewel in a wide green space so big that there would be at least standing room at its base for all who worked in it. Given $250,000,000 there could be created a city of such simplicity, such poise, such spaciousness and rest that it would take ten years off the city dweller's age.

The plans of Radio City were announced, with pictures, on March 6. And the howls of the populace have been rising ever since. Architects have contributed more dignified criticism; newspapers have complained in judicious editorials; but the people who write letters to the papers have been neither dignified nor judicious. Ugly, futile, stupid; disgraceful symbol of a generation; a garment center surrounding a hatbox; hideous; gas-house architecture; and so on.

We wish we could defend the plans of Radio City. We can't. To us Radio City looks like the first six radio "hours" on Sunday morning congealed forever in stone. The elliptical building, which has become better known in the correspondence columns as the gas-house, has nothing to recommend it except, perhaps, that having no corners it will be easy to wash. The worst thing about Radio City, however, is that it has no more apparent unity than any other three city blocks. And as for that spaciousness, simplicity, and rest we dreamed of, what have we? For spaciousness we have one tiny plaza occupying one-tenth or less of the space —the rest is solid buildings, nine of them in three blocks, including three skyscrapers! For simplicity we are given barrenness. For poise and restfulness—we would rather not go into that.

The architects responsible have made various answers to the critics: Radio City must be economically as well as artistically sound; beauty must be sacrificed to utility. But the layman refuses to believe either excuse and continues to complain. Which leads us up to the two most interesting and, happily, cheerful aspects of the controversy.

In the first place the layman has rebelled. In no uncertain terms he has asserted his feelings without apology or hesitation. After all, laymen must live with and in Radio City—it is no private museum piece to be avoided at will. It is entirely right and proper that laymen should say what they think about it. In the second place the rebellion has been effective. While the architects responsible have made answer to their critics, they have been singularly reasonable—so reasonable in fact that it is now announced that new plans are to be worked out. We hope they will be more satisfactory.

Arnold Bennett

By DOROTHY VAN DOREN

BY his death at London on March 27, Arnold Bennett has passed at once from the status of a writer of the most compelling contemporaneity to that of a classic. For nearly thirty years we have not been surprised at receiving from Mr. Bennett's hands a novel that was far above the ordinary. During the same period he issued an astonishing number of capable, readable books—plays, essays, novels that he called "fantasias," novels that were plainly potboilers, notes on how to live that sold hundreds of thousands of copies. It is the more extraordinary that out of all this welter of words so many should have been fine; that Mr. Bennett, writing steadily, relentlessly, remuneratively, should at the same time have written greatly; that the decade and a half which produced twenty-eight novels, eleven plays, and about a score of other books should also have produced two novels —"Clayhanger" and "The Old Wives' Tale"—which rank among the finest English novels of any period.

It is perhaps worth while to consider what manner of man it was who could perform such feats of quantity and quality. Mr. Bennett says of himself that he prayed to be delivered alike from idleness and from poverty. He came honestly enough by these standards of industry, and in his novels about the Five Towns district of England—which means in two-thirds of his best novels—he stresses the inescapable importance of money. He himself did not grow up in poverty; his father was a middle-class solicitor who kept his family comfortable enough; the son was sent to the Endowed Middle School at Newcastle-under-Lyme, and thence to London University in 1885. By 1889 he had quit the Five Towns and gone to live in London, where he was occupied as a solicitor's clerk, and "combined cunning in the preparation of costs with a hundred and thirty words a minute at shorthand," not to mention the not inconsiderable stipend of £200 a year. Within the next ten years he had departed forever from the law and had definitely become a journalist, and his prodigious energy had already shown itself. He could say at the end of 1899 that he had averaged nearly a thousand words a day for a year, and if practice means anything, he should have been well on the way to acquiring the facility and skill which was to serve him in his finest books. He described himself with evident truth when he said that his three major qualities were:

> First, an omnivorous and tenacious memory—the kind of memory that remembers how much London spends per day in cab fares just as easily as the order of Shakespeare's plays or the stock anecdotes of Shelley and Byron. Second, a naturally sound taste in literature. And third, the invaluable, despicable, disingenuous journalistic faculty of seeming to know much more than one does know.

He might have added a precise and penetrating observation. The observation and the memory were alike exercised on the Five Towns, that section of England which has remained so exclusively English and so incurably provincial. The pottery towns of Staffordshire had embraced industrialism in its first youth and they were in no hurry to adopt any more modern innovations. The potteries and the mines flourished, therefore; the workers went on their first abortive strikes to loose themselves from a thirteen-hour day for old and young and to demand wages large enough to keep breath in them; the towns suffered smoke, filth, brutality, restraint. And in the midst of this sat the middle class, the employers, the fortunate ones, calm, temperate, decent, hard-working, frugal—above all, frugal. To this class Mr. Bennett belonged; and he has given it immortality.

His first novel of the Five Towns was written in 1902. "Anna of the Five Towns" is Mr. Bennett's first attempt to write a "serious" novel on a large scale. But even while this work was being written he was thinking of other and still more serious attempts to portray the locality of his childhood. "The Old Wives' Tale" in 1908 was the result of many years of thought upon a particular milieu. It displayed, indeed, an inability to escape from the milieu. For here was the Five Towns—smoke, industry, restraint, frugality, and all; and, incidentally, here was life, unmistakable, pitiable, touching and uplifting the heart. Mr. Bennett declared that he first conceived the plot of "The Old Wives' Tale" when he saw a plain, stout, elderly woman enter a restaurant in Paris and heard her subjected to the laughter of the pretty young waitress. He saw in her "a heartrending novel"; she had once been young and was now old and pitiful. That was the novel he resolved to write. The story of Constance and Sophia Baines, daughters of the draper in St. Luke's Square, Bursley, was the result. They progressed from all that was young and promising and lovely to a futile and unwanted old age. They grew up and grew old and died. They married and one of them bore a son and they were widowed. The younger, Sophia, having run off with a commercial traveler who turned out to be a rascal and left her, lived through the siege of Paris in 1870 and emerged financially triumphant; the other hardly left Bursley, where she had been born and raised. But Sophia, taking part in the Franco-German war, was untouched by it; her Bursley virtues of frugality and industry kept her as firm and unassailed as her sister Constance was, living out her life in the house in St. Luke's Square. Paris might have been the Five Towns, for all the difference in her life its strangeness made. And if Constance and Sophia Baines are the heroines of the novel, the house and shop in St. Luke's Square is the hero. It was dark, inconvenient, ugly; it was immaculately, painfully "well-kept"; it was in a sort of way comfortable. And it is real. Nevertheless, only a great writer could have taken this material, so commonplace, so dull, so undramatic, so unbeautiful, and transmuted it into compelling life. If we could meet Constance tomorrow, either in her pretty, compliant girlhood or in her fat, pain-ridden, helpless old age, we should probably flee from her. But her creator made not only the good-natured, rather stupid girl and the gently obstinate old woman, he made also the pathos and the drama and the pity and heartbreak of a long life, not one of the details of which can be doubted or laid aside as irrelevant.

"The Old Wives' Tale" is generally considered to be Mr. Bennett's finest book. I should place "Clayhanger" above it. Written two years later, it, too, is located in the Five Towns, only a block or two away from Mr. Baines's draper's shop. It describes the life of Edwin Clayhanger from his departure from school at sixteen to his marriage at forty. Many persons live in its pages: Darius Clayhanger, Edwin's father; Maggie, his sister; Janet Orgreave, who "waited" for him in vain; Hilda Lessways, who jilted him because she couldn't help it and later became his wife; Big James, he of the brown beard and magnificent bass voice and gentle heart. "Clayhanger" has a quality of reality that is unique in English fiction. Clayhanger himself is more real than the man you will meet tomorrow on the street; because the man on the street has his secret life, and those who meet him cannot penetrate it; but Clayhanger's secret life, which nobody in the novel knows but himself, is revealed to the reader in all its pitiful or admirable or futile or triumphant details. Clayhanger the schoolboy, resolving to begin at once the full exercise of his powers, to achieve self-perfection in spite of his shortcomings; Clayhanger the youth, afraid of his father, afraid to speak what is in his mind, unwilling to enter his father's shop yet entering it, fitting at last securely into the routine of the printing business; Clayhanger the man, trying to overcome his shyness, reading, pondering, settling into a rut of meticulous regularity, and jerked out of that rut twice by Hilda, the strange, intense, inexplicable woman whom he loves. This is life, made fuller and richer and more credible than life by the mystery of art. This is the complete mind and heart of a man, as every man knows his own mind and heart and none other.

There are many other aspects of the novel nearly as incomparable as the portrait of Clayhanger: his father's terrible childhood on the pot-banks, working eighteen hours a day at the age of seven, and staying for a brief, indescribably horrible night at the poorhouse; and Darius's disintegration and death; and the boy George; and the full, gay, vigorous life of the Orgreaves, so bitterly in contrast to the restraint and intellectual poverty of the Clayhangers; and the life of the town, real, sharp, indubitable. "Clayhanger" is the first and best of a trilogy about Edwin and Hilda; it gains some strength by those novels that follow it, by its very length and fulness. But alone I believe it has not been surpassed by any English novel since "Vanity Fair." I am aware that such a sweeping judgment is perhaps as unwise as it is dangerous. I shall be reminded reproachfully of Charlotte Brontë and George Eliot and Meredith and Hardy. Cheerfully I sacrifice them and deposit them and all their works in second place. Dickens gives me pause and the question reduces itself to a matter of personal taste. I prefer "Clayhanger" to any single novel of Dickens. The bulk of Dickens's work may very well endure longer than the bulk of Bennett's. But that is another matter.

From a rereading of "The Old Wives' Tale" and "Clayhanger" it becomes clear what are Mr. Bennett's characteristics as a writer. First, the fulness and correctness of his observation; second, his willingness to set down everything about his characters, whether flattering or not; third, his relentless preoccupation with money. The preoccupation with money is the most striking of his interests. In every novel it is apparent; in "Riceyman Steps" it reaches its climax with a frank study of avarice. But if Mr. Earlforward is the extreme example of this passion to save money, Sophia and Constance are themselves impressive illustrations of it. Sophia's burning passion during her hard months in the Paris siege was for the accumulation of a competence; Constance in her old age, although by her own and even by more worldly standards she was rich, handled every sixpence as if it had been her last. The Clayhangers had bread and tea for their evening meal, and old Darius was horrified when his daughter dared to add meat, though they could well afford it. When Edwin was thirty and thinking of getting married, his father would raise his wages to a bare pound a week, although the young man was manager of the business and second in importance only to his father. Edwin himself was scandalized by the lavishness of the Orgreave tea, when jams and meat and a fruit pie loaded the table. Sophia Baines despised her young husband for a fool because he ran through a fortune in four years. The same motif appears in the lesser novels. "Buried Alive," the story of a great painter who, out of his excessive shyness, tried to pretend himself dead, is concerned over and over with extravagance, the exact price of article after article, the proper uses of wealth. Extravagance is the greatest vice. A decent attempt to save money is the supreme virtue. It may be that Mr. Bennett came to this conclusion after reading Balzac, whom he enormously admired; it may be that his boyhood in the Five Towns, where frugality was so patently wise and a spendthrift would so surely end in the gutter, influenced him not only to desire money for himself but constantly to write about it. Money, indeed, in these books is a consuming passion; love is almost always secondary to it. Love is restrained, considered, sober. Young, romantic love is on the whole foolish. Even in "Clayhanger" the unmistakably compelling love of Edwin and Hilda is described temperately and with sanity.

It is this temperateness and sanity, indeed, that separates Mr. Bennett from the first and greatest novelists. Nowhere in the novels is there a trace of the fire, the gusto, the passion, the unadulterated rhetoric that burn in "The Idiot," in "Anna Karenina," in "Tom Jones," in Thackeray at his best, in "Moby Dick." The highest compliment one can pay to Mr. Bennett is to say he is not quite in this company. His tone is level and composed. He will tell everything; but he will not raise his voice. He will not throw his scruples to the winds and dare all. Extravagance is a vice. Only a fool throws away his money, only a reckless, hot-headed incompetent will fail to keep for himself those reservations which an honest man needs to keep in order to live a creditable life and die a decent death. The middle ground is the safe ground; do not throw away your resources; do not passionately clutch them until you die of want. And it may be said of Mr. Bennett that he made the middle ground, the temperate, decent life more moving than any other writer has ever made it. To be clean, to be hard-working, to be honest, to be not necessarily kind but just—this is not, with Mr. Bennett, to be also dull. Here, probably, is the astonishing source of his power. It would be incomplete not to add that he possesses the saving grace of an ironical and sometimes mordant humor. Life is not quite tragic; it is more than comic; it seems to have no meaning, yet the meaning is there—in its fulness, in its variety, in the inescapable movement of one year after the other. Everything is the same and everything is changing. People are as they are. Mr. Bennett has shown that what they are is good.

Aid for the Jobless—or an Alibi?

By DEVERE ALLEN

Hyères, France, March 21

WHEN President Hoover's interest in foreign methods of unemployment relief was revealed by the dispatch of the official investigating expedition of Mr. John J. Leary, Jr., there were quiet smiles in Europe. Over here not the least humorous thing about American politics is our famed engineer's way of tackling problems by making an elaborate survey of the means by which they may be dodged. In labor circles, especially, there is sardonic wonderment as to what Mr. Hoover, who cannot tolerate anything that smacks of socialism, expects to find in countries where unemployment relief has taken a course conspicuously divergent from rugged individualism.

As Mr. Leary chats with the devoted readers of the Telegraph and Morning Post and discovers that the cost of unemployment insurance is a growing and tremendous drain upon the state, it is to be hoped that he will also take into account the fact that England, with almost 2,700,000 jobless workers, is still a country without bread lines. And if he is bothered because there have been abuses of the insurance plan, and because in truth a few men have passed up jobs they might have taken, he will do well to notice the cases in which men have had to choose between living on twenty-eight shillings a week without labor and working forty-five hours a week for thirty-one shillings, with no free transportation to and from their homes.

If Mr. Leary finds business men who can pull long faces and still enjoy it better than pulling longer ones, they will confide that although they hate like everything to keep up the dole—they will call it that—it was either dole or revolution. For Mr. Leary's notebook the following words from the Manchester Guardian might not be inappropriate: "America offers at least one lesson to those who denounce 'the dole' as the source of all our evils. Over there a man who is out of work has two resources on which to fall back —private charity or crime. Charity is limited. The opportunities for crime are not." And the Guardian is right, even allowing for those special areas where our vigilant police reserve the choicest pickings for themselves.

Apart from Hollywood, which is always a journalistic standby when events are dull in other quarters of the cosmos, American crime was until recently our most relished news in Europe. On the Continent, where you can buy Nick Carter, the Bradys, and Jesse James in several languages, daily headlines shrieked forth the latest amenities of life in Bill Thompson's bower, while the newest bedtime stories from Tammany Hall's domain embellished front pages from Moscow and Munich to Paris and Madrid. But crime stories are giving way; the American collapse, even if it carried the fortunes of Europe down to a more horrendous level, has brought with it a redeeming chance for laughter at the inanity of our officialdom. The leaders of French industry have not been slow to point out the wisdom of their resistance against the marvels of speed-up; the Germans have begun to doubt the virtues of mere industrial efficiency as a cure-all for their ills. Britain, where traditional ruts are unquestionably a curse, is in danger of growing still more deeply intrenched in antiquated production methods, including low wage scales, because of our egregious muddling. In every place there are doubts of things American. But regarding our "method" of relieving unemployment, doubt is too mild a word; amazement would be truer.

Unemployment insurance in Europe, though still inadequate and not universal, is firmly imbedded in the fabric of the common life. Other forms of social insurance, in which we have been laggard, were established long before the war, and have since made rapid progress. Germany's act of 1889 for old-age and invalidity insurance was extended in 1911 to cover pensions for salaried workers. Provision for limited forms of insurance was made by France in 1910, and almost simultaneously insurance acts—pensions or sickness or old age—were passed in Great Britain, Luxembourg, Rumania, Sweden, and Holland. Since the war new insurance of this character or extensions of old programs have been instituted by Spain, Italy, Belgium, Bulgaria, Czecho-Slovakia, Great Britain, Poland, Hungary, and France.

The International Labor Office in a recent report looks back on this steady march of social insurance and holds that the compulsory feature is essential. "Social insurance," it states, in the calmest sort of faith, "will no doubt continue its development as a compulsory system until it is universally adopted." If this be prophecy, something must give way. Can it be that the mounting effects of the world crisis will generate, even in America, a popular perception that the risks of competitive life are so great as to warrant a change toward social control? The recent progress of old-age pensions is, perhaps, a reassuring portent. It is less reassuring to reflect that while our unemployed still go without anything to hold body and soul together except what is brought them on the winds of chance, the White House has to wait for an emissary to find out what is already well known and available for the asking. Mr. H. B. Butler, deputy director of the International Labor Office, has completed a fair and detailed study of American unemployment. For a long time the staff at Geneva have had their fingers on every feature of the relief plans of every country. They could tell Mr. Leary all he needs to know. Perhaps they cannot tell him what he wants to know. They will not be able to tell him how, in any country under the sun, successful relief for acute unemployment can be effected through enlightened charity alone, or through private agencies working strictly in keeping with a competitive economy.

Nobody contends that because a scheme exists it operates everywhere in absolute perfection; nobody believes that widespread distress can be entirely overcome by social insurance alone, no matter on what scale. Nobody thinks that unemployment relief can be put through without upsetting the routine of life for some of the more privileged classes. Nevertheless, taking unemployment insurance specifically, as the form of social insurance which most urgently affects the present suffering millions, its benefits have been incalculable. In more than one country, hard though conditions are, any sustained economic cohesion has been possible only because collective intelligence has been marshaled for collective protection. To see how significant a factor unemployment insurance really is, one must realize its enormous growth.

In 1919 the workers insured against unemployment numbered between 4,500,000 and 5,000,000. At that time Great Britain was the only country where unemployment insurance was compulsory, and even there compulsion was limited to certain industries. Today, however, a compulsory system exists in ten countries, bringing a measure of protection, if the other countries with voluntary systems are added in, to more than 47,500,000 wage-earners. Of these, nearly 45,000,000 are located in Germany, Great Britain, Russia, Austria, Italy, Poland, Bulgaria, Australia (Queensland), Irish Free State, and Switzerland (nine cantons), where compulsory systems are established. In the Soviet Union 10,000,000 workers are ordinarily affected by unemployment insurance, though since October 9 last benefits have been suspended owing to the state of the labor market and the new ruling compelling laborers to accept jobs distant from their homes. Yet, deducting these 10,000,000, no fewer than 35,000,000 workers, thanks to compulsory unemployment insurance, are being aided who would otherwise be left to chance charity or starvation. Is this the method, demonstrably successful, in which the President is interested?

At the final session of the unemployment conference called by the International Labor Office last January, which I attended, the problem was sharply focused in a manner that epitomized our own conditions. A French employer, elaborating with hard realism the need of industrialists to rule in their own house, dwelt upon the desirability of freedom from too strenuous social demands. Poulson, the delegate of British labor, challenged this whole conception. The issue, he said—forcefully and accurately, though with little originality—was the old, old struggle between the right of a few to use human beings for profit and the right of the many to control society for the well-being of all. It is, of course, however old it sounds, the basic issue everywhere.

To the extent of protecting nearly 50,000,000 human beings against reliance on the dole of charity, world capitalism has yielded to the workers' pressure. But there are many men in all countries for whom American individualism is still the last strong bulwark, who understand that the beginnings of social control in our country mean the abridgment, then the destruction, of the right of financial and commercial groups to control society by their own superior brains. To this body of stalwart individualists Mr. Hoover has belonged, both by obligation and by personal conviction.

Why then, all Europe wonders, seek light from countries whose socialized methods only prove, by the Hoover standard, their flabby, weak degeneration? Where will Mr. Leary get his aid and counsel? Does the President genuinely want help, or does he seek new reasons for evasion?

Lawrence Decides

By ROBERT A. BAKEMAN

Lawrence, Massachusetts, April 1

LAWRENCE, Massachusetts, built around numberless cotton and woolen mills on the Merrimac River, has definitely decided that the National Textile Workers Union shall not be allowed to exist within its borders. The question of whether or not the workers in the textile mills want to organize under this form of union has been brushed aside. Notice has been bluntly served by the officials of the city, aided by federal authorities, through a series of spectacular acts that have swept away every semblance of civil liberty, that the right of laborers to organize, which has been upheld by our highest courts, will be denied to the workers of Lawrence if they insist upon affiliating themselves with the National Textile Workers Union.

This is the heart of the present situation in Lawrence. It is no longer the question of who was right in the recent strike—employer or employee. It is not even the question of whether textile workers should be organized into a conservative or a radical labor union. It is the far more fundamental question of whether workers shall be free to organize themselves for collective bargaining with their employers under whatever auspices they please, without the arbitrary and unlawful interference of the police, whose primary job it is to protect the civil rights of all.

For several years the textile industry, hard hit by changing conditions, has been attempting to reduce expenses and at the same time increase production. This has meant the introduction of efficiency experts and their subsequent recommendations for the speeding up of machinery. The process went on until "the straw that broke the camel's back" was laid on. It resulted almost immediately in the complete closing down of the largest woolen mill in the world, along with two smaller ones.

For some months an organizer of the National Textile Workers had been in Lawrence. This was the only labor organization there, for with all its experience in industrial conflict Lawrence had not yet learned that the safety valve which will minimize social explosions in the industrial field is the labor union; and in fairness it must be added that the conservative union has not so far shown any great interest in the unskilled worker. The strikers, therefore, came in flocks to the only people that offered to organize them. In their emergency it was not a question of a conservative or a radical union. Then only did the Lawrence which had remained inactive for years, in spite of the rumblings of discontent, arouse itself. The fear of a general strike, the hysteria against "Communist activities," the memory of bitter industrial conflicts in the past, and the specter of the disappearance of the pay roll which supported the whole community led to the formation of a Citizens' Committee. The newspapers announced a concession by the American Woolen Company—the withdrawal of efficiency experts—but it was only a newspaper announcement. The strike leaders were vigorously denounced by one Roman Catholic priest, and colorless resolutions were passed by a body of Protestant ministers urging the strikers to go back to work. A request came from the Citizens' Committee for a vote upon the acceptance of the company's offer. This request was not acceded to as quickly as the Citizens' Committee desired, and the next day the conspiracy to rid Lawrence of the strike leaders began to unfold—a conspiracy which has not yet ceased.

On the morning of February 26, while the strike committee was in conference preparing the issues to be submitted to a ballot of the workers on the following day, and while other workers were painting the placards announcing when and where the balloting would take place, the police rushed into the headquarters of the union and arrested Patrick Devine, the national secretary. Two hours later, while the strike committee was in conference again in the same union hall, City Marshal O'Brien with a squad of officers armed with clubs rushed into the room and arrested all whom they could find, including the organizer, Edith Berkman. One of the strikers, who asked to see the warrant, was struck over the head by an officer, receiving a terrific wound which later became so infected that the victim had to be placed in the Marine Hospital in Chelsea. The head of another striker was split open, and Miss Berkman was so cruelly treated that her body was covered with bruises for many days.

That afternoon, when the attorney for the defense went to see about bail, he was informed, as he testified without contradiction in court the next day, that two charges had been brought against the five persons arrested, each one of which called for $5,000 bail. When it was hinted that the bail would be forthcoming, thus permitting the leaders to go back to the strike, two further charges were added, each also carrying $5,000 bail. This meant the raising of $20,000 for each defendant. To cap the climax, double sureties were demanded, making it necessary to pledge $40,000 worth of property for the release of each person.

One naturally asks, What was the high crime for which this unconscionable bail was demanded? And the answer is the same charge that could have been brought against any labor union anywhere that ever declared a strike against its employers: namely, (1) conspiracy to destroy the personal property of the American Woolen Company; (2) conspiracy to destroy real property of the American Woolen Company; (3) conspiracy to destroy business contracts of the American Woolen Company; (4) conspiracy to intimidate employees of the American Woolen Company.

Then the Citizens' Committee, with a strike committee of its own choosing, the leaders of the strike being safely in prison, voted to have a ballot taken of the workers. It took place two hours after the announcement had been made. At ten o'clock at night the result was announced. At four the next morning a group of newspaper reporters who had been covering the strike came into my room at the hotel and confessed what a farce the whole balloting was. Nevertheless, the next morning the headlines in all the papers announced that the workers of Lawrence had voted by a majority of four to one to go back, though the really significant news was that only 1,650 out of more than 9,000 workers on strike had voted to return, and about 7,000 had not voted at all. The bells of the churches were rung in token of the wonderful victory.

At the hearing of the arrested leaders next morning examination was waived, and the judge in charge, without hearing a word of the evidence, refused to reduce the bail and accused the defendants of coming into the community to stir up trouble and flaunt its laws. At the end of the hearing the federal authorities stepped in, and with telegraphed authority from Washington completed the job of breaking down the morale of the strikers by taking their leaders to the Immigration Detention Department at East Boston as suspicious aliens. Although $40,000 worth of property had already been put up for their appearance in court, they were kept in detention several days, and the Immigration Department demanded $5,000 more from each individual before he could have his temporary freedom. In this way was both municipal and federal machinery put into use to rid Lawrence of the leaders in the industrial strife.

But official Lawrence was not yet through with its job. On the morning of March 2 the marshal with some fifteen men rushed into the headquarters of the National Textile Workers and began searching the rooms. The records of the District Court of Lawrence reveal that no warrant was issued authorizing the search of these premises. The officers took away mimeograph machines, typewriter, books, papers, vouchers, and records of all kinds belonging to the union. The headquarters were then nailed up and remained that way until days later, when members of the union forced their way back in. A young girl, stenographer for the union, was given her choice, after a two-hour grilling, of being arrested on the charge of vagrancy or of going back to New York. She was driven in an automobile to Boston by officials and put on the New York train. A man who was found in the hall was arrested on the charge of vagrancy, and his case is still to be heard.

The next move came in the form of a notice from the owner of the building that unless the union gave up its quarters immediately, steps would be taken for an eviction. The union has a bona fide lease of these quarters which does not expire until February 20, 1932.

The union also had hired a hall for its mass-meetings for a period expiring on March 20. On March 6 it advertised a mass-meeting of protest against the imprisonment of its leaders. At the scheduled time of meeting, those who came were greeted by a "No Trespassing" sign and a large body of policemen. The policemen, when asked for information, said they were simply obeying the written request of the owner that there be no trespassing on his premises, but a visit to his home the next morning revealed the fact that the owner of the hall, a Syrian, had been followed to his work in Lowell by the police and had been persuaded to allow them to post the "No Trespassing" sign.

And now from the hearing before the immigration officials on the question of deportation of these people whose real crime is that they have led a strike, the report is broadcast throughout the country that members of the National Guard during the recent Lawrence textile strike were asked "if they would refuse to be true to their oath of allegiance and would lay down their arms in the event of a red riot." It is said too on the best of authority that testimony was offered at this hearing that the strikers were asked to join a rifle club and to practice at a rifle range. Apparently the authorities, both municipal and federal, are convinced that the prejudice against the reds is so deep-seated that the American people have lost perspective and even their sense of humor.

Two significant things stand out in this story of Lawrence. First, a legal process has been invented for use in the realm of industrial conflict—a charge of conspiracy by which apparently the leaders of any strike, be it under conservative or radical auspices, can be arrested at a moment's notice and kept under impossible bail—which the Constitution of the United States forbids—until the emergency time of the strike has passed and the demoralization of the workers has been accomplished. Second, the conviction has been buried deep in the hearts and minds of thousands of those who toil that the machinery of government is for the sole use of those who possess the economic power. But of still greater concern in the recent experience in Lawrence to the student of human relations is the passing of civil liberties—freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of assemblage, freedom from invasion of basic rights.

Aftermath of a Lynching

By WILLIAM PICKENS

A LYNCHING took place in Marion, Indiana, on August 7, 1930. The victims were two Negroes charged with murder; there was also what seems to have been a false charge of rape, which served to win sympathy for the lynchers. The two men were in jail and would have been fully punished by the State.

The trial of the second of the half-dozen or so men who were indicted for the lynching was in progress in the last week of February, 1931. And it was astonishing to see and feel the mob atmosphere that still prevailed nearly seven months after the murder. The first member of the mob to be tried had been acquitted by the jury in twenty minutes. Against the second, Charles Lennon, there was enough evidence to hang ten men. Seven reputable citizens, including the sheriff from whom the prisoners had been taken, the chief of police, and two reporters of the two local papers, had definitely identified Lennon as the man who had swung the sledge hammer to break down the jail doors. And an eighth witness, who did not know him by name, described him exactly as the other seven had described him. Moreover, the witnesses for the defendant included his wife, his mother-in-law, his brother-in-law, and a "good friend," in whose testimony the prosecution pointed out many discrepancies and some absolute lies.

But it was plain that the mob spirit was dominating the trial and the court. Men who had been members of the mob packed the auditorium to the corridors, hundreds of them, every day. And a hard-faced lot they were. The better class of citizens seemed to be unconcerned about the matter; at least they were not present during the first three days of the trial. The Negroes, too, absented themselves, since they had no hope of seeing justice done, until finally a mass-meeting of Negroes was called, and the speaker, representing the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, showed the colored citizens how by their sullen and despairing absence they were leaving the whole spiritual domination of the courtroom to the mob. He urged them to attend the trial and by their very presence add their spiritual weight to the forces of prosecution.

During the last three days of the trial, therefore, Negro citizens attended in unusually large numbers. And strange to say, the rougher-looking mob element dwindled a bit among the spectators and some of the more cultured whites began to attend. On Friday afternoon, when the crowd was waiting on the deliberations of the jury, most of the mob crowd stayed out in the corridors, while Negroes and the better class of whites sat inside.

I visited Marion just a few months before the lynching. At that time the colored people gave a banquet for me, to which the mayor, the chief of police, and other city officials and prominent citizens came by invitation. They ate and drank with us. They declared that the colored people were on the whole the most law-abiding and the best citizens of Marion. But seven months after the savage lynching, many white people frowned or growled at the sight of a colored person; friendly greetings were rare, suspicion quick. We always fear and suspect those whom we have injured.

At the trial, while the judge seemed to be professional, the general atmosphere of the court was biased. The two young lawyers representing the attorney general's office and the "State" were looked upon as enemies of the community not only by the mob but also by most of the court officials. Their objections were almost uniformly denied and they were frequently insulted by court subordinates, while the two defense lawyers by a trick kept one of the prosecutors, Judge Earl Stroup, from making his plea to the court. After Merl Wald, the first prosecutor, had made his argument before the court, the attorneys for the defense announced that they would make no argument; as a result Stroup had no chance to present the devastating rebuttal which they knew he would make. The defense lawyers, who appeared to be weak and inexperienced—they were said to be two insurance agents who had recently "read law"—were willing to let their case rest with the evident prejudices of the jury. One of the defense attorneys was observed exchanging grins and disparaging grimaces with one of the jurors while Prosecutor Wald was making his remarkably fine statement to the jury. In his charge the judge laid great emphasis on the "presumption of innocence" to which the defendant was entitled, and stressed the point that proofs against him must be "beyond a reasonable doubt."

The case went to the jury on Friday. All afternoon the crowd waited, hundreds of people with less than twenty determined Negroes among them. The jury evidently could not agree. The Negroes had decided to stay through to the end. Mobs are like dogs. They seize you when you run, but only bark or growl or snap at you when you stand. The Negroes decided to stand at all costs. There were detectives, uniformed policemen, and deputy sheriffs in the crowd, but their presence held no assurance for colored people. Many of the spectators were armed, including some of the Negroes. Six of the Negroes who stayed were women, including Mrs. F. K. Bailey, local leader of the colored people. She and her husband, like all the other colored citizens of Marion, have been living under the threat of mob attacks ever since last August. The jury deliberated for many hours. Apparently it included at least one brave man who held out to the end, for the final report was disagreement. The trials of these two lynchers will have cost the county eight or ten thousand dollars. That is perhaps the only punishment that will be meted out. Other cases will be dropped.

The Lennon trial was a fitting climax to the events of the preceding months in Marion. The mob had "felt its oats" ever since that savage night in August and had made continuous attempts to terrorize the Negroes. They rode up and down through the Negro sections in fast autos, shooting and shouting, sometimes adjusting their engines so as to make rapid "back-firing" in the wee hours of the morning, simulating machine-guns. The one Negro physician, who has his office just a half-block from the main square and the courthouse and who has quietly but determinedly kept up his practice in the face of repeated threats, seems to be the chief thorn in the flesh of these people. The physician, six feet tall, straightforward, unquivering, says nothing but goes armed constantly, carrying a Winchester in addition when he answers calls at night. One night, after the firing of many shots near his residence, four automobiles filled with men drew up and parked directly in front of his house on the opposite side of the street. The doctor opened his front door so that the flare of his brightly lighted house fell right across the porch and down the front walk. The mob decided not to accept his invitation and silently withdrew.

Threats were passed around about what would happen to the colored population if Lennon were convicted. It seemed to make no difference that there was no Negro concerned in the actual trial in any way, not even as a witness: the prosecuting lawyers were representing the attorney general's office and the "State" and were almost apologetic in explaining that they had only a professional interest. The case throughout was one of white against white, eight of the most reputable citizens of the town being witnesses against the lyncher. Yet on the day preceding the giving of the case to the jury, mysterious telephone calls were made to the residence where the representative of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People was staying, "warning" him or insinuating threats. The warning came from a white woman, who said that she could not afford to give her name or to tell from what telephone she was making the call. The voices of men called several times, inquiring where the association's speaker was to speak next in Marion, and what route he would take in going and coming that day to and from Muncie. And all night there was shooting and automobile back-firing through the streets where colored people live. The next day efforts were made to frighten all colored people from attending court. Some were frightened away. Others went back with grim determination and a desperate resignation.

The Indiana legislature has just passed a bill to curb lynching. The bill originated among the colored people as a result of the Marion lynchings, and was finally passed almost intact. It provides for (1) automatic suspension of the sheriff in whose county a lynching takes place, with reinstatement only when it is proved to the satisfaction of the governor that the sheriff did his full duty in trying to prevent the lynching; (2) money damages to be assessed against the town, city, or county in favor of the relatives and heirs of the lynched person. The colored people also want the constitution amended, if necessary, to permit the State to ask a change of venue in the trial of lynchers. At present only the accused may ask such a change. In cases of mob violence it would be safe and good policy to allow the prosecution to move for change of venue, for when a great mob holds a small community in its grip for twenty-four hours, there is hardly a prospective juror in the place who is not either a member of the mob, a relative of a member, a friend or a debtor or creditor of a member, or in some way a colleague or henchman of someone interested in defending a member of the mob.

To see Marion nearly seven months after a lynching was to realize the disastrous effect of mob action upon a presumably civilized community. It is a question whether the present generation of Marion inhabitants can ever recover from the relapse of that one night, when they dragged two Negro boys from the jail to a tree on the courthouse lawn in the center square of the city; when, after the killing was over, their youths and young men seized the rope, and like savages, all with their hands on the sacred piece of hemp, danced from the jail to the courthouse lawn, like college students making merry after an athletic victory.

In the Driftway

HIGHER education as it is practiced in this country has come in for some hard knocks within the winter just past. And if the Drifter feels constrained to say a word in its favor it is not because he would care to deny any of the strictures that have been passed upon it by critics more qualified than himself. Aside from the fact that he learned long ago—from a college prof—that it is useless to argue with anyone who doesn't already agree with you, the Drifter would be the first to admit to a serious-minded investigator that in his own case the years he spent at college were mostly wasted, that the hard-earned money (hard-earned by someone else) he consumed might better have gone back into the business, that gerunds and gerundives are to him almost as if they had never been. But he would still feel that the investigator was wasting his breath in railing at American universities.

* * * * *

IT is not yet a crime even in a democracy to say that there are fewer excellent brains in any given group, State, or nation than there are mediocre brains. Keeping that fact in mind, surely it is a little less than realistic to assume that universities which are open to all who come—and the Drifter thinks they should be—can possibly have much relation to higher education in its strict sense; further, if we must provide enough teachers to call the rolls, and if those teachers must have Ph.D.'s to get their jobs, it is patently absurd to expect that very many Ph.D. theses will have any relation to "real scholarship," whatever that is. Such assumptions and expectations can lead only to false hopes and savage sneers, both of which are irrelevant. The Drifter feels, in short, that Abraham Flexner's Institute for Advanced Learning, to which only scholars will be admitted for work in "pure science and high scholarship," is much more to the point than Abraham Flexner's book on the universities. The present-day college will probably remain just about as it is. The critics and the scholars would do better in the Drifter's opinion to let that windmill whirl in its own democratic air and head for more rarefied and more exclusive regions.

* * * * *

As a matter of fact, the Drifter, acknowledging a heresy, thinks that youngsters learn a great deal in college. And if what they learn enters their consciousness during an all-night session in a dormitory bedroom instead of in the class hour father pays for, at least it is likely to be remembered longer and used oftener. The Drifter, for instance, learned a great deal about two subjects not listed in the catalogue on a spring afternoon when he went for a walk with a girl instead of attending a duly scheduled physiology lab. During the stroll an impassioned discussion of careers for women broke loose; in the midst of which there was discovered a hoptoad that had got marooned in a black lake of tar which the spring sun had treacherously melted. For hours the Drifter labored heroically with a jackknife, digging out first one leg and then another, only to find that some other toe had inadvertently slipped back. The battle grew fiercer, and the talk about women grew more impassioned, as the afternoon waned and the tar hardened. But Eliza Hoptoad was finally extricated, presumably intact, since the Drifter cannot remember that she limped as she hopped away; and the woman question was clarified if not settled. The moral of this tale is that the Drifter that day learned so much about the texture of a toad's hide, the stretch of a toad's legs, and the quality of a toad's patience that he has ever since felt a knowing intimacy with hoptoads. Likewise, he learned so much about women that he has been a staunch feminist ever since. These attitudes of his toward hoptoads and women may not partake of education. He thinks they do. But he would never presume to call it higher education.

* * * * *

The Drifter thinks the American university should continue to be open to all who come. Every human being should have at least one opportunity to lead the remote and academic existence which the campus provides. College days are like the false spring of February that comes and goes before the mind can take it in. The only trouble with the students the Drifter knew, including himself, was that they were so preoccupied with April's plowing that February's sunshine was only half-experienced. Naturally they could not know that all their striving would most likely bring them up against nothing more rewarding than overproduction and a sharp decline in prices. It is not true that college students are frivolous-minded. They are in fact the most serious-minded creatures alive. If they concern themselves with first love and the latest rules of an autocratic dean, who is to say that these are less worthy than the price of stocks, the precise date of an early Egyptian tax list, or the founding of a political party? To appease the serious-minded investigators, remove the label Higher Education from the college gate. Put up instead a line from the early Masefield: "The days that make us happy make us wise."

Handle Words with Care

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: To say, as you do in The Nation of March 18, that Hoover's philosophy would do credit to "a Proudhon the anarchist" is much too great a compliment for our President.

> Several of our fellow-men have agreed to treat each other with good faith and fair play—that is, to respect those rules of action which the nature of things points out to them as being alone capable of assuring to them, in the fullest measure, prosperity, safety, and peace. Are you willing to join their league, to form a part of their society? Do you promise to respect the honor, the liberty, the goods of your brothers? Do you promise never to appropriate to yourself, neither by violence, by fraud, by usury, nor by speculation, another's product or possession? Do you promise never to lie and deceive, neither in court, in trade, nor in any of your dealings? You are free to accept or to refuse.

The above is from Proudhon. What relation has it to what the President stands for?

Government never stands for individualism. It stands for the exploitation of the many by the few with the help of the army and the church. You may say that it should stand for social service, but it never has. On the power question Hoover's position merely means that government shall protect a few individuals in the privilege of exploiting nature's bounty and the workers for the benefit of that few. No individual wishes to live without society, and the intelligent individual knows that if he is not to be exploited it must be a condition of society that there shall be no exploitation of human beings.

It is not fair to use words loosely simply to bolster up an argument. Socialism, anarchism, individualism, wealth, capital, education are all used loosely and ambiguously by most people. Those who would teach should be more painstaking.

Support Civil Liberties

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I draw the attention of Nation readers to the nation-wide membership campaign of the American Civil Liberties Union? Although it is hardly necessary to introduce the union to Nation readers, it might be well to remind them of the very important role the union plays in American life today. Briefly, the work of the union consists in keeping a vigilant eye open for cases of violation of free speech, press, and assemblage, and in supplying the victims of such attack, regardless of race, class, creeds, or principles advocated, with expert legal aid, widespread publicity, and organized protest.

The demands on the union this year, through the unrest caused by unemployment, and the intolerant temper of the police, have increased tremendously, and there is no sign of abatement. Our work at the present time is being maintained by an exceedingly small though active membership. It is vitally necessary that we double our strength.

Yearly membership ranges from $1 up through $2, $5, $10, $25, and $100. Our Quarterly Review goes to all members, bulletins and pamphlets to members paying $2 and over, and our weekly news release to members paying $10 and over. Further information can be had by addressing the American Civil Liberties Union, 100 Fifth Avenue, New York.

New York, April 1 HELEN WINNER, Secretary

Intellectuals and the Bonus

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I can easily understand why veterans of the World War want a bonus. And it is also obvious why rich taxpayers like Secretary Mellon are against such appropriations. But I have never understood why the liberal press has been consistently hostile to bonus bills.

You must admit that one function of the government is to distribute its money unevenly by grants, subsidies, and bonuses. Possibly you may be against tariffs, ship subsidies, and guaranties to railroads and infant industries. But you certainly advocate special aid to mothers, to the aged, to the unemployed, to backward farmers, and to many other groups. You favor a graduated income tax, which is class legislation.

Even if a true liberal be against the foregoing grants, he undoubtedly favors the postal system. Yet the postal system, even-handed as it seems, grants special favors to farmers in the parcel service, to airplane companies and shipping interests, to magazines and papers through cheap rates, to business through low third-class rates, to the party in power by manipulation of postmasterships and post offices, and to its current legislators in franking privileges that are generally used to further personal political ends. What is true of the postal service is true of other government functions. Subsidies are not more just because they are not open. The only possible way for the government to avoid special grants would be to dole its income out in cash to individual citizens—and not even the Socialists want that.

Since the government cannot avoid subsidies, the only question for the intellectuals is: Is the subsidy good or bad? The pro-bonus soldiers make two claims: (1) that a dollar a day, plus board, lodging, and pills, was an insufficient wage for the job of killing; and (2) that private soldiers belong to the comparatively poor class that should be helped at the expense of the rich.

There is no such thing as a just wage for knocking home runs or crooning blues or killing Germans. But surely the intellectuals would not commit murder or aid in it for three dollars a day. Even our gunmen and our hangmen demand more. Nor can the intellectuals deny that wealthy privates were practically non-existent, and that rich men either secured exemption or became officers in safe or dangerous places. If our unweary liberals believe in correcting past errors in the Philippines and Panama, let them also advocate "adjusted compensation" nearer home. If the liberals believe that our gap between rich and poor is too vast, let them begin with this piecemeal correction.

Such is the case for subsidies and for this particular subsidy. There are, however, a number of minor facts which liberal magazines have consistently misrepresented. (1) The war-risk insurance cannot be a substitute for pensions because it was at first, and still is largely, a death benefit. (2) The Civil War pensions are our nearest general approach to those old-age pensions that the liberal press so much desires—the awards go to old soldiers and old widows, usually of the poor or middle class. (3) The cost of pensions is a pacifist argument, useful for the liberal press. (4) The war-risk insurance is not a gift from a grateful government—it is just as strictly business as a postage stamp. Rates are cheaper than those of private companies, but the government pays for no advertising, employs no solicitors, pays no commissions, pays no taxes, has comparatively few statistics, and pays small premiums. (5) Similarly, the present Bachrach bill is a business proposition. Not one cent of charity is involved. The government which has been lending money to its heroes at 5½ per cent on good security is now willing to lend twice as much on good security at 4½ per cent. Why does the liberal press always fail to mention that the government has been borrowing this money at 3½ per cent? Why does it never say that the government's profit in borrowing over $300,000,000 at 3½ per cent and lending it at 5½ per cent has amounted to $6,000,000 a year, less operating expenses? What sort of "Treasury grab" is that, and who does the grabbing?

Not Pirandello

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: After reading, in your issue of February 18, Mark Van Doren's review of the current performance of Pirandello's play "As You Desire Me," I had a bewildered feeling that he must be speaking of some other play than "Come Tu Mi Vuoi," which I had just finished reading in Italian. Then I went to the Maxine Elliott Theater to see the production. I found that Mr. Van Doren's remarks are quite justified as far as that play is concerned. But that play can scarcely be called Pirandello's. The production itself is poor enough—it is only the acting of Judith Anderson which in any way redeems it—but we can ignore that since all of Mr. Van Doren's irritation seems to be directed at Pirandello.

In very small letters in the program you may read "adapted from the Italian." It would have been much nearer to the truth to have said "a new play, with the names of the characters and the barest outline of the story borrowed from Pirandello, and entirely rewritten down to what the Broadway producer considers the intellectual level of the American audience." The play as given here bears about the same resemblance to the play Pirandello wrote as the average movie scenario does to the novel from which it is adapted. Lines, scenes, incidents, spirit—all have been changed; what in the Italian is a delicately evocative, wistful study in half-tones, all done by allusion and indirection, becomes here a heavy-handed and rather absurd melodrama. It is scarcely a tribute to the intelligence and taste of the theatergoer to have the producer feel, as he so obviously must have felt here, that unless the play were flattened out with an elephantine tread, and every bit of subtlety or metaphysics signposted for the level of twelve-year-olds, it could not succeed before an American audience. Some day I hope that we may have the privilege of seeing the play that Pirandello wrote. Until then I suggest that the critics reserve judgment on Pirandello as a dramatist.

Mordecai Manuel Noah

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I am completing a full biography of the American Jew, Mordecai Manuel Noah (1785-1851), who was prominent in the political, dramatic, diplomatic, journalistic, and social life of his time.

Since I am very eager to establish communication with any descendants of his who may be in possession of documents or of authentic information relating to him, I should be glad to hear from such persons, who may address me in care of the John Day Company, 386 Fourth Avenue, New York City. All documents will be scrupulously cared for and returned by registered mail immediately after perusal.

Proportional Representation in Ireland

Will It Survive?

WE print here an interesting account of the workings of proportional representation in the Irish Free State, where the system has been in effect during three general elections. The account was written by the Irish correspondent for the Manchester Guardian Weekly.

The Free State has proportional representation in its most elaborate and exact form. The census of 1926 suggested the desirability of a bill for the redistribution of seats, and this has naturally led politicians to consider the suitability of the electoral system which has been tried out now in three general elections.

The a priori arguments usually urged against proportional representation are that it fosters the group system in the legislature and thereby produces instability in the executive, or, alternatively, makes the cabinet unduly subservient to the caprice of the legislature. A posteriori we note that things have turned out otherwise. The Free State is today apparently nearer the two-party system than any country in Europe. Its cabinet is the longest-lived of European cabinets, and his worst enemy will not accuse Mr. Cosgrave of having truckled to the legislature.

It may be argued that these results are due to abnormal conditions—to the fact that one of the Free State parties, Fianna Fail, was an extra-constitutional party which aimed at subverting the foundations of the state. Thus the government party, which is essentially a coalition of separate groups, was compelled to cohere as closely as if it were a true unitary party, while the ministers' revolutionary training gave them an unusual contempt for the elected representatives of the constituencies. Now that Fianna Fail no longer cares to talk of denouncing the treaty, Mr. Cosgrave begins to find it less easy to hold his party together and has to be more cautious about pushing through unpopular reforms.

Even if this is admitted, the fact remains that proportional representation makes for stability in another way. It has abolished sensationalism in politics. The existing English system magnifies the effect of a 10 per cent swing-over of votes, so that a large parliamentary majority may be converted into a humiliated minority, while a minority in the country may get an effective parliamentary majority. Under proportional representation 10 per cent of changes among the voters will be represented by 10 per cent changes in the party numbers in the Dail, and a party which has 40 per cent of the voters in the country gets 40 per cent, and no more, of the seats in the Dail. Further, since proportional representation necessitates large constituencies with four or five seats, each large party is sure of returning its leading candidate in each constituency. Thus on election day there is no hope in any constituency of utterly defeating the enemy's champion. The battle centers round the fate of the second-class candidates.

Another fact about proportional representation which Free State experience brings out is that it favors the candidate with a cross-bench mind as against the sound party man. Suppose a constituency with four seats. The voter is presented with a ballot paper containing ten names. Four are his own party candidates, four belong to the opposition party, one belongs to a small party, and the last is an independent. The voter is quite ready to put two of his own party candidates first and second. Then, with a great effort, he recalls the adjurations of his party leaders and the local canvasser and puts three against his third party man, whom he thinks a bit of an ass. But now he feels that he has done his duty nobly by his party and that he is free to consider his private preferences and exercise his individual judgment with his remaining votes. "Mr. A, number 4 on my party's list, I have always regarded as an unreasonable fellow, anything but an ornament to the party. Now, Mr. B, number 4 on the opposition list, is a decent and intelligent man, likely to exercise a restraining influence on his colleagues. Why shouldn't I give him my fourth preference? And then the independent has done local services and understands our local needs better than any man. Let him have my number 5. And then there is the new party. It deserves encouragement. We need a new point of view. I'll put their man number 6." One of these last votes is quite likely to become effective—number 4 or number 5 more likely than number 6. Thus the wise party manager is careful to choose moderate men as candidates. It is in this way, rather than by getting direct representation for minority interests, that proportional representation has proved a valuable protection to minorities. In spite of the evil legacies left by the bad times the Dail has shown itself on most subjects, except ancient history, reasonable, free from prejudice, and not given to violent utterances.

What pleases the elector is poison to the professional politician, who dislikes the cross-bench mind and wants the sound party man and the emotional atmosphere at elections which brings the sound party man into the House. Thus he is anxious to abolish proportional representation for very much the same reasons as influenced his Ulster brothers to do the deed in Northern Ireland. The strongest argument which he has against it is that it necessitates large constituencies. A five-seat constituency is the smallest suitable unit. It is true that in such constituencies there is a lack of touch between the sitting members and their constituents which is unsatisfactory to both.

Large constituencies also make electioneering expensive for a small party like the Irish Labor Party, which may not wish to contest more than one-quarter of the seats. Its difficulties are aggravated by the fact that Free State electoral law places no restriction on the supply of transport for the convenience of voters. Only the two big parties can afford to have cars in every corner of the country areas.

A return to the single-seat, single-vote constituency system would annihilate the Labor Party and many independents. Hence Mr. Cosgrave could not and probably would not wish to carry such a measure. But the professional politicians may induce him to copy the new English bill and try single-member constituencies with the transferable vote. The effect of this in the Free State would apparently be to promote party spirit. It does not even seem likely to strengthen the position of the third party, Labor. Nor can one easily see why it should be expected to conduce to better government than the Free State has hitherto enjoyed.

PAUL GAUGUIN: The Calm Madman by BERIL BECKER

"One of the most terrible and one of the most inspiring books I have read, a tragedy of hell from beginning to end. My reading of the book was breathless, giving me a thrill which comes more and more rarely to my share. I know of no work giving a more perfect picture of the true artist's struggle against a world stupidly determined not to understand and accept his art," says Edwin Björkman.

Here is an "unforgettable biography" of the great French artist who is revealed in his revolt against convention as the Master Rebel. It carries so much of fascination, aspiration, heroism, weakness, poignancy and madness as to possess the mind of the reader for days after its last page is turned.

CERVANTES: A Biography

by T. R. YBARRA

The wildly adventurous life led by this great Spanish author forms the subject of a glamorous biography. The life of the author of the great Don Quixote is as exciting as that of the hero whose deeds he has immortalized. Mr. Ybarra, an eminent biographer, has set this life against one of the most colorful periods in history.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF LINCOLN STEFFENS

Not only does this great reporter write of "raking the muck" of corruption, of going to the war, to revolutions, to the Peace Conference, of knowing intimately the outstanding figures of the era—Roosevelt, Wilson, Harding, Darrow, Lenin, Mussolini, Carranza. His autobiography, to quote Harry Hansen, "is filled with the understanding of men, their aims, their ambitions, their rewards. It is the story of an American liberal trying to see past the illusion. It is the book you can't put down because it pulls you along with the turbulent rush of its vitality and narrative power. It may be described as a realistic study of political hopes." 2 vols. $7.50

JUNGLE WAYS

William Seabrook

Author of "The Magic Island"

"Jungle Ways" is one of the most profoundly exciting documents that any white man has ever brought out of the Dark Continent. Seabrook goes further than any civilized writer has ever before dared to go in presenting the unexpurgated truth about the intimate life and customs—religious, magical, moral, sexual, and social—of the real savage.

He lived in Africa with the natives of the Ivory Coast jungle, with the Gueré cannibals, and with a little-known phallic-worshipping tribe. Accepted as "the black man with the white face," he was initiated into the secret rites and practices of civilizations fantastically different from our own. "Seabrook brings out of Africa precious material that practically all earlier explorers have missed."—N. Y. Post.

The Philosophy of Morris R. Cohen

By HENRY HAZLITT

THE appearance of "Reason and Nature,"* by Morris R. Cohen, seems to me destined to mark an important milestone, perhaps even a turning-point, in the history of American philosophic thought. Even a critic unsympathetic to its temper and typical conclusions can hardly refuse it a place on that modest shelf of American philosophic classics which holds the works of a bare handful of thinkers—Peirce, James, Santayana, Dewey. What makes it peculiarly significant at this time is that it marks a definite repudiation of the doctrines and catchwords which, chiefly under the influence of James and Dewey, have dominated American speculative thought at least since the beginning of the present century.

One may begin by admitting, indeed, that Morris Cohen's philosophy is "un-American," just as the philosophy of James and Dewey, as most European critics were quick to recognize, is peculiarly American. In James's pragmatism, for example, as Santayana pointed out nearly twenty years ago (and his comment is just as true of Dewey's more recent instrumentalism), there are echoes of various popular American moral forces, like democracy, impressionism, love of the concrete, respect for success, trust in will and action, and the habit of relying on the future, rather than on the past, to justify one's methods and opinions. Writers more distinguished for their patriotism than their perspicacity have even hailed this philosophic reflection of our national ideals as one of the outstanding merits, if not the outstanding merit, of the philosophers concerned. It is significant, however, that these writers have never carried their patriotism to the length of demanding a peculiarly American science, nor does one find them praising, say, a German thinker because his thought is peculiarly German. Philosophy, like science, is worth little unless it is as true in Ceylon as in Cincinnati. Thought that is characteristically national is apt to be merely provincial. It is even open to the suspicion of being a disguised rationalization of the local mores, a system of apologetics.

Now one of the distinguishing traits of Professor Cohen's thought is that it is not only remarkably free from provincialism of place but from provincialism of time. It is neither "American" nor "modern." It is, on the contrary, deeply traditional; not in the sense that it lacks freshness or force, but in the sense that it has attempted to digest the thought of the great philosophers of the past; it feels that the road to truth lies through them rather than around them; that even their errors are instructive, and that instead of airily bidding them goodby, we might profitably examine what they had to say. "The notion that we can dismiss the views of all previous thinkers," he writes, "surely leaves no basis for the hope that our own work will prove of any value to others." "The philosopher whose primary interest is to attain as much truth as possible," he continues, "must put aside as a snare the effort at originality. Indeed, it seems to me that the modern penchant for novelty in philosophy is symptomatic of restlessness or low intellectual vitality." Philosophy, in short, must grow like science, not by each thinker rejecting everything that his predecessors have believed, but rather by absorbing it, scrutinizing it critically, amending, correcting, supplementing, developing it at this point and that, seeking always for more comprehensive vision, but never forgetting that omnipotence and omniscience are not to be attained. "The task of philosophy is too complicated to be solved by simple magical formulae. The age of panaceas, nostrums, and philosopher's stones belongs to the adolescence of philosophy."

I have said that Professor Cohen's thought is neither "American" nor "modern." This is most sharply revealed in his Epilogue: In Dispraise of Life, Experience, and Reality. Popular modern philosophy is honeycombed with these three terms, yet it is impossible to attach a clear meaning to any of them. The last two have been stretched to the point where they no longer have intelligible negatives; the first has often been absurdly narrowed. Thus Nietzsche sharply opposes the pursuit of life to the pursuit of knowledge, ignoring the quite obvious fact that the pursuit of knowledge is itself a form of life. "To the eye of philosophic reflection," Cohen replies, "the scholar or persistent thinker shows as much life or vitality as those who have to cover their naked restlessness by a gospel of strenuous but aimless perpetual motion—in no particular direction. The term "experience" again, as popularized by Professor Dewey, is equally applicable to everything that is an object of consideration, and Professor Cohen cannot see that it serves any definite intellectual function beyond carrying the faint aroma of praise. In brief, the philosophic scandal surrounding all three terms —life, experience, reality—arises from the fact that they have established themselves as terms of praise rather than of description; and the honorific use of non-discriminating terms can only serve to darken counsel.

These criticisms in themselves give the clue to Professor Cohen's broader position. He is a rationalist, in the sense that he is convinced that philosophers, whatever their opinions, must rely on the validity of logical reasoning to establish them; and the task to which he addresses himself in his first chapter is that of defending reason against the modern attacks upon it. For in spite of the popular worship of "science," we have been witnessing today a remarkably widespread decline of the prestige of intellect and reason. This distrust of reason, Professor Cohen feels, has its roots deep in the dominant temper of our age, an age whose feverish restlessness makes it impatiently out of tune with the slow rhythm of deliberate order. Recent popular philosophies—those of James, Bergson, Croce, Nietzsche, Spengler, for example—are at one with recent fiction, poetry, music, painting, and sculpture in attaching greater value to novel impressions and vehement expression than to coherency and order. The romantic or "Dionysiac" contempt for prudence and deliberative (so-called bourgeois) morality is a crude expression of the same reaction against scientific or rigorous intellectual procedure. Professor Cohen does not think it far-fetched to correlate this distrust of intellectual procedure with a growing bigotry and intolerance in political life, and the remarkable resurgence of faith in violence. "From Moscow to the Mediterranean there reigns a pathetic faith in salvation through brutality."

He turns his attention, therefore, to the various arguments—those of psychologism, historicism, empiricism, kineticism—that have been used by those who distrust reason. These anti-rationalistic arguments, which Professor Cohen examines and rejects in turn, are at bottom romantic. Romanticism, however, is not merely negative, but involves an abounding faith in some inner, creative, and unlimited source of illumination or revelation superior to ordinary reason. Professor Cohen considers separately these various rivals and alleged substitutes for reason: authority (as variously reflected in the church, tradition, and expert opinion), "pure experience," intuition, instinct, and creative imagination, and he shows that these are either unreliable or complements of rather than substitutes for reason. Faith, he holds in the end, cannot be based on skepticism as to reason. As for William James's "Will to Believe": "Reason in the form of logical science is an effort to determine the weight of evidence. To tip the scales by the will to believe is childish foolishness, since the real weight of things is not thereby changed."

I have said that Professor Cohen is a rationalist, but I do not mean to imply that he returns to the naive rationalism of the eighteenth century. For while he emphasizes the role of reason, he does not identify knowledge with its rational element. Nature is more than reason; no possible number of analyses can exhaust it; always there remains the beyond, the unexplained, the contingent. Logical "explanations" can never do more than push back the contingency of our fundamental assumptions: ultimately the universe is just what it is. Yet though "our reason may be a pitiful candle light in the dark and boundless seas of being, we have nothing better, and woe to those who wilfully try to put it out."

Professor Cohen is then ready to devote himself to some of the broader philosophic problems raised by reason and scientific method—induction and deduction, the theory of probability, the irrational, and the a priori. He is a realist, in the older metaphysical sense opposed to nominalist; that is, he believes that classes, universals, and relations are real, or at least correspond to something real in nature, and are not mere convenient mental fictions as supposed by empirical sensationalists like Mill. One other principle is central to his thought—the principle of polarity. This is suggested by the phenomena of magnetism, where north and south pole are always distinct, opposed, yet inseparable. Thus opposites such as immediacy and mediation, unity and plurality, the fixed and the flux, substance and function, ideal and real, actual and possible, all involve each other when applied to any significant entity. Not only, for example, must every natural event have a cause which determines that it should happen, but the cause must be opposed by some factor which prevents it from producing any greater effect than it actually does. This principle (which suggests the Hegelian dialectic, with the significant difference that it never violates the principle of contradiction by holding opposites to be identical) may seem at first merely obvious or verbal, but the persistency and rigorousness with which Professor Cohen applies it over a wide range of problems makes it yield highly important insights. Professor Cohen deals in turn, in a series of brilliant chapters—which would be amazing for their scholarship alone—with the problems of method and the crucial philosophic issues raised by mathematics, physics, biology, psychology, and the various social sciences, particularly political theory, law, and ethics. Space does not permit me to indicate in detail the conclusions to which he comes in each subject, but something must be said of his method of approach. He is too critical a mind to line up with any party or cult. Thus, in ethics, he can accept neither absolutism nor antinomianism; in psychology, he is as severe on the loose metaphors and hypostatizations of the psychoanalysts as on the crude materialistic monism of the behaviorists; and in biology, though in the end he finds the hypothesis of mechanism far preferable to that of vitalism, he is careful to point out that neither is free from undue dogmatism. A student of physics and mathematics, he accepts the necessary implications of relativity and recent discoveries regarding the atom without being at all impressed by the religious and philosophic lessons drawn by men like Millikan, Eddington, Jeans, and Compton. While he respects the great achievements of these men in their special fields, he feels that they cease to be scientific when they jump off into "amateurish speculative flights" in the fields of religion and philosophy. In short, he is never a mere "eclectic" or a facile "reconciler"; he is as far as possible from the mushy the-truth-probably-lies-somewhere-between-the-two-extremes writer. Like Bradley, he knows that the exact opposite of a false idea may be an idea equally false.

Emphasizing, as he does, the need for the richest possible variety of observations and hypotheses to assure the probable truth of our results, insisting on the need of unifying principles and yet always directing our attention to the complexity and the fulness of the concrete facts in any particular problem, Professor Cohen bears little resemblance, either, to the philosophic system-builder. What he gives us, in the end, is not a "system" but a set of marvelously sharp philosophic tools. What interests him is the methods rather than the results of thinking; or rather, he feels that more attention to the first will assure more success in the second. If we were to study propositions about morals, for example, with the same detachment as propositions about electrons, caring more for the rules of the scientific game than for any particular result, our ethical theories would probably be much sounder than they are.

Professor Cohen's style compares unfavorably in some respects with Santayana's dulcet periods or with Bertrand Russell's ease and lucidity, but it is not lacking in a fine terseness of its own. Compared with Dewey's prose it seems a model of clarity and firmness. A high devotion to truth keeps the general tone serious. Professor Cohen resists the temptation, to which brilliant writers like Eddington and Poincaré often succumb, to strain after paradoxes; but he often permits himself a dry irony, and he has a remarkable gift for pithy aphorism.

In output, he has revealed a scrupulous will-to-refrain remarkable in our time. For many years his reputation has been growing, but up to now that reputation has been rather esoteric. "Reason and Nature," his first book, appears when he has reached the age of fifty. This explains, in part, why it achieves such remarkable compression; it represents almost literally the work of a lifetime.

The New Mythology

By HORACE GREGORY

THE last eight years in American poetry have been commonly regarded as a comparatively sterile period. The enthusiasm of the 1912 renaissance, with its many discoveries and its new bohemianism, had reached a climax in 1922, and was beginning to recede. The publication of "The Waste Land" in the pages of the Dial was the first indication of a change that was to steer American poetry into new channels, and to develop what may be called a new mythology.

T. S. Eliot, by a deliberate analysis of the civilization recognized as characteristically American, found a title for his major poem. The fact that the immediate locale of the poem was contemporary London is of secondary importance. It is significant that the poem deals with the problems of the contemporary scene and the frustration of spiritual life in the modern city. The "hollow men" (of the poem that appeared shortly after the publication of "The Waste Land") are creatures produced from a waste-land environment. They form a chorus serving as a background for the progress of a modern tragedy.

> We are the hollow men
> We are the stuffed men . . .
>
> Remember us—if at all—not as lost
> Violent souls, but only
> As the hollow men . . .
> This is the dead land
> This is cactus land . . .

Grishkin in a drawing-room, J. Alfred Prufrock, and Apeneck Sweeney are of the same race, children of a broad American desert. The validity of Eliot's myths may be subjected to something that resembles scientific proof. In "Middletown" we rediscover the same barren continent, populated with a "business class" that bears a generic relationship to the hollow men. The despair of the waste land is reechoed throughout Mr. Lynd's sociological report of the average post-war American. Spiritually bankrupt, friendless, obscure, standardized, Mr. Middletown accepts the routine of business as a religious ritual. Both Middletown and his wife seek relief in childish or vicarious excitement. Automobiles, radios, the talkies, speakeasies, and country clubs offer an escape, or at least enough excitement to counterbalance the nervous strain of making a career in business and the fear of losing the job.

It is no wonder that the post-war poet reacted sharply from the Whitmanesque optimism and the blind search for beauty that ran their course in the renaissance of 1912 to 1922. He was confronted with the problem of finding a substitute for old symbols of a spiritual life or recreating traditional symbols of metaphysics into a new language and a new mythology. Upon the evidence of the poetry that has been written within the last eight years, it seems inevitable that much of the new mythology carries with it the implication of tragedy.

Far removed from T. S. Eliot, and springing from tradition that is predominently romantic, Robinson Jeffers has created an entire world of demi-gods walking toward us out of the sharp sunlight and violent storms of Southern California. The psychological importance of Robinson Jeffers's creations is a debatable point, but it may be dismissed as irrelevant to the present interpretation. Mr. Yvor Winters, in a review published in Poetry of February, 1930, has attacked Mr. Jeffers's philosophic credos and his ability to control a precise and effective poetic vocabulary. This, too, is beside the point that Jeffers has given us a convincing mythology which survives by virtue of his narrative power. Cawdor and his adulterous wife, Roan Stallion and the woman, California, the Greek giants in "The Tower Beyond" tragedy, and even the mad preacher in "The Women at Pont Sur" may be taken as symbols rising from the America of "Shine, Perishing Republic."

> While this America settles in the mold of its vulgarity, > heavily thickening to empire . . .
> . . . be in nothing so moderate as in love of man, a > clever servant, insufferable master.
> There is a trap that catches noblest spirits, that > caught—they say—God, when he walked on earth.

The waste land of "Cawdor" and "Tamar" takes on the character of a quicksand. It is not only desolate but treacherous. The magnificent land- and seascape of the Pacific coast, the quick, earth-shaking storms and the grateful calm of rich sunlight over redwood forests and long, rolling beaches, merely deceive the eyes of Titans who are lost in a monstrous hell of their own making. Cawdor, perhaps the most significant of Jeffers's heroes, knows that the materialism of American life has set another trap for him:

> Ruling men's money's a wedge in the world. But > after I'd split it open a crack I looked in and saw > The trick inside it, the filthy nothing, the fooled and > rotten faces of rich and successful men.

Yet Cawdor cannot escape his own doom. The betrayal of human love, a central theme, running throughout Jeffers's poetry, from his early volume "Californians" down to his "Loving Shepherdess," is Cawdor's undoing. Humanity, if we are to accept it at Jeffers's evaluation, feeds upon itself, grows inward, and rots. It is only in the sacrifice of human attributes and in death that Jeffers's myths find union with his deity. Translated into strong lines of action (the very plot a symbol of human destruction) the creatures of Jeffers's imagination stride, love, and die within a nightmare that is becoming known as the American consciousness, which is a poetic distortion of the American scene. They are manifestations of a civilization that on the surface seems childishly innocent and harmlessly insane.

Following upon the heels of Jeffers's Titans, we have Hart Crane's synthesis of America in "The Bridge." It is a deliberate conception of a new myth, and like Jeffers (as opposed to Eliot) Crane relies upon the vitality of an anti-intellectual force. His work translates the emotional shock of skyscraper environment into a fresh poetic vocabulary. Again we see the contemporary poet searching for spiritual values in the American desert. Crane looks backward into America's past toward Pocahontas, Cutty Sark, the Great River, and gazes forward where Atlantis lies, but the present is a world of the Tunnel, where the subway roars through hell:

> The phonographs of hades in the brain
> Are tunnels that rewind themselves, and love
> A burnt match skating in a urinal . . .

Crane attempts a solution, never quite articulate, of his relationship to modern life by way of metaphysics. He has taken the broad background of the American tradition and woven its symbols into a strong yet delicate pattern. Poe, Melville, Whitman, and William Carlos Williams of "The American Grain" are recreated in his own idiom. The forward leap of the poem at its close leaves the barren soil of the waste land far behind:

> intrinsic Myth
> Whose fell unshadow is death's utter wound . . .
> Forever Deity's glittering pledge, O Thou . . .

If Eliot, Jeffers, and Crane were the only creators of a waste-land mythology, they could be readily presented as three striking literary accidents, but such is not the case. The reaction to the American waste land, even when it has resulted in an attempt to escape into the language and music of seventeenth-century poetic diction, is characteristic of the poetry that is being written today. A composite portrait of the scene reveals rather than obscures the characteristic attitude.

Since the war there has been a development of an expatriate group of which Eliot himself is a member, and whose influence is felt in the work of Archibald MacLeish and R. Ellsworth Larsson. The sterility of the modern scene is stressed and made poignant by a nostalgia for the past and the use of distinguished music. MacKnight Black has made the machine itself a means of producing decorative effects, but his commentary upon the entire civilization is slight. Closely allied to the expatriate mood is one of post-war cynicism such as we find in the poetry of Kenneth Fearing. Here is the world of the tabloids, stripped clean of emotional values and presented in the staccato of machine-gun bullets. The same gin-drinking, insane New York civilization comes to light in Joseph Moncure March's "Wild Party," and the specific horror of the waste land is very close to us indeed.

Returning to the mythology of Robinson Jeffers and away from the immediate effects of urban civilization, Isidor Schneider's "Temptation of Anthony" recreates the typical American tragedy in a small-town environment. Frustrated emotional life blazes forth in fury against a persecuted protagonist. The individual man, artist and lover, is crushed and then deified by the mob.

A recent development of the contemporary attitude in American poetry is one of withdrawal from actual conflict. For the moment there is a revival of interest in traditional poetic language and formal elegance, combined with the effort to express emotion in terms of metaphysics. This is another way of saying that the younger groups of American poets are looking for spiritual sustenance and exact boundaries in which they can find security. Perhaps the most original and gifted of these is Léonie Adams, whose precise use of the traditional patterns in metaphysical poetry is always sharp and convincing. Stanley Kunitz and Yvor Winters are also significant figures in building a defense against the intrusion of a harsh world. Their work must not be confused with the familiar art-for-art's-sake formula; it is a direct reaction against the thunderous exuberance that shook the earth in 1912.

Within the last few months another group, under the leadership of Louis Zukofsky, has made an effort to unite in its demand for verbal discipline under the title "Objectivists 1931." An examination of the poetry written by the group reveals again the central theme of tragic disillusionment, but it is by implication rather than statement. The technical influences of Williams, Pound, E. E. Cummings, and T. S. Eliot are markedly evident; and it may be well to observe here that William Carlos Williams, as a creator of a poetic mythology indigenous to American soil, is a profound influence in American poetry today.

For the moment it seems as though we have come to the end of a period in which American poets have preached a gospel of fear and negation. Certain religious phases of Hart Crane's poetry and the reaction of the younger groups that I have indicated by the mention of Stanley Kunitz and Léonie Adams display characteristics of affirmation after defeat. Though the symbols of the waste-land mythology are those of terror and destruction, the very fact that they are created out of what seemed to be barren soil is evidence of an essential vitality at work in contemporary American literature. Despite its subject matter the poetry of the last eight years has shown no lack of imaginative power. The myths of Eliot and Jeffers are possessed of a terrifying will to endure. They have already provided a background for a new interpretation of poetry on the American continent.

Career

By KAY BOYLE

there are many ways now of being a young man not so simple as plowing a field spading a black patch strung thick with earthworms or making love
a procession of lace handkerchiefs swept up from lawns floors
checkerboards

I would be finding a new way to bend water making a fan of it to chill the desert brand cattle break horses with the pulse of the knee
Spring nights would catch me
horning new timber down salmon-rivers my breath at lonely corners linger all night with whiskey-singing sun cracking whips upon my skin of hard man speech running sweet raw high
under the hay

Meditation in Forty-second Street

By JOHN GOULD FLETCHER

Sunlight falls in a long ragged sword-cut across—it swings downward
Over soaring acres of brown; the swift night approaches,
Night without end, the flute players of the white storm uplift
Out of the gulf again and the wind pits
Scarred beetling faces.

Night of strong winds and sheer frost, night set free to roam
Three thousand miles over fruitless plains, empty in sunlight:
What have you seen, have you seen, by what impulse
In the million-faced acres of casemented brick have you come here,
Why has fate set here a door?
The west-wandering peoples
Pass through and do not return: in the free rocky deserts
No one has counted their footsteps:
Their trail is utterly lost.

How shall we shape here, define
Tower from tower when each changes;
Proteus-like assuming some new incarnation,
Altering in form but not purpose; change on the surface;
Under the skin bare rivets that bite into steel,
The groans of loosening stone.

How weigh the weight of these towers,
Seeming so tranquil, indifferent to the life that was burnt up to make them;
And makes them tirelessly anew; in what new sphere must we set them,
Freed from the jangle of noise that still follows; the hoarse diapason
Of horns, hammers, sirens, and gongs—dare they ignore these?
Frozen in lunar night, can their chasm-walls drink only sunlight?
Can they know, can they feel, can they see?

Clamor of impotent impulse beats here against being;
Vainly the towers strain against the sense of life surging beyond them,
Life without meaning or rest, but life like an insect,
Tirelessly heaping the million-celled heap a little higher;
Burying its tiny eggs in domes that were built for free giants;
Rending the nest apart, and scurrying off into shelter.

Men have dreamed gods before in Athenian sunlight;
The coursers of night and of day watched the free contest
Of the olive-strown rock and the sea:
And in Florence
Angelo, tortured by hope, set his listless dreams: thought and stilled action
Over the struggling limbs of reclining Night and Day.
But these gods were gods of a human sort; their stretched effort
Spread from shrines and towers into fields, over the free open woodlands,
Summoning the sap of a million growths toward their harvest,
Man's mind made one with the tireless renewal of nature:
Here, wave upon wave, the stone
Shuts nature out; like sea-cliffs riddled by swallows,
These challenge the spirit, that dares not encompass their meaning;
Set beyond good or evil, or mind and unmind; sheer power that braces its shoulders
Against the void and the darkness;
Not human; a dream of the night that the mind dares not utter Though drawn from the limitless depths of the human will.

Before Dawn

By LOUIS UNTERMEYER

And where the hill went sliding down the south
Into a closed infinity of night,
One star, and one alone, and none too bright,
Came to dispute the darkness and our drought;
One meager hint, one glimmering drop for both,
Parched with dry prayers, soiled with the smell of blight—
And you were all for turning back in fright,
And there were only ashes in my mouth.

Then the one star went out, and something happened,
Something beyond the boundaries of sight.
Something unrolled the darkness; darkness ripened,
Fold on upwelling fold, height over height.
Darkness turned upon darkness; darkness opened
To light, light all-compelling, nothing but light.

Epitaph of a Generation

The Autobiography of Lincoln Steffens. Harcourt, Brace and Company. Two Volumes. $7.50.

THERE should be another name for this rare sort of book: the word "autobiography" is misleading. To be sure, Lincoln Steffens has told here the story of his own life—a part of it, at any rate; but, like Mill and Tolstoy and Henry Adams, he has mainly done something else, and that a more fruitful thing than most self-portraitists succeed in doing. He has written the psychological history and, so to say, the extended epitaph of a whole generation, a whole social movement, a whole class. There is something cartographic about such a book. One reads it with a sense of getting one's bearings in a half-familiar territory for the first time: unrelated by-paths and gullies and hillocks gradually arrange themselves in an intelligible pattern, north becomes unmistakably north, and south south. One stands in a somewhat clearer relation than ever before to one's immediate predecessors, and everyone knows the exhilarating effects of such a change. A book like this is, intellectually, a great economy: it enables generations, as if they were developing individuals, to accumulate experience, to profit even by abortive experiments, to avoid the mere marking of time, and to push on into new realms.

Mr. Steffens's autobiography, to be specific, is the obituary of American reformism, progressivism, liberalism; it is at once the story of and the verdict upon the whole first phase of the movement in this country against privilege, inequality, individualism—the phase that found its characteristic expression in middle-class "social work," in muckraking, in trust-busting, and in reform legislation. Not that these things have not been appraised and found wanting many times before; not that a later generation than Mr. Steffens's has not passed through disillusion and either relapsed into cynicism or moved on to newer forms of positive action. But the whole story has not hitherto been told by a man who could boast of having been magna pars in the movement itself, who had lived out in his own person the whole cycle of enthusiasm and disenchantment and reorientation, and who could speak at once personally and perspectively. Indeed, if another man exists who is better qualified for the task than Lincoln Steffens, I do not know who he is. A dozen other men and women were perhaps as close to the center of the movement as this financial reporter for the Post under Edwin L. Godkin, this editor of McClure's and the American in the palmy days of muckraking, this author of "The Shame of the Cities" and "The Struggle for Self-Government," this friend of Croker and Roosevelt and R. S. Baker and Darrow, of Upton Sinclair and La Follette and Ben Lindsey and Fremont Older, this interviewer of many a boss and many a bribe-taker. But did any of them see through, as Steffens did, the badness of "good men" and the unreliability of upright citizens, or see into the goodness of "bad men" and the curious honesty of the crooks? Did any of them understand, as he gradually did, the inevitable role of corruption and venality in a badly organized society based on privilege? Did any of them, after beginning with the friendship and the views of Jacob Riis and Norman Hapgood, end with a sympathetic understanding of the purposes, on the one hand, of Lenin and, on the other, of Henry Ford?

What all this implies is what makes his autobiography so absorbing a document—a wonderful intellectual plasticity against a background of intellectual integrity, an exceptional union of social imagination with personal intuitiveness. One thinks of the type reformer, of his inflexible commitment to a formula, his indifference to individuals, his dyspeptic zeal: how little of all this there is in Lincoln Steffens! So little that if his book had no other value it would have the richest interest just pictorially or just dramatically, as reminiscence, as evocation, as narrative. There is the most effortless humor, the most natural tenderness, in his account of a California boyhood in the prosperous, innocent days after the Civil War. There is the pleasantest profane exuberance in his picture of undergraduate life in Berkeley in the '80's and of the following years in German university towns and in Paris. But of course the interest of these early chapters remains rather strictly personal. It is when he reaches the period of his newspaper life in New York in the '90's—of his journalistic career in Wall Street during the panic, of his work as a police reporter in the days of Parkhurst and Schmittberger and Riis and Roosevelt—that Mr. Steffens begins to be the inspired chronicler. Nothing could be more spirited or more startling in the effect of truth than the scenes, for example, in which the vehement, the spurious Roosevelt holds the stage; or the glimpses of J. P. Morgan lowering like a great beast in his inner office; or the unstudied reports of illuminating conversations with malefactors like Matthew Quay and Martin Lomasney; or the picture of Paris during the Peace Conference and of Moscow before and after the October Revolution. It is not for nothing that Mr. Steffens got his training as a journalist: the reporter of genius was never lost in the reformer, and this book is the winner accordingly.

But he has been more than a reporter, just as he has been more than a reformer: if the word did not have too many portentous connotations for so genial a man, one would say that he has been a kind of prophet. At any rate, if to be a prophet is to have a true humility of mind and spirit, to grasp imaginatively the conflicts of one's time, to apprehend the relation between men and events, to be capable of disenchantment without bitterness or negation, then Lincoln Steffens has been something of a prophet, and this book has something of the stateliness of prophecy. I do not mean that it embraces the sum of social and personal wisdom, but I do mean that it is full of invaluable hints and intimations. It suggests how the transition can be made from a plastic liberalism to a resourceful and humane radicalism. It suggests how social movements can be given a personal and psychological as well as a collective aspect. It demonstrates, indirectly, the shabbiness of our fashionable cynicism. It is a source book for the critic, for the radical, for the man of action. But it is certainly not merely an "autobiography."

Moore in Aulis

Aphrodite in Aulis. By George Moore. Brentano's. $2.50.

THIS may be the last book we are to have from George Moore. It was written during a long illness to which he had resigned himself as his last, and with a certain grim propriety it is dedicated to the physician who by his encouragement as much as by medicine kept him alive to complete it.

There is nothing in the book, however, of the laxity and the wandering mind of invalidism. Structurally, it is perhaps the firmest of Moore's novels; and there is no loosening of his smooth and scrupulous writing, the outcome of unwearied revision. Characteristically, Moore, to whom there is no such thing as a final script, has made revisions in this edition from what was announced as the definitive form in the first limited edition, adding another to the many similar grievances of his collectors.

The story begins with the dream of Kebren, an Athenian actor, whom a divine voice orders to Aulis. At Aulis he is given refreshment by Otanes, a rich merchant, whose daughter, Biote, proves more insistent than the ambition of Kebren to tour the cities of the Greek world to teach a new interpretation of the significance of Helen in the Homeric epics. Marrying Biote, he begets two sons, Rhesos and Thrasillos, the first of whom becomes a sculptor praised by Phidias, and the latter an architect. Rhesos is imperious and rebellious and the softer-willed Thrasillos follows him. There is an implication of incestuous desire on the part of Biote for her masterful son, Rhesos, in whom the artist she has loved and conquered in Kebren, her husband, is rearisen, unconquerable.

Rhesos and Thrasillos go to Athens and while they are there a series of earthquakes scourges coasts neighboring upon Aulis. In their terror the citizens of Aulis, led by Biote, urge the building of a temple to avert a similar visitation. The goddess chosen is Aphrodite, and Rhesos and Thrasillos are summoned to Aulis to carve her statue and build her dwelling. The temple rises, but Rhesos grows melancholy because he cannot finish his statue until he has seen a certain completing gesture that will make his sculpture divine. He sets out to consult Phidias, but the oxen that draw his cart take the road away from Athens to Tanagra, near which there is a little-known oracle. Its priestess bids him await Aphrodite on the shore at sunrise, and following this advice many mornings, he finally sees two girls walk naked from the surf, one of whom makes the gesture that Rhesos needs to animate his statue. This girl Rhesos marries, while Thrasillos wins the sister. Their marriage, taking Rhesos at last away from her, destroys the desire for love in Biote and from then on she sleeps apart from Kebren. At the end of the book there is a concourse of great men from Athens; Phidias and other notable sculptors, Euripides, Sophocles, and the boy-prodigy Aristophanes all come to admire the temple and its statue, and so to worship Aphrodite.

Thus, in her leisurely way, using up the lives of two generations of a family, possessing them by dreams and oracles when they lag in her purpose, Aphrodite comes to Aulis. There is little other idea in the book, though it would be easy to interpret and find allegories in it of the power of love. But it is not likely that Moore, who believes ideas to be the corruptible parts of a work of art, intended that such allegories be found in it.

The story is quietly told but very moving. Historians and archaeologists may quarrel with Moore and say these men and women are spurious Greeks, the children of the far-away Celtic renaissance. Skeptics, offended by gods and oracles, may debate its reality. Nevertheless, within the world created between its first and last word, and by all that is relevant to itself, there is not a hesitant moment in the book, nothing incredible, unreal, or unconvincing. Like every work of art, it adds its special reality to the realities of the world.

In manner all the characters are alike, all grave and courteous, even the capricious woman and the impetuous man. But under this calm appearance, the calm of quiet reminiscence, there is a subtle and sure building up of personality.

The writing is more fluid than ever. It seems to melt into the mind as one reads, but it recrystallizes in the mind, and is not lost as sometimes happens with faulty stylists. The effect is gained partly by the exquisite choice of words whose sounds mesh perfectly with each other, so that they run together, but the sense of flow itself is given by the present participle, which Moore uses probably more than any other writer in the whole range of English literature. There is no doubt of its occasional overuse in passages that would gain strength were they a little more rugged. To complain of it, however, is to no purpose. A virtue perhaps is not understood until it is practiced to excess.

Because of its exquisiteness critics have often denied strength to the work of George Moore; a ridiculous judgment. The power to arouse emotion and the power to realize character fully and firmly are in his work; other strengths in the writing of fiction are often delusive, mere harsh voices.

Although "Aphrodite in Aulis" does not rank in my mind with "Héloise and Abelard," having, I feel, a slighter story and a slighter command as well of its historical background, it is better articulated and more exquisitely constructed. It has beauty and grace. It is the work of a master.

What Are the English Like?

The Natives of England. By Henry W. Nevinson. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

IN his preface Mr. Nevinson, the veteran journalist, remarks that it is impossible for one race ever to understand another. As prefaces are not seldom intended for signposts to reviewers, this statement may be taken as the equivalent of the road warning "dangerous curve ahead." However, the reviewer must proceed, and Mr. Nevinson himself devotes not a little space to quoting with approbation the wise comment of foreigners on the people and institutions of his own country.

This is but one of the many instances of illogicality in what in some ways is a most difficult book to review. It is at once delightful and irritating, comprehensive and inadequate, careful and slipshod. Familiar with the English scene by residence, intimate through cousinships that are of blood and not of rhetoric, I can appreciate the high quality of much of Mr. Nevinson's analysis of his countrymen, and at the same time as a foreigner can realize the false impression that both commissions and omissions may make upon those who have little or no knowledge of England.

The skeleton construction of the work is almost as precise as that of a doctoral thesis, the chapters being headed The Island Scene, The Race, The Monarchy, The Nobility, The Upper Classes, The Middle Classes, The Country Worker, The Workpeople, Interests of the English, and The English Base. This sounds formidably dry-as-dust, but in fact this logical skeleton disappears in the book as do the bones which we are quite unconscious of beneath the charming shroud of flesh of a smiling and inconsequential youth. The fault of the book is not erudition of the German type but amateurishness of the English sort. Nevinson has quite clearly written to please himself rather than to instruct even his own countrymen, much less the despised foreigner. For example, although he traces the history of the monarchy, tells us that there is no longer any demand for a republic, chats about the rather snobbish love of royalty by the people at large, and devotes nearly three pages to the king as head of the church, he gives the reader no inkling at all of the genuinely deep feeling of many Englishmen for the king as symbolizing in visible form the whole of the mental complex which they call "England," nor of the absolute necessity of a non-elected head of the Empire if the Empire is to hang together. Both these points are of the most profound importance when considering the English form of government, yet in twenty pages the author mentions neither of them, preferring to skim the surface with a good deal of irony and persiflage.

Here and there one may, with all modesty, disagree with specific statements, but on the whole the misleading statements, if I may be permitted a bull, are those which the author does not make. I have just illustrated this with regard to the monarchy. Another case is that of the Englishman's conception of "home," so different nowadays from that of any other of the dozen nationalities or so with whom I have some acquaintance. This is the more inexplicable as this is precisely one of the things about England which he says in his preface no foreigner can understand. He pokes fun at the rather stuffy interiors of the old country houses, but the spirit which animates them does not emerge. In the same way, for all Mr. Nevinson tells us, the Empire might almost be non-existent. The book is, of course, about England (though the two examples of "gentlemen" chosen to represent certain gentlemanly qualities are both Scotch!), but England itself as the island heart of empire is psychologically different from what it would be as a solitary island north of Europe.

The book, however, is a shrewd and delightful presentation of certain aspects of English life and character, marred a little in the earlier chapters by too great a straining after what, in connection with Mayor Walker, have attained notoriety as "wisecracks." Nevinson's sympathies have aways been with the working classes, and as he rises in his climactic series of chapters from the king and aristocracy to the miners and trawlers, his style becomes increasingly simple and sincere.

I do not know whether Nevinson is an Oxford man, who has been said to "walk as if the whole world belonged to him," or a Cambridge one "who walks as if he didn't give a damn whom the world belonged to," but he writes as either might in so far as he discusses what he wants to and nothing else. If the reader will remember that he is far from getting all of the English spirit and character in this book, he will get a lot that is true and worth while about both, set down delightfully and with wealth of illustration.

James Truslow Adams

An Honest Socialist

America's Way Out: A Program for Democracy. By Norman Thomas. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

HERE is an honest book by an honest man. Convinced that in a world of power-driven machinery some form of collectivism is inevitable, satisfied that the lords of the new capitalism are incapable either of ruling without enslaving us or of bringing order into the present chaos of world economic disorganization and threatened war, unable to accept communism as the way out because its attainment frankly involves dictatorship and war, Norman Thomas believes that our American way of salvation lies in the attainment of socialism by peaceful and democratic means. He summarizes his work thus:

> My only claim to originality is in the choice and organization of material and in my attempt to present the necessity for socialism in our machine civilization, a philosophy for the necessary organization to carry it out, and grounds for hope that human nature does not make the task impossible—all these not as separate subjects but as essential and related parts of the Socialist case.

Readers will find here in one form or another most of the standard Socialist ideas and arguments, and most of the facts commonly alleged today in the United States in support of those arguments. But with his usual candor Norman Thomas has stated the Marxian theories in his own fashion, without any pretense of worshiping at the Marxian shrine. Those who want a full statement and criticism of the great corpus of Socialist theory, then, will turn elsewhere than to the present volume; nor will they find here more than the barest outline of Socialist history. Rather they will find a consideration of the present state of affairs in the United States, and an attempted way of mending that state of affairs without revolution or war, in a world which offers no certainty, but at best a reasonable hope, of such a change through intelligent and well-organized effort.

The Communists will damn the book—and rightly from their point of view—for its lack of cast-iron theory, for its endless compromises and its acceptance of halfway measures as means to the end. The orthodox Socialists will curse it for its inadequate presentation of the classical doctrines and records of socialism. The orthodox economists will scorn it for its failure to grapple with their theories. The historians will criticize it for its neglect to marshal large and impressive-looking bodies of fact. The stylistic and logical critics will pounce upon it for its lack of literary grace and of compelling order and arrangement of material. The ordinary intelligent reader will doubtless admit a measure of truth in all their criticisms, and then will remember that what he has been doing is to watch the honest thinking of a candid mind, trying to find a practical solution for a pressing problem of the utmost magnitude and complexity, in a situation that is not logical or orderly, that is not amenable to formulas, that calls for practical measures of thoroughgoing reconstruction taking full account of all the mountainous difficulties in the way of any effective action.

Ever since the war Norman Thomas has been steadily growing, not only in his command of the materials and the methods of economic and social advance, but in the respect and esteem of all classes of men, including those who disagree with him intellectually. His book is therefore assured of a wide welcome as a statement of his present faith, of the reasons why he holds it, and of the means by which he hopes to attain it. If that faith lacks something of the glow of the apocalyptic vision, if those reasons are none other than the reasons that have convinced many other thoughtful Americans, if the means are simply common-sense adaptations and developments of plans and devices already projected and partly worked out here and elsewhere, it is all but part of the genuineness of a book that does not pretend to be other than what it is, the best formulation that Norman Thomas has yet been able to make of America's Way Out. HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

California

Orange Valley. By Howard Baxter. Coward-McCann. $2.

TO find a parallel for a locality evoked so vividly as the valley of the San Joaquin in California is here evoked, one must go back to Anderson's "Winesburg, Ohio." The similarity of the two books, however, stops here. The characters in "Orange Valley" are more alert, less baffled than those in Sherwood Anderson's stories; but in both books is the same feeling for a particular locality—a locality so insistently presented to the imagination that in the end the slightest detail seems to evoke the whole setting, and at times even the whole manner of life of the characters.

The characters of "Orange Valley" are the fruit ranchers and their families; they are Easterners to whom the West seems essentially foreign. They have built up their groves in country that was once desert, and the problems they face are the communal problems of marketing, of water and frost. It is the daily round of the lives of these people that concerns the present author—the inconsequential business of irrigating, of sitting on the porches in the evening, of going to town, of driving over the mountains to the beach. These people are continually consoling themselves for the disappointments of their crops by believing that the next crop will be better than the last one, and in the meantime they know that the water is sinking steadily in the wells, and that a rush of alkali to the surface may destroy their groves. In the face of these conditions their individual problems seem somehow insignificant, even to themselves. The central character of the book, Charles Swanson, suppresses everything dramatic in his life; he quietly abandons his plans for marriage when his mother disapproves of Magine, the girl he wants to marry, and after his mother's death he avoids writing the letter that would bring his sweetheart to him. In the last chapters the emphasis changes from Charles to his sister, Juliana, and while Charles is paralyzed by doubts of Magine, largely because he cannot forgive her for having given herself to him, Juliana is tormented because she cannot force herself to surrender herself to her lover. The drama of "Orange Valley" is the drama of inaction and indifference, yet it is remarkable how well Mr. Baxter has succeeded in giving it movement and vigor. But, in the end, it is not through their personal troubles that the characters of "Orange Valley" reveal themselves. In the end we know Charles, not because of his struggle with himself when he learns that his sister may be pregnant, or through his cloudy romance with Magine, or through any of the complications of the novel, but through his trivial, meaningless actions as he moves about his house or his groves.

> When he turned toward the house he forced the blade of the hoe under the loose soil in order to make it stand like a milestone at the head of the middles in which the water was running. The tops of the trees were purple and jutted into a layer of coppery light, but down closer to the ground darkness lay in masses beside the trees. He could hear the water singing in a monotone as it fell from the standpipes, and the wild voices of the children at play floated clearly to him but with a strange rise and fall in intensity. The dim clatter of his or his neighbors' pumps was repeated at regular intervals, slow sounds as if the pumps paused to meditate before bending to a great effort.

There are needless repetitions in "Orange Valley," particularly in Charles's reflections about Magine. The opening chapters seem awkward and artificial, and there are occasional incongruous suggestions of Hemingway in the conversations—incongruous because these people are far removed from the self-conscious expatriates of Hemingway's particular world. But the positive virtues of the novel make its defects negligible. The California of Howard Baxter is neither the paradise of the advertisements nor the drowsy, prosperous country a traveler sees along the highways; it is a California that exists as a rich land inhabited by people who only dimly understand the poverty and monotony of their lives. A locality so clearly realized that it becomes neither local color nor a background for characterization, but an integral, motivating factor in the story—it is this that makes "Orange Valley" a remarkable achievement.

ROBERT CANTWELL

Handbook of a New Religion

American Caravan IV: A Yearbook of American Literature. Edited by Alfred Kreymborg, Lewis Mumford, and Paul Rosenfeld. The Macaulay Company. $5.

ONE question occurs to everyone when a new issue of the "American Caravan" appears: Is it any better than the others? It appears to be a sensible question. As a matter of fact it betrays a basic misconception of what the "Caravan" is—as well as that tragic American impatience which has created the get-rich-quick system in business, the super-spectacle system in the movies, the genius system in literature. Unless the new "Caravan" contains thirty-seven geniuses, we say in effect, we don't want to look at it. The reason is simple: the "Caravan" is the mirror of ourselves.

What do we see when we look into it, what makes so many of us curse the whole idea and turn away? Immaturity, immaturity undisguised. The "Caravan" represents one of our few attempts to be honest with ourselves, to see ourselves in the nude. As such alone it would be one of the most important literary institutions in America. The geographical patriotism that it expresses is something we can all admire; in fact, it may even amount to a "standard" around which we all can rally. Walt Whitman, of course, is the "Caravan's" prophet, and its aim, like his, is to make America conscious of herself. Such an aim is not primarily artistic but religious. The "Caravan," therefore, is really addressed to those who make a religion of their country. Artistically it is of little value. If you are looking for the "aesthetic emotion," look somewhere else. If you are looking for geniuses—I assume that you would know one if you saw one—you had better subscribe to a club that will guarantee to mail you a new one every month. This year's "Caravan" is still no better than the first. The reason is simple: American life, of course, is exactly the same as it was four years ago.

It would be ridiculous then to criticize the "Caravan" strictly from the standpoint of achieved art. It is the crude handbook of a new religion, the religion of America. As a whole it can be criticized only on the basis of how clearly those in charge of it have kept its essential purpose in mind. Without forgetting the good things that have been printed, it has been apparent to everyone that each issue has contained several items which had no place in such a book. These editorial mistakes would seem to be due principally to the desire for novelty and "well-roundedness," neither of which, if we remember its purpose, has anything to do with the "Caravan." The novelty of adolescents, for the most part, is either crankiness or concealed imitation; and "well-roundedness" is merely a publisher's cliché. The duty of the editors is not to provide us with a literary banquet (which if we ate it would only make us sick), but to spy the significant men among the manuscripts and to offer the encouragement of regular publication to their development.

This year the editors have splendidly done their duty in the inclusion of an essay called Art and Identity, by Ferner Nuhn. This essay is the outstanding contribution to "American Caravan IV." It attacks the problem of the formation of an American culture and imposes the obligations that must be assumed by the individual American artist. It is evident that Mr. Nuhn has prepared himself for his subject with much reading, travel, and thought; but above all that he has a strong new spirit. Though excellently informed and under no illusions, he has lost none of his earnestness; and he writes with both vigor and sensibility. The stoicism that he advocates is most significant. There is no sense in extravagant prophecies, but on the strength of this essay alone, though I have since acquainted myself with his other published work, I may say that I feel confident of Mr. Nuhn's future importance. And it should be noted in passing that his remarkable essay in all likelihood could have been published nowhere else.

Of the different groups of material, I should say, the short stories maintain the highest standard. Some of the contributors to this section are Paul Rosenfeld, S. Guy Endore, Jonathan Leonard, William Faulkner, Evelyn Scott, Robert Penn Warren, Joseph Vogel, and Robert Cantwell. The best of the stories, in my opinion, is that by Mr. Rosenfeld, The Dark Brown Room, which recalls one moment from the Victorian back parlor of a genteel German-Jewish family in New York. Thought and feeling have fused well in this story; it is a well-considered expression of Mr. Rosenfeld's personality, one of his best works. If it does not convey the pathos of its situation, it succeeds notably in conveying the emotion of its author. This emotion, which comes to us wrapped in a tender sophistication and sensuality, is interesting and underived.

Special mention should be made of three modest contributors whom it seems unusually appropriate to find in the "Caravan." They are Philip Stevenson and Albert Halper, who have written stories, and James Henry Sullivan, who has written a visionary essay about architecture. As writers these three are hardly expert: Mr. Stevenson continually misses fire; Mr. Halper falls down when he comes to the very point of his story; and Mr. Sullivan as often as not is unintelligible. Yet the spirit of each is extremely attractive and is allied, moreover, to that religion of America which we have mentioned. In a time when purity of purpose is a rare thing, we can only be glad that the "Caravan" has encouraged these three. And it might be noted that the work of Mr. Stevenson, who has contributed to earlier numbers, shows definite improvement over the past.

It is plain that the value of the "Caravan" as an institution depends upon its permanence and regularity. As we have said, the principal duty of the editors is to realize and be true to its essential purpose. Common sense will dictate the same policy to the publishers. They are mistaken if they believe that the "Caravan" will ever earn much money for them. By its nature it is doomed to be unpopular; its sale will be restricted to that small minority which still, in a world that is doping itself with gloss and falsehood, desires self-knowledge. If the publishers wish to continue the excellent service they have performed, rather than be halted by expense, let them be economical. If necessary let the "Caravan" be printed on newsprint and bound in paper. The important thing is to keep going, to outrage the entire nation with this likeness of itself.

The World of William Faulkner

Sanctuary. By William Faulkner. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.50.

AMONG the characters of Mr. Faulkner's latest novel are a murderer, an ex-harlot, a drunkard, two half-wits, a nymphomaniac, a degenerate child, three procuresses, and a voyeur. The action of the book includes two cold-blooded killings, an emasculation, a lynching by gasoline fire, a jazz party in honor of a gunman's corpse, and a particularly inhuman sexual assault. In his search for the perfect Inferno Mr. Faulkner makes no Dantesque journeys—his hell lies in the territory of northern Mississippi. There is no recent book better contrived to send Mr. Irving Babbitt into a (restrained) fit of delirium tremens.

But the book is real, there is no doubt of it. Mr. Faulkner has an almost Joycean power of exteriorizing his horror-obsession. His damned and distorted cosmos is a cosmos. It is not a private belly-ache. And because it is a cosmos, obeying laws of its own, self-sufficient, shaped and dynamic, one cannot deny to Mr. Faulkner the title of creator. By virtue of this book alone he at once takes his place among the foremost of the younger generation of American novelists. He is an original.

And yet it is not hard to understand the point of view of the sweetness-and-lighters who are dismayed by his "sadism" and his morbidity. One cannot, of course, challenge an artist's choice of materials; one can only challenge his manipulation of them. Perhaps I am merely tender-minded, but it seems to be that "Sanctuary," while startling and intensely interesting, is not overwhelming—and it might very well have been. It fails to overwhelm chiefly because it makes an exaggerated attack on the reader's nervous system. Here we have a book curiously akin to the eighteenth-century Gothic tale of horror. It makes use of similar mechanisms—dark hints, desolate backgrounds, unrelievedly black villains. But, instead of the flesh, it makes the mind and viscera creep. Each individual page is a calculated assault on one's sense of the normal, like the clever incantations and manual passes of the hypnotist. But while one succumbs to the hypnotist one does not quite succumb to Mr. Faulkner. His book induces a sort of stoic behavior-response; one wants to fight back against these repeated shocks, these impacts of horror. As a result, so much nervous energy is expended in this nervous resistance that the sensitive faculties which should lead you to abandon yourself to Mr. Faulkner's witchcraft are actually in part inhibited. The imagination gets charley-horse.

Mr. Faulkner's descriptive style, too, for all its terrific cleverness (I am speaking particularly of his cruelly evocative observation of unpleasant sensory impressions) is a little too taut, too strained. The hypnotist works too hard. Each sentence bears more than its due freight of tenseness, innuendo, horror, and fear. One's sense of the normal, at first paralyzed by the impact of this coiled and deadly prose, at last reawakens—and the spell is, for the moment, broken. There is a kind of artistic detachment so icy as to induce in the reader nervous terror rather than aesthetic submission. Accordingly, the more thoughtless critic may find it easy to accuse Mr. Faulkner of mere maliciousness; he may urge that ugliness, while it can be pushed to the point of art, can never pass the threshold beyond which lies the genuinely tragic. But I do not think that there is anything loosely gratuitous in Mr. Faulkner's morbidities. He has simply made a slight error in the calculation of his effects. He must learn when to pull his punches.

From almost every point of view "Sanctuary" is a better book than either "As I Lay Dying" or "The Sound and the Fury." Its construction, however, is more open to criticism. It is really two novels, not one. The story of Horace Benbow, unsuccessful as lawyer, husband, and idealist, forms one novel. That of Popeye and Temple Drake forms another. They revolve about one another like the components of a binary star system, connected by lines of force but none the less separated. Also, there are certain bravura passages, gorgeous in themselves, but which as far as the necessities of the plot are concerned seem dragged in by the ears. Examples are the Hogarthian humors of Reba's gin party and the horrible grotesquerie of Red's funeral.

There are other weaknesses in the book but they are all resultant from the copiousness of the author's imagination. Possibly he has tried to do too much. His faults are the faults of excessive eagerness. He remains, for me at least, with Ernest Hemingway and Conrad Aiken, among the most interesting young novelists now writing in America.

Piatiletka—Russia's Five Year Plan. By Michael Farbman. New Republic, Inc. $1.

A VERITABLE avalanche of books about Russia has descended on America during the last two months. More are coming—at the rate of three a week. Most of them deal, directly or indirectly, with the Five-Year Plan. Someone has said that if people don't stop talking about the Five-Year Plan it will have a nervous breakdown. But I suppose it is inevitable that the world and the United States in particular should show increasing interest in the Soviet Union's domestic and foreign affairs. Imagine how happy Einstein would be if he could leave this earth of ours, travel for eight days through the ether, and then set up his telescopes and other paraphernalia on a little observation planet from which he could measure, and check his theories. Bolshevik Russia affords the bourgeois expert an opportunity of getting off the capitalist globe and looking back on it for purposes of comparison. When capitalism suffers by that comparison, Russia begins to constitute a challenge to the bourgeoisie to put its house in order or abdicate. This is the real "red menace," and the real reason why even the relative success of the Five-Year Plan has alarmed the Western world. If a system of economy and government which denies the wisdom and efficacy of capitalism can register even slight progress, capitalism thinks it must be on its guard.

A year ago the man who suggested that the Five-Year Plan might be fulfilled was a "Bolshevik agent." The Five-Year Plan was a statistician's dream. Now bourgeois specialists themselves proclaim Soviet accomplishments. Today it is the pro-Bolshevik who holds up a cautioning finger and warns against vaulting from the extreme of skepticism to the extreme of exaggerating Soviet achievements. For this reason a book like Knickerbocker's "Red Trade Menace" is misleading, though it contains many important truths—and, incidentally, some untruths. There is no Soviet trade menace, just as there is no convict labor in the production of Russian export timber. The proof cannot be adduced in a book-review. This morning the assertion may sound rash. Some day it will be accepted just as naturally as the thesis of stability of the Soviet regime and Why Recognize Russia?

THIS is the title of a new book by LOUIS FISCHER, whose Soviets in World Affairs, published last September, has been accepted internationally by editors and statesmen as the most comprehensive and informed history of Soviet diplomacy written. WHY RECOGNIZE RUSSIA? presents fully the argument for and against American recognition of Russia. A chapter is devoted to that much-discussed question of Communist propaganda, world revolution, and the relationship between the Soviet government and the Communist International. Both sides get a hearing. Another chapter deals with the vexed problem of debts. A long chapter describes the actual diplomatic relations that have existed between the American and Soviet governments. You can no longer afford to ignore the Russian issue. WHY RECOGNIZE RUSSIA? gives you all the facts. Just published. $2.00. (Jonathan Cape & Harrison Smith.)

the success of the Five-Year Plan. On this point "Soviet Foreign Trade—Menace or Promise" can be read with profit. It presents a mass of significant data on Russia's world commerce and on labor in the U. S. S. R.

The best book I have seen on the Five-Year Plan is George S. Counts's "Soviet Challenge to America." I recommend it especially to those who may believe that planned economy is possible under capitalism. For Counts demonstrates that the Five-Year Plan is not an office economist's blueprint, but a map of Soviet life itself. The author shows how political, social, and cultural activities dovetail with the construction of plants and dams, and how coordinated and charted economy integrates with proletarian participation in industry, the activity of local soviets, indeed with every feature of the Soviet governmental system. This book is consequently not merely a good description of the Five-Year Plan, but a useful handbook on Soviet politics. Professor Counts makes it plain that the object of the plan is as much "making Bolsheviks" as making tractors.

Professor Harper's little volume of lectures is an interesting addendum to a study of the plan. But although written in simple language his "Making Bolsheviks" assumes considerable knowledge of Russian conditions and Bolshevik principles. It will mean much to the person acquainted with Russia; it will bewilder the beginner. The author does not delineate Russian social types. He merely outlines the role in Soviet society played by groups now emerging: the Communists, the Young Communists, the class-conscious workers, the collectivized peasants, the culture crusaders, and the ideologically red soldiers. The book is written without evident bias. The author is at times cynical, at times skeptical, but never hostile. Nevertheless, Dr. Harper encountered the difficulties that would face any scientist trying to photograph a fetus swimming confusedly in its opaque element.

As a dynamic description of the Five-Year Plan in the short compass of a 35,000-word New Republic dollar book, Michael Farbman's volume has no peer. He sees with the keen eye of a fine economist and able analyst. Since he can compare the ante-bellum and post-bellum Russias, and since he combines the warm, nervous temperament of the native Russian with the dispassion of a man who has lived many years in England and written brilliantly for leading British dailies and periodicals, his product possesses an intimacy and a sense of understanding lacking in many other treatments of the Five-Year Plan. And yet it too, like all the books under review, is only an attempt at social photography. A moment in the development of a great revolution is caught by a portable typewriter-camera. Since 1917 I suppose three hundred books on Russia have appeared in the United States. Those that can be read with profit two years after publication could be counted on the fingers of two hands. LOUIS FISCHER

Jane and Thomas

The Two Carlyles. By Osbert Burdett. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.

THE straining of strong natures held in the bonds of marriage by an indissoluble attachment has been a favorite theme of the novel, taxing the art of so sure a realist as Arnold Bennett in "These Twain." It is still more fascinating in real life, in the relations of a man and a woman of genius. For the married history of Thomas and Jane Carlyle there is a great mass of documents, permitting posterity to scrutinize with microscopic detail. The celebrated Froudean controversy, recently summarized by Mr. Waldo Dunn, has enlisted strong passions in favor of husband or wife. Consequently, an already whetted appetite welcomes Mr. Burdett's proposal to treat the subject without partisanship as "a work of imagination."

The expectation of a dramatic story with psychological penetration is disappointed. Not that Mr. Burdett is inaccurate or skimping with his materials. Despite his disclaimer of scholarly professionalism, he has examined almost everything pertinent, even reading through Carlyle's "Frederick," an uncommon feat nowadays. But the book is weak precisely where he intended it to be strong—as a work of imagination. Conventional standards are applied to an extraordinary marriage. Such generalizations as "woman, the ivy, naturally clings" are irrelevant to the strong-minded Jane. Mr. Burdett assumes her chief cause for unhappiness to have been childlessness; there are eleven references to that topic, spread through 134 pages. Yet upon no point is the evidence more doubtful and conflicting. He likewise fails to create the impression of Carlyle's titanic stature, and to comprehend the sympathy for the suffering masses and the grappling with great social and intellectual problems that brought his difficult moods of gloom, pity, and scorn, his complaints of the intolerable labor of writing. Reduced to this scale, the Chelsea household loses tragic significance. Mr. Burdett even disappoints us of the vivid, spicy writing we have come to expect from the new biography. He is politer and fairer, but also flatter, than most of his predecessors in the mode. The pulses of the professional biographer are languid; the once swift Strachean current strains through sands and shallows.

The work can hardly be recommended as a primer to its subject: it seems adapted neither to the idly curious nor to the serious. The latter had better go directly to Froude's biography, which Mr. Burdett praises highly in his closing chapters, or to what he calls the "mosaic" of Mr. D. A. Wilson, from whom he has borrowed extensively. Justice to the incandescent Carlyle temperaments requires the powers of the Meredith of "Modern Love." Mr. Burdett's attempt irresistibly recalls a couplet Carlyle was wont to apply to similar cases:

> Weightiest of harrows, what horse will ply it?
> Cheeriest of sparrows meanwhile will try it.

EMERY NEFF

A Reviewer of Plays

Upstage. By John Mason Brown. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.

THE scope of Mr. Brown's book is indicated in its subtitle, "The American Theater in Performance." We are treated here to an all-star cast comprising the principal figures among the present-day American playwrights, actors, directors, scene-designers, and dramatic critics. Each "performer" is discussed in a separate essay, and each group of "performers," according to their special art, is introduced by a general essay on the condition of their particular sphere of theatrical activity. The presentation is completed with two chapters on theater architecture and on the audience. Mr. Brown's writing is extremely readable, his manner urbane. He shows a sound appreciation of the fundamentals of the art of the theater, and reveals a penetrating and sensitive mind in analyzing the subjects of his portrait studies. His essays on Philip Barry, Eugene O'Neill, Otis Skinner, Alexander Woollcott, and George Jean Nathan—to name only a few—are admirable for the skill and discernment with which they bring into relief the salient characteristics of their respective subjects. In Barry, for instance, he sees not only an entertainer with a happy gift for delightful flippancy, but also a rather shallow moralist whose comedies "laugh in order to preach." Nor is he blinded by O'Neill's earnestness, his savage force, and his vibrant prose into a reverent admiration of his helpless flounderings as a "foggy-minded coiner of cosmic beatitudes." These and other comments of Mr. Brown's are evidence of his ability to probe below the surface. Yet the book as a whole leaves the impression of an author studiously refraining from sounding the depths of his subject. As if to justify his classification of dramatic critics into reporters, reviewers, and critics, Mr. Brown chooses the part of a reviewer.

He dispenses praise and blame without once comparing the achievement of the American artists of the theater with that of the artists in other countries. Is Philip Barry only a sentimental Noel Coward? Is Eugene O'Neill a much more important dramatist than Leonid Andreyev? Mr. Brown does not tell us, and so we are left to view the American theater with the perspective of world standards carefully blacked out.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY

Abraham Cowley

Abraham Cowley: The Muse's Hannibal. By Arthur H. Nethercot. Oxford University Press. $4.75.

A BIOGRAPHY of Abraham Cowley has somewhat more meaning today than it would have had thirty, even fifteen, years ago. Of the group of seventeenth-century poets to which Cowley belonged Mr. T. S. Eliot has remarked that they possessed "a mechanism of sensibility which could devour any kind of experience." Although they lived in an age which was quite as much beset by new and exciting developments in science and philosophy as our own, they were able to amalgamate in their verse the most disparate experience, create new wholes of poetic vision. The task before them was to comprehend in its totality the universe that had suddenly expanded around them; their method was an ever-richer refinement of the sensibility. Since Mr. Eliot pointed out the resemblance between the problems solved by this group and the problems with which the contemporary poet is faced, the reputation of the former has increased until it is now, as Professor Nethercot remarks, highly dangerous not to agree that John Donne was one of the major English poets. Moreover, their influence on current poetic writing promises to surpass even that of the French symbolists. It is, indeed, rather a triumph for some contemporary poets to have their work mistaken for something by Donne or Marvell or Cowley.

Cowley, to be sure, is not usually spoken of in the same breath with the other two poets mentioned; he lacked the fierce Elizabethan attack of Donne, and he wrote nothing in his own vein to compare with Marvell's "Coy Mistress." But, as Professor Nethercot's scholarly life proves for us, his promise was more significant than his accomplishment. No poet of his century was more aware of the necessity of doing something as a poet with the body of scientific material cast up by the Renaissance. He was a student of medicine, botany, and "experimental philosophy" in general. His was one of the first names to be put on the membership list of the Royal Society in 1660. His later and most ambitious projects had for their object the integration of scientific with poetic experience. Altogether he was, in direction at least, a more comprehensive and for his own time a more truly contemporary poet than Milton.

Professor Nethercot offers an interesting history of the various confusions that have surrounded the term "metaphysical" as applied to the poets who succeeded Donne. At first the adjective referred to the habit of Donne and others of introducing abstruse philosophical speculations into their amatory verse. Parallel to this use of the word to describe subject matter or content was its application to certain qualities of manner or style—conceits, far-fetched metaphors, and general over-elaborateness of expression. According to Mr. Eliot (whom Professor Nethercot strangely neglects to mention anywhere in his book) Cowley was too often "metaphysical" in the latter and more superficial sense. He became so enamored of decoration that his complexity is merely affectation.

It is because this particular danger is so imminent for those contemporary poets who follow in his tradition that Cowley is of special interest today. For the present we must expect our poets to be "difficult" because of the excessive strain that is placed on their capacity for assimilation and fusion. But "difficulty" may easily become a fashion, a mode, a mere system of artifice—as in those poets who have emulated the manner without ever having experienced the intense intellectual passion implied in the "metaphysical" style from Donne's day to our own. A modern Dr. Johnson may already complain that in certain contemporary poets "the most heterogeneous ideas are yoked by violence together." The example of Cowley, who was almost a great poet, should point to the consequences of violence cultivated for its own sake, as a mere mannerism.

Books in Brief

Politics. By H. J. Laski. J. B. Lippincott Company. $1.

This new addition to the Hour Library is not any too easy a book for the man-in-the-Pullman. It provides, however, for the attentive reader a clear and unadorned sketch of the current progressive theory of the nature of the state, of its relations with the great society, and of the functions of law and government. Granted the limited space available, it appears dubious whether Professor Laski would not have provided his readers with more provocative material had he discussed, for example, the effect of anthropological research upon the deliberate modification of political institutions and control of civilization rather than the technicalities of second-chamber reform. His allusion, again, to the socialization of the law is all too brief in proportion to its contemporary interest. Anyone, however, who purchases a volume by Professor Laski may always be confident that he will get his money's worth, and this book is no exception. "The legal imperatives of any state must always be conceived as . . . a permanent essay in the conditional mood." Phrases such as this enter into the lasting literature of a subject; one of them alone might provide the intelligent reader with material for all of his allocated hour of thought.

The Cambridge Ancient History. Volume VIII: Rome and the Mediterranean, 218-133 B. C. Edited by S. A. Cook, F. E. Adcock, M. P. Charlesworth. The Macmillan Company. $10.50.

The eighty-five years covered by the latest volume in the "Cambridge History" saw the foundation of the Roman Empire. The Second and Third Punic Wars, the subjugation of the Hellenistic monarchies in Macedonia and Asia Minor, and the extinction of Greek freedom in the overthrow of the Achaean League made Rome supreme over all the shores and all the islands of the Mediterranean. The account is ably written. The authorities who contribute the twenty-one chapters of this volume are competent writers as well as scholars. This is characteristic of "The Cambridge Ancient History" as a whole, and it is a mistake to regard it only as a reference work. Every volume is readable and passages of authoritarian quibbling are relatively few. The whole undertaking is infused with the broad historical conception of the late J. B. Bury, its first editor. His successors ably carry on hjs work.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., N. Y. C.

Cross Roads of the Java Sea. By Hendrik De Leeuw. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $3.50.

Dr. De Leeuw's travels brought him to Java, Sumatra, Borneo, Celebes, and Bali, the principal possessions of the Dutch empire in the East Indies. A certain complacent practical-mindedness that lets him appreciate the beauties of oil wells, mines, and factories along with the lavish tropical scenery keeps him also from the extravagances of recent writers who locate paradises anywhere but at home. His book is interesting because he had energy, was not too squeamish in his curiosity, and apparently felt at home everywhere; the insensitiveness, however, that permitted this makes his travel record a peculiarly superficial one.

A Pagan's Pilgrimage. By Llewelyn Powys. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

This small volume represents the precipitate left in the alembic of the author's mind after it had produced "The Cradle of God." Asking with a truly pagan receptivity, "How do I know that Jesus was not actually a God?" Llewelyn Powys went to Palestine "to look for traces of his earthly sojourning." Impressions of that pilgrimage are here set down in vivid brevity. Poetic and philosophic reflections are intermingled with notes of things seen in southern Italy, Greece, Cyprus, Rhodes, and Syria. Slight as these sketches are, they have the authentic stamp of Mr. Powys's verbal artistry.

The Comedy of Manners from Sheridan to Maugham. By Newell W. Sawyer. University of Pennsylvania Press. $3.

Mr. Sawyer has written a very satisfactory definition of the kind of comedy whose history he tells, and his running account of innumerable plays will make his work highly valuable for reference. The criticism is not always inspired, but it is responsible and intelligent; and it may very well assist the cause of comedy here and in England during the years of promise that seem to lie ahead.

Too Much Halo

WE are all interested in newspapers and what newspapermen write about their calling. The business of supplying us with our daily scandal, if we are to believe these chroniclers turned novelists and playwrights, is in itself full of scandal. Moreover, it has its thrills which, as they are pictured in books and plays, can stand comparison with the most exciting experiences of the world of crime. We are reminded of all this by that extraordinarily vivid picture of newspaper life "The Front Page," by Ben Hecht and Charles MacArthur, which has now emerged as a film (Rivoli). Granting it its trenchant dialogue and the sculpturesque sureness of its characterization, the only question it stirs in my mind is whether it gives a true picture of the newspaper world. It is the glamor, the romantic halo, surrounding the characters of "The Front Page" that arouses one's suspicions about the authenticity of the men portrayed. Aren't they a trifle too hard-boiled to be wholly credible? And if the authors are right in their characterization, aren't they guilty of a certain lack of honesty in treating this hard-boiled cynicism as standing for some superior knowledge and understanding of life, instead of being merely what it is, a protective mechanism of inferior intelligence against the demands of life? Perhaps if we had been allowed a glimpse under the callous masks worn by these reporters we might have found their owners more human. On the other hand, so clearly do they stand out as individuals under the vitalizing treatment of Messrs. Hecht and MacArthur that one is inclined to forego further probing and to accept them for what they appear to be—racketeers of publicity, whose habitual sitting in judgment on other people gives them the prestige of superior intelligence.

The film, one of the most satisfying during the current season, again shows us Mr. Lewis Milestone, who directed "All Quiet on the Western Front," as one of the most sensitive and intelligent directors in Hollywood. His treatment is distinguished not by any striking contrasts of light and shade, by any emphasis of action, but by an atmospheric unity in which all characters and all action flow in a constant stream as parts of a single whole. One is brought to realize this dramatic unity when the flow is suddenly arrested by a lyrical interlude between the condemned man, Williams, and his street-walker friend, a scene that both emotionally and dramatically belongs to a different world. Neither this episode, however, nor the conventional scenes—they are fortunately few—of the romance of the star reporter, Johnson, nor the romantic embellishment of the newspaperman and his profession are sufficient to destroy the air of verisimilitude which pervades the picture, and which is sustained largely by its effortless and expert acting. By far the highest honors in this go to Mr. Menjou, who gives as polished a performance of a gruff and unscrupulous editor as he used to give of a man about town. Mr. Pat O'Brien in the role of the reporter Johnson is rather colorless, but his confreres in the court pressroom are as bright and glittering a group of characters as has ever appeared on the screen.

"Tabu" (Central) adds little to the artistic reputation of F. W. Murnau, who died within a few days of the opening of his film in New York. Murnau's greatest achievement was "The Last Laugh," produced in cooperation with Karl Freund and Emil Jannings. None of his other pictures, including the heavy-footed "Faust" and all of his American efforts, comes anywhere within a measurable distance of that early masterpiece. "Tabu" is deliberate and forced in its playfulness, cheaply melodramatic in its tragedy, and unconscionably long-winded. It has neither the charm of Flaherty's "Moana" nor the pictorial and dramatic force of "The Last Laugh."

The Changing Shaw

THE title of this article is misleading. Shaw has never changed. But we have changed with respect to him—changed so many times, probably, that he could now say of us, if he thought it worth while, what we used to say of him, namely, that we are a bundle of mountebanks, a set of inconsistent and bewildering buffoons. How reconcile the various views we have taken of him during the long generation when he has been the best brain on the stage? How account for the especially rapid reversal of opinion in the past five years? How explain the fact that "Getting Married," when revived the other night by the Theater Guild (Guild Theater), was greeted on the whole rather coolly, or at any rate with little nervousness, little fever, in the laughter? Doubtless there is no explanation beyond the very simple one that men always behave this way in the presence of brains. Brains confuse us. A man who has a mind and who never changes it keeps us guessing. And there is no more ridiculous posture than the guessing posture. We cannot help looking foolish in the company of someone whom we do not understand, and this is particularly true if he amuses us.

The future of Shaw's reputation is impossible to predict. But one can say of its past that it has had at least three periods. There was the remote and happily dead time when Shaw seemed an irresponsible clown. He was represented, often in visible caricatures, as standing on his head to make us laugh. And, the theory went, we merely laughed. Now few things are more certain, probably, than that there is no such thing as mere laughter. Laughter must be at something, or for something; there must be a reason. Realizing this, we discovered the "serious" Shaw, the Socialist and the Nietzschean, with ideas which might be worth agreeing with, or at any rate understanding. He was praised for the consistency and the importance of his thought—laughter being something that by accident came with it, as decoration or as wrapping. But a third period followed—the one we are now in.

The present revival of "Getting Married" should show anyone how silly it is to take Shaw seriously. In so far as the play is about marriage it has little to "teach" us, however much it may once have had. No, the first of these positions is better than that. And yet the first position can no longer be held in its original innocence. Now that we have considered Shaw's ideas at all, we cannot refuse to admit their presence. They are there, and they cannot be got around. What shall we do with them? The answer seems clear enough. Take them as ideas, and not as truths.

Whatever Shaw as a person may believe or disbelieve, as an artist he believes nothing, and that must always have been the case. He possesses the more important faculty, for comedy at least, of being able to take delight in an endless comparison of beliefs. That is what happens in "Getting Married," where surely nothing is settled about the institution under discussion—nothing except the fact that it is an excellent institution to discuss. Nobody in the play convinces anybody else; they all resume their original relations; and Mrs. George goes into a trance. The argument ends, in other words, where Plato's arguments are sometimes said to end, in a realization that the truth is undiscoverable, and in a vision. The moral of "Getting Married" is that we must give up marriage as a bad job in which there can be no earthly justice; give it up, get married, and go on talking.

It is talk that Shaw as an artist is concerned with; he has rarely done anything else in a play than assemble a number of persons who talk well. He can get on with any of his creatures who knows how to express himself; and he sees to it that all of his creatures get on together. There are really no hard feelings among them, for they delight one another even with their insults; all of them are at once insufferable and irresistible. Otherwise how could the conversation continue? It does continue, and we like these persons—even the knaves and fools—as much as Shaw likes them, and for the same reason. Each of them has an idea, indeed is an idea. So, liking them, we find ourselves liking ideas. Which is vastly more important, where the art of comedy is concerned, than discovering the truth.

This may not be the final Shaw, but the Guild's excellent performance of "Getting Married" convinces me that it is the best one we have had so far, if the least sensational. And it is one we can settle down to.

"Lady Beyond the Moon" (Bijou Theater), by William Doyle, is about some Riviera Americans who are nobler at heart than they at first appear; as lovers they wait years for one another, only to give one another up at the slightest misunderstanding; yet not, of course, irretrievably or in vain, since it is the lesson of nobility that they learn to read in the good old type known as Great Primer.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

THE KING OF SPAIN has abdicated, and as we go to press news comes that the royal family is busy packing up its effects and preparing to make a journey into exile, friendly though that exile may be. This is, of course, the result of the overwhelming victory of the Spanish Republicans in the municipal elections on April 12. More than two-thirds of the provincial capitals chose Republican councilors, Madrid went strongly Republican, and in labor centers the anti-monarchist vote was heavy. Upwards of 80 per cent of the qualified voters are estimated to have gone to the polls, many of them, owing to the fact that there had been no election since 1923, casting their ballots for the first time. A notable feature of the election was the general absence of disorder, the elaborate police and military preparations made by the government proving to have been largely unnecessary. The abdication, also, seems to have been conducted with orderly dispatch, and the last of the Bourbons seems likely to suffer no discomfort except the mental one of losing his throne. The Spaniards are a sensible people and evidently prefer getting their own way by peaceful means. One wonders, indeed, whether Alfonso might not have kept his throne all his life if he had made a few more gestures in the direction of republican rule. Since he did not, Spain, almost the last stronghold of monarchy, is to be a republic, as is Catalonia, which has just been declared a separate state. Niceto Zamora, leader of the Republican forces and a likely choice for president, is at work forming a cabinet and making plans for the new government.

DEPORTATION of more than 1,100 illegally resident aliens from New York alone since mid-January was joyfully announced by Secretary of Labor Doak on April 10. About 17,000 such aliens were deported last year, and the number is expected to reach 20,000 during the present year. Secretary Doak hails such action as a means of providing jobs for "worthy citizens in need of employment," and in reply to the charge that extensive deportation is not humane, he declares: "The government should protect its own citizens against illegal invaders. This I propose to do with every weapon in my power. Law is law and I intend to enforce it as long as I hold my office." In pursuit of this laudable end the Labor Department on March 24 issued orders to begin deportation of nearly 100,000 alien seamen who had deserted their ships here and under a recent Supreme Court decision were held to be illegally in this country. Two days later the President announced with something of a flourish that owing to the business depression consular agents during the five months ended February 28 had refused visas to 96,883 would-be immigrants on the ground that they might become public charges. Under normal conditions most of these aliens would have been admissible. Only 3,147 aliens arrived for permanent residence during February, the smallest number admitted in any month since 1820, when the records of the Labor Department begin. In fact, more aliens departed than arrived during February. With the State Department stretching the law to keep aliens out and the Labor Department exercising its utmost effort to put out those who have got in, the Administration prides itself on what it is doing for our unemployed.

THE LATEST TRIUMPH of science in tariff-making has been achieved in the case of cherries, sulphured or in brine, and tomatoes prepared or preserved in any way. It will not be forgotten that the new Tariff Commission adopted a new technique calculated to speed up action. Some time since they recommended reductions on the delicacies named above, but, alas, the President returned their recommendation unapproved because it was based "in some cases upon data over a period of so short experience as to make it desirable that the commission be afforded more time." Furthermore, the ever-vigilant scientist in the White House would like the commission "to review the facts upon the basis of the forthcoming crops and make another report." This is the best plan yet. Any time you don't like a report, just send it back and ask for a new one based on the next season's output. Even President Coolidge never thought of that. But we note with grief the unscientific outgiving of James D. Mooney, vice-president of the General Motors Corporation, telling the New York Board of Trade that when we passed the Hawley-Smoot tariff we made the mistake of slamming the door in the face of prospective customers who wanted to exchange goods for goods, and that pending European tariff arrangements were likely to make it harder yet for us to sell automobiles and other American products in transatlantic markets. Who knows? Perhaps next year's automobile crop may finally do more than next year's cherry crop to induce us to lower our obstructive tariff rates.

COMPETITION RUN WILD in crude-oil production has led to many unsuccessful attempts at stabilization. The numerous smaller independents, unsuccessful in the last Congress in their attempt to get a tariff or an embargo on oil imports, have by no means given up their efforts. A so-called conservation conference has just been held between the Federal Oil Conservation Board and the Oil States Advisory Committee representing the governors of the nine chief oil-producing States. Inconclusive recommendations were adopted looking to the stabilization of production through federal-State cooperation with the industry within each State. In fact, conference and recommendation can do little when there are large numbers of independent producers. Senator Borah voices the warning that the consumer is being forgotten in all this planning, and urges that in order to prevent excessive prices for refined products the oil industry should be made a public utility subject to government regulation. What little progress has thus far been made toward stabilization has rested on the control of oil pools by a few powerful companies, and we do well to realize that effective stabilization and price control are not to be attained so long as the ownership of the basic oil resources remains in competing private hands.

SIR PERCY BATES, chairman of the board of the Cunard Company, fresh from the report of a staggering fall in profits for 1930, lays before the stockholders details of the company's new $30,000,000, 73,000-ton liner now under construction on the Clyde. The contract for a second ship of similar character, it is stated, will shortly be given to John Brown and Company, builders of the present vessel. With characteristic British thoroughness the builders have extended the designing of this great ship over four more years, and she will embody everything that the Cunard Company has been able to learn about safety, comfort, and luxury, together with a speed so great that with two ships the company will be able to maintain a weekly express service, thus meeting the powerful competition of the North German Lloyd's Bremen and Europa, to say nothing of the forthcoming French super-liner. While the Cunard Company would be glad, if possible, to recapture "the blue ribbon of the Atlantic," Sir Percy declares that the board has in mind primarily regularity of service, safety, and comfort—all in the best Cunard tradition. There is something magnificent in the competition of these great shipping companies, driving them on to larger, more luxurious, and faster ships, but the price is paid in an ocean over-tonnaged and in a shipping and shipbuilding industry struggling through recurrent periods of distress.

CHINA WANTS full recognition as a free and independent state, and to that end insists that the privileges of extraterritoriality which a number of foreign nations claim for their subjects shall be given up. For more than two years the Nationalist Government at Nanking has been negotiating with the United States, Great Britain, France, and Japan for the abolition of extraterritoriality, it being understood that whatever agreement was made by these four Powers would be accepted by others. Nothing really important has been accomplished toward satisfying what Dr. C. T. Wang, Chinese Foreign Minister, describes as "the admittedly legitimate aspirations of the Chinese government and people," and Dr. Wang has now announced that unless a satisfactory solution of the difficulty with the United States and Great Britain is found before the meeting of the people's convention, on May 5, it will be necessary to declare that the negotiations have reached a deadlock. Why France and Japan, which have done no better than Great Britain and the United States, were not included in the warning is not clear. Washington is said to regard Dr. Wang's pronouncement as intended mainly for home consumption, and to expect a postponement of the people's convention for at least two months. The difficulty in granting China's request heretofore has been obvious, and it is by no means certain that the disorders which have jeopardized the existence of the Nanking Government will soon disappear, but until they do the foreign Powers may be expected to hold to their extraterritorial rights as the only means of insuring legal protection for their citizens.

AT THE INVITATION of Foreign Minister Arthur Henderson, Chancellor Brüning and Foreign Minister Curtius of Germany will visit England informally in the early part of June. First reports of this proposed visit gave rise to much speculation and to sharp criticism in some European capitals, but comment has now taken on a more understanding and friendly tone. The exact scope of the proposed discussions has not been publicly announced, but they will doubtless range widely over the field of European economic and political relations. Newspaper dispatches have surrounded the origin of Mr. MacDonald's invitation with mystery, but since the invitation followed close on the heels of Mr. Henderson's demand that the proposed Austro-German customs union should be submitted to the Council of the League of Nations, and Germany, while letting it be known eventually that it had no objections, has also made it clear that it did not regard League approval as necessary, it may very well be that some third party, with friendly access to Mr. MacDonald's ear, suggested to the British Prime Minister that an informal talk with the Germans would be worth while. If such was the case, it was probably a useful piece of unofficial diplomacy, rather more certain than not to clear the air and let each party know where the other stands.

THE SOCIALIST PARTY of Chicago is prepared to attempt to force another mayoralty election in that city because its candidate, John M. Collins, was barred from the ticket. The candidacies of Collins and four other minor-party nominees were declared invalid by the Chicago Board of Election Commissioners on technical grounds. The Socialists sought a writ of mandamus from Circuit Judge Thomas Taylor, who ruled in effect that the action of the election commissioners was illegal, but that because it would cost the city a few thousand dollars to reprint the ballots he found himself obliged to refuse to issue the writ. "Economics," he said, "are as much a part of our civilization as fanciful rights of liberty," and in summing up he announced that the right of a minority party to be heard is more or less fanciful, "because if you took a referendum of the people whether they should pay for these ballots and permit the Socialists to go on the ticket you know what would happen." Judicial tyranny against minority parties could not have been more brutally frank. However, the Socialists, aided by the American Civil Liberties Union, are preparing to take this case to the highest court in Illinois. On the face of the evidence they appear to have a good case, but that they will win it is by no means certain.

THE LOS ANGELES RECORD, a paper that has been more than once distinguished for original and pertinent observation, has a few things to say about war that are astonishing, coming from California, and worth pondering by anybody. Under the title Rules for the Next War, the Record prints the following:

> A new world war will kill off surplus labor. This obviously is the easiest way of solving a difficult problem; it is so much easier to start a war than to apply common sense to world ills.
> Well, if we are going to have another war, we might as well have some rules for it. We therefore offer for public approval this model set:
> 1. That all Congressmen and Senators voting for war be given the choice of enlisting in the shock troops or being shot on the Capitol steps.
> 2. That each battleship, cruiser, destroyer, and submarine shall carry as excess baggage one or more stockholders in battleship-building concerns.
> 3. That all manufacturers of war supplies be hanged when their profits reach the million-dollar mark.
> 4. That all holy men who announce to their congregations that "God is fighting with us" be dispatched to interview God personally on the subject and find out.
> 5. That college professors be estopped from delving into history to prove that the enemy always was a low-down scoundrel, anyway.
> 6. That the secret service be restrained from the discovery of "enemy plots" every time somebody turns on a light in the parlor.
> 7. That the cause of the war shall be clearly stated to the nation as the reduction of unemployment, and not disguised as "a holy war to save civilization."

THE BEST TESTIMONIAL our colleges and universities have had in a long time comes from the lips of that sterling patriot and spender of special party funds, Robert H. Lucas, executive director of the Republican National Committee, who finds it well-nigh impossible to make good traditional Republicans out of young persons infected with the heresies of university theorists. Says the practical Mr. Lucas:

> Inasmuch as it seems to be hopeless to expect a reform in the textbooks which teach free trade, internationalism, public ownership of private industry, etc., and inasmuch as it is apparently equally hopeless to expect the teachers in institutions of higher education to abandon their radicalism and socialistic theories, the approach to the young man and the young woman who is about to become a citizen must be made independent of our educational system.

The more independent the better. Did Mr. Lucas ever consider keeping the boys and girls in entire ignorance? Who knows but that we could make the country solidly Republican that way? But after all, Mr. Lucas is unduly disturbed. The percentage of ignorance among our graduates is high enough to maintain a good working Republican majority. Thought is not very catching, even in the colleges, and a high proportion of the population is wholly immune. Let the Republican sage not despair.

THE WORKS OF JOHN MILTON, for the first time full and complete, are beginning to make their appearance over the imprint of the Columbia University Press. The first two volumes, in four parts, have just been issued, and are handsomely printed and bound in a format, as the announcements say, "worthy of the contents." The set will consist of eighteen volumes in all, sixteen of which will be the prose works. To those who think of Milton as an English poet of unquestioned nobility but a little hard to read, this will come somewhat as a surprise. The truth is that through most of his middle years Milton was a publicist in the thick of current politics; he wrote of the position of the church, of the civil power, of divorce, education, the tenure of kings. He wrote voluminously on Christian doctrine—four of the present large volumes are needed to complete "De Doctrina Christiana." When he was young he wrote "Lycidas" and the others of the minor poems; when he was past fifty and blind he wrote "Paradise Lost." The Columbia University "Milton" is a handsome and highly creditable addition to scholarship; under the general editorship first of Professor William P. Trent and finally of Professor Frank Allen Patterson, with their associates, it brings prestige and honor to the university.

FIFTY YEARS AGO Booker T. Washington, with thirty pupils and with an appropriation of $2,000 from the Alabama legislature, started his new "normal" school in one shabby building at Tuskegee. It is a pity that he could not have been present at the celebration of his school's semi-centenary, when its proud progress was recounted, and prouder hopes were raised for its future. Sixteen hundred students take the place of his thirty; an endowment of more than $7,000,000 makes the institution secure; forty trades are taught there; and some 132 buildings house the whole. This is good work. Tuskegee started in the black belt of Alabama when not more than a handful of Southerners would have testified that the Negro was at best anything but an irresponsible if amiable child. Fifty years of labor have demonstrated beyond question that the Negro is and will continue to be a hard-working, responsible citizen of his country. It is for Tuskegee now to recognize that the tasks of the next half-century will differ from those of the last. Having established the Negro as a responsible citizen, its task is now to educate him as such; not merely by continuing to conduct a competent trade school, but by offering all the opportunities that an increasingly educated Negro group will demand. That it is mindful of this obligation is evidenced in the John A. Andrews Hospital Clinic held at the school every year, one of the few large clinics in the country where Negro physicians and surgeons can discuss their common problems with successful white practitioners. This is one direction in which the new Tuskegee is reaching out. And while we salute the old Tuskegee, it is to the new Tuskegee and to schools like it that we must look for the future of the Negro race.

The Class War Enters Science

THE address of Nikolai Bukharin before the Conference for Planned Organization of Scientific Investigational Work at Moscow raises an issue in Soviet Russia of far-reaching importance. Bukharin is quoted in the New York Times as saying:

> So-called pure science, that is, science devoid of contact with practical life, is a figment. The whole fabric of scientific investigational work in capitalist countries is a weapon in the hands of capitalist magnates and governments and their industrial and military organizations. . . . The problems before us require a decisive and categorical break with bourgeois traditions of old academism and their conversion to the task of solving immediate, practical difficulties.

Russian scientists, he concluded, must now choose whether to throw in their lot whole-heartedly with the Socialist system or "hide their hostility behind a screen of pure science and its abstraction from the national life."

The question immediately raised by these remarks is this: Assuming that the Kremlin were to make them the basis of its attitude toward scientific research, how would it differentiate between pure and applied science? It does not take much reflection to see that no sharp dividing line anywhere exists. The two types of science blend into each other like the adjoining colors of a rainbow. The difference between green and red is vivid enough, but precisely at what point does green become yellow, yellow orange, orange red? Scientific investigation, similarly, may be divided into an indefinite number of delicate nuances, passing from the most "pure" and rarefied theoretical speculation at one end to the most immediate and narrow application at the other.

The gradual shading of pure into applied science implies more than our mere inability to set up a sharp cleavage between them; it implies the necessary interdependence of the two kinds of science, particularly the dependence of applied upon pure science. It would be next to impossible to name an important invention of the last century and a half that did not depend upon some previous discovery or development in the field of supposed pure science. Perhaps nothing could have seemed more abstract and thoroughly useless at the time of its early development than the theory that sound consists of the transmission of physical vibrations or waves through an elastic medium, but without that knowledge there could have been no phonograph, telephone, radio, or talkie. Faraday's electromagnetic experiments led to the invention of the dynamo and other electromagnetic machines. Maxwell's investigation of the properties of electromagnetic waves led in half a century to wireless telegraphy and radio. Pasteur's discovery that fermentation, putrefaction, and many diseases are due to the action of microscopic living organisms has had enormous results in industrial, medical, and surgical progress. Mendel's experiments on the heredity of peas have already led to systematized plant-breeding, and may ultimately result in radical changes in the human race itself. Inventions, in turn, forward the progress of pure science: one need merely recall the enormous importance of the telescope and microscope.

The reader who will consult any standard history of science, such as Dampier-Whetham's, will find such instances, illustrating the intimate interdependence of pure and applied science, multiplied indefinitely. The truth seems to be that we are more successful in applied science, as in happiness, when we pursue it indirectly. The cure for cancer seems more likely to be discovered by men working on the problem in laboratories than by physicians called into such cases every day; it may even be discovered by someone now studying cytology without any direct interest in the problem of cancer at all.

One never knows, in brief, how important any theoretical discovery may prove to be. Applied science is interested in controlling nature; pure science is interested in understanding nature: but nature must be understood in order that it may be controlled. The defense of pure science is sometimes made on this ground. A defense of this sort, however, assumes that non-utilitarian science needs a utilitarian justification, and such a justification is contrary to the spirit of non-utilitarian science itself. The pure scientist wishes knowledge for its own sake, regardless of the possible future usefulness of that knowledge. Astronomy, aside from its incidental employment in navigation, is one of the most useless of the sciences, but it is also one of the noblest. To know that the earth is only a speck of dust in sickening space and the whole of human history but a watch-tick in time may not improve man's economic lot in the slightest degree, and it certainly reduces his self-importance; but a man who does not have this knowledge, who does not value it, who is not interested in knowing what sort of universe this is in which we find ourselves, seems to us an unimaginative clod, little better than an animal. The demand that science should always be useful is the essence of philistinism; it reflects a mere belly philosophy; and this ideal is not altered, but only made more dangerous and revolting, when it is put forward as a social rather than an individual ideal.

Bukharin's speech illustrates a fact often pointed out: that one of the peculiar dangers of Socialist or Communist society is that its leaders will not encourage or permit activities whose value they do not understand. But this is true also, though in a lesser degree, of a capitalist society, in which pure scientific research must depend, in the main, upon the endowments of the wealthy. In our own "business man's civilization" the work of the scientist is still directed too narrowly toward practical ends. What the scientist discovers depends to a very large extent on what the big business man thinks it important for him to discover. Even the remarkable laboratories supported by great corporations like the General Electric Company, which represent perhaps the least utilitarian aspect of big business, are under pressure to justify themselves by practical "results," and the scientists in them must depend to a large extent on the more disinterested research which goes on in the universities of America and Europe. The problem in Russia and America is basically the same: to educate those who hold the power and the purse-strings.

Nicholas Longworth

WHEN one has said that Nicholas Longworth was a stalwart Republican, an able Speaker of the House of Representatives, a son-in-law of President Roosevelt, and an all-round good fellow, one has mentioned all the qualities and achievements for which he is likely to be remembered. He had no conspicuous part in initiating either national or party policies, and no important piece of federal legislation bears his name. The mention of his name for the Presidency carried no serious suggestion that he might be nominated. Yet he climbed steadily and surely to preferment in a House which expects its members to fight and fight hard for place, he administered the Speaker's office with a fairness and courtesy which even his most pronounced political opponents recognized, and enemies and friends alike spoke well of him when he died.

Mr. Longworth's Republicanism was of a kind which politicians everywhere regard as an essential element of party strength. From first to last Mr. Longworth was a regular. He began his political career as a henchman of George B. Cox of Ohio, one of the most astute and unscrupulous bosses the Republican Party has ever known, and Mark Hanna was one of his early friends and advisers. After he had in a measure freed himself from Cox he continued to train with the party, accepting its doctrines without question and doing his bit for whatever the party wanted. It may have taken courage to oppose Roosevelt and support Taft in 1912 and go down with others to defeat, but he had none of the temper of the progressive or even of a liberal, and he may very well have perceived that his political future, if he was to have any, was bound up with the party to which he had given his allegiance, and that he would only court disaster if he followed the Roosevelt lead whether the career of the Progressives turned out to be long or short.

When, accordingly, after a long apprenticeship in the House, he became Speaker, it was as a Republican dyed in the wool, unstained by progressivism and undeterred, though perhaps not undisturbed, by the party record of corruption and inefficiency. Yet he was to show in that office that he was neither a mere servant of the party machine nor, like some of his predecessors, a ruthless boss of his legislative associates. It is a far cry from the pompous czarism of Reed or the cynical brutality of Cannon to the courteous fairness and diplomatic skill of Longworth, but the reason is clear. No one ever thought of Reed or Cannon as a gentleman; both of them, despite their fine phrases on occasions that did not matter, despised the House and clubbed or browbeat it as they chose. Longworth was a gentleman from his heart to his immaculate attire. The House, to him, was a body to be persuaded and led—with undoubted mastery as it turned out and for the glory of the Republican Party, but by methods of impartiality and consideration rather than by those of the blaring manner and the clenched fist. He steered his ladder through the crowd without breaking heads, and even the Democrats and Progressives who rejected almost every partisan thing for which he stood and saw in him only the master of a party machine praised the skill and good temper of the feat.

By and large, the Republican Party has always both expected and welcomed the kind of distinction that Mr. Longworth brought to it. It is not by accident that the Republicans, far more than the Democrats, have drawn into their ranks the well-born and well-dressed, the wealthy and socially elect, for they have been preeminently the party of privilege and favor. Such ideas as that of the equality of all men have rested lightly upon the typical Republican mind. From the days when Federalism was giving American government its form, the Jeffersonian conception of a democratic state has been opposed by the conviction that the country must be ruled by its "best men," and it is to that conviction that the typical Republican adheres. In the Republican view of politics, wisdom lies not with the masses but with the better-educated, the well-to-do, the men of affairs, the controllers of business, industry, and finance; and the consciousness of possessing such leadership has developed a party solidarity against which the best-directed opposition, however high its motives or sound its ideas, has had difficulty in making headway.

Mr. Longworth was a representative embodiment of the notion that politics is properly the occupation of a gentleman. His political thoughts were those of his party, and from party weaknesses and sins he could turn away his face, but he was too refined to be rough and too generous to incur enmity. Actually, there was no more legislative freedom under his command than under the more strident orders of Cannon or Reed, but he did not sound a raucous yawp across the chamber or attack his opponents with an armored tank. Given a House and a party situation such as we have lately had, it can in justice be said that he played his part honorably and well.

Negroes Out of Work

IN any consideration of the general problem of unemployment the Negro is apt to be forgotten. It is assumed that inevitably a large number of Negroes are out of a job; it remains for a sober, unhysterical organization like the National Urban League to come forward and show that the percentage of Negroes among the unemployed runs sometimes four, five, or six times as high as their population percentage warrants. This is especially true, of course, in the industrial areas, and a careful study of the question indicates that the percentage of Negro unemployed runs higher in the Northern industrial centers where the Negro is limited to unskilled occupations, where he is in fact the marginal worker.

The preponderance of Negro unemployed is due to a number of causes. Obviously, in almost any community, when jobs are scarce preference is given to the white worker in case of a vacancy; but worse than this, a fairly widespread tendency is observed to replace Negro workers with white. White girls have replaced Negro waiters, hotel workers, elevator operators, of course at reduced wages; Filipinos have replaced Negro men under the same conditions. In the drought-affected areas of the Southwest, Negroes, stripped of their livelihood, have drifted to the cities—and found nothing there. Finally, there is considerable evidence that in the jobs specially created to ameliorate the difficulties of the depression—for example, in public works—

Negroes find it much harder to get work than do whites.

The Urban League investigation discloses specifically figures for various cities that are to say the least startling. Akron, Ohio, reports 4.5 per cent of the population to be Negroes and 25 per cent of the relief cases; Baltimore, for the same relationship, reports 17 and 34 per cent respectively; Des Moines, Iowa, reports 4 per cent of the population Negroes and 25 per cent Negroes of the total unemployed; Houston, Texas, for the same relation, reports 25 and 50 per cent respectively. Englewood, New Jersey, stands at the bottom of the list with 18 per cent of the population Negroes and 92 per cent Negroes of the relief cases reported! And St. Louis, Missouri, is a close second with 9 per cent of the population Negroes, 66 per cent Negroes of the total unemployed, and 60 per cent Negroes of the families needing and receiving relief.

Here and there conditions are reported to be improving slightly. Scranton notes an improvement over last year, with only about one-tenth of its Negro population unemployed; Dayton reports that in December 50 per cent of those persons aided by welfare organizations were Negroes and in February only 38 per cent; for some reason Madison, Wisconsin, shows itself the workers' paradise by reporting briefly that State work is available for any citizen regardless of race or color. But in the main the plight of the Negro is a sore one and it is getting worse, if anything, instead of better. Measures of relief, according to the investigation, are confined almost entirely to charity, and Negroes get more charity but fewer jobs than do whites. The economic structure of the Negro race, as a result, is in an alarming state of threatened disintegration. The effect of such a disintegration upon the whites is obvious, and the unsettled state of the color question is reflected in the increased number of lynchings. If we are not careful, the present economic depression will put the solution of the Negro problem back many years.

Present-Day Politics

MRS. SIDNEY WEBB'S leading article in the Political Quarterly for January-March reminds us again that one of England's leading statesmen is a woman. Mrs. Webb has spent practically her whole busy life in the scientific study of social institutions, and the series of monumental volumes that she and her husband have contributed to the understanding of trade unionism, the social services, and central and local government in Great Britain testify to her competence to propose well-considered plans of governmental reform to meet present-day conditions. Her suggestions have the more interest because the problems she discusses are by no means peculiar to Great Britain, but present themselves wherever democratic government is seeking to maintain itself at the present time.

Mrs. Webb sees Britain's primary government difficulty in a House of Commons and especially a Cabinet "overtaxed beyond human capacity for thinking and taking decisive action," with a consequent growth of bureaucracy and an increasing ineffectiveness of the Commons. She points out the enormous increase in the number and complexity of the things that government has to do, reminding us, for example, that during the eighteen-nineties Gladstone rebuked Keir Hardie for mentioning unemployment in the House of Commons. It was a subject, he thought, unfit for consideration there. In addition to all the old, and many new, functions based on the exercise of power—"sovereignty, overseas relations, national defense, the main body of law, and the administration of justice between man and man"—it has come necessarily to concern itself with an immense variety of "social services, such as public health and education, pure air and pure water, insurance and industrial regulation, town planning and open spaces—all essentially subjects for organized cooperation amongst citizens to supply their common needs and fulfil their aspiration for a better and nobler life."

Mrs. Webb's proposal is essentially to separate the two groups of activities, leaving the first in the hands of the present Parliament and Cabinet, and devolving the second on a new National Assembly, with its own national executive, for Great Britain. The new organization would thus take over the business of the present Ministries of Health, Education, Labor, Agriculture and Fisheries, Transport, Mines, and Works, with branches of the Home Office and the Board of Trade. The proposal for a devolution of power is not new; but Americans, long accustomed to lament the inefficiency of Congressional as contrasted with responsible Cabinet government, will be interested to note that Mrs. Webb rejects the Cabinet system for the proposed new assembly in favor of a scheme of administration by committees as worked out by the British municipalities and county councils. This latter system she believes leads to a continuous use of the abler members of all parties, gives greater control to the elected body itself than exists in the Commons, and avoids the disadvantages of the sudden change of government that follows the fall of a responsible ministry. Whatever the success attained in British local government under such a system, in American experience it has given rise to plenty of difficulties.

We shall not attempt detailed discussion and criticism of Mrs. Webb's plan. The "breakdown of parliamentary government" is the subject of universal lament. It is occasioned by the rapid increase of the demands on government caused by the growth of the newer activities and responsibilities, notably in the economic field. In Russia this situation has been met by a revolutionary change in government. In this country, on the other hand, business, as represented largely in the policies of the national administration since 1920, has done its best to limit government as narrowly as possible to the exercise of the functions of power, trying to keep everything else in the hands of the omniscient and omnipotent business man. To this end all possible has been done to discredit both the honesty and the competence of government. Such a fatal policy is bound ultimately to have revolutionary consequences and must be strenuously resisted. But the older government organization is, in fact, ill adapted to its myriad new duties, and must be swiftly adjusted if disaster is to be avoided. Those who retain their faith in the democratic method of social progress, then, cannot afford an airy contempt for the real problems of government and politics. If we do not want sudden and violent change with all its costs and dangers, we have got to have a rapid adjustment both in the conception of government and in its forms and agencies to meet the needs of the new time. We are in pressing need of constructive political thinking to create the kind of government that the times demand.

Broaden, Europe, or Die!*

My Country Is Not Yesterday My Country Is Tomorrow

By ROMAIN ROLLAND

GASTON RIOU'S leading article in the first number of the Nouvelle Revue Mondiale propounds one of the most serious problems confronting European liberals today. I feel I must reply to him without delay, even though I am still ill from an exhausting sickness. Bear with me if my pen should respond poorly to my thoughts.

I thank Gaston Riou for the friendly courtesy with which he mentions me. But he is entirely mistaken as to my true character and the stand I am taking. No one has the right to label me a sentimentalist shutting his eyes to reality in order to dream of the Promised Land merely because I have tried, in the course of my literary career, to rouse the mysterious force of dreams, the deep and primitive springs of the mystic, the musical and subsconscious force dormant at the heart of the Occident. I am a historian by nature as well as profession, hence clear-seeing, inured to seeing the chronic villainies and strayings of mankind; I am a free Frenchman, a Gaul, and not hoodwinked by the political lies and the holy principles in which the states of all times and countries clothe their unholy egoism. Certain of my books have, by their possibly disproportionate success, laid on me a moral responsibility toward a public which expects me to spoon-feed it, and my sense of responsibility has too often forced me to measure out to it as much of the truth as it could swallow. But I shall not spoon out truth here, in writing for my intellectual peers, who are, or should be, the leaders of Western democratic thinking.

When I refuse to identify myself with Count Coudenhove-Kalergi's and M. Briand's Pan-Europe, to which Gaston Riou has just brought the warm enthusiasm of his generous nature, I do so not in the name of a Utopia, a City of God, which may exist in two thousand years or may never be. This discussion concerns the very ground on which we now stand, the threatened region where we have gathered during the vigil before the fray. It concerns the assaults we shall undergo tomorrow. The idealistic intellectuals of the Franco-European League are not sufficiently alive to this. Let me remind them! If my words seem harsh and bitter I crave their pardon. I was as blindly deceived as they until the last months of 1914, and it is because I later discovered the abominable fraud that I feel I have the right to open their eyes.

Since the big European states and America, the banner-bearers of white civilization, have replaced absolute monarchy with idealistic democracy, the brutal and crafty political power which governs the world has felt the need of pretending to the people a submission to their will, which it does not consult, and to the thought-systems of their intellectual elite, which it abuses. To be exact, the masters, even in the era of absolute power, have always had recourse to lies about lofty motives, religion, country, and the like, to cover their personal passions. But today the contrast is even more glaring between the shameless cynicism of the moneyed powers who actually run the state, and the democratic fiction with its sublime phantoms of right, justice, and liberty, which those powers employ as their slogan and screen.

Among us, comrades, no man is still duped unless he wants to be. We know very well that the people in our democracies govern nothing, and know nothing about government. For their one source of information is the press, and that is almost entirely sold out to the money powers. Hence the force of the people's critical reactions is reduced to zero. No one has taught the people to control and question the logic and the facts, or rather the blind and contradictory passions with which they are inoculated to suit the needs of the masters of politics. This is a difficult course of education which the state forbids rather than encourages its teachers to give the people, since the first aim of such knowledge would be to open the people's eyes to the tricks of statecraft. And, alas, the intellectual liberals, who should instruct them as elder brothers, cannot do so, for their social education is hardly more advanced than that of the people. They are preeminently the pawns of state trickery.

When divided Europe was battling, both camps needed noble voices to sing anthems to country and celebrate the heroism of self-immolation, in order to shelter their ignoble secret covenants, their divisions of the world (land and business), their spoliations and their crimes. They had no trouble finding them. I know with what sincerity and self-abnegation the best intellectuals of our unhappy Occident accomplished their mission, and at the cost of what sacrifice of self and family. And among the university men, my comrades of yesterday, how profound the mourning for the victims that were offered to the Moloch they were made to invoke. But I also know, I know how they were duped and how many dupes they made, and they have never forgiven me for telling them so.

What else could they have done? Back in those days while I was slowly and painfully freeing myself of all the illusions which had bound my youth (official historic lies, lies in the national and racial conventions, lies of tradition and state) I began faintly and tremblingly to hear the liberating response the people should have made, and I dared not utter it. I shall speak out today. It is the answer Lenin made in 1917: let the armies of Europe revolt against the war lords and fraternize on the field of battle.

But let us not revert to that part. That is a long confession which I owe it to myself to write if I still have time, for it might start the travail of thousands of souls which harbor these thoughts but dare not bring them to light. Let us stop talking of yesterday. The present suffices us. Let us talk of the great and redoubtable today!

* This article was written by Romain Rolland in reply to an article by Gaston Riou discussing the Pan-European problem. It is here published by courtesy of the editor of Unity, and it appears also in the current issue of that periodical, dated April 20. The translation is by Mrs. Ruth Langner.—EDITOR THE NATION.

The generous intellectuals of present-day France, of whom Gaston Riou has constituted himself leader, are intoning the new anthem "Europe, my country"—and they have no idea that they are serving the latest interests of the astute masters of the day.

There seem to be two conflicting trends in French politics today. There is the iron-handed group which means to keep by violence the oppressions imposed on Europe by violence, and there is the velvet-gloved school which attempts to gain assured peace with all Europe by allowing the victors a magnanimity involving no risks or costs. There is a difference in political intelligence between the two, but not in nationalism. Both camps adhere to the credo of victory and the inviolability of its decrees.

What does the "realist school" of French politics want? To keep the fruits of victory unthreatened by the destruction of a new war. Hence, to establish peace and the laws of a Franco-Europe on the basis of the 1919 treaties. But they are very careful not to inquire if these treaties are just or unjust, if they are not abominable abuses committed by violence triumphant, if they do not rise on a scaffolding of intolerable crimes and iniquities which still continue. The fact is that the boundaries established by the treaties of 1919 cannot, from the point of view of two-thirds of Europe, be maintained. Our French informants stop their ears to the agonized cries of the vanquished countries. Germany, rubbed raw, whose enormous energy is being reborn—Germany is starved and will not be able to bear this repression more than a year or two without social and national convulsions that will make the Western world tremble; peoples and parties are being persecuted and tortured by France's allies, as in, for instance, Pilsudski's Poland; Hungary, reduced to despair, is ready even for crime if that will snatch its heroic race from the tomb. It is clear that such a Europe is an insult to Europe, a criminal mockery, and the first gang leader à la Mussolini who cares to ruin French supremacy will have an easy time rallying all those desperate men about him.

If these "Europeans" like Riou have the sense of "reality" that they like to say they have, let them prove it by ceasing to be the dupes and supporters of a purely verbal generosity which offers peace as it squats astride the world and pummels it. Let them be the first to start a revised European peace provided with all the guaranties of political prudence, but sincere, loyal, and a real attempt to wipe out the worst injustices and feuds. Let them be clear-headed and big enough to look for themselves at the mistakes and wrongs their own country has caused in Europe, and then offer to right them. True, such a revision, no matter how moderate, would bring with it fatally great sacrifices on the part of the victors; they would have to share the cost of ruining Europe. Any man who dared preach such a doctrine to France could not hope for popularity. But if he demands peace with his heart as well as his lips he should know how to pay for it in personal sacrifice. I insist on a grand assize of Europe where the people's representatives loyally and unitedly may review the possible conditions of life together. Until these are found and accepted there is no use in repeating "Europe!" There is no Europe. There are peoples bound and gnawing at their chains. There are those who tighten those chains. With whom are you?

That is only the first point. Let us proceed to the second. The almost exclusive preoccupation of Western "Europeans" is, quite naturally, the establishment of lasting peace in the West through a Franco-German reconciliation. It is a great aim. I have always worked toward it. But it is only a part of our aim, and, to speak my inmost thought, its realization is not the principal problem now. Today the gravest risk does not lie in a renewal of the Franco-German struggle. I know Germany well enough to believe that only noisy but unimportant minorities think seriously of another war with France. The economic condition of the country makes war impossible. And it is very striking that Ludendorff, the generalissimo of the last war, should flood Germany with his deluded little books, trying to turn it away from a new war in which, as during the Thirty Years' War, it would, as things stand, be the field of battle and ruin for all Europe; and Ludendorff refuses to be the grave-digger in that cemetery! He declares in advance that if war breaks out he will have no part in it. The shrieks of the Hitler group aim at intimidation rather than action. All these party agitations are no more than circus didos today. At present the real game is being played within the business world. A little more than a year ago, in an article on The Piracy of Peace published in Europe for November, 1929, I violently denounced the secret negotiations pursued for some years between Arnold Rechberg, the German potash magnate, and the French nationalist business men—those alarming projects (publicly confirmed by Rechberg) for a Franco-German military alliance which would allow the big German munition manufacturers a new lease on life and give the French captains of industry a share of the profits. Just now it is rumored that these negotiations are more active than ever. The big German industries, which are prevented by the economic crisis from investing sufficiently large sums in armament, are seeking financial aid from France in rehabilitating German war industries and are offering France, along with part of the profits, the chance to increase French armament as well.

These monstrous projects of martial partnership are one of the secret pivots of the new Pan-Europe. I should like to know what the French intellectuals of the Franco-European League think of them, and if they have a mind to wreathe them with garlands. I will not allow them to ignore the facts and refuse to consider whither their Franco-Europe would inevitably be dragged by such protectors. The two most powerful Western states will not strengthen their munitions and armies and then leave their swords sheathed. Their maws are ravenous for prey, and unable to rend it singly they are agreeing to divide it. Where is this prey? Gaston Riou sweetly compares me to Mary in the Gospels, to Mary, the mystic adorer of the Master, who, seated at his feet, dreamed with her eyes closed. He assigns himself the role of worthy Martha, who cooked for the Master. Has Gaston Riou lifted his eyes to his Master's face? Can he tell me who this Master is? Who will he be tomorrow? Will he be the Comité des Forges, the Standard Oil, or Sir Henri Deterding? I imagine our good Martha will upset the pot-au-feu with a frightened start when she sees who has taken the place of the Master she loved and dreamed of. As for me, I have never aspired to play Mary. I claim my Gallic heritage from Diderot rather than Rousseau; I am a man without a master, and I delegate my housekeeping to no one. My grandfather, Colas Breugnon, taught me as a child to be wisely afraid of Nivernais sheep (they're chamois—it takes but three to strangle a wolf).

Poor sheep! "If the wolf were all, we'd know how to guard against him. But who will protect us against the shepherd?"

I have never been more than half-asleep, and I have been watching the antics of the bad shepherds for years—their efforts to blockade the U. S. S. R., their scoundrelly collusion with the white émigrés and the reactionary factions, the military missions sent to organize the mercenary armies of Poland or the Balkans. The recent Moscow trial told me nothing I had not suspected, allowing for the supplementary exaggerations with which rogues like Ramzin adorned their confessions to save their necks. The fundamental facts of these confessions are only too easily verified. The U. S. S. R. is the prey they aim at. If the plans against Russia have failed so far, it is only because, luckily for it, the big international robbers, the Anglo-Franco-German captains of rapine, have fought clumsily over possession of the bearskin without coming to an agreement. Once the agreement is made and the European business and army bloc is organized, does anyone dream it will lie inactive faced by a Soviet world which is its social negation and whose success would menace its own existence?

So I ask Gaston Riou, what position will he and his friends take? Which camp? Will he continue to serve the Master of oil and petrol, the Western business bloc, ideologically? Or what will he do? Cards on the table! Here are mine! If the U. S. S. R. is menaced, no matter who its enemies may be, I am on its side. I am not blind to what seem to me to be its mistakes. I have often told Russia directly. But I believe and I know that it incarnates the most heroic adventure, the most solid social hope of the future. If it disappeared I should no longer be interested in Europe's future. I should consider it sociologically damned for centuries to come.

But that is not all. Another conflagration is flaming outside our doors. To charm her young lovers, the fair Europe whose knight errant is Gaston Riou has borrowed the form of a pretty girl of 1789—the Goddess of Reason with her blossoming breasts bearing the new evangel of the Rights of Man. But she has less pretty features under the make-up. The rest of the world knows her tiger snout. The democracies of today are empires (some would say vampires). These beasts of prey have divided the carcass of the earth. Their appetite is immense. They gorge themselves with the gold and blood of peoples twenty times more numerous than they. The British lion has his claws sunk into the flanks of India, sunk so deep he cannot withdraw them, nor live detached from his prey. We French, who let him capture this magnificent prize in the days of the unfortunate Lally and Louis the Beloved, made up for it rather well later on. It is noteworthy that our imperialistic expansion coincided with the establishment of the Third Republic. "In a republic," Victor Hugo might have said, "there are publicans." The climax of the Roman republic was the rule of Crassus and Verres. Naturally we made away with a fourth of the planet only in order to bring it the light of our civilization, our culture, and our language, which are the most beautiful and perfect of all. But our lucky charges have the ill grace to prefer their own. Ingratitude we know is the law of life. And the great Asiatic races accept no blame for attempting a renaissance of their own. The foremost, Japan, has declared itself adult by force of arms. China, awake now, will never go back to sleep. And, conscious of its power, Gandhi's India has just given the signal for the great emancipation. The rest of Asia will not take long to follow. Our Indo-Chinese empire has already manifested the first awakening twitches, which the proconsuls of our democracy have, naturally, wiped out in blood. The same wakening thrill is coursing through the large body of Islam, which from end to end covers about a third of the old continent.

The question will arise tomorrow, it has arisen today: Where are Gaston Riou and his friends going to stand—with the Great God Rubber (automotive) flanked by all his pantheon and his holy harem—the Goddess of Liberty, Spiritual Enlightenment, Art, Science, Progress, Civilization? Or with the great brothers, Asia and Africa, trying to snap their chains? I will have no sidestepping. When the duel starts—and the blind selfishness of Europe makes it almost inevitable—what soldiers will docilely help the adventurers of Europe combat a world fighting for independence?

I answer for myself, pledging no one else, but pledging all of myself: I will not be such a soldier. Europe, if you enter upon this monstrous war I will march against you, against your despotism and your rapacity, and for my brothers in India, China, Indo-China, and all the oppressed and exploited countries. I shall do so not only in the name of justice and the racial rights which you will lyingly invoke, but in the name of civilization itself, of the greatest civilization—the unlimited progress of the human spirit. For this spirit has a vital need in this hour to be enriched and renewed by the intellectual and moral contribution of these magnificent races, who, though centuries of rapine have extorted from them their gold, still hold fast to their spiritual treasures, their ancient and now resuscitated civilizations.

I shall hope against all hope that the mighty onset of both hemispheres can still be averted. But if this eventuates I am too near death to hide my thoughts. I say to the U. S. S. R. of Lenin, and I say to the Asia of Sun Yat-sen and Gandhi: Brothers, count on me! I am only one man among millions. But that man is and has all his life been a liberal voice in the West, the voice of the Jean-Christophes and the Colas Breugnons, a free worker, brother of the free workers of the world, who want to open the way to a universal labor union, free of the yokes and prejudices of race, caste, and class.

And I say to Europe: Broaden, Europe, or die! Wed all the new free forces on earth! You are stifling in your outmoded liberty cap, glorious but crushed down over your face. Tear it off! Breathe and let us breathe! We need a home, a country, more far-flung than Europe.

My country is not yesterday. My country is tomorrow. And the angelus has already rung out this day.

Chicago Goes Tammany

By MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

Chicago, April 8

THOMPSONISM has been swept out of power. The Clown Mayor will no longer amuse the patient residents of Chicago; he will no longer annoy the bankers, big business men, and newspaper publishers of this city. Big Bill was overwhelmingly defeated for reelection yesterday after an election campaign unparalleled in the city's history. Never before had Chicago seen a campaign attended by such religious and moral fervor as that which characterized the drive to unseat William Hale Thompson. This morning, with the election not yet twenty-four hours old, Chicago is already beginning to ask itself whether the price it paid to get rid of Thompson may not in the end prove too high, for the man elected in his place is A. J. Cermak, Democratic boss of Illinois, and sole proprietor of a complex political machine built entirely along the lines of the Tammany organization in New York.

Cermak was merely an incident in the great crusade to kill Thompsonism—to use a Chicago phrase, which will be explained later. The rallying cry was "Get rid of Thompson at any price." Hence Tony Cermak, the only alternative candidate available, drew the unanimous support of all the good people of Chicago. They did not inquire too closely into his record; they did not press him for binding promises and pledges; they swallowed him whole because he was the only man in the field who could beat Thompson—and Tony had seen to that months before the crusaders awakened to their opportunity. These crusaders took the position that "even a yellow dog would be better than Thompson," as one of their leaders expressed it to the writer. Who were the crusaders? Not the professional reformers, for they were divided. They were the leading bankers, industrialists, lawyers, physicians, social workers, and educators of the city. They were, in short, the "better element." They included outstanding citizens of the type of Colonel Albert A. Sprague, A. A. Carpenter, E. A. Cudahy, Jr., Stanley Field, James B. Forgan, Jr., John V. Farwell, Jacob M. Loeb, Arthur Meeker, Harold Plamondon, E. L. Ryerson, Jr., Fred W. Sargent, Melvin A. Traylor; nationally known lawyers like Silas Strawn; noted social workers like Miss Harriet Vittum; socially prominent civic leaders like Mrs. Kellogg Fairbank; educators like Dean Shailer Mathews and Professor Charles E. Merriam; philanthropists like Julius Rosenwald; and national leaders in the medical profession like Dr. M. L. Harris. They had the support of hundreds of women's clubs and similar organizations, and they were led in their drive by the publishers of the Tribune and the Daily News. Jointly they aroused the city—with the help of the Cermak machine.

Perhaps Big Bill Thompson was as vicious as his defamers pictured him. To the practical and unprejudiced observer it appears that Chicago has simply swapped one evil for another. Indeed, it is clear that the great crusade has had one net result: the people of Chicago, by electing Tony Cermak, have made him the most powerful political boss in the United States today. The power that lies in his hands is greater than that possessed by any other boss anywhere in the country; it may eventually prove greater than that of any other boss in American history, barring not even Tweed, Platt, Penrose, or Mark Hanna. Cermak controls Cook County, of which Chicago forms only a part, the Sanitary District and its rich patronage, the South Park Board, the Illinois legislature, and one of the United States Senators from Illinois. He is expected to win the governorship and the other senatorship next year—rumor has it that this latter post will go to Dr. Herman Bundesen, the Chicago newspaper doctor, for his graciousness in retiring from the mayoralty race. Cermak's rule of the State will then be absolute. More important, however, is the control of the Chicago governmental machinery which he won in yesterday's election. With it goes domination of the Civil Service Commission, the school system, and a host of appointive offices, control of which gives the mayor of Chicago more authority and more patronage than is possessed by any other municipal executive in the United States.

When Chicago elected Cermak yesterday it was not consciously ousting Thompson, but was voting to get rid of Thompsonism. Most of the voters of Chicago had never been permitted to know the real Thompson; the Big Bill with whom they were acquainted was the vicious and degenerate politician set up for them years ago by the city's newspapers led by the Tribune. This was the Thompson who made Chicago the butt of the world's sneers; this was the Thompson upon whom was hung the blame for all the rottenness with which the city's political and commercial structure is shot through. It was no accident that in the moral campaign just closed Big Bill's opponents painstakingly refrained from attacking his personal integrity, but chose rather to assail a phrase—Thompsonism. Summed up in this phrase are all the criticisms, just or unjust, that have been leveled at Chicago in the past twelve or fifteen years. To Chicago it means municipal corruption, police graft, gangster rule, racketeering. The writer does not intend that this shall be an apology for Big Bill Thompson. Big Bill has been anything but an ideal mayor; he has made a clown of himself; he has tolerated illegal practices when these were committed by his friends; he has tacitly accepted the support of Al Capone exactly as one of his newspaper opponents accepted the services of Capone in breaking a truck-drivers' strike. Thompson's greatest weakness was his refusal to interfere with the grafting of his friends. Doubtless a more courageous man might have given Chicago a cleaner government, but no individual alone can break up racketeering and gangsterism in Chicago so long as the existence of these evils is profitable to many of Chicago's leading citizens. Hence, though Big Bill may be gone, Thompsonism remains as firmly intrenched as ever.

At least a dozen of Cermak's most prominent supporters, all of them lifelong Republicans, frankly told the writer that their game was to beat Thompson, and only that. They admitted with equal frankness that while there was not much more hope in Cermak they had to accept him as the lesser of two evils. About two years ago officers of the Better Government Association, bitter foe of Thompson but nevertheless one of his supporters in the late campaign, set out to find an outstanding citizen, free from all political connections, whom they might persuade to run against Big Bill at the next election. They found only one or two men eligible for the post according to the association's standards, and these men refused to consider the suggestion. The others without exception were either intimately associated with Thompson and his friends, and were profiting therefrom, or stood to gain financially and politically by the removal of Thompson. Meanwhile, though he started somewhat later, Cermak began to prepare himself against the day when the moral indignation of the city, constantly fed by the press, would result in a popular revolt that would turn Big Bill out of office. His absolute control of the Democratic machine made it certain that he would get the Democratic nomination, which he did without opposition. The crusading business men and bankers did not awaken until after the primary last February, and then they found that they had to choose Thompson, Cermak, or an independent. Realizing that an independent such as Herman Bundesen, who had intended to enter the race, or one of their own number, would split the opposition vote and thereby insure a Thompson victory, the crusaders prevailed upon Bundesen to retire, and rallied behind Cermak. One of the crusaders confessed to me that they had arrived at this decision rather belatedly after their division behind two opposition candidates in the Republican primary had given Thompson the nomination. In the election campaign, however, he continued, they had taken measures to make certain that the opposition vote would be concentrated unanimously in support of one man, and thus it came about that the Socialist, Communist, and three other minor-party candidates were barred from the ticket, leaving the Democratic boss to fight it out alone with Thompson. Incidentally, this move on the part of the crusaders may in the end prove their undoing. The Socialists are preparing to fight the case up to the highest court in the State, and having a strong case they may win and thereby force the Illinois Supreme Court to declare the election illegal. (This would be a big surprise for the Chicago voters inasmuch as they have not been informed by the press of a single detail in the Socialist battle.)

Who is Cermak, and what can he do for Chicago? He was born near Prague in Bohemia fifty-eight years ago, and was brought to this country when still a child. In his early teens he worked with his father in the mines at Braidwood, Illinois, attending school about three months out of each year. His teacher was George E. Brennan, whom he later succeeded as boss of the Illinois Democratic machine. At sixteen he came to Chicago, worked at various odd jobs, and finally found himself in politics in the old Lawndale district of the city, then, as now, populated chiefly by Czechs and other Central and Eastern Europeans. He started as a precinct worker, but being a born politician and understanding the value of the Tammany principle, which might best be described as "taking care of the little fellows in your own district," he rose rapidly, and by the time he was thirty was sent to the State legislature from the Lawndale district. His assembly record was distinguished only by his vote for Billy Lorimer for United States Senator, a vote which was the occasion of sensational charges by Speaker Edward D. Shurtleff and Representative Charles A. White. Cermak later served four terms in the Chicago City Council, and in 1922 was elected president of the Cook County Board of Commissioners, to which post he was reelected in 1926 and again last year. He was defeated in the race for United States Senator in 1927. He was trained in politics by Roger Sullivan and George E. Brennan, though he had great difficulty in working in harness with the latter because he believed in "taking care of" the Czechs, Poles, and other non-Irish Democrats on the West Side to the disadvantage of the Irish who then controlled the Democratic city machine. Although Chicago's new mayor has never held a job that paid him more than $12,000 a year, he is worth today more than $7,000,000, according to the private estimates of several of his supporters in the mayoralty campaign. Thompson, by the way, already possessed his huge fortune before he ever entered politics, and his wealth is today less than it was thirty years ago. Finally, the political machine Cermak has perfected—and it is in operation in virtually every ward in the city—is not a personal machine built, as Thompson's was, around one man. It is constructed on a basis of organization. Much as the district leaders of New York's Democracy control Tammany Hall, the Democratic ward leaders run the Chicago machine, although final control rests securely with the boss. Persons seeking favors or privileges from the city or county government cannot go to the boss or one of his friends to get what they want; they must apply to the ward leaders. These lesser politicians are also charged with the distribution of minor offices and other local or district patronage. It was relatively easy to dislodge the Thompson machine because it consisted of one individual; it will be much more difficult to dislodge the Cermak machine, when Chicago does finally awaken to the consequences of its action of yesterday, because the Cermak organization will be found closely woven into the very fabric of the municipal and county governments, into the life of the city itself. It will be found to be another Tammany Hall, equally permanent and honest.

It is not suggested here that Cermak himself will not give Chicago a better brand of government, at least outwardly, than Thompson has done. First of all, he will be under great moral pressure to do so. He has obligated himself to the financial and commercial interests of the city, and they have power enough to exact payment of one sort or another. They will, at least at the start, name his cabinet, and they will insist that he undertake certain reforms which he has promised. These reforms have almost entirely to do with the structure of the municipal government. In Cook County, for example, there are 419 tax-levying bodies. While most of these consist of township and other minor community governments outside the city, the more important of them are to be found operating in Chicago. As a result there has been considerable duplication of governmental activity and also, in consequence, much waste and extravagance. Cermak hopes to be able to consolidate some of these bodies and thereby save the taxpayers upwards of $50,000,000 annually. He doubtless will also cut out much of the heavy graft in public improvements; $3,000,000 bridges will probably cost something near that amount instead of costing $7,000,000 as they did under Thompson, and there will very likely be no more $100 daily fees for realty-appraisal experts. At least that sort of thing is not to be expected from a man instructed in Tammany principles. Other reforms may bring taxes down a trifle farther, but the reduction in the tax rate will hardly be noticeable to the average citizen. Chicago is a huge metropolis and its expenditures run close to half a billion dollars.

Cermak's promise that he will clean the gangsters out is, of course, pure political buncombe. He stands completely helpless before the gangsters and racketeers, and he will continue helpless, granting that he is sincere in saying that he is opposed to gangster rule, so long as the operation of the gangs and racketeers remains profitable to so many of the important people in the city. The Tribune, in a series of articles now being published, asserts that the gangsters are finally on the run. It is contended that five or six of them have been sent to prison and that the conviction of Leo Brothers for the murder of Jake Lingle, Chicago Tribune reporter and himself a racketeer, has thrown the fear of the law into the rest of the gangsters. Be that as it may, it is yet worth noting that the five or six gunmen mentioned are not associated with the Capone outfit (which, by the way, just a week ago cleared out the last of its rivals and made its rule of the city's speakeasy, gambling, and prostitution trades complete), and that Brothers was convicted on evidence which neither established a motive nor showed any connection between Brothers and Lingle. There are numerous lawyers in the city who believe the conviction will be thrown out by the State Supreme Court, and many more private citizens who are convinced that Brothers, although known to be a professional killer, did not kill Lingle. In any event, I have heard in the last few days from the lips of more than one speakeasy proprietor and more than one Capone henchman that far from fearing anything in the way of a genuine Cermak offensive against the gangsters, these men actually supported Cermak on election day in the belief that he is helpless to move against them, but that had Thompson remained in office four more years public indignation would have risen to the point of open and probably violent warfare against the gangsters.

Chicago has elected as its mayor the most powerful political boss in the country. Chicago's leading citizens are pleased. Julius Rosenwald telegraphed Cermak that when "I regain my health my services are at your command to help you redeem the good name of the city." Silas Strawn said: "Every decent citizen should hail this victory." Shailer Mathews, dean of the Divinity School of the University of Chicago, declared: "I believe that this is the greatest opportunity that ever came to the city." Dr. M. L. Harris, former president of the American Medical Association, announced that "this election means the regeneration of Chicago." Murphy and Croker of Tammany Hall, both of whom resembled Cermak in many respects, would thoroughly enjoy the irony of these testimonials. Cermak, musing over this enlargement of his already extensive political power, probably derived much enjoyment and no little amusement from the testimonials and the hundreds of congratulatory messages that poured in upon him.

California Sunshine

By DUNCAN AIKMAN

> The situation is remarkably good. I feel sure that the recent rains will bring us out of the slump. The situation is not at all alarming. We do not find it necessary to feed our unemployed men here. In San Francisco I saw free soup kitchens. There are none here. All we have to do is to give our men jobs and the problem is solved.—John C. Porter, Mayor of Los Angeles.

THE Honorable John C. Porter is a representative Southern Californian—not a Titan of the regional economic or intellectual life, but because of this very lack of obvious eminence all the more representative, perhaps. On most issues of personal and public life he holds the same views as other Southern Californians. He was an earnest worker in the Ku Klux Klan when that organization for super-Americanism was up and doing in the land. He is an influential member of the Federated Church Brotherhoods of California, and believes that regular church attendance and conventionality in morals and opinions are outstanding marks of good citizenship. He is an ardent prohibitionist, and believes that by making speakeasy operation difficult in Los Angeles—and thereby aiding the city's hordes of "grappo" and bathtub-gin bootleggers—he is bringing practical enforcement close to hand.

He believes that in public morals and private scandal there is no other guide so expert as the Reverend Robert Pierce (Bob) Shuler of Trinity Methodist Church (South) and Radio Station KGEF, and so far he has not refused to accede to a single important political demand openly made by that gentleman. He believes that one way of maintaining a "clean moral tone" in city administration is to see that no city employee takes an illicit drink or indulges in risque amusements in off hours. Hence, until newspaper raillery checked it, he maintained a special snooping squad to spy on such breaches of decorum. He believes that to permit Communists to express their opinions publicly in Los Angeles, or to approach the City Hall or address His Honor, would seriously imperil the foundations of American institutions. He is in the automobile junk business in a big way, regionally speaking, and for recreation he sometimes tosses horseshoes. Recognizing the representative character of these views and qualities, a majority of several score thousand of his fellow-citizens two years ago elected him mayor of the fifth city in the United States over a retired college professor—of sociology—who had cultivated practical politics so well that he received the backing of the expert "ring" bosses.

A more adequate spokesman of the spirit in which the average Southern California mind is facing the unemployment crisis could hardly have been fashioned by a soviet of psychologists in a robot factory. The Mayor of Los Angeles, like all congenital Iowa county-seat merchants, thinks that a little rain in the ground will ease the situation of all its major difficulties by getting "folks' " minds back on spring lanting again. He is happy and proud to report that however much calamity talk there may be about the situation ere on the local Main Street, conditions are, by proof of is own eye-witness observations, a plain sight worse in the ival burg up the line. Finally, Mayor Porter has none of he sense, known to have proved bothersome of late to certain rofounder captains of industry and economic thought in ther centers, of vast dislocations and maladjustments in the ndustrial organization felt to be threatening the stability of Vestern civilization. "All we have to do is to give our men obs and the problem is solved," says this cheerful Justice ottom of the machine age.

It is as simple as that. For with Mayor Porter maority opinion in Southern California and on the Coast genrally would unquestionably agree that the unemployed crisis an be met by the formula of the tender ballad, "Somewhere little sunshine, somewhere a little rain." The Far West, short, believes that it is undergoing something like the anic of 1907, only maybe a little bit worse. Its solutions nd most of its cerebration on the subject are to be viewed in e light of this group concept.

Hence, in the main, the Coast believes that the affliction an be cured by the favorite local panacea, ballyhoo. About e whole relief program there has been an air of the choice alifornia art of idea salesmanship. Women are 75 per cent f customers, J. A. H. Kerr, recently elected president of e Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, told his fellowembers in his inaugural address. If they would support to the limit" a "buy-home-products" campaign "the un-nployment situation would be largely solved."

A similar spirit of idea salesmanship prevails in the rincipal concrete effort which the Los Angeles Chamber as made to ease the emergency. This is an office in the ity Hall where a newly appointed pay-roll beneficiary—ntil recently a purchasing agent—spends his time "coordinat-g" the fields of the various relief agencies. A prime idea this functionary is to "contact" all the civic agencies in wn and enlist them in spreading the "give-somebody-a-job" opaganda. Southern California has been flooded with peals to "Mr. Average Citizen" and "Mrs. Average ousewife" to do something about the crisis—so much ooded, in fact, that from a batch of 700 letters sent out me time since by the Coordinator's office to members of e business community no answers were received.

But the Coordinator has practical as well as philan-ropic ideas to "sell" for the duration of the emergency. "contacting" industries, for instance, he has made the ost of the thesis that $1.25 worth of 1929 construction, ving to the lower costs of materials and labor, may be ught now for less than $1. Therefore, now is the time put men to work. New construction, the official argu-ent runs, is a banner investment, better even than buying w-cost securities. For when land and building values ome back" in from three to five years, the new owner will ve made more profit than if he had had his capital out at terest. Meanwhile the purchasing power of every two en put to work will have resulted in creating a place for me other workman somewhere. On the home-economics ont, the Coordinator planned to organize his cohorts of vic bodies for practically a house-to-house canvass of the y, assuring householders that because of the low-cost situation now was the time to do all conceivably needed repair work about the place. Meanwhile another economic realist in the field, Miss Susan B. Dorsey, former superintendent of schools in Los Angeles, has intimated that the crisis may be utilized to solve the chronic American servant problem. The slogan "Every home employs at least one woman a week" would do a lot, Miss Dorsey has averred, to carry Los Angeles over almost any depression.

Beyond these efforts to popularize the principle that this is bargain season in the labor market, actual relief on the Coast has been left mainly to public agencies. In San Francisco, after a good deal of red-tape investigation to make sure of the applicants' worthiness, a few hundred men have been intermittently employed at $5 a day cleaning up undeveloped city properties, and a few score women have been hired at $4 a day to make comforters, by an antiquated hand process, for the destitute wards—other unemployed—of the city charities organization. Practically all the larger Coast centers have appropriated, or borrowed, considerable sums for public-works construction, Los Angeles having authorized a $5,000,000 bond issue. Within a week after Governor Rolph's inauguration in January, the $30,000,000 surplus in the State treasury at Sacramento was reduced by a $5,000,000 works and highway appropriation, which, it was immediately announced for public edification, would create 319,350 days of work and was altogether a remarkable public-service achievement for an administration only a week old. The Mayor of Seattle announced about the same time that the entire city government would be utilized as a great unemployment agency, whatever that meant; and in general the politicians have assured the unemployed of their deepest commiseration.

Soup kitchens, meanwhile, have been established where the need was evident, with appropriate councilmanic oratory, though in Los Angeles, where official confession of community distress is regarded as a heresy to the cult of boosterism, this last extremity has been nominally avoided. Instead of being maintained by the city, the Los Angeles soup lines are conducted by various missions for "down-and-outs" in the slum sections of the city, publicity having been given to their services early in the year by the award of a civic medal to the veteran missionary "Brother Tom" Liddecott as the most useful citizen of Los Angeles. Shortly afterward an investigation by the Los Angeles Record disclosed that Brother Liddecott's soup kitchen was serving decayed restaurant garbage to the unfortunate. The mission authorities met this crisis, however, by dispatching an earnest appeal to restaurant proprietors to contribute more palatable remnants, and "Brother Tom" kept the medal.

On the whole the Coast is inclined to agree with Mayor Porter that the unemployment crisis is merely a temporary case of mainly fatuous pessimism in the business world, which can be largely overcome by giving an artificial odd job here and an artificial odd job there until the trouble automatically rights itself. Of deeper mental probings into the causes and possible cures of the prevalent economic anemia there have been just two Far Western instances.

One of these is represented by a series of six articles contributed to the Los Angeles Times by no less a person than its publisher, Harry Chandler. Mr. Chandler's studies have convinced him that the efficiency of the machine has made overproduction inevitable if all employable members of society are given eight-hour jobs six days in the week. Therefore the forty-eight-hour week must go and be replaced by the five-day week or the six-hour day, according to the individual needs of different industries. There would be more than enough jobs to go around if this standard were adopted, Mr. Chandler suggests, citing statistics, but he adds that there must be insistence on one proviso: the reductions in working time must be compensated by corresponding reductions in pay. This, he proceeds, would work no real hardship, since wage reductions of from 16 to 20 per cent would be almost exactly balanced by reductions in the cost of living since the piping times of Coolidge. On the other hand, he argues, actual benefits would be conferred on trade were the working classes tempted by the new sense of security in their less profitable jobs to spend what they earned instead of hoarding it for recurrent unemployment crises.

Mr. Chandler has already put the five-day week into effect in the mechanical departments of the Times, he announces, and he urges his fellow-industrialists to hasten and do likewise. The unkind comment of various Southern California labor leaders has been, of course, that it is a typical Chandler strategy for crowding the workers 16 per cent farther toward a hand-to-mouth living standard and therefore farther into the employer's power.

The other piece of ratiocination is an example of community rather than of individual thinking. Southern California, at any rate, has been ardently converted to the principle that it is better to let the unemployment problem drift toward a solution than to let the apostles of incendiary revolt from "red Russia" attract any attention by exploiting it. In consequence of this determination, Southern California has given the Communist movement some of the best local publicity it has enjoyed anywhere west or east of the Moscow Izvestia office. Practically once a week during the winter the Los Angeles police were mobilized, half a thousand strong, to prevent Communist attacks on the City Hall by tangling up traffic and shoving pedestrians out of the half-dozen city blocks in the recognized "danger zone." Usually, while the unemployed stood by in apathetic droves to enjoy the exciting spectacle, the danger was momentarily overcome by letting loose anywhere from fifty to a hundred club-armed motor-cycle police to charge a little knot of perhaps a dozen Communists who presumed to raise a paper banner announcing that the unemployed demand bread for their children.

Thus, for the rank and file of Southern Californians the unemployment menace has tended more and more to drift into the category of a public spectacle—the old, reliable, exciting melodrama of saving the Republic by violence. It is scarcely to be denied that this policy has afforded a certain measure of relief to the situation; for the unemployed, in general, are manifestly thrilled to see such drastic measures taken to protect their contentment with American institutions, while in a few outstanding instances actual employment is afforded, as in the cases of Lieutenant Colonel Leroy F. Smith, executive secretary of the Better America Federation of Los Angeles, and Lieutenant William F. Hynes of the local police "red squad," the chief local sources of information on the program of the Communists to overthrow faith, economic organization, and government in Southern California by exploiting the discontents of the era.

In the Driftway

THE insular self-sufficiency of the English, which has built an empire and annoyed whole continents, is an ancient tale. But whenever the Drifter encounters it he is moved anew to amazement and admiration by its intensity and its frankness. And it happens that he has just come upon a particularly striking articulation of it. Bertram Thomas, as everybody knows, achieved the distinction in February of this year of being the first white man to cross the Rub' al Khali, or Great Sandy Desert, in southern Arabia. It was an epic journey of 900 desert miles, in the course of which important geological and ethnological discoveries were made. The Drifter would like to quote some of Mr. Thomas's own vivid account as it appeared in the Manchester Guardian, but unfortunately it is copyrighted and reserved in very black type. He will have to content himself instead with a paragraph from another article which follows Mr. Thomas's and which really has more bearing on this discussion, anyway. It is from the pen of Sir Arnold Wilson. It is unprotected by copyright or otherwise—and the reader will perceive at once that neither the article nor the man who wrote it needs protection. In commenting upon the exploits of Mr. Thomas, Sir Arnold writes as follows:

> The details now given by Mr. Thomas help us to appreciate the magnitude of his achievement, which deserves to rank with those of Stanley, Shackleton, and Scott. He has not depended upon the adventitious aid of aeroplanes, airships, or motor cars. He has not financed himself from public funds, nor received aid from private sources. He has not had recourse to apostasy in order to commend himself to the unruly denizens of those regions that appear to us so intrinsically abominable and vile. He has made no attempt to disguise his nationality or hide his religion. In so doing he has followed the best traditions of English explorers in Asia and has justified the boast of Colonel Pelly, the first Englishman to visit Riyadh (the capital of Nejd), that an Englishman could, should his duty so require, traverse any portion of Arabia with dignity and without disguise.

* * * * *

SIR ARNOLD is right, theoretically. Any self-respecting man, English or Asian, should be capable of goin wherever he pleases without disguise. But the Drifter cannot help wondering, a little maliciously he admits, what Si Arnold would have thought if Mr. Gandhi of India, wh will visit London this summer, had lived up to the newspaper reports that he would not wear trousers, empire or n empire—had followed, to the letter, the example of Bertran Thomas. According to these first reports he intended to brav London dressed only in a loin-cloth of his own spinning The Drifter at this point readily admits that he would himself have certain ignoble qualms about meeting Mr. Gandh for lunch at the Astor; and human devotion to conformit being what it is, he welcomes the later news that Mr. Gandh will wear trousers and shirt after all. They represent compromise, to be sure, but one which no one will reproac him with, since they will protect him not only from th "unruly denizens" who would undoubtedly follow hin through the London streets, but from colds in the head which lurk in the London fog.

* * * * *

THERE are times and circumstances, in other words, when self-sufficiency may don the disguise of humility, and truth put on trousers, without dishonor. Here is a theme, in fact, which the Drifter would like to develop at length. For the present, however, he will cut himself short with the story of a headline from the London Times. It was told to him only recently by a Scotchman—if, by the way, you are in search of entertainment, persuade a Scotchman to speak his mind and heart about Englishmen. The headline in question appeared after a severe storm in the Channel which had paralyzed shipping. "Heavy Channel Storms," stated the Times with dignity and without disguise, "Continent Isolated."

California Is Not Civilized

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As a Californian and a resident of the Imperial Valley I should like to reply to the article of Mr. Robert Whitaker in your issue of April 1. California is not civilized. What State is? All the injustices he mentions exist. As a human being I am ashamed of them. But I can't think that injustice and intolerance are confined to such an insignificant part of the world as this Promised Land for all good Iowans.

The Imperial Valley is a small part of the State of California, and it is even less civilized because it is one of the few places that are still on the frontier. It is in the desert and the old fight with nature is still going on. No doubt the conditions in the cotton fields would be "incredible to most of the American people." Most Americans would not stand them. But a great many people do. The point Mr. Whitaker overlooks is that the farm owners are living and working under just as hard conditions as the Mexicans and Filipinos who work for them.

At the time of the Frank Spector case which Mr. Whitaker mentions, it was reported that the living conditions of the field workers in the valley were unspeakable. They were. But it is very difficult to persuade a farmer to build model dormitories for his men when he and his wife and his three or four children are living in a two-room shack, with perhaps a sleeping porch. Try asking him to build shower baths for his melon pickers when he himself is still using a round washtub and probably carries water for it from the irrigation ditch.

Regular farm labor, white as well as colored, earns three dollars a day. And the work is hard. Many factory workers could not stand it. Special workers—for instance, the Filipinos who are now cutting the asparagus—earn from seventy to eighty cents a crate, bunched, which means that they get from four to seven dollars a day. It is not easy to stoop and cut "grass," and the bunching job is monotonous, and the season is short. But then in their turn come the other special crops—the melons, cotton, peas, and lettuce. All are too poorly paid, but it is a living, and the farmer who owns the crop hardly makes one. One farmer's family had nothing to eat but lettuce for some weeks last year because the price was so low that he could not afford to market his crop.

Perhaps if Mr. Whitaker had lived in the Imperial Valley instead of merely "sojourning" here among the "best people"—by the way, I did not know we had any in this land where truck-drivers and ditch-diggers still call bank presidents by their first names, and the husbands and sons and brothers of the leaders of society run service stations or work as drug-store clerks. Perhaps if Mr. Whitaker had lived in the desert where every living thing has to struggle for its own existence, if he had worked under the sun that makes everybody—employer as well as employee—sweat alike, he might find one of the reasons for our narrow, cruel individualism which makes us fight attempts to organize agricultural workers.

The Curse of Eve

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: There is a casual statement in the article Why Mothers Die, in The Nation for March 18, which should not remain uncorrected.

While there are many references in the Old Testament to the pangs of childbirth and while it is referred to as a punishment inflicted upon Eve, there is no basis for the assertion that the Jews did not try to alleviate this pain. The Book of Exodus, on the contrary, refers to midwives who were rewarded for their goodness. Anybody who refuses to alleviate pain, including that of childbirth, on account of religious principles is not in accord with ancient or modern Jewish law and spirit.

Wise Greeks

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Apropos of the editorial entitled The Harvard Memorial in your issue of April 1, the observation may be made that the Greeks had a way for it, for in most of the treaties that terminated the wars between the cities of ancient Hellas there was a provision forbidding the erection of memorials of victory—no "soldiers and sailors monuments," so to speak.

Music and the Metropolitan

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Seldom have I read an article with so much satisfaction as the one written by Arthur Mendel in the issue of April 8, If the Metropolitan Should Go Musical.

> If the Metropolitan should ever go musical . . . it could learn that Weber, Gluck, and Handel were of more than historical importance; . . . that Mozart wrote more than one opera, and that at least five of them are good shows. . . .

Statements to this effect cannot be repeated too often; in fact, I wish they might be carried by pickets in front of the Metropolitan all day and all night. (I admit that this would not be very dignified, but neither is it dignified or in good taste to mention the names of boxholders and describe their dresses in newspaper reports.)

To me it seems especially tragic that it has to be pointed out that Mozart wrote more than one opera, in view of the regret I have always felt that "only" five of them are on the permanent repertory of every German and Austrian opera house. Since Mozart wrote (after deduction of two unfinished works, two dramatic serenades, and one sacred Singspiel) seventeen operas, every Mozart admirer should have an opportunity to hear during his lifetime at least ten of Mozart's operatic works.

Unfortunately the same condition prevails in the Philharmonic repertory. Of all the great composers Beethoven is the only one who gets his full share of performances, while Haydn and Mozart can only occasionally find a place on the program. Great as Beethoven's Fifth Symphony is, there is no justification for playing it twice within four weeks, while none of Mozart's three greatest symphonies has so far been given during the present season.

The chief sufferer here, however, is Bach, whose existence Mr. Toscanini almost ignores. I don't see why the orchestral works of Bach should not be as much a steady feature of the Philharmonic's programs as Beethoven's symphonies.

Not Guilty

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Mr. William Pickens in his article Aftermath of a Lynching which appeared in your issue of April 15 stated that the jury disagreed in the trial of Charles Lennon, one of the seven men indicted for the lynching of two Negroes in Marion last August. As a matter of fact the jury brought in a verdict of Not Guilty—which gives all the more point to your article. The charges against the other five defendants were duly dismissed by the attorney general's office, just as Mr. Pickens said they would be.

The Candy White List Grows

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The current spring issue of the Combined Candy White List of the National Consumers' League exhibits encouraging growth in (1) area covered, (2) number of manufacturers cooperating in the improved standards of the candy industry, and (3) the nature of the concession made by the newcomers.

Chicago, the newly included area, is important because it is one of the largest centers of candy manufacture and distribution. It is especially important, also, because of Illinois's backward legislation on the hours of labor. No other State which legislates at all allows seventy hours work a week—seven days a week, ten hours a day—without Sunday rest or restriction upon night work. It is altogether bad! It is, therefore, an important gain that the Combined Candy White List offers, for the first time, the names of fourteen Chicago manufacturers who have agreed to the White List standard of fifty hours for all except the twelve extra-busy weeks, when they may work fifty-four hours instead of the seventy hours which would still be legal.

The total list contains now 115 names, many of which stand for chains. Every issue of the Combined List has been longer than its predecessor because its object is constantly better understood. Manufacturers are increasingly unwilling to be missing from it. Especially they like to escape from the group known to pay less than $14 to their beginners, or to require more than fifty hours a week in ordinary seasons. They value highly every reduction in undercutting.

Prelude

By CONRAD AIKEN

Keep in the heart the journal nature keeps;
Mark down the limp nasturtium leaf with frost;
See that the hawthorn bough is ice-embossed,
And that the snail, in season, has his grief;
Design the winter on the window pane;
Admit pale sun through cobwebs left from autumn;
Remember summer when the flies are stilled;
Remember spring, when the cold spider sleeps.

Such diary, too, set down as this: the heart
Beat twice or thrice this day for no good reason;
For friends and sweethearts dead before their season;
For wisdom come too late, and come to naught.
Put down "the hand that shakes," "the eye that glazes,"
The "step that falters betwixt thence and hence";
Observe that hips and haws burn brightest red
When the North Pole and sun are most apart.

Note that the moon is here, as cold as ever,
With ages on her face, and ice and snow;
Such as the freezing mind alone can know,
When loves and hates are only twigs that shiver.
Add in a postscript that the rain is over,
The wind from southwest backing to the south,
Disasters all forgotten, hurts forgiven;
And that the North Star, altered, shines forever.
Then say: I was a part of nature's plan;
Knew her cold heart, for I was consciousness;
Came first to hate her, and at last to bless;
Believed in her; doubted; believed again . . .
My love the lichen had such roots as I,
The snowflake was my father; I return,
After this interval of faith and question,
To nature's heart, in pain, as I began.

With a Preface

The Apple Cart: A Political Extravaganza. By Bernard Shaw. Brentano's. $2.

WHETHER we lay it to advancing age or set it down as merely one of those unfortunate accidents that happen to the greatest authors, "The Apple Cart," which appears in print so belatedly after its stage production, is one of the feeblest plays Bernard Shaw has ever written. It concerns, as the reader doubtless remembers, an English king who outwits and outmaneuvers his cabinet; and so slight is the plot that to make a full-length play out of it Shaw had to throw in a not very amusing scene between the king and his platonic mistress and a still more labored and unamusing scene in which the American ambassador—the stock British-stage American vulgarian—proposes that the United States become a British dominion. Both scenes could have been omitted without in the least affecting the main theme or story.

In fact, the play itself would have been impossible had not its author shamelessly loaded the dice. The British cabinet, it will be recalled, wishes (sometime in the nineteen-sixties) to strip the king of his last vestige of power or influence; to make him merely a rubber stamp, a complete cipher. Whereupon King Magnus, in a long peroration, reminds them that he is the only person left who stands above the tyranny of popular ignorance:

> I stand . . . for conscience and virtue; for the eternal against the expedient . . . for intellectual integrity, for humanity . . . for everything that you desire as sincerely as I, but which in you is held in leash by the Press, which can organize against you the ignorance and superstition, the timidity and credulity, the gullibility and prudery, the hating and hunting instinct of the voting mob. . . . Think of the things you dare not do! the persons you dare not offend! Well, a king with a little courage may tackle them for you. . . . I am your scapegoat: you get the credit of all our popular legislation whilst you put the odium of all our resistance to ignorant clamor on me. . . .

But the argument is plausible only because the cards are stacked. Shaw has quite unscrupulously made his king amazingly witty and wise and his cabinet a pack of fools. In his preface he indignantly denies this, holding that what he has done is to make the king and his prime minister intellectual equals, and that the king wins, not by greater astuteness, but because he has the ace of trumps in his hand and knows when to play it. No one who reads the play can take this contention seriously for an instant. The prime minister is an obvious fool, whatever his literary creator may have intended, and the king is immensely his superior in manners, strategy, and repartee. The quickest way to recognize that Shaw's prime minister and cabinet are grotesque caricatures and his king a fantastic idealization is to compare King Magnus with King George and Proteus with Ramsay MacDonald, or even with Lloyd George or Baldwin. There is a great deal to be said against democracy, and in some passages of "The Apple Cart" Shaw says it with all his unique brilliance, penetration, and power; but most of the time he is saying the wrong thing against it. For democratic politicians are strong precisely where "The Apple Cart" makes them appear weak. A successful politician, particularly a prime minister, may be a thundering ass so far as his knowledge of economics or his grasp of any abstract or complicated question whatever is concerned; but there is one direction in which he is extremely unlikely to be an ass, and that is in his ability to handle men, to flatter, impress, charm, cajole, bargain, negotiate, outwit. It is this quality, possessed in preeminent degree, that has brought him to the top in the always intense and sometimes obscene struggle for political power. He is likely to represent the survival of the fittest among thousands of aspirants. The king, even if his native endowment happens to be above the ordinary, is unlikely to have had his faculties in this direction tempered through fire. Of course a playwright may pick his own premises; but it is well to remember that the probabilities are several hundred to one against the combination of such a king as Magnus with such a cabinet as Proteus's. (In fairness it must be added that Shaw has attempted to put two intelligent persons in his cabinet—both of them of course women, the only women in it. But they are made to seem intelligent chiefly by contrast with patent windbags, and like most of Shaw's women they are full of an insufferable self-assurance.)

Shaw also denies in his preface that "The Apple Cart" is really an attack on democracy. What he is attacking, he holds, is the parliamentary system that is so effective in obstruction that it takes thirty years by constitutional methods to do thirty minutes' work. He advocates instead "two or three additional federal legislatures, working on our municipal committee system instead of our parliamentary party system." But as the system Shaw proposes depends ultimately on election, it would be subject to the same "tyranny of popular ignorance" that he is now denouncing. In "The Apple Cart," in short, Shaw solves the political question by the simple device of begging it. Wouldn't it be lovely, the play says in effect, if final political power were in the hands of a man of charming manners, who would pay no attention to what the people wanted or demanded but would know infallibly what was good for them, and would provide it; who, though a member of a hereditary upper class, would appreciate fully the feelings and needs of workers and slum dwellers; who would never be subject to popular recall yet would never abuse his power; who— We need hardly go on. That is not a solution but a self-contradictory day dream.

A Lost World

Dumb-Animal and Other Stories. By Osbert Sitwell. J. B. Lippincott Company. $2.50.

MR. SITWELL is a very fine writer. He is not afraid of detail, of describing the environment of his characters to the last small object, its shape, size, color, and weight. He knows that life is made up of a number of trivial things, and that each trivial thing has its unique importance. He is acutely aware of the feel and smell and sound and taste of the world, as well as the sight of it, and he knows that out of a person's reaction to his senses it is possible to deduce the color of his mind.

In the seven stories in this book their author touches many parts of the earth, several kinds of people. They are, in the main, English people of the upper middle class, cultivated, intelligent, aware of themselves, able to make choices and to carry them out. They can use leisure, they have leisure to use; they are agreeable and self-contained; for the most part they are temperate, just, capable. They greet the world with an air of amused tolerance, believing that it is beyond measure preposterous, but that there is nothing a civilized person can do about it. They conduct themselves admirably—and there is not the slightest reason why any of them should ever have existed!

Mr. Sitwell, therefore, writes without prejudice and without passion. Or if there is passion, it is the passion of ice, not of fire. There is in him so profound a melancholy, so deep a distaste for the world, that no part of it seems more than a fraction more desirable than any other part. The best is so little better than the worst that its merits are hardly worth noting. The sensible thing to do is to occupy oneself with the most inconsequential, the most irrelevant, the most empty of vanities, since none of them can be so empty as the greatest vanity of all, which is to be alive. It is a little difficult to write about these stories without sounding like a prig; they mean nothing, and by contrast one seems to be demanding that life should have a meaning, that it should be good or true or in some way noble and worth living. I should not like to be classed with those who demand a moral from the world. But I am of the opinion that no important writer ever wrote without heat, without taking sides, without demanding something of life, no matter what it might be. If he was too impartial, if he remained too completely above the battle, he failed to enlist his reader on his side, to make him care whether or not the engagement had an ending, whether or not he read another page.

This is being a little hard on Mr. Sitwell. In spite of his disinterestedness, I found myself reading every page. And in his last story, Happy Ending, a devastating account of an English military school before the war, there is evidence that even he can kindle—at stupidity, at brutality, at emptiness. When I read him I am curiously enough reminded both of Marcel Proust, that master of trivialities, and of Max Beerbohm, equally master of satire. But if Proust writes of minutiae, his minutiae somehow make a whole, they have some relation to each other, they have a plan; and if Mr. Beerbohm finds the world preposterous, infinitely to be despised, he finds it also to be laughed at. And the warmth of his laughter justifies the edge of his scorn. Mr. Sitwell is as without laughter as he is without plan. Here they are, he seems to say, stupid people, cruel people, people who occupy themselves charmingly with stuffed birds and mechanical toys, people who engage themselves gracefully with love—one love after the other; occasionally, in this utterly mad world, there is a man of parts, with a mind and a heart and compassionate bowels; but of course there is no reason for his thought or his tenderness or his compassion. So naturally he puts them to no use. This is a picture of the world. Take it or leave it.

Without controverting it, I should prefer to leave it. If I know in fact that it is so, I am not at all times aware of it. I wish occasionally to be aware of something else. Which is why I prefer Happy Ending to any story here; because there are two men in it who seemed not only to have a reason for living but power to despise and flee from the rest of their companions. In other words, they have prejudice, and their author, in describing them, seems to prefer them. I wish that Mr. Sitwell would more often express a preference.

City Bosses Old and New

Master of Manhattan. The Life of Richard Croker. By Lothrop Stoddard. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.50.
City Bosses in the United States. By Harold Zink. Duke University Press. $4.

MR. STODDARD'S biography of Richard Croker has a great merit of timeliness. On the eve of a new city-wide investigation New York is interested in past investigations. And Richard Croker was more investigated than any other Tammany boss. In one of those investigations he made the classic admission that he was working for his own pocket "all the time the same as you." Very early in his career he was indicted for the murder of John McKenna, member of a rival faction, in a street brawl. Of this murder Richard Croker was acquitted, Mr. Stoddard believes correctly. The affair checked his rise to power in the political organization and was repeatedly thrown up against him in his later career.

But nothing permanently stopped Dick Croker. Son of an Irish immigrant, himself born in the old country, common ordinary gangster, member of the Fourth Avenue tunnel gang in the rough Civil War days—Croker never went to the war—useful man for the politicians, district leader, boss of Tammany Hall and Master of Manhattan, Irish country gentleman and winner of the Derby! There's a career for you. If Croker had any ideas or ideals except of power and profit for himself, his biographer has not discovered them. He was the "Boss incarnate," who lived in splendor on what he took from the city, without personally practicing any such spectacular generosity to the poor as did members of the Sullivan clan.

If there are any anecdotes or written documents which shed light on what went on inside the boss's mind, his present biographer evidently has not discovered them. What Mr. Stoddard has given us is a graphic account of external events with some occasional shrewd comment on conditions which made possible Tammany's long rule, broken only by occasional spasms of reform. Incidentally, it is to Mr. Stoddard's credit that never once does he use his old friend, the Nordic myth, to explain anything about New York and its politics.

It is not my purpose, nor I think any part of a reviewer's duty, to summarize the course of events during Croker's reign as Master of Manhattan. What makes the story so interesting now is the inevitable comparison with our own days. And that comparison I hesitate to make in dogmatic generalizations within the necessary limits of one review. Croker's empire was outwardly rougher than is the greater empire of the modern triumvirate, Curry, McCooey, and Flynn. Both its poverty and its splendor were more vulgar. New York was much poorer then than in the decade prior to the present depression. "Honest graft" was, I think, less developed, less subtle, and less profitable than at present. A larger percentage of Tammany's revenues was probably derived from the exploitation of women. (I should have said this with much more confidence three months ago than since the revelations about the vice squad today.) Speakeasies may be more profitable but are less politically useful to Tammany than the old saloon. The necessary growth of public services has compelled the city to build up a better corps of civil servants than in the cruder times of Croker. None of Croker's mayors had in his own right as much power as Jimmie Walker has. Mr. Walker, it must be remembered, made Mr. Curry leader of Tammany Hall. No mayor made Mr. Croker leader. He made the mayors. Even after the consolidation of the greater city Richard Croker had to give less deference to the machines of other boroughs than is now necessary when Brooklyn has more Democratic voters than Manhattan.

Nevertheless, the Tammany of Croker's time was essentially the same as today. Tammany used and still uses gangsters. But no gang has ever gained power to intimidate Tammany as the Capone crowd intimidates the political machine in Chicago. Tammany was and is a very successful broker between the rich and the well-to-do with power, privilege, and profit, and the masses with nothing much but their votes. Nevertheless, no one set of interests owned Tammany in Croker's time or does in ours. Tammany has a long history and its own traditions. It has built a political racket which not only the underworld but the upper world must recognize and deal with respectfully. The machine is no single man's creature. Even Croker's iron rule depended on the acquiescence of district leaders, and he retired when he found that he could not master them. It was Croker's trouble with the Sullivans more than the reform victory of Seth Low which led to Croker's final return to Ireland and the winning of the Derby. Most reform victories have been won either when Tammany has exceeded some ill-defined speed limit in its extortions or when Tammany has been split. Of these basic truths about the Tammany machine, Croker's life gives abundant evidence.

There is more meat in Mr. Stoddard's story of one boss than in Mr. Zink's brief, factual, and rather colorless biography of twenty municipal bosses. These biographies give information in convenient form, but they neither make their heroes live nor give any particular insight into the conditions which made them possible. It is rather surprising to find that Mr. Zink omits from his list, which comes down to our own day, so significant and powerful a figure as John McCooey of Brooklyn. (Mr. McCooey probably rejoices in the fact that on the whole he has more power than publicity in the United States!)

The most interesting part of Mr. Zink's book is his chapters on boss backgrounds, personal characteristics, and business relations. He substantiates his point that there is no "typical" boss. No general observation can be made about their heredity, early poverty, ruthless will power, or political technique to which one cannot find exceptions in the twenty bosses whom Mr. Zink has studied. Mr. Zink's conclusion is right: "Political bosses are not of a different species of human beings but possess the physical, mental, and moral variations of men in general." In other words, to understand boss rule in American cities one must not study so much individual bosses as the impact of plutocracy upon a heterogeneous urban democracy. To this sort of study Mr. Zink has made no particular contribution.

The Gauguin Legend

Paul Gauguin: The Calm Madman. By Beril Becker. Albert and Charles Boni. $3.50.

THE sensational facts of Gauguin's life have been violent drink to the myth-makers. Drunk with enthusiasm for a story that would turn daylight into exotic, iridescent nightmare, they have made Gauguin the barnstorming, melodramatic hero of symbolism. Nor are they entirely to blame, for Gauguin himself contributed generously to his own legend. Neglect and poverty had taught him the values of expert showmanship; it is no wonder that on his last visit to Paris in 1895 he made a point of displaying his Javanese mistress as part of his portable equipment. Very well, he would be exotic in the grand manner; there would be no misunderstanding of his contempt for the civilization that had rejected proof of his genius—he would be a savage with literal savagery and vengeance.

"The Moon and Sixpence" was a natural product of the legend, and fitted to the purposes of a talented novelist it became a remarkable piece of fiction—indeed, more valuable as a legend than truth itself. "The Intimate Journals," published with an introduction by Emile, Gauguin's son, were issued with an effort to give the actual facts in the case more conviction and to destroy the popular conception of Gauguin as a cold-blooded monster who sailed away to the South Seas with never a look behind him at the poor creatures, a wife and children, whom he had left in the lurch. "The Intimate Journals" disclosed a personality even more amazing than Somerset Maugham's hero and the author of "Noa, Noa." Here was a man with a vigorous intelligence, a tall body that had withstood twenty years of starvation and disease, and a passion for painting that can be explained only by the use of the word genius. The "Journals" and the publication of Gauguin's letters to de Monfried have resulted in the latest variation of the now famous story under the title of "Paul Gauguin: The Calm Madman."

Again we see poor Gauguin heavily novelized and tricked out in the fancy-dress costumes which were used as his own defense against a hostile world. His present biographer has made a valiant attempt to preserve the factual outline of the story, but like others he cannot resist the temptation to make an exciting biography move forward at twice its normal speed. Gauguin's refusal to drop his responsibilities as a father and husband, and his equal determination to develop as an individual, are dramatized almost beyond human recognition. A fair sample of what is offered may be reproduced in these few statements selected at random: "He heard the violent beating of his heart . . . He had descended into the pit of the maelstrom but he was condemned to live . . . Bah! He must not let self-pity get the best of him . . . What queer blood was in him that doomed him to such an ignoble end . . ." And so on for 336 pages. All this is good, clean fun, with a little blood thrown in to keep the temperature at boiling-point, but the actual motives behind the scene are lost. It would be hard to believe that Mr. Becker's protagonist was a highly intelligent man and an artist of unusual power. There is enough action here to supply plots for a dozen romantic biographies, but no valid explanation of how Gauguin found time to paint his South Sea goddesses moving with precise deliberation across broad canvases. If we are to find an answer to the mystery we must return to "The Intimate Journals" and to "Noa, Noa." Or, better still, gaze at the canvases themselves; the "calm madman" disappears, for here is Gauguin's own reply to all who questioned his sanity.

HORACE GREGORY

The Roots of American Literature

American Humor: A Study of the National Character. By Constance Rourke. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

MISS ROURKE'S book establishes the fact that we have in this country a genuinely indigenous, a whole literature. Heretofore, except for such studies as Parrington's, our American literature has been presented as a rather poor reflection of English literature. Meantime American folklorists have been very busy tracing analogues in English and European folklore. The work in the two fields of literature and folklore has never been brought to any clarifying focus, nor was there any attempt, before Miss Rourke's, to study the national myths and legends (specifically, their patterns, regardless of their possible origins) as they grew up and were expressed in our literature. This, therefore, is Miss Rourke's very important contribution.

Though "American Humor" will doubtless be used as a most valuable introduction to courses in American literature, whether they concern the short story, the novel, or poetry, it will have, of course, a far wider and less biased reading public than the purely academic; for Miss Rourke is one of the few truly scholarly critics who write a beautiful prose. She is able so naturally to fuse her documentary evidence with her critical exposition as to convince any reader that her book (based, as it is, on three or four years of painstaking research) was written for pure pleasure. Her method is undoubtedly that of completing her research before she begins her writing, of holding her facts, not as mere blossoms sprung upward from footnotes, but as the warp and woof of the pattern of her critical ideas.

Her sources for this particular book are the unique and untouched material of the early almanacs during the period from 1830 to 1860, the early joke books, such early sporting and theatrical journals as The Spirit of the Times, edited by William T. Porter from 1831 to 1861, old plays embodying Yankee characters, and many very early minstrel songs. From the examination of such materials she discovers that three figures emerge as typical of our cultural history and of our literary sense: first, the Yankee (New Englander first and later American); then the Pioneer, the teller of the tall tale, a figure in some respects akin to the Yankee; and, last, the blacked-up white man who became the American minstrel singer. Miss Rourke makes the important point that the contribution to our literature from the Negro came first not directly from the Negro himself, but indirectly through the blacked-up comedian, who translated Negro humor into the terms of the white civilization.

Each of these three national figures is, in the Meredithian sense, comic, and capable always of the humorous approach to life. The Yankee humor was usually that of understatement; the backwoodsman's, usually that of gross exaggeration and a dramatic delight in prodigious lying; the Negro humor was a good-natured criticism of American life. All these humorists accepted certain definable patterns for their tales and their dramas, and all of them employed the monologue. They turned naturally toward self-dramatization, off stage or on. The strolling players took up the well-known jokes and stories and spread and heightened them; they became more and more self-conscious of their art as they dramatized it. English criticism of American character brought out and helped to fix the pattern of the American characteristics. A prolonged childhood (through the gradual extension of the frontier) gave Americans a deeper sense of their own individuality. This, along with primitive resilience and a half-physical exuberance, carried the American comic myths and legends forward. Then, very tiny at first, a cloud of culture appeared on the horizon (in female characters aspiring toward bluestocking ideals), and at last we were ready for the drawing together of all this primary stuff of literature into works of literary art.

We had arrived at Emerson, with his oracles, his monologues, his familiar imagery, and his exaggeration of hitching one's wagon to a star; we had come to Thoreau, with his deeper tone of wonder and his figurative speech. Along came Whitman, the consummation of many of these characteristics, with his local prejudices, national prepossessions, and fantastic faith—"the first man to possess a sense of the whole civilization." Even Poe used a kind of hysterical comedy. And Melville exploited to its greatest literary possibilities the humor of exaggeration, the epic spirit of the frontier. None of these writers, however, as Miss Rourke says, could be so deeply grounded in popular lore as other literatures had been grounded in such sources. Their quick drafts, their breathless haste, may have been the final cause of incompletion from which they all suffered. Yet comedy was everywhere and had deepened in our literature. In the West there were Bret Harte and others, and finally, as a product of Eastern civilization, Henry James stepped forward "bent upon a purpose that had absorbed many American fabulists, that of drawing the larger and generic American Character."

The prevailing tone of the national character as it emerged from myth and legend was, as Miss Rourke points out, predominantly poetic and vitally comic. Poets like Robinson, Frost, and Lindsay indicated this again, and the author's study might have been continued down even to the present year's books: Hart Crane in poetry, Lynn Riggs in drama. But a study must close somewhere, and Miss Rourke closes by pointing out that while the mingling of the theme of defeat with the theme of comedy has been necessary to the maturity of our literature, we have as writers always been too healthily humorous to remain obsessed, as we might today seem to be, with the subject of disillusionment.

EDA LOU WALTON

Foch

The Memoirs of Marshal Foch. Translated by Colonel T. Bentley Mott. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $5.

FOCH, as we know, refused to publish his memoirs during his lifetime, and at his death, the publishers of the present volume tell us, his family intended to postpone publication for ten or fifteen years. The appearance of the memoirs now is due to "recent bitter controversies on which they have so great a bearing." As it is, the memoirs are a fragment. Foch's original intention was to write what in effect would have been a history of the World War, but not only did time and strength for that task fail him, but he also left unrecorded the story of his career from April, 1915, at the close of the first

Allied attempt against the fortified German front, to March, 1918, when the German offensive on the Scarpe and the Oise began. A forty-page summary of events during this three-year period is supplied by an unnamed hand under the direction of Foch's military associates.

The interval was one of great importance to Foch, since into it fall his displacement by Nivelle as commander of the northern armies because political chagrin at the outcome of the Somme battle required a victim, his visits to Italy, his designation by Painlevé as Chief of the French General Staff, the defection of Russia, the creation of a Supreme War Council and the development of the controversy over an Interallied High Command, and the entrance of the United States into the war. The gap in the memoirs is perhaps explained by Foch's purpose to set down first his account of the events in which he was one of the principal figures, leaving to a later time, which unhappily did not come, the record of the years in which he was out of favor at Paris and a subordinate.

Anyone who turns to the memoirs with the expectation of finding them dramatic or entertaining will be disappointed. Nine-tenths of the book at least is concerned exclusively with military operations, and what is said is matter-of-fact, extremely detailed, and so technical as to make slight appeal to the reader who is not a military expert. The memoirs show Foch as a kind of intellectual machine, cold, resolute, able, supremely self-confident, and sparing of words even on the rare occasions in which he indulges in praise. There was no warmth in his nature and there is none in his book. His outlook upon the war was that of a soldier who had studied its possibilities in every phase, who recognized the initial superiority of the German military preparations to those of France, who had evolved a perfectly definite plan of what should be done, but who felt little or none of the traditional soldier's generosity toward the enemy whose purpose he did so much to thwart. He begins his chronicle with a typically French arraignment of Weltpolitik, and in his detailed account of the armistice negotiations reveals himself as essentially a soulless, immovable conquerer deaf to pleas for consideration and bent upon compelling the Germans to beg for an armistice without giving them the least hint of the terms that might be granted. If anyone still imagines that Foch had bowels, a reading of his ast two chapters will dissipate that notion.

In what is said of political and diplomatic matters Foch evinces consistent restraint. There is no complaint of the treatment which he had to put up with from politicians, nor of the trials which attended his efforts to bring about a unified command of the Allied forces. He records without bitterness the obstructive attitude of Kitchener and Haig toward cooperation, and the repeated interference of politics with military plans and operations. One gathers that he thought Lloyd George a good deal of a nuisance at times, Winston Churchill a close second, and Woodrow Wilson a rather presumptuous dealist, but if he felt ill-will he does not emphasize it. His opinion of Pershing is typical of the sparing praise for individuals which is found in his pages. Pershing, he says, came o France "full of the idea of commanding a great American army as soon as possible." The later impression was that of a man whose "experience and character . . . were a guaranty that whenever he might engage American troops he would only halt after success had been achieved."

Foch had two main difficulties to contend with. He had o reconstruct the French military machine from one designed rimarily for defense to one fully equipped for offense, and to bring the Allied governments to a realization of the imperaive need of a unified military command. The first called for military ability of a high order, and in the undertaking his rofound knowledge of the art of war and his clear, cold erception of what had to be done stood him in good stead. The second called for diplomacy, but more for a stubborn refusal to yield the point. The chief value of the memoirs, aside from the technical record which they present, is in the light they throw on the steps by which both of these results were eventually attained.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Books in Brief

New Schools for Young India. By William J. McKee. University of North Carolina Press. $4.50.

Two of India's basic problems are the development of an educational system adapted to that country's peculiar needs and spread among the masses, and the rescue of the 750,000 villages from their present desperate economic, hygienic, and social state. The whole problem of India's education was briefly but readably set forth about four years ago by Arthur Mayhew in his "Education of India" (not mentioned in our author's bibliography) and was recently studied in detail by the Hartog committee in connection with the Simon Commission; the village problem has just this fall been brilliantly presented in Gertrude Emerson's "Voiceless India." Those two problems meet in the subject of primary education, for about 90 per cent of India's population lives in villages. Professor McKee, after a successful educational experience in India, discusses primary education there from the point of view of a professional educator, reviewing the history of that subject—a dispiriting spectacle—and describing recent experiments to make primary education "progressive." His aim is entirely utilitarian; every section of his book is focused on the problem of devising an adequate curriculum. His solution is the modern one of "functional education," that is, of relating the child's school life to his outside life through the interests of the latter, a solution with which he has already experimented successfully in India; and it seems indisputable that such a program would represent an enormous advance over the present. His argument is clearly developed; the discussion sober and scholarly; and the book one of the most important contributions yet made to the study of primary education in India.

The Meaning of the Glorious Koran. An Explanatory Translation by Marmaduke Pickthall. Alfred A. Knopf. $7.50.

The author is an Englishman who has lived for many years in the Near East and India and has written a number of valuable books on Moslem life. He has become a convert to Islam, and the present volume is a work of devotion intended to provide an authorized text for English Moslems and to displace existing translations which, having been done by men who were skeptical of or hostile to Mohammed's evangel, were not strict enough in their interpretation. Mr. Pickthall has done his task well. It may be granted that no English version can reproduce the qualities of the original; yet the Mohammedan Bible, judged purely as literature, seems a confused and ill-written book. The fact that several hundred million people regard it not alone as final revelation but as the very greatest work of literature may give rise to a disquieting suspicion, among some Western readers, that cultivated Hindu or Chinese scholars, uninfluenced by our traditional attitudes, might similarly set the Bible, as literature, below our own enthusiastic estimates.

Adventure or Experience. By Dorothy Brewster and Angus Burrell. Columbia University Press. $2.50.

The authors of "Dead Reckonings in Fiction" continue their exploration of contemporary fiction in this somewhat slenderer volume, where they consider among others George Gissing, Somerset Maugham, Arnold Bennett, Thomas Mann, and Virginia Woolf. They are always sensible and illuminating in their remarks upon individual works; but perhaps their most significant contribution in this case is a distinction which they draw between adventure, or the raw material of life, and experience, or the realization of what it means—either to a writer or to a reader.

Survey of American Foreign Relations, 1930. Prepared under the Direction of Charles P. Howland, Director of Research of the Council on Foreign Relations. Yale University Press. $5.

The third annual volume of this useful handbook is given over principally to a discussion of American relations with China and the islands of the Pacific, with, in the case of China, a considerable background of history and social description. A short chapter is devoted to the international relations of the Philippines and the questions which they raise for the United States, but omitting the question of independence, and another traces the preemption of islands or scattered groups by Great Britain, France, the United States, and Japan. The other contents include an extended review of the negotiations for a limitation of armaments, a brief history of the first test of the Kellogg-Briand anti-war pact in the Chinese Eastern Railway controversy, an account of the Young Plan (to which is appended an informing note on the French debt settlement), and a chapter on alien-enemy property and the policy of the United States and other countries in relation thereto. The volume, to which a considerable number of authorities have contributed, continues the policy of providing "for certain foreign relations of the United States the background—historical, cultural, economic—without which those particular relations cannot be well understood." Criticism, where it appears, is studiously restrained.

Music

Stokowski

ARTURO TOSCANINI, according to an illuminating though very possibly apocryphal story, is said to have remarked that although other conductors often come to listen to him and go away singing praises, he is always disappointed to find that they play no better than they did before hearing him. When he was a young man, it appears, he heard Richter play the Prelude to the "Meistersinger." Finding much in that performance with which he did not agree, he restudied the score, decided that Richter was right, and has played it Richter's way ever since. Those who have heard his Bayreuth performances and those of Karl Muck say similar things: Toscanini has not hesitated, it appears, to help himself to the best in Muck's readings of the Wagner scores.

Mr. Koussevitzky, envisaging the possibility of comparison with Mr. Toscanini, does not, perhaps, carry humility as far as learning from him. But he chooses the better part of valor and, in general, avoids unfavorable comparison by making the catholicity and the discrimination of his program-making the main attraction.

The prudence of Mr. Koussevitzky and the humility of Mr. Toscanini are alike foreign to Mr. Stokowski. At the time of the exchange of conductors, earlier in the season, he gave out a statement extolling Mr. Toscanini. But he did not hesitate, upon his recent return with the Philadelphia Orchestra, to present a program the first half of which invited comparison of the two orchestras, and the second, of the two men. Those who heard him do the Fourth Symphony of Brahms with both orchestras say that the performance with his own orchestra was the better—a result hardly surprising. But not more than the molto espressivo of the first few measures of the "Lohengrin" Prelude was needed to show that Mr. Stokowski would have been wiser to have avoided the Wagner excerpts. And after the long-drawn-out languishing of the last part of the Bacchanale it was clear that the sense of form that Mr. Toscanini so eminently possesses is what makes us accept many phases of his interpretation which without that structural coherence would be offensive.

I think it was that formal logic, more than anything else, that made Mr. Toscanini's unconventional playing of the Brahms Third nevertheless convincing, and the lack of it that kept Mr. Stokowski's performance of the Fourth from having more power than it did. Mr. Toscanini's tempi, especially in the last movement, were much faster than the customary ones; and by slighting the rhythmic value of the two measures that introduce the first movement he robbed the opening of much of its effect. But while he occasionally swallows words and rushes through scenes, the main import of the drama and the scheme of its expression are constantly present to him.

Mr. Stokowski, in the Fourth, chose his tempi with more success. But he cannot, it seems, resist the temptation to linger over a luscious syllable—even though by so doing he thereby gives to it an importance that belongs to more important passages—and to rush from one scene to another without so much as a breath, when he pleases. Mr. Toscanini may at times rush Brahms through his story, but the main outlines of the plot still stand out, the moments of repose, though sometimes short, are always in the right place, and it remains a convincing and a moving story. Mr. Stokowski, on the other hand, finding four measures in the first movement of the E-minor (Measures 90-91 and following—the measures are numbered in the Philharmonia pocket score) that would have sounded well in an andante con moto movement, interrupts the action entirely so that his violins may sing these precious measures tenderly. A few pages earlier (at Measures 44-45) he has not hesitated to ignore the significance of a well-defined and repeated cadence, marking the end of a long, modulatory passage, by rushing by it at full speed. His treatment of the two passages is in each case extreme: on the one hand he pushes the expressive to the sloppy; on the other, the restrained to the inarticulate. Each offense is heightened by the other. Thus his judicious choice of tempo goes for nothing: his play has come out exactly on time, perhaps, but Hamlet and Polonius have exchanged roles.

I may as well admit that Mr. Toscanini's treatment of those two introductory measures of the Third rather weakens the argument, and that only by ascribing motives, a dangerous business, does one justify in Mr. Toscanini what one finds offensive in Mr. Stokowski. But, for one thing, such lapses are much more frequent in the latter than in the former. And I confess that Stokowski's stage tricks annoy me, and that I find it hard to separate his inconsistency in matters not purely musical from his illogic in performance. He makes a great point, for example, of excluding late-comers from the hall until the intermission, whether or not the works in the first group are in any way related. Scores of those who have gained admission, on the other hand, are still wandering down the aisles when Mr. Stokowski leaps on to the platform and, without so much as a snap of the fingers, begins. By these and similar foibles he lays himself open to the charge of paying less than whole-hearted attention to a faithful interpretation of the music, so that when his playing seems strange or illogical, one is not inclined to make allowances for good intentions. How much the most reasoned comment may be affected by such considerations, no one, least of all the commentator, can say.

The Harder They Fall

"THE WISER THEY ARE" is the title of a new comedy by Sheridan Gibney at the Plymouth Theater, the moral of this comedy being, shall we say, The Harder They Fall. If no moral is announced in any of Mr. Gibney's lines, none is necessary, for the situation is as familiar as life, not to speak of literature, and Mr. Gibney, unless he had been destined to write a comedy that would make him immortal, could hardly have dealt with the situation otherwise than as he did. His hero, Bruce Ingram, is the sort of man we never seem to grow tired of—a wealthy, tired young man, moderately a rake, who has been pursued so long by so many women that he knows everything he needs to know. Everything, that is, except—ah! yes, except love, which now at the beginning of the play he confesses he feels for a girl who looks as if she were going to be the heroine; and she certainly is. She at least is a match for the wealthy, tired young man, for although she too pursues him she does so in such a disarming manner that he soon believes he is pursuing her; and the play shows him tumbling after her in her flighty progress through New York. With all his wisdom he finds himself always just one move behind her; with all his cynicism he feels himself fascinated; even he can become jealous; even he can become something of a fool. The wiser they are the harder they fall.

But this is hardly to describe the play, or to assign the reason for its merit, which is considerable. The plot and the leading characters already existed for Gibney, as did our capacity for becoming interested in them. What Mr. Gibney had to do, and what he managed to do, was to be always fresh and contemporary in his dialogue. The pleasure of his first-night audience was the pleasure of feeling secure, speech by speech, that the commonplace would be avoided. So it was. Mr. Gibney, challenged to be smart, was smart in virtually every crucial line; he proved that he had a perfect sense of what in this situation had been too often said. Our suspense was not at all a suspense as to the general drift of what the characters would say; what we waited for was the way they would say it. We were never disappointed. Which is not to hail "The Wiser They Are" as a triumph exactly, but to recommend it as the very crisp entertainment that it is. The playing of Osgood Perkins as Bruce and of Ruth Gordon as Trixie has much to do with what might otherwise have been only a fragile success. Mr. Perkins has the proper amount of humorous hardness for his part, and Miss Gordon, as all her appearances have demonstrated, is hardly to be matched on Broadway for her ability to combine flippancy with innocence and charm with imbecility.

"Joy of Living" (Masque Theater), adapted by Louise Carter from the German of Rudolf Lothar and Hans Bachwitz, can boast in Taylor Holmes and Donald Brian two of the best inebriates of the season. Beyond that, and beyond the authors' rather interesting conception of a nouveau riche hero, the play has little to offer, particularly as it is spoiled at the end of a drunken first act by the intrusion of a woman whose presence on the stage is never quite justified or understood. "Right of Happiness" (Vanderbilt Theater), by Roy Daavidson, is of even less consequence, being incredible from start to finish.

The German-Austrian Customs Union

By FRIEDRICH HERTZ

Halle, March 30

IN Germany and Austria the news of the proposed German-Austrian customs union has been soberly received by public opinion, though of course with sympathy. The press on the whole has refrained from exuberant hopes. Many liberal and Socialist papers have even doubted that the movement was the right one for such a scheme. Most papers have emphasized the desirability of other states joining the union, too. The agrarians are afraid that the union might lead to a lowering of the tariffs. Keen advocates of a political fusion have complained that the proposed economic agreement might take the pith out of the movement toward a complete Anschluss.

On the contrary, strangely enough, the radical Nationalists have made a very sour face. The Völkische Beobachter, edited by Adolf Hitler, said on March 28 that it was a mistake to consider the plan as a move in the right Pan-German spirit. On the contrary, this paper says, the German Foreign Minister wished nothing more fervently than to prepare an economic Pan-European union in accordance with his Francophile policy. Nevertheless, the French attacks were eagerly reported by the Nationalist press as a symptom of the implacable hostility of the hereditary enemy. Nothing is more welcome to the German Nationalists than the prospect of France getting the upper hand in this question, and the Hitler press is already rejoicing in the hope that the scheme will fail and that the republican system in Germany will then break down.

However, even in England opinion is widespread that Germany and Austria made at least a tactical blunder by not informing the other states beforehand about their designs. The Austrian government denies this and declares that the other states were officially informed before the preliminary pact was signed. However, what is really meant by those who accuse Germany and Austria of impoliteness is much more than a failure to observe diplomatic forms. They think that the two governments should have discussed the whole affair with the other side in order to find a possible compromise.

This seems at least to be the English view. But the highly excitable temper of France makes it doubtful that such a step could have brought about a compromise. France seems to believe that it has an absolute right to veto every sort of cooperation between Germany and Austria. It may be asked whether certain strong words used by French politicians and newspapers do not constitute a much worse breach of international comity than that attributed to Herr Curtius and Herr Schober; or whether France and the Little Entente states have ever submitted their own numerous agreements, which certainly affect the interests of their neighbors, to a previous friendly discussion with Germany and Austria.

France will of course assert that this is quite a different matter, Germany and Austria being bound by certain clauses of the peace treaties. If it is a question of international law, it ought to be decided by judicial procedure, for example, before the High Court of The Hague. The Council of the League of Nations is not a judicial court. The very statute of the League (Article 13) provides that questions of international law are to be decided by a court of arbitration, not by the Council of the League. When the British government asked Germany and Austria to submit their scheme to the Council of the League, both states answered that they did not object to a judicial decision, but that they declined to have the case judged by a political body. This answer has aroused great indignation, even in England. A few days later M. Briand revealed that Mr. Henderson had proposed to him to bring the case before the High Court at The Hague and that he, M. Briand, had declined to do so.

France asserts that Austria has bound herself by the Pact of Geneva to acknowledge the decision of the League on the question whether or not an economic agreement constitutes an infringement of her independence. Yet the text of the Pact of Geneva does not contain any such obligation for Austria except in Protocols II and III, concerning purely financial matters. No such obligation has been imposed upon Austria as regards the question of independence. Neither does the peace treaty contain such a clause. Therefore only the general rules of international law hold good.

It is difficult to see how a compromise is possible as long as French intransigence prevails. France has good reasons to place upon the aggressive Pan-Germans and the militarists of the old regime the burden of a terrible war-guilt. Nor has this spirit yet died out in Germany. Yet, tragically enough, France does not realize that by maintaining the deepest distrust toward the new Germany she is largely responsible for the rise of radical nationalism in this country. The German Socialists, Catholics, and liberals are fighting vigorously against the barbarism of Hitler and the spirit of revenge. Yet their struggle is hampered by the fact that France is insisting with extraordinary tenacity on the system incorporated in the peace treaties, a system which denies full equality and fair treatment to the German nation. Even the concessions made with respect to the occupation of the Rhineland have been reached so slowly and after so much petty bartering that the psychological effect has been to a large extent lost. On the other side, German nationalism is hardly less to blame for its blindness and arrogance. Toward Austria the policy of France and her allies has been more lenient of late years, and the result is that hardly a trace of hostility against the former enemies has survived.

With respect to the special problem before us the great psychological blunder of France is that every wish of Germany and Austria for a closer union is denounced as the outcome of an aggressive and imperialist viewpoint; even a merely economic cooperation is interpreted in this sense. This is felt as a grave insult by millions of German and Austrian pacifists who are cherishing the customs union and working for it because they consider it a most efficient means for a real pacification of Europe. If French statesmen—who must wish an international understanding—are so unable to understand the mentality of the great majority of sincere pacifists in Germany and if they continue to hurl the accusation of veiled imperialism, then we must despair of arriving at a better understanding between nations.

The real motives of the present scheme are predominantly economic, though, of course, cultural affinity and national sympathy are fostering influences. The agreement aims at alleviating some of the consequences of the economic "war of all against all," brought about by the breaking up of great economic units into small fragments. The new states in Central and Eastern Europe were foremost in following a policy of extreme protectionism, and in consequence Austria has been almost strangled to death and her conditions of existence have become insupportable. Careful calculations of the Vienna Chamber of Commerce show that in 1927 the average proportion of customs to the value of goods was 19.2 per cent in Austria, 36.4 per cent in Czecho-Slovakia, 31.1 per cent in Hungary, 34.8 per cent in Jugoslavia, 43.3 per cent in Poland, and 98.4 per cent in Rumania. This shows the economic pressure to which Austria has been exposed by her neighbors. The result of it has been an excessively low standard of living in Austria. The national income per capita is 70 per cent higher in Germany than in Austria, and in England the average income is about 2.5 times larger. In the treaties of St. Germain (Clauses 51 and 57), the Allies reserved the right to lay down rules for fair trade conditions between some of the new states. But no use has been made of these clauses for securing fair treatment to Austrian commerce. All the international negotiations for lowering excessive tariffs and organizing larger economic units have come to nothing. Therefore Austria cannot be reproached for seeking a way out of her distress by gaining admittance to the large market of Germany.

France herself has certainly no interest in keeping Austria in economic fetters. But unfortunately Czecho-Slovakia still believes in this policy, occasionally with some doubt as to its expediency. France and Czecho-Slovakia maintain that a customs union between Austria and Germany would infringe upon the independence of Austria and therefore violate a clause of the Pact of Geneva of 1922. It has never been admitted by international law that a customs union could do anything of the sort. Has Luxembourg lost its independence by the customs union with Belgium? France, indeed, has attempted to bring about a customs union between Austria and Czecho-Slovakia, and if an economic union could be interpreted as an encroachment on political sovereignty at all, then this, too, would have been a breach of the peace treaty and of the Pact of Geneva.

France has admitted by her advocacy of a Danubian customs union that such a scheme does not impair the political independence of any state. The Austro-German agreement takes care not to restrict the economic independence of the participants. Every state may join the pact, every state retains a free hand to conclude treaties for itself, there is to be no common council, the agreement is for a short term, and any member may give notice to cancel it. Moreover, Czecho-Slovakia has expressly been invited to join. If France still considers this to be an infringement of the independence of Austria, why not submit this question to an impartial court of arbitration? Are not the conditions under which Austria is forced to live at present the opposite of real independence?

JEWISH SOCIAL WORK

is in need of men and women possessing:

1. good personality; 2. a genuine desire to contribute to the social welfare of American Jewry; 3. adequate academic preparation; 4. training in the theory and practice of individual and group adjustment, as well as of communal organization with special reference to Jewish life in America.

The Training School for Jewish Social Work

offers a course of study designed to supply the fourth qualification. The candidate is expected to provide the first, second and third.

Social workers who have not had the advantages of professional preparation, and college graduates, are invited to examine the course of study offered by the School.

Scholarships and Fellowships ranging from $150 to $1,000 for each academic year, are available for especially qualified students

MAYOR WALKER'S REPLY to the charges of the City Affairs Committee is generally agreed to be an e document, and skilful in its marshaling of detailed ts in answer to the specific criticisms of his administra- n. The Mayor's lamentable personal attacks on Messrs. lmes, Wise, and Thomas and his charge that the City airs Committee is simply an annex of the Socialist Party l not deceive that great number of New Yorkers for- ate enough to be acquainted with the men attacked and know the single-heartedness with which the committee pursued its thankless civic task. The Governor has thus given no intimation whatever as to what he will do with charges, but in any case the situation has been greatly nged by the passage of the legislative resolution for -wide inquiry, and the City Affairs Committee deserves thanks of all self-respecting New Yorkers for what it done in helping crystallize public sentiment in behalf of horough investigation and an honest and efficient admin- ation of city business. Even the Mayor himself at last ns to recognize that his task calls for hard work as well greeable manners and political skill.

SECRETARY DOAK has announced the Hoover substi- tute for employment exchanges. There is to be a ral employment bureau in every State "on a basis which will afford every opportunity of placing employees in contact with jobs"—which is just nonsense. Senator Wagner's bill, vetoed by the President, provided $1,500,000 the first year and $4,000,000 a year during the next three, to be matched by like sums from the States and expended by the latter in cooperation with the federal Department of Labor. Instead, Mr. Doak has $785,000. His first move is to appoint forty-nine State directors and fifteen general officers in Washington who, of course, will "coordinate" all employment work. These sixty-four positions, if they paid $4,000 apiece—certainly not an exorbitant salary for a responsible position—would exhaust a third of the appropriation before a payment was made for office rent, clerical help, field forces, or other expenditures necessary really to do anything useful for the unemployed. We have had no opportunity to check up the list of appointees; at first glance we do not note the name of a single well-known student of employment problems. One Administration objection to the Wagner bill was that the exchange officials would be locally appointed without Washington control. That objection is here completely obviated. Mr. Doak can appoint whom he pleases, at what salary he pleases, without the inconvenience of civil-service interference. It appears to be a direct method of providing employment and so relieving the crisis. There seems to be no length to which the Administration is unprepared to go in preventing anything effective from being done toward a scientific organization of the labor market.

LEGAL LAWLESSNESS is hard hit in the report made to the Wickersham Commission by Reuben Oppenheimer, who has been studying for that body the enforcement of the immigration and deportation laws. We have protested what we conceived to be abuses existing in the practice of both the State Department and the Labor Department in these particulars, and our position is fully sustained by Mr. Oppenheimer's report, which, it is declared, has caused no little stir in Administration circles. Mr. Oppenheimer questions, just as we have done, the interpretation of the "public-charge" clause under which consular officers at the President's direction have since last autumn refused visas to 100,000 would-be immigrants normally admissible. He declares that many aliens have been deported unlawfully in violation of their constitutional rights, suffering illegal search and seizure, violation of personal rights, and arrest without warrant. He recommends the establishment of an independent judicial body to which the alien could appeal against the arbitrary decision of immigration authorities. The administration of the immigration and deportation laws is a difficult and hateful job at best. Those responsible for their enforcement should specially remember that the more helpless the persons subject to the operation of any law, the more zealously should their rights be safeguarded. When an alien is not without influential friends, as was the case with Miss Ella Young, who was finally admitted after having been threatened with exclusion on the ground that she might become a public charge, it makes the helpless ones seem all the more unfortunate.

DR. ROBERT R. KUCZYNSKI of Brookings Institution, one of the ablest vital statisticians in the world, has several things to say about our population that are worth pondering. First, although the number of births still exceeds annually the number of deaths, we may look forward in as little as a decade to a decreasing population. Our restrictive immigration policy and our wholesale deportation of aliens throws the burden of population increase upon domestic production—and domestic production is not doing its duty. The chief difficulty, according to Dr. Kuczynski, is that American mothers are not giving birth to enough girls to reproduce themselves. In 1800 there was an average of three girls born to every woman in the country; in 1926 this figure had declined to 1.3, and it is still declining. So allowing for mortality during childhood and adolescence, and for childlessness, there are not enough girl children today to take the place of their mothers in the next generation. To a lesser degree the same tendency is observable in European countries also. Nor is Dr. Kuczynski consoled by the prospect of a declining population in the United States. Frivolous persons who live in cities and think there are too many persons in the world as it is will be disposed to rejoice at these figures. But, seriously, they mean something significant for the future of America. Large families and hospitable shores made us the power we are. We have now succeeded in covertly and overtly antagonizing most of our neighbors. What will happen to our plans for an American "empire" if our population begins markedly to decline?

IF GOVERNOR NORMAN of the Bank of England had any more important purpose in his recent visit to this country than to shake hands with the bankers and the members of the Federal Reserve Board and ask how things were going, or if his visit accomplished anything likely to mitigate the world depression, both purpose and accomplishment have been skilfully concealed. As far as the public knows, neither the Federal Reserve authorities nor the bankers have promised aid in any plan for a large international extension of credit, nor is there any reason to think that either the Young Plan or the war-debts settlement will soon be disturbed. The gold supply appears to be sufficient for world needs notwithstanding the egregious unevenness of its distribution, and the Administration has let it be known that it has no interest in any international action to raise or stabilize the price of silver. The most that Governor Norman could reasonably have expected, we think, is that he might be able to inspire some hopefulness in the Treasury Department and among the bankers regarding foreign loans in aid of trade revivals, and we doubt that he was able to do this. What with the reported turning back of the recent Morgan loan to Spain, the suspicion that the recent French loan to Rumania may turn out to benefit French munition-makers, and the possibility of a prolonged tariff controversy between Great Britain and France, it is not surprising that Washington and New York should hesitate.

CHARLES M. SCHWAB won his battle for proxies in the war over bonuses to Bethlehem Steel executives. Now if the court which has the matter under advisement will only be gracious, President Grace may continue to get his million-dollar "incentives" in years when he "earns" them. From 1918 to 1930 they averaged $814,993 a year; in 1929 it was twice that much, and even last year more than a million. Over the past twenty years the company has paid out more than $35,000,000 in bonuses, most of it to half a dozen men. We can see little reason for the stockholders' clamor over the system and its alleged secrecy. It has been in operation ever since Mr. Schwab bought the company in 1901; it was fully described, with its results, in the annual report for 1916, and was approved by the stockholders. It seems a trifle late for them now to be discovering its existence. Mr. Schwab, who has never shared in the bonus payments, belongs to that older and more engaging type of business man who holds to the good old American theory that to the grabber belong the spoils. He has run Bethlehem on that principle, and the corporation's total "earnings," before interest, depreciation, and special reserves, have risen from less than $4,000,000 in 1905 to more than $67,000,000 in 1929. If the stockholders do not object to the grabbing system, we find it hard to get up much indignation over the bonus plan, which is part of it.

TWO HUNDRED CORPORATIONS control between 35 and 45 per cent of all our business wealth—excluding from business wealth that of government, agriculture, and the professions—according to an important study by Gardiner C. Means appearing in the American Economic Review for March. These large corporations, all of them with assets of more than $85,000,000 and net income over $4,500,000, had combined assets of more than $67,000,000,000 in 1927. They control nearly half the corporate wealth of the country and dominate much more than half its industry. Moreover, during recent years they have been growing three times as fast as the 300,000 smaller corporations, and if the existing rate of growth is maintained, in twenty years they will own half of our entire national wealth. They have among them fewer than 2,000 directors. In the light of such facts, what becomes of that theory of rugged individualism on which President Hoover mistakenly tries to shape national policy? To quote Mr. Means:

> A society in which production is governed by blind economic forces is being replaced by one in which production is carried on under the ultimate control of a handful of individuals. . . . Shall we then regard these men as seekers for private gain or as economic statesmen serving the commonweal?

THE RESPONSIBILITY of war debts and high tariffs for the present business depression is strikingly brought out in the report of the Committee on International Settlements and Economic Information of the International Chamber of Commerce recently made public in Washington, where the chamber will meet during May. The report points out that there is no general scarcity of gold, but that that metal is concentrated in France and the United States, the principal creditors of the world's "political" indebtedness. International obligations can be met only with gold, with goods, or by means of further borrowing. But tariffs obstruct the flow of goods, and borrowing, owing to the depression, has been sharply curtailed; hence pressure is put on gold, and the political debts, in addition to ordinary commercial obligations, have drained to France and the United States during the past two years all the available new gold and practically as much more drawn from the reserves of other countries.

So far as the causes of the depression are monetary, then, they are due chiefly to "international-debt obligations swollen by debts of political origin." Such causes are by no means exclusively responsible for the present desperate state of the world's business, but as this report indicates, the most important prior condition to a remedying of the general crisis is a clearing up of international debts, first, through a lowering of tariffs, thus making possible increased exports by debtors, and, second, through "a reduction of political debts."

THE BRITISH LABOR GOVERNMENT triumphed again on April 16 when the House of Commons, by an unexpectedly large majority of fifty-four, rejected a Conservative motion censuring the Government for its course with unemployment. The majority was due, as usual, to the Liberals, thirty-five of whom voted with the Government against ten who sided with the Conservatives, but it was also noticeable that the left-wing radicals of the Labor Party, led by James Maxton, stood solidly with Prime Minister MacDonald. The expected arraignment of the Government by Stanley Baldwin, Conservative leader, turned out to be a good deal of a fizzle, as well it might when one remembers that Mr. Baldwin has no specific for unemployment except protection, and that to have mentioned protection would have been to alienate all the free-trade Liberals and deprive the motion of censure of the needed majority support. Mr. MacDonald's victory opened the way for the presentation of Mr. Snowden's budget, and if the budget is accepted there is a probability that the Labor Government will survive at least into the summer, when a report from a commission on unemployment insurance is due. The greatest cloud in the sky, aside from unemployment, is the ominous growth of protectionist sentiment in Great Britain, and the likelihood of prolonged tariff controversies with Continental countries because of the desire of Great Britain to secure a general reduction of duties.

EIGHT NEGRO BOYS, the youngest fourteen, the oldest not yet twenty-one, have just been tried and all but the youngest convicted and sentenced to death for rape in Scottsboro, Alabama. The alleged victims were two white girls, but only one of them was willing to identify the defendants in court, and her testimony was conflicting all the way through. One thousand militia were summoned to the town to maintain order; after the first two boys were pronounced guilty, a brass band and general celebration outside the courthouse indicated where the sympathies of the populace lay and doubtless was not without influence on the jury, which nevertheless could not agree to impose the death sentence on the fourteen-year-old boy. The alleged offense was said to have been committed on board a freight train; the girls were accompanied by seven white boys who, so the story goes, got into a fight with some seventeen or eighteen Negroes; the white boys were thrown off the train; about half of the Negroes soon followed. The remaining nine stayed on the train—a strong presumption of their innocence—and were arrested when they reached their destination, denying that they had any part in the fracas, and all but two of them testifying that they were not even present while it was going on. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People has been investigating the matter and is making every possible effort to appeal the case and secure a new trial under more favorable circumstances. Scottsboro is priding itself on not having staged a lynching, although the threat of one hung like a thick fog over the legal proceeding from start to finish. And in place of a lynching we must be consoled by the spectacle of several boys under twenty sentenced to death on the unsupported testimony of a white girl who gives every evidence of irresponsibility.

SPILLING THE BEANS is ordinarily not a weakness of the leaders of Tammany Hall. But a lady did it the other day; a district leader named Miss Annie Matthews made a speech before the League of Women Voters that told all about how judges are chosen; and how bribes by prospective candidates for judgeships are never, never given; and how, after the judge is seated securely on the bench, with fourteen years of office at $25,000 a year ahead of him, he would be a base caitiff, a—to quote Miss Matthews—"rotter" if he did not remember, by a substantial present, the district leader who recommended him for the nomination. Miss Matthews, of course, did not up and say right out that she or any of her coworkers had actually accepted such a "present." She stated a hypothetical case: "If you were a judge, would you not be a 'rotter,' etc." It is reported that Miss Matthews will in due time be carefully and thoroughly interrogated by Commissioner Seabury; and meanwhile one suspects that she has spent some anxious moments explaining her remarks to her immediate superiors. But what the Matthews incident shows is that women are still novices in politics. The Chinese, who have been engaged in political intrigue longer, perhaps, than any other nation, have learned perfectly the art of seeing everything and saying nothing. The sachems of Tammany likewise are adepts. Miss Matthews is right when she says that everybody knows or at least suspects that the district leader does not support himself by drawing his sustenance from the clouds; but she is on less firm ground when she says, "A present afterward is a very different thing from a bribe beforehand"; and when she confesses publicly both her political knowledge, which will alienate her friends, and her moral distinctions, which will alienate everyone else, she is slipping into quicksand.

JOSEPH LEBLANG, New York's cut-rate-theater-ticket man, has died leaving a fortune estimated at $20,000,000, made in the sale of theater tickets and in real-estate operation. Mr. Leblang thirty years ago discovered and acted upon the very simple fact that some plays are worth more than others. (In the sense in which we here use the term, a play is "worth" the price, or rather prices, at which it is possible to fill the house. This may be fifty cents or twenty dollars.) Mr. Leblang accordingly took large blocks of tickets of the less successful shows and sold them at cut rates, thus making possible the continuation of some plays that could not have gone on at box-office prices. We hear ceaseless talk of the evils of ticket speculation and endless proposals for remedy. In fact, there is no fundamental remedy for those evils, such as they are, short of a recognition by the managers of the principle on which Mr. Leblang's fortune was based, a fixing of prices on the basis of what the play is actually worth as represented by demand in the market, and a box-office sale of seats at those prices. Otherwise ticket speculation will continue because the ticket speculator will continue to meet an economic need.

The Fall of a Dynasty

IN considering the fall of the last of the Bourbons, one's first impulse is to think of Alfonso in terms of what he lost—the Spanish crown. It was a crown that had been served by the fierce ambition of Jiménez de Cisneros, the genius of the Great Captain, the probity of General Prim, the brilliance of Cánovas del Castillo, and the devotion of Sánchez Guerra. It was a crown which had rested alike on the head of the wily Ferdinand of Aragon, of the restless Charles V, of the impossible Ferdinand VII—a varied and arresting line of rulers, occasionally stupid, occasionally great. And Alfonso carried that crown with the confident nonchalance befitting the son of those who had signed the decrees of empires with the curt and sufficient "I, the King."

But it was also a crown which had been dragged low at least twice in the hundred years preceding Alfonso's accession—once when Joseph Bonaparte sat on the Spanish throne while the legitimate king played billiards and knitted in a French château, and again in 1875 when a republic had been set up. As the twentieth century came on, and questions of titles, successions, and dynastic prestige gave way to questions of tariffs, overproduction, unemployment, and workers' insurance, monarchical Spain gradually recognized how difficult it is for tradition to deal with transition. In the last ten years of his reign Alfonso contributed to the fall of the monarchy in three ways: he lost the confidence of the country; he failed to recognize the economic basis of unrest; and when the crisis came, he hesitated.

The six-and-a-half-year tenure of the Primo de Rivera dictatorship created the impression abroad that Alfonso was really a clever politician. By countenancing the coup of September, 1923, he had avoided the impending reckoning. But this very evasion sowed suspicion among the Spanish people. The Moroccan campaign, which had culminated in the disaster of Annual, provoked a nation-wide demand for an investigation of the whole affair. The Picasso report was the result. Its contents were never published, but the rumor spread that Alfonso himself had had a hand in the Moroccan debacle. That the King, in all the years of the dictatorship, took no steps to clear himself of the charge was proof enough for his opponents of his insincerity. By suspending constitutional guaranties and by calling Primo de Rivera to power, the King interposed insurmountable obstacles between himself and his people. Again, in February of this year, when for a fleeting moment he appeared willing to intrust the government to the venerable Sánchez Guerra in response to popular demand, only to come out with a conservative Cabinet organized during the breathing spell, the impression deepened that the King was not playing according to rules. Alfonso alienated the affection of his people because he wounded what no Spaniard will endure injury to—amor propio.

From the time Primo de Rivera assumed control until the resignation of the Aznar Cabinet on April 14, it was clear that the economic problems of Spain were beyond the competence of its rulers. A belated and overrated program of public works was carried on under Primo; his successor, Berenguer, did no better; the wealthy conservative ministers in Aznar's Cabinet resorted to personal gifts and bread lines. Meanwhile, the Guardia Civil continued to crush strikes while Cadiz, Seville, Barcelona, Bilbao, and Madrid filled with peasants and factory hands out of work.

This inability to solve the economic crisis was matched by the indecision displayed when the political crisis reached fever pitch last December. A monarch who had told his subjects that the crown belonged to his family, not to him, and that therefore he could not and would not give it up would be expected to march out at the head of his troops to sweep away the Republican barricades if he could. Rather than die by the sword, however, Alfonso negotiated, compromised, hesitated, groped. He could not part with strong men, so he called to his side Berenguer and Aznar, strong men with a pronounced dash of amiability. He was opposed to elections for a constituent Cortes, so he decided to approach them by the dangerous path of municipal and provincial elections. The Jaca rebels were set free or given light sentences; Niceto Alcalá Zamora shouted his taunts under the very nose of the monarch; students were flat-sabered and then permitted to have their own way; staff officers refused to obey orders from Madrid and were removed to a beneficent climate for disciplining. Strategy degenerated to tactics and energetic measures gave way to "a melange of subtlety and violence." The overwhelming Opposition victory at the polls on Sunday, April 12, caught the King and his government as the Prussian offensive in Alsace in 1870 had caught the French armies—with their spats on and their powder damp. Even then Alfonso hesitated—until the one-hour ultimatum of the exultant Republican-Socialist coalition made it clear that the only way out was to clear out.

The provisional government headed by Alcalá Zamora has at least one thing for which to thank Alfonso—he left the country at peace. The new government thus begins without the need of putting down civil war. But there are critical days ahead. The revolutionary government represents a coalition of Republicans, Socialists, and other left groups. Of these, the Socialists have the smoothest party machinery and the clearest program. The Republican leader, Alcalá Zamora, is Republican partly because of a grudge; and he is impulsive enough to alienate the Socialists on even minor issues. The coup of April 14 in no way alleviates economic conditions. The government can still stress the coming constituent Cortes; but hundreds of thousands of Spaniards stand in need of bread and shelter as well as guaranteed civil liberties. Foreign banking circles must be mollified after the pronouncement of the Republicans that they would nullify the $60,000,000 credit of last March, negotiated by the Aznar Government to stabilize the peseta. There still remain the small but active groups of intransigents—Communists, clericals, militarists of the old school, monarchists, the Catalan separatists. The Republicans would do well to remember the advice of the good Abbé Coignard and not base too vast a hope on the fall of a prince.

Can the Leaders Lead?

SENATOR COUZENS addresses some pointed questions to the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, meeting at Atlantic City on April 28. He waxes a trifle ironic at the idea that business men can reasonably ask government to leave everything to them, and asks, in view of recent Treasury figures, whether business men approve of "the present trend of accumulation of property in the hands of the few." Then, after inquiring whether they advise the people to pledge their future income through instalment buying to such an extent as to become "almost economic slaves," he challenges our business leaders to see to it that there is brought about a proper division of earnings between labor and capital. But most pointedly of all, in view of the immediate situation, he declares that "it now rests with these leading business men to solve the problem of stabilization of industry and maintenance of continuous employment"—no small order—or else, he asserts, they must expect legislation compelling business to change its methods, because the patience of the public, he believes, is exhausted.

Are such demands reasonable? We believe they are, and we believe that both business men and other leaders of American life will do well to give serious thought to their significance; for it does not lie wholly on the surface. We have largely mastered the problem of production. In a country like the United States, with productive power rapidly growing, we already produce enough so that it is possible for all men to have reasonable food, shelter, clothing, and other necessaries and conveniences of life, and to enjoy reasonable security. Men in this country no longer go hungry and cold and troubled for the morrow because our society lacks the power to produce the wealth by which we all must live. Poverty and insecurity are no longer unavoidable; yet we still have poverty, and insecurity is perhaps greater than ever before. Further, these two curses are not the fault of those who suffer from them, but they result from bad distribution of income and the want of social arrangements to make our social resources available in such a way as to meet the elementary needs of all men. It is the contention of Senator Couzens, and we agree with him, that the rank and file of honest, hard-working people will not indefinitely put up with such a state of affairs, and that our business leaders, if they are to retain their present power or anything approaching it, have got to make their system provide a reasonable and assured income for all people willing to do their share of work. If our leaders cannot or will not do that, then, as Senator Couzens suggests, their power will be taken from them, and ought to be taken from them, for these are only reasonable demands that people are making of our economic system. Let our business men, then, hasten to answer these pressing questions: How are you going to redress our present disastrous inequality of income and property ownership? How are you going to insure an adequate income to every industrious citizen? How are you going to care for people unemployed through no fault of their own? And how are you going to stabilize industry and prevent unemployment in future? If business leaders cannot answer these questions, they have no right any longer to maintain their position as rulers of our society. They cannot complain if government takes hold, as the Michigan Senator warns them is inevitable.

But what can government do? By changes in the laws of property, inheritance, and taxation, and by the expenditure on social services of funds raised by heavy taxation, it can change markedly the existing distribution of income. By unemployment insurance on a comprehensive scale it can do something to overcome the worst distresses of unemployment. This much we see. But when it comes to insuring a steady income to all workers by stabilizing industry, we have not yet got beyond words. It is agreed that there must be national planning—but how is any government in the world, short of one which actually determines the whole economic life in detail, going to see that such planning is carried out? Soviet Russia, with complete control over all the agencies of production, and with power to say to consumers what they may and may not have, does actually manage a system of "planned production." But are Americans willing to pay anything approaching the Russian price for such a system? And if not, is there any means whereby a national planning system can be made much more than a form of words? Can we stabilize industry and insure regularity and security of income by anything short of the iron discipline of communism? Such is the question ultimately raised by Senator Couzens in his challenge to our business men. He expresses the fear of "bankruptcy of ideas and plans" on the part of business to prevent a recurrence of present conditions, and a consequent inescapable pressure for government action; but he makes no concrete suggestion of the form that such action could take with any reasonable promise of success. The time calls for the best thinking that the Western world can do.

Americans in Nicaragua

AN obvious effort is being made in some quarters to make it appear that Mr. Hoover, in announcing through Secretary Stimson that the United States cannot undertake to afford military protection to Americans in the interior of Nicaragua who may be in danger from Sandino's operations, but that such persons should withdraw to the coast towns where the American navy can look after them, has served notice that the American government proposes to abandon Americans in Nicaragua to their fate. There is no substance to this contention, as a reading of Mr. Stimson's announcements shows. The United States is not abandoning anybody. What it has done is to call a halt in a course which should never have been entered upon and which has worked mischief wherever it has been followed, and to adopt a new policy which, if it is consistently adhered to, will open a new era in the relations between the United States and Latin America.

When Mr. Coolidge, in his speech before members of the United Press at New York on August 25, 1927, declared that "the person and property of a citizen are a part of the general domain of the nation, even when abroad," he promulgated a doctrine which not only is unwarranted by international law, but which also involves in its application precisely the kind of interference in the affairs of other nations which has long been a blot on our Latin American policy. Whatever the usefulness of the Monroe Doctrine in protecting the Latin American states from European interference, it ceased to be useful and became an impertinence when it was invoked to justify the armed intervention of the United States whenever and wherever Americans or their property were jeopardized by local disturbances. It put the United States in the position of backing, forcibly if the Administration so chose, every investment of American capital in Latin America and every American citizen who elected to reside in a Latin American country, irrespective of the nature of the controversy in which such persons or their property became entangled or of the ability and purpose of the state in question to extend to American nationals the same protection that it extended to its own.

The reappearance of Sandino and his followers has given the Administration an opportunity to drop the policy to which Mr. Coolidge presumed to give the sanctity of international law. In 1926, when the American authorities established neutral zones for the protection of noncombatants, there were, as Mr. Stimson points out, two armies in the field, each of which professed, at least, to observe the recognized rules of war. The present outbreak, as viewed by the Department of State, is banditry pure and simple, with murder and plunder as its familiar incidents; and banditry, too, in regions sparsely settled and extremely difficult of access. The proper authority to deal with such lawlessness, the Administration now holds, is the Nicaraguan constabulary—a force of upwards of 2,000 trained men.

Under such circumstances it is manifestly impossible for the United States, without deliberately usurping the authority of the Nicaraguan government and thereby bringing it into contempt, to undertake the protection of imperiled Americans wherever they may happen to be. No one would expect it to attempt such a task in any European country, and it has no business to attempt it in Nicaragua. It has done its whole duty when it has warned its citizens to withdraw from dangerous areas to coast towns where the American navy can, if need be, assure their safety.

Mr. Hoover and Mr. Stimson merit hearty praise for what they have done and a cordial recognition of their courage in doing it. It was time that American bankers were taught that American warships must not be expected to trail American loans, and that American business men were made to understand that their mines, plantations, and factories in foreign countries are entitled to such protection only as those countries are prepared to give. To accredit an American Minister to Nicaragua, receive an accredited Minister from there, and then treat the country as if it had neither mind, will, nor power of its own and send marines on their travels whenever internal disorder breaks out, is an international farce that should never have been staged. We are glad that the marines are to be withdrawn notwithstanding the renewed activities of Sandino, and that Nicaragua is to be left to restore order as best it may. The announcement now made that Americans who persist in courting murder or plunder do so at their own risk is another long step in the right direction. It is earnestly to be hoped that neither the clamor of business and financial interests, nor the outcries of politicians, nor the conjured specters of diplomatic complications will turn the Administration in the slightest from its course.

Money Measures All

IN New York City there are 140,000 people ill every day and at least 70,000 are continuously ill from chronic disease. So calculates the director of the New York Academy of Medicine. "It is a fair estimate," he continues, "that these 70,000 persons could earn $150,000 a day if they were in good health, and that if they worked 300 days of the year they would earn $45,000,000." As it must cost at least $2 a day to care for each invalid, the total loss "amounts to very close to $100,000,000 a year."

We quote these monetary calculations not to contradict them but to wonder why it was thought necessary to make them, to lay such emphasis upon them. The impression they leave, whether the director intended it or not, is that if there were merely 70,000 people in New York chronically ill nobody would bother to think about it, but that when one points to a loss of $100,000,000 a year on this account, the rest of us will begin to sit up and take notice.

As an isolated calculation this would perhaps not be worth remarking upon, but it appears to be merely another revelation of a point of view that is becoming more widespread every year. Living conditions in all our great cities become more and more depressing as the hopeless traffic jam increases. But you cannot get your typical statistician to see that this is an evil in itself, expressible directly in terms of misspent time—whether during leisure or business hours—missed appointments, irritations, headaches, frayed nerves. Before we can appreciate that it is an evil worth stopping, apparently, we must be shown that the traffic jam is costing us so and so many hundred millions a year. Are our cities full of hideous noises, making impossible any genuinely humane life? Then let us prove that noise is really an evil because it reduces our industrial efficiency by 11.6 per cent.

What lies behind all this is the assumption that all human misery and welfare can be reduced to monetary terms—indeed, even that the monetary gain or loss is the good or evil. But suppose New York's annual $100,000,000 loss through sickness were made up by a snowstorm of $100,000,000 from heaven; would this be considered complete compensation by, for example, pneumonia patients? When the sick died, might not a monetary calculation be obliged to treat the death—aside from the funeral expenses—as a gain, because the monetary loss through illness would no longer have to be calculated? The calculation, indeed, seems dubious even from its own standpoint, for it hardly seems to take into account that if there were no illness all the doctors and nurses would be out of jobs, and the capital cost of hospitals would have to be written off. The calculation might imply, finally, that chronic illness is less of an evil than vacations and holidays, for the loss through illness is not so great as the "loss" resulting from the fact that most of us do not work on at least sixty-five days out of the year.

Nothing could do more to give point to the common criticism of present-day America as a complete worshiper of Mammon than the constant flood of statistics assuming that final human and social costs can be expressed in dollars and cents—that health itself exists merely to make us efficient for our real business here below of ceaseless and of course lucrative production.

What I Believe*

By BERTRAND RUSSELL

THE answer to such a question as What do you believe? is generally expected to consist of two parts: the first explaining one's views as to the nature of the world, the second one's opinions as to how human life should be conducted. The man who invents some fallacious and fantastic argument to show that since the world is such and such, conduct ought to be so and so is considered to show greater profundity than the man who perceives that the two questions have nothing to do with each other. Academic philosophers, ever since the time of Parmenides, have believed that the world is a unity. This view has been taken over from them by clergymen and journalists, and its acceptance has been considered the touchstone of wisdom. The most fundamental of my beliefs is that this is rubbish. I think the universe is all spots and jumps, without unity, without continuity, without coherence or orderliness or any of the other properties that governesses love. Indeed, there is little but prejudice and habit to be said for the view that there is a world at all. Physicists have recently advanced opinions which should have led them to agree with the foregoing remarks; but they have been so pained by the conclusions to which logic would have led them that they have been abandoning logic for theology in shoals. Every day some new physicist publishes a new pious volume to conceal from himself and others the fact that in his scientific capacity he has plunged the world into unreason and unreality. To take an illustration: What are we to think of the sun? He used to be the glorious lamp of heaven, a golden-haired god, a being to be worshiped by Zoroastrians and Aztecs and Incas. There is some reason to think that the doctrines of Zoroaster inspired Kepler's heliocentric cosmogony. But now the sun is nothing but waves of probability. If you ask what it is that is probable, or in what ocean the waves travel, the physicist, like the Mad Hatter, replies, "I have had enough of this; suppose we change the subject." If, however, you press him, he will say that the waves are in his formulae, and his formulae are in his head, from which, however, you must not infer that the waves are in his head. To speak seriously: such orderliness as we appear to find in the external world seems to be due to our own passion for pigeonholes, and it is quite doubtful whether there are such things as laws of nature. It is a curious sign of the times that religious apologists welcome this view. In the eighteenth century they welcomed the reign of law, since they thought that laws implied a Lawgiver, but religious apologists in the present day seem to be of opinion that a world created by a Deity must be irrational, on the ground, apparently, that they themselves have been made in God's image. The reconciliation of religion and science which professors proclaim and bishops acclaim rests, in fact, on grounds of quite another sort, and might be set forth in the following practical syllogism: science depends upon endowments, and endowments are threatened by bolshevism, therefore science is threatened by bolshevism; but religion also is threatened by bolshevism; therefore religion and science are allies. It follows, of course, that science, if pursued with sufficient profundity, reveals the existence of a God. Nothing so logical as this penetrates, however, to the consciousness of the pious professors.

The odd thing is that, at the very moment when physics, which is the fundamental science, is undermining the whole structure of applied reason and presenting us with a world of unreal and fantastic dreams in place of the Newtonian order and solidity, applied science is becoming peculiarly useful and more able than ever to give results of value to human life. There is here a paradox of which possibly the intellectual solution may be found hereafter, or, equally possibly, no solution may exist. The fact is that science plays two quite distinct roles: on the one hand as a metaphysic, and on the other hand as educated common sense. As a metaphysic it has been undermined by its own success. Mathematical technique is now so powerful that it can find a formula for even the most erratic world. Plato and Sir James Jeans think that because geometry applies to the world, God must have made the world on a geometrical pattern, but the mathematical logician suspects that God could not have made a world containing many things without exposing it to the skill of the geometer. In fact, the applicability of geometry to the physical world has ceased to be a fact about that world, and has become only a tribute to the geometer's cleverness. The only thing that the geometer needs is multiplicity, whereas the only thing the theologian needs is unity. Of unity, however vague, however tenuous, I see no evidence in modern science considered as a metaphysic. But modern science considered as common sense remains triumphant, indeed more triumphant than ever before.

In view of this state of affairs, it is necessary to make a sharp distinction between metaphysical beliefs and practical beliefs in regard to the conduct of life. In metaphysics my creed is short and simple. I think that the external world may be an illusion, but if it exists, it consists of events short, small, and haphazard. Order, unity, and continuity are human inventions just as truly as are catalogues and encyclopedias. But human inventions can, within limits, be made to prevail in our human world, and in the conduct of our daily life we may with advantage forget the realm of chaos and old night by which we are perhaps surrounded.

In human beings three things seem to me to be particularly desirable. They are scientific method, friendly feelings, and interest in life or the world. Let us begin with scientific method.

The ultimate metaphysical doubts which we have been considering have no bearing whatever upon the practical uses of science. If a Mendelian develops a variety of wheat which is immune from diseases that are destructive to the older varieties, if a physiologist makes a discovery about vitamines, if a chemist makes a discovery about the scientific production of nitrates, the importance and usefulness of their work is quite independent of the question whether an atom consists of a miniature solar system, or a wave of probability, or an infinite rectangle of integers. When I speak of the importance of scientific method in regard to the conduct of human life, I am thinking of scientific method in its mundane forms. Not that I would undervalue science as a metaphysic, but the value of science as metaphysic belongs in another sphere. It belongs with religion and art and love, with the pursuit of the beatific vision, with the Promethean madness that leads the greatest men to strive to become gods. Perhaps the only ultimate value of human life is to be found in this Promethean madness. But it is a value that is religious, not political or even moral, and at the moment it is morals and politics of which I wish to speak.

* This is the first of a series of articles in which men and women of distinction will set forth the ideas by which they live. The second article, by Mrs. Sidney Webb, will appear in an early issue.—EDITOR THE NATION.

Scientific method as an ingredient in everyday life consists of the habit of basing opinions upon evidence rather than upon emotion or tradition. The agriculturist who employs the methods that he learned from his father and his grandfather is likely to be indignant with the urban whippersnapper who sets to work to instruct him. Frequently the latter is ignorant of something essential and is apparently overwhelmed by the shrewd man of practical experience. Nevertheless, he is likely to possess some new piece of knowledge which, if it can be incorporated with experience, will lead to an important improvement on traditional methods. Uneducated mothers imagine that nature has taught them how to bring up their infants, and are indignant when male experts offer them advice. No doubt the male experts would be a failure if they tried to bring up infants themselves. Nevertheless, on many points, such as fixed hours of feeding, their advice has now been accepted by all intelligent women. The main principle of the scientific method is that emotion, like what the soldier said, is not evidence. If this could be more widely recognized, it would not only improve the technique of the arts and of education, but would go far to solve international problems, which are rendered intractable by the substitution of patriotic emotion for a sober survey of facts. Emotion has its sphere, since it decides the ends to which our activities are to be devoted, but it should not be allowed to obscure our vision as to the means for realizing those ends.

Scientific method is closely connected with the social virtue of impartiality. Piaget, in his book on "Judgment and Reasoning in the Child," contends that the reasoning faculty is a product of the social sense. Every child, he says, begins with a dream of omnipotence, in which all facts are bent to his wishes. Gradually, through contact with others, he is forced to the realization that their wishes may be opposed to his, and that his wishes are not invariably arbiters of truth. Reasoning, according to Piaget, develops as a method of arriving at a social truth upon which all can agree. This condition is, I think, largely valid, and emphasizes one great merit of the scientific method—namely, that it tends to avoid those intractable disputes which arise when private emotion is regarded as the test of truth. Piaget ignores another aspect of scientific method—namely, that it gives power over the environment and also power of adaptation to the environment. It may be, for example, an advantage to be able to predict the weather, and if one man is right on this point while all his companions are wrong, the advantage nevertheless remains with him, though a purely social definition of truth would compel us to regard him as in the wrong. It is success in this practical test of power over the environment, or adaptation to it, which has given science its prestige. The Chinese emperors repeatedly refrained from persecuting the Jesuits because the latter were in the right as to the dates of eclipses when the Chinese astronomers were in the wrong. All modern life is built upon this practical success of science, at any rate where the inanimate world is concerned. It has had hitherto less success in direct applications to man, and it therefore still meets with opposition from traditional beliefs where man is concerned, but it cannot well be doubted that if our civilization survives, man also will soon come to be viewed scientifically. This will have a great effect upon education and the criminal law, perhaps also on family life. Such developments, however, belong to the future.

The power over the environment which science gives is not necessarily a good thing; the stock instance to the contrary is war. If science gives a nation the power to wipe out an enemy capital within a few hours of the outbreak of war, the gain to mankind is problematical. Whether scientific power is to be a boon or a curse depends upon the dominant emotions of those who wield it. Hitherto hatred and cruelty have always played a very large part in human life. Education and the criminal law have at most times been so ferocious as to defeat their supposed ends; that is to say, boys have been stupider, and criminals more criminal, than they would have been if they had been more kindly treated. Similarly, when nations go to war nominally for economic ends, both sides are impoverished, and it is clear that hatred has blinded them as to their true interests. The more scientific power men acquire, the more important it becomes that they should wield this power for good rather than for evil. How they will wield power depends upon their dominant emotions: if these emotions are friendly, they will wield it well; if hostile, badly.

The problem is therefore presented to the men of science to devise a method of generating friendly feeling in the mass of mankind and more especially in the holders of power. The method of direct exhortation, which has been favored by the founders of religions, has not proved very effective, and it is clear that quite other methods are required. A considerable period of experimentation will be necessary before anything can be said positively on this subject, but it is clear that among the factors concerned are diet, instinctive satisfaction, and skill in constructive work. Probably a radical transformation of the economic system is also necessary. I have no doubt whatever that methods could be devised for creating a world in which most men had friendly feelings toward other men, but I think rivers of blood will have to flow before the holders of power will allow such a world to be created, and I am doubtful whether rivers of blood are the right kind of rivers to water the tender plant of human kindness.

When I speak of the necessity of friendly feelings, I emphatically do not mean unselfishness. Unselfishness is, of course, a vague word which is incapable of any precise meaning, but at any rate it always involves control of the feelings by the will. Traditional ethics emphasize the will far too much; emotions and sentiments are far more important than will. The type of person that should be produced is a type that spontaneously, without self-control, wishes to do what in fact is in the general interest, not the type that is filled with destructive wishes kept in check by an iron self-control. Destructive wishes, where they exist strongly, will find an outlet somehow, usually by generating beliefs which justify cruel actions. Useful emotions are produced not by preaching, but by physiological means and by wise conditioning.

This technique applies not only to friendly feelings but also to interest in life. There are many moderns in whom zest is lacking: they live more or less virtuously, but with a minimum of enjoyment. This is usually due to the fact that they force themselves by an effort of will to live in a way which is contrary to powerful emotions, of which they may or may not be conscious. An indispensable psychological condition for interest in life is a certain emotional harmony which makes it unnecessary to suppress certain emotions in order to gratify certain others. The most frequent conflict is between sexual emotions and desire for the respect of neighbors. Wherever such conflicts are strong, they are likely to produce either listlessness or rage: a man will either lose all interest in life or will find his chief pleasure in punishing those who have enjoyed the pleasures which he has denied himself. To keep alive the spontaneous play of interest and the flow of friendly feeling, it is necessary that as far as possible such fundamental emotional conflicts should be avoided. This requires partly an adaptation of the individual to the community, but partly also an adaptation of the community to the individual. To avoid emotional conflicts in the individual, it is sometimes best to adopt such methods of education as will prevent certain desires from growing up, but at other times it is best to alter public morality in such a way that desires previously incompatible shall cease to be so. The latter is the best method wherever public morality condemns acts which would be harmless if they were not condemned.

I believe that the substitution of a scientific for a religious technique in the production of virtue may prove to be of enormous importance. Moralists hitherto have been extraordinarily unsuccessful in producing the type of character that they said they desired. The growth of psychology and biochemistry is likely to give us in the not too distant future a far greater power of molding character than mankind has ever hitherto possessed. Like the power over inanimate nature, this new power over human nature may be used either for good or for evil. I do not profess to know in which way it will be used, but if it is used for evil, our scientific civilization will not long survive.

Yale's Cathedral Orgy

By WILLIAM HARLAN HALE

New Haven, April 12

AS a pinnacle achievement of American education, as an architectural Eighth Wonder, and as a fitting memorial to its donor, Yale has just dedicated its new library, built at a cost of about $7,000,000 from the estate of John W. Sterling of the class of 1864. The ceremony on April 11 was impressive. Gaping crowds were guided through the halls of the vast medieval pile, and herded around the Gothic cloister of this gorgeous cathedral of 1931. Everyone realized that American culture had arrived at a plateau previously unknown. The assemblage was stunned by the thirteenth-century sanctity, the gilt and the glory.

The monument will indeed remain through the centuries as a memorial to the character of its builders. For ages it will unmercifully reveal their soul. It will tell the story of American wealth and academic culture of the earlier twentieth century. Skyscrapers narrate only a part of the story; in a generation they must give way to others, and in their mortality lies their smallness. The Yale library will not give way, and historians, philosophers, and sight-seers in five hundred years will reconstruct the America of our day from its venerable stones.

When Yale went in for expansion, endowments, and publicity, it was not content to build ordinary buildings that with common efficiency would carry out the functions for which they were intended. Under the Yale hand, a chemistry laboratory became a Hampton Court palace; a gymnasium became a Norman cathedral, well fortified from all access of light; fraternity houses and senior-society tombs were built as Attic temples, Saracenic strongholds, Tudor mansions, Venetian palaces, and sacred edifices of the classical revival. Every minor building became other-worldly, enchanting in its antique quaintness, its cumbersome and happy extravagance. The donors were tickled by the splendor; hardened business men felt holy when erecting imitation abbeys to their own memory; and Yale's cultural stock went up.

The time came to build a library. Not merely a library, of course, but the largest building in New Haven, the greatest monument in Connecticut, the vastest library on the continent, the greatest educational spectacle in the world. It was to be violently radical; and what great precedents there were to follow! Frank Lloyd Wright, Eliel Saarinen, the masters of the Dessau group, the Dutch designers, the Swedes—all of these could offer their rich gifts and their modern vision to the achievement of a masterwork in freedom and new thought.

Radical? It surpassed all expectations. There was no limit to its innovations. Under the inspiring genius of James Gamble Rogers, the new Yale library was designed to include:

1. A cathedral of the English Decorated period.
2. A group of Tudor pavilions, loosely connected.
3. A cloister.
4. A court with details of:
    a. An Italian Gothic or Spanish arcade.
    b. An Elizabethan house.
5. A central book tower, armored with extremely heavy masonry under Romanesque inspiration, pierced by Early English lancet windows.
6. Interiors designed with elaborate vaulting, Tudor bosses, medieval roof-painting, and furniture of Jacobean influence.
7. A room in early Colonial style.
8. Certain rooms to be decorated in High Renaissance style.

Radical? Not even yet were the designers satisfied. The thing was becoming too Gothic, too sacred. It needed a secular note, as a concession to the less visionary of visitors. So it was decided to turn one half of the building into a modern office structure. To outward appearances everything was solidly antique; but on close examination one could pass from a fourteenth-century ambulatory through an oaken door into a functional office corridor, with linoleum floors, radiators, exit signs, padded partitions, and sanitary tiling. In the very center of the ecclesiastical stronghold a modern light shaft was designed, like any number one finds in New York's garment-workers' district. This second court, so different from the Gothic-Romanesque cloister out in front, was kept somewhat of a secret; but it was there, in case practical eyes began to pry.

It also occurred to the fathers that although they were erecting an ancient cathedral and its appendages, there was no reason why they should forego the pleasure and expense of using steel girders throughout. Their idea was to employ all the medieval stonework possible (quarried from half a dozen different sources), and to add to that, just for good measure, a complete system of structural steel. It was a happy thought, an architectural two-in-one.

So the vast structure rose, first glittering and open and forward-looking in its unmantled steel. When the frame was finished, and all the rivets were fast, and the skyscraper was firm in its newness, the stonework began. Hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of ashlar approached in endless caravans. Great buttresses were mortared fast to the girders, so that all the steel supporting members might themselves be supported. Lavish tricks were played by the dozen, emulations of the builders of Chartres; and the visitors below gasped at the glory, not seeing the hidden lie of steel and the fraud of fake design.

A library? You would never recognize it when you saw it. Enter it—pass through a bastard version of the west portal of an abbey. Continue down the main hall, which is a precise copy of a nave with five bays. Observe the massive and unnecessary piers, the inconvenient but orthodox side aisles, the lofty transepts bristling with sanctity above and serial catalogues below. Advance to the high altar—a $25,000 book-delivery desk; overhead, admire the rood screen, of utmost complexity and facility at catching dust, which has been cleverly placed to hide the important library clock from view. See the space where the great apse painting is to go. (At the present time the painting has not yet been transferred from preliminary drawings, but the work is unofficially believed to represent two nude figures, both viewed from the rear—one, a woman, flying off to the left, and the other, a horse, flying off to the right. The conception is of course in keeping with the general library scheme.) Turn about and gaze at the triforium gallery above the vast nave; scan the splendid clerestory windows, heavy with tracery and mullions, highly effective in minimizing the light, and sealed hermetically shut. Pass down the corridors, and cry out in rapt adoration of more color, more carving, more corbels, more plaques, balconies, chandeliers, wall brackets (electric, in the style of ancient torch-holders), more sacred splendors! And, while at last laboring to find a book, bow your head in holy ecstasy!

Do you accuse this place and its builders of impotence and deceit, of a hypocritical stealing from the past, of leisure-class exhibitionism? Then you are told that the building is all idealism and pure art; and that, besides, it cost $7,000,000. Do you point out that the whole thing is architecturally criminal in its false façades, unbuttressing buttresses, and its inculcation of the lie in young student minds? You are told that the building is meant to lift men above and away from their everyday surroundings into the world of culture and beauty. You call the place a Roxy movie palace, a cheap nouveau riche establishment in the style of Southampton, Long Island? You are forcibly shown the high civilization and learning which droop down from the structure in thousands of ornaments, scrolls, shields, panels, corbels, embrasures. You are led to the fortified facade, where you may see symbolic inscriptions in the following languages or scripts: Cro-Magnon, Egyptian, Assyrian, Hebrew, Arabic, Greek, Chinese, and Mayan. None of these being in the remotest degree intelligible, you are made to digest some other graven images spattered all over the stone: the Phoenician ship, the winged bull of Babylon, the Mayan serpent, the Athenian owl, the Roman wolf.

You still doubt the overpowering intellectuality of the abbey? Then you will receive supplementary proof in the form of a row of sculptured heads—poorly spaced and vapidly executed, meaningless without a handbook—representing Moses, symbolizing religion; Socrates, philosophy; Herodotus, history; Columbus, geography; Varro, language; Shakespeare, literature; Leonardo da Vinci, fine arts; Bach, music; Adam Smith, economics and sociology; Justinian, law; Aristotle, natural sciences; Galileo, astronomy and mathematics; Newton, physics and chemistry; Aesculapius, medicine; Vitruvius, engineering. Or you are taken through the cloister itself, which bristles with extravagant carvings reproducing several dozen typographers' mottoes or marks, emblems of a score of engravers, and puzzles in stone and fabulous Latin inscriptions. But a modern building constructed for purely modern needs has no excuse for going off in an orgy of meretricious medievalism and stale iconography.

It is inevitable that the observer, at first stunned by the dazzle, will recover his balance and call the bluff of this fraud. The seven million dollars have all been wisely used to show him that the library is an obscene toy of capitalism and academic greed. As the spectator looks down the corridors, part monastic, part palatial, entirely impractical, he finds in this building the true spirit of the American rulers. It dawns on him that in this holy place the bankruptcy of the American millionaire's mind and the vulgarity of the American educator's mind are faithfully monumentalized for the ages to come. He turns away with a sort of disgust as the students file into the towering mausoleum, from which light and air—and therefore freedom—have so studiously been excluded. He would like to tell them to get out from this diseased establishment, to escape the fake aesthetics, the amassed untruths, the deceitful incrusted idealism, the sick orgy of millionaire display. He would like to make them realize that neither they nor their fellows will ever learn a true thing in any institution such as this.

Despairing then, he hurries toward the exit portal of the sanctuary. And the last thing that greets his departing eye, at the end of the nave, is a telephone booth, designed as a fourteenth-century confessional.

Governor La Follette

By MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

Madison, April 12

THREE months ago Philip F. La Follette, second son of "Fighting Bob," was inaugurated governor of Wisconsin. During those three months he has accomplished little that can be measured concretely, but he has gone far toward winning the confidence of the voters of the State. This sentiment is to be found almost everywhere among the people; and it even creeps into the editorials of the opposition newspapers. A generation ago the appearance in the opposition press of an editorial article applauding anything done by Governor Robert La Follette would have been a startling novelty; the other day the Green Bay Gazette, most outspoken of tory papers, spoke with unusual kindness of some of the present Governor La Follette's achievements, and caused barely a ripple of comment. Here in Madison the State Journal has been much less caustic in its criticism than most political observers had anticipated. It is probably true that the opposition is for the moment politically disorganized and therefore its newspapers do not speak out with as much energy and enthusiasm as they have shown in the past, but it is also true that popular support for Governor La Follette is so great that the opposition papers cannot well ignore it.

Philip La Follette has won the support of the public by his vigor, his clear and sound presentation of his solutions for the major problems confronting the State, and by his promptness in acting upon his campaign and inauguration promises. So rapidly has he moved that the opposition in the legislature, despite the fact that the session is already three months old, has not yet found time to organize. The enemy in both senate and assembly has up to now had but one thought—namely, its fear that the Governor would succeed in putting the more important of his plans through the legislature before the stalwarts could organize a decent show of resistance. Another indication of his opponents' disorganized state is their inability to find a suitable candidate to pit against La Follette in the election next year. The only man they believe might have a chance is former Governor Kohler, but he is at present being groomed for John Blaine's seat in the United States Senate, presumably on the theory that Senator Blaine will be an easier man to beat than Governor La Follette. On the other hand, the progressives are united and well disciplined. They control the lower house and have fifteen of the thirty-three votes in the senate—the opposition has sixteen votes, while the remaining two senators are independents who vote as often with the progressives as they do with the stalwarts. One gets the impression in talking with the rank-and-file progressives, both in and out of the legislature, that they are confident to the point of cockiness. Their leaders, however, do not display the same overconfidence, and Governor La Follette in particular refrains from expressing any belief that his legislative program will carry the day.

Phil La Follette as governor has not been content to depend upon his political acumen or his political position. He has solicited the advice and assistance of a host of experts. He has gone out of the State, for example, to pick men like David Lilienthal of Chicago, a recognized authority on public utilities, to head his Railroad Commission, and he leans heavily for political guidance on a man who is not a progressive Republican but a Socialist, Senator Thomas Duncan of Milwaukee, wealthy Yale graduate and business manager of the Milwaukee Leader, Socialist newspaper. Railroad presidents and bankers, old enemies of his father, are often asked and willingly come to the Governor's office to discuss administrative and legislative matters. He has revived the council of unofficial advisers made up of faculty members of the University of Wisconsin, which his father originated. Professor John R. Commons and others of this group frequently come to the State House to assist in drafting legislation, just as Commons and some of the others did thirty years ago when the elder La Follette was governor. Lastly, Governor La Follette has put through the legislature his plan for the creation of an Executive Council, to be composed of five senators, five assemblymen, and ten members selected by the governor, the governor's members to be "spokesmen for agriculture, manufacturing, commerce, finance, labor, and similar basic interests in the State." Referring to the purposes of this Executive Council, Governor La Follette in his inaugural speech said:

> We must mobilize for the solution of the critical problem of distribution the ability and experience which have perfected our machinery of production. . . . It is possible for us to inaugurate for Wisconsin the first steps toward a planned development, to be achieved by the free cooperation of individuals and groups with the government of the State. No one section or member of the community is all-sufficient for this task. Our institutions of government should be designed to facilitate this taking of common counsel. In the conferences which have already been held with many groups in recent weeks, there has been generous response from representatives of many interests. We may yet turn our economic difficulties to some permanent achievement if we establish a continuing practice of this kind.

Although the council has been empowered to conduct investigations, it will not be reduced to the status of a Hoover "fact-finding commission." The Governor declares rightly that there is little point in gathering information merely for the sake of collecting it. Moreover, there is plenty of valuable information concerning agriculture, finance, industry, and labor already at hand, and this information he will have the council put into such shape that it will be of positive benefit to these branches of economic activity. The members of the council are to serve without compensation.

Thus far, as has been stated, Governor La Follette has got very little major legislation, apart from that dealing with the power question, through the senate and assembly. The omnibus appropriation bill has been passed and is now awaiting the Governor's attention. The La Follette unemployment-relief plan has also been adopted, but impartial observers report that this plan will probably not work out as well as was anticipated. The scheme consists of squeezing a three-year program of highway construction and grade-crossing removal into one year. The railroads are required by law to bear one-third of the cost of removing grade crossings, but the plan provides that the State shall finance this work so that the railways will have three years instead of one in which to meet the cost. The necessary funds will be obtained through an increase in the gasoline tax from two to four cents. Governor La Follette hoped to provide work "directly to at least 10,000 men and indirectly to many others." It is doubtful, however, whether more than 6,000 men will benefit directly—and according to the most acceptable estimates, there are at present approximately 225,000 workers unemployed in Wisconsin.

Two sections of the La Follette program are yet to be tackled by the legislature. The first concerns taxation. In Wisconsin farmers and home-owners pay from 65 to 70 per cent of all taxes collected; in some cases individuals in this class pay out as much as one-third of their incomes in taxes. The Governor has asked for laws restoring the tax on dividends, increasing the rates in the higher brackets of the State income tax, and repealing certain reciprocal tax arrangements. It is probable that all these reforms will be enacted, though not entirely in accordance with the terms of the La Follette program.

The second section of the Governor's program has to do with electoral reform, and will probably be defeated. Under a proposed amendment to the election laws any candidate receiving a majority of all the votes cast in a primary for the office he seeks would be declared elected to that office. If no candidate received a majority, the two persons receiving the largest number of votes would, irrespective of party, be voted upon at the general election. Governor La Follette sees in this reform the development of "a more genuine and realistic reflection of the political interest of the citizen." However, even the progressive leaders believe there is little hope of getting this legislation through at the present session.

It is on the power question that Philip La Follette is making his biggest fight, and it is on the power question that he will most likely either be made or broken as a political leader. He has receded somewhat from his original, outspoken championship of public ownership, production, and distribution of electric power. He still believes that public ownership is to be preferred to absentee ownership by private interests, but he has lately come around to the opinion that public ownership, to be valuable and permanent, must be permitted to establish and develop itself without special favors or privileges from the State or federal government. His power program, some sections of which have already been enacted into law, would place private and public power corporations on an equal basis, subject to the same strict regulation and the same taxation, on the theory that the better and more economical system would and should survive. Governor La Follette is sure that public ownership will win out.

One of the most important bills passed by the legislature this session provides for the creation of "municipal power districts" throughout the State. Under this law a group of organized communities may unite in owning and operating a power plant that will produce and distribute electrical energy to all residents and industries within the power district. The various municipalities in any given section may erect their own power-transmission hook-up, distribute power over their entire area from a single large central station, and so place themselves in a stronger position to compete with private utilities which already operate on this basis. Such municipal power districts are not mandatory; "the governing bodies of one-half or more of the municipalities proposed to be included in the district" may by resolution call for a popular referendum on the question of whether a power district shall be created, or as an alternative a referendum may be had by the presentation of a petition signed by 10 per cent of the qualified voters of the proposed district. If the referendum fails to bring out a favorable majority in some of the municipalities in the district, the Railroad Commission is empowered to decide whether a smaller district embracing the communities where the proposition was carried would be economically and otherwise feasible. Once created, a municipal power district can enlarge itself by taking in other municipalities or by merging with other districts. In this manner, should the voters so decide, the State of Wisconsin may eventually become one vast public power district.

Two constitutional amendments now pending are designed to facilitate the development of public power systems. The first, in compliance with the amendatory clause of the constitution, has already been adopted by two successive biennial sessions of the legislature, and it now goes to the voters for ratification. This amendment would remove the limit on the debt which a municipality may incur in the construction or operation of a power generating and distributing system. At present no incorporated community may have a bonded indebtedness totaling more than 5 per cent of the assessed value of the real property within the community. Such a limitation, of course, places a municipality at a disadvantage as compared with private companies, who may borrow freely and with few restrictions. The second amendment gives the State government full authority to go into the power business whenever it so desires, which will probably be when most of the State has gone over to the municipal-power-district plan. This amendment was passed for the first time at the current session; it must be resubmitted in 1933. If it is repassed then, it must be submitted to the electorate for approval in November, 1934.

In the meantime, however, there is to be no relaxation in the regulation of privately owned utilities. The appointment of Mr. Lilienthal and the regulation bill now before the legislature indicate that supervision of the utilities will be much stricter than heretofore. The pending legislation recognizes that absentee ownership is difficult to control, but it would outlaw absentee management by requiring that the directors of all public-utility corporations be residents of Wisconsin, and it would further require that "the directors of such public utilities shall not, directly or indirectly, delegate or in any manner, temporarily or permanently, relinquish or surrender their duty to manage and direct the stock, property, affairs, and business of such corporation." Absentee ownership is not neglected, however. In fact, the most important section of the proposed law is designed to reach public-utility holding companies, no matter how many may be piled one on top of the other, or other corporations or persons, which may be interested in one way or another in power companies operating in Wisconsin. These interests—the proposed law describes them as "affiliated interests"—may be based on stock ownership, interlocking directorates, managerial control, blood relationship of directors or managers, or upon any other connection through which a "substantial influence" over the Wisconsin companies might be exercised. All contracts and other arrangements between such "affiliated interests" and any Wisconsin company providing "for the furnishing of management, supervisory construction, engineering, accounting, legal, financial, or similar services" would under the law have to be approved by the Railroad Commission before becoming legally valid or effective. Finally, the Railroad Commission, or some other body that may be set up in its place, would be empowered to make changes in rates and other orders upon its own volition after due notice had been given and hearings held. In no other State is this done. The usual practice is to wait until the utility company applies for a change in rates, or, more rarely, until consumers protest against existing rates, before investigating the necessity for an adjustment. Under the La Follette-Lilienthal plan the utilities commission would keep a constant check on changes in conditions influencing power production and distribution costs.

Neither Wisconsin nor La Follette alone can solve the unemployment problem; they would not get far with a planned economy confined to that State so long as economic chaos prevails in the other forty-seven States; a rationalized and more equitable structure of taxation would probably fail to bring beneficial results so long as the larger industries and the wealthier individuals can find privileged protection elsewhere in the country; but the power question is essentially a local problem. It can be solved locally without consideration for conditions or circumstances elsewhere. The power trust cannot escape by running away; by doing that it leaves the field wide open to the La Follettes and other proponents of public ownership.

As yet the Governor has met little opposition from the power trust. This has in part been due to the lack of organization among the stalwarts, in part to the vigorous fight La Follette has been making against the power lobby. Two lobbyists are already under charges of having attempted to bribe a State senator, a fact which has virtually disrupted the lobby for the present session. Among the stalwarts and power people in Madison, however, it is said that the full forces of the power trust will be thrown into the Wisconsin battle two years from now when the State-ownership amendment comes again before the legislature and when the municipal-power-district plan goes to the voters for ratification. That battle is sure to be a fierce one, since success for the La Follette scheme in Wisconsin would put private power interests on the defensive in every other State in the country. Today, with the real battle still some months off, the stalwarts are disheartened, the progressives confident. Governor La Follette himself is hopeful, but is proceeding with great caution.

Political Prisoners, 1931

By JOHN NICHOLAS BEFFEL

THE term political prisoner has an anomalous ring in the United States in 1931. It savors of prosecutions in war time, when justice takes sides and speech is free only to those who speak in favor of the dominant hysteria. Yet at the present moment twenty-five persons are serving sentences in the prisons of this country for political offenses. This total does not include Mooney and Billings and the six industrial unionists who are serving sentences of from twenty-five to forty years in Centralia, Washington, although it is obvious to any fair-minded investigator that all of these cases are at base political. Finally, there should be added to the total of twenty-five one person now confined in an Oregon insane asylum and three out on bail in Pennsylvania pending appeal of their convictions for sedition.

Pennsylvania, California, and Oregon are the principal prosecutors of political heresy. In the first State eight persons have been convicted in five years under a sedition law which industrial barons have found to be a handy weapon against workers who speak too stridently against injustice. California, under its criminal-syndicalism statute of 1919, sent eight labor organizers to prison in 1930 for strike propaganda in the Imperial Valley. Oregon has lately dusted off its own criminal-syndicalism law and is applying it against men who do not think that the present economic situation is pretty to look at.

During the war and for six years thereafter the Industrial Workers of the World were the chief target for prosecutions under the syndicalism laws of various States. Now Communists are bearing the brunt of the attack, since they are the most active in their protests against industrial exploitation. They are the gadflies of the hour, and their aggressiveness has been intensified by onslaughts from the Fish Congressional Committee, the illegal alien raids staged by the federal immigration authorities, and police interference with unemployment demonstrations.

The Pennsylvania sedition act was passed in 1919 and amended in 1921. Under its provisions mere membership in the Communist Party may be a basis for prosecution. In December, 1929, Milan Resetar, Tom Zima, and Peter Muselin began serving five-year terms in the Allegheny County workhouse under that law. All three are naturalized American citizens hailing from Croatia. Muselin was overseas in the American army for two years. He and Zima have families and are property-owners in Woodlawn, fifteen miles from Pittsburgh, where Resetar also lived. Woodlawn is a typical steel town. The life of the community is dominated by the company. The twelve-hour day and the seven-day week had never been questioned.

The three men were arrested in 1926 following persistent distribution of radical literature in the steel plant of the Jones and Laughlin Company. After a trial which lasted five days they were convicted of membership in the Communist Party and of utterances designed to overthrow by force the government of Pennsylvania. In charging the jury Judge William McConnell used this curious language: "It is alleged . . . not that they spoke certain things . . . but that they had uttered certain things, and had been guilty of certain things the intention of which is the forcible overthrow of this government." The conviction, however, was based not on evidence of actual utterance, but on literature seized in the homes of the defendants during an illegal raid. Two years after the trial the verdict was upheld by a higher court, and the accused men went to prison.

Roy Peltz and Thomas Holmes were convicted of sedition in Media, Pennsylvania, in 1930 for distributing leaflets near the Viscose Mill in Marcus Hook, a suburb of Chester. The leaflets bore the words "Join the Communist Party of the United States of America." The verdict was based on membership in that party. Peltz was fined $5,000 and is serving from one to twenty years. Holmes, a minor, was sent to Huntington Reformatory for not less than eighteen months.

Tess Ryder and Anna Lynn, in Philadelphia, are facing prison terms of from ten to twenty years following the conviction for sedition. Two counts were brought against them—membership in the Young Communist League and handing leaflets to National Guard members urging them to attend an anti-war meeting and to "fight with all other workers against the preparations for a new imperialist war." William Lawrence was recently sentenced to from two to four years under the same law for a speech in Philadelphia during a Communist election campaign. Both cases will be appealed.

Six of the men convicted in the Imperial Valley in California are serving from three to forty-two years, the longest terms ever imposed in this republic solely for strike propaganda; two others received sentences of from two to twenty-eight years. Their crime was an attempt to organize melon workers against low wages and intolerable working conditions in January, 1930. Only four of the eight prisoners are Communists. Defense counsel argued that the Communist Party was legal, that the right of workers to organize was constitutional, and that any talk of violence had come from stool-pigeons hired by ranch-owners. One detective admitted on the stand having suggested that the workers use pop bottles in self-defense. No overt act by any defendant was shown. But all were found guilty. After the trial Commander Thaanum of the American Legion post in El Centro stated in a speech that the trial judge was a legionnaire, and that half the jurors were war veterans. "What chance," he asked, "did the Communists have?" Anti-war and unemployment demonstrations in recent months have resulted in sentences of six months or a year for ten Communists, who at last accounts were still in jail in Los Angeles and Lincoln Heights, California.

In Portland, Oregon, in March of this year, Ben Boloff, organizer of the Young Communist League, received a sentence of ten years in prison for violation of the State syndicalism law. The jury recommended leniency, but the defendant received the maximum penalty. At his trial "The State and Revolution" by Lenin and copies of the New York Daily Worker were offered as evidence that the Communists intended to establish a dictatorship of the proletariat by force.

Michael Kulikoff, grammar-school student in Portland, was arrested last November for teaching Communist songs to fellow-students. He was taken before a Circuit Court judge, with no counsel. Criminal-syndicalism and deportation proceedings were discussed but were abandoned. Finally, on a physician's testimony, the boy was committed for insanity, and is now confined in the State insane asylum. A writ of habeas corpus was denied.

To complete the record: Fred Bassett is serving a year in jail in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, on a charge of unlawful assembly and rioting in connection with a Communist unemployment demonstration on March 6, 1930.

In the Driftway

PROFESSOR IVAR TENGBOM, Director in Chief of the Royal Board of Public Works in Sweden, likes our skyscrapers—with several reservations. He thinks there are too many of them; he thinks each should have been surrounded by ample green space; he thinks that since it is now too late to achieve that happy condition, the height of buildings should be limited in order to prevent any future increase of the horror known as congestion. It is not often that a person of prominence voices the Drifter's own ideas so exactly, so the Drifter may perhaps be forgiven for feeling unusual enthusiasm for Professor Tengbom's excellent remarks. However, perhaps because the Drifter, unlike Professor Tengbom, has actually suffered from, as well as observed, skyscrapers, he hesitates to agree that it is necessary to let sleeping dogs lie and too many skyscrapers stand forever. He feels that something can be done even yet.

* * * * *

HE is ready to admit, however, that the outlook is pretty discouraging. It is true, as someone was good enough to point out, that the very impermanence of New York skyscrapers—has one ever reached the age of twenty?—makes it at least possible to bring about a less congested city. But that fact can only abet and not provide a solution. The plans for Radio City make it clear, moreover, that no private builder, even one with sufficient money, will ever defy the rule that the price of land makes anything less than a skyscraper financially impossible. It is remotely possible that if skyscrapers continue to pile up unrented office space, the value of real estate, since potential income would be reduced, might fall a few stories, but that is so remote that the Drifter prefers another solution almost as remote but not quite—namely, some form of public control. He admits at the start that the forces that would array themselves against anything of the sort would be discouragingly formidable, particularly in view of the fact that the public, while it complains about congestion, still accepts it as a necessary evil.

* * * * *

HERE, of course, is the real heart of the difficulty. As long as the people who work in the city offer no resistance to the greed which makes a profit out of their discomfort, nothing will be done to alleviate it. When will the rebellion come? Until it does, the Drifter clings desperately to his dream of a beautiful city. Ideally no building would be more than ten stories high—except one. In the center of the island, surrounded by at least four acres of grass and garden, would be set one magnificent skyscraper—the Empire State building would do.

Don't Flatter Mr. Coolidge

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: As a rule I enjoy Paul Y. Anderson's articles. He makes one statement, however, in his article in the issue of March 25 that to me seems not quite fair. He speaks of the "Great Administrator" having "surrounded himself with a pack of adventurers and political hacks whom Coolidge would not have tolerated."

President Harding of "normalcy" fame, as I recall, invited Mr. Coolidge to sit in at Cabinet meetings, thus affording him opportunity to become well acquainted not only with the personnel but with the methods of procedure of the President's official family. Yet, on inheriting the Presidency, Mr. Coolidge retained that "pack" until public opinion forced action; and when at last Attorney General Daugherty got out, Mr. Coolidge expressed sympathy and regret. Referring to the present "pack" as one "Coolidge would not have tolerated" to me seems hardly justified.

If at any time since Grant was President we have been in the hands of a "pack" demonstrating the "moral and intellectual bankruptcy of the men who now control the politics, industry, and finance of the country" more fully than when Mr. Coolidge was President, my memory fails to recall it.

Laymen and Museums

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: In your issue of February 11 you published an article by Mr. Paul Rosenfeld called Bread Lines and a Museum. It dealt with the Museum of Modern Art established last year in the Heckscher building. While I disagreed with Mr. Rosenfeld's views I waited until now for someone more competent than myself to register a protest to his scathing criticism of the museum.

The Museum of Modern Art has been a source of continuous enjoyment for me and many friends of mine. Busy people that we are, we do not miss any of its exhibitions. Mr. Rosenfeld wants busy people and even the unemployed to get into contact with art. Who is more generous in providing this opportunity than the management of the Museum of Modern Art? The sums it expends on assembling its exhibitions must be considerable; it makes accessible to us works of art which we could see only at great expense otherwise. Take the recent showing of German paintings for example; some of them were actually sent here from Europe. The fact that the museum is open on Sundays and in the evening adds immensely to its usefulness to the general public.

Mr. Rosenfeld feels that the quality of the paintings shown at the museum is inferior. This seems a very unjust generalization. Paintings by practically all the great masters of modern times have been shown at its exhibitions, and the selections offered, while probably not complete, were certainly reasonably comprehensive and illustrated different periods in the artists' development. Not only the recognized masters but also the works of young painters have been shown extensively at the museum. In judging what is "living" and what is "dead" in this field it is naturally difficult to find any two critics who agree; therefore we need not be amazed that Mr. Rosenfeld and the museum do not agree on it.

Furthermore, the succession of exhibits is criticized by Mr. Rosenfeld. He challenges the directors of the museum to show the development of modern art systematically. But even if such a scheme could be carried out in a museum that has as yet no permanent collection, would it not be most unsatisfactory for the public? We might get down to contemporary art in anywhere from one to five years, depending on how thoroughly its development should be presented.

Judging from my own circle of friends (which includes a few artists), the museum has helped immensely to stimulate interest in modern art; and I believe this to be an achievement that should not be belittled.

Rugged, if Not Ragged, Individualism

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Will you ever desist from your praise and advocacy of the Russian Five-Year Plan? I can think of nothing more un-American than such an enterprise. Imagine the tedium of life in this blessed land of rugged individualism if we were to have our gloriously unpredictable future obscured and hedged about by some such fantastic formula. Thank God and the Republican Party that our future is as free and untrammeled as a citizen of Arkansas. No Five-Year Plan, or Five-Month Plan; not even a Day-After-Tomorrow Plan. How dull it would be to have the faintest inkling of the pig-iron production or the car loadings or the building permits of 1936! What sport would the ticker afford if some hypothetical Economic Council had decreed the output of General Motors or United States Steel for that year? What scintilla of interest would remain in a Congress that had nothing more to do than legislate for the efficient working of a carefully planned system of economical and equitable production and distribution?

I am thankful to the great practical economist and all his saints and martyrs that I still live in a land where the economic wind bloweth where it listeth, where a man can starve in sturdy independence, and where a few dollars cast upon the watered stocks of the market may, by some wild gyration of the uncontrolled forces of American industrialism, return a thousandfold.

Help Win Strikes

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Before the Senate Committee on Unemployment Mr. Brandt A. Scott of the West Virginia Miners Federation gave testimony concerning human misery and serfdom which shames America in the eyes of the world. I have in my possession the wage slips of a miner showing how at the end of two weeks of intermittent work for a coal company, paid mostly in "scrip" (that is, tokens good only in company stores), he owed the company more money than when he began. I have seen miners living in houses not as well built as an ordinary cow shed, and have talked with a man dispossessed at night from his shanty, all his chickens let loose and his children's clothes stolen by the dispossessing officers.

The misery is partly the consequence of a sick industry, partly the fault of an incompetent and often cruel industrial autocracy. In both cases it can be helped by social legislation, unemployment insurance, and a strong union. Numerous small, short, but heroic strikes are helping to rebuild a union no longer under John L. Lewis's stifling control.

The need of relief is great. The Red Cross is doing little or nothing—nothing in the case of strikers against intolerable conditions. The Emergency Committee for Strikers' Relief, 112 East Nineteenth Street, New York City, of which I am chairman, is transmitting relief funds which I can testify are competently and fairly administered by the miners' own committee. No need in America is greater.

Three Cheers for Emory

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The suggestion that intercollegiate contests be abolished altogether which occurred in your editorial Sport for Sport's Sake in the issue of February 18 certainly merits serious consideration. But it is, perhaps, a significant comment on the reason why more institutions have not adopted your simple but effective plan that you can say, as you do, that to the best of your knowledge "no college or university president has thought of this remedy." Emory University, deprived of the advertising that accompanies intercollegiate athletics, has apparently escaped your attention.

Since 1889, when intercollegiate athletics were discontinued at Emory, the athletic program has been confined to intramural contests, except in the minor sports of tennis, golf, and track. There are no imposing stadia on the campus to dwarf the libraries. There are no waves of neurotic excitement to upset the fall term. The coaching is done by six men of the graduate or professional schools under the supervision of a physical director. Instead of concentrating the attention of the coaching staff upon a handful of carefully picked—and more carefully paid—stars, and limiting the supply of athletic equipment to their needs, the administration encourages all students to participate in the games. Beginning this year every able-bodied student is required to take part in at least one sport.

Dr. H. W. Cox, president of the university, defends its policy by saying: "The individual student is our goal instead of the game. Why can't we have a school where people can send students for study? . . . Our whole atmosphere here is one of scholastic endeavor. It is strikingly different from that of a school where students have to be loyal to the team. . . . Our life as a university does not depend on one football game."

Indian Tribal Arts

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Among your readers are many who are interested in the welfare of the American Indian and in the preservation of his arts. Few Americans know that Indian artists of great talent, now living in the United States, are producing works of real beauty and excellent craftsmanship. Their poetry, paintings, textiles, and sculpture deserve wider appreciation among white Americans. At present there is in Europe more recognition of their extraordinary contribution to the pure and applied arts than in this country.

The Exposition of Indian Tribal Arts now being organized will be the first comprehensive and truly representative exhibition of the work of contemporary Indian artists. This exposition will include fine specimens from private and museum collections and modern work of outstanding excellence. It will open at the Grand Central Art Galleries of New York in December, 1931. After a month's showing there it will be exhibited in the leading cities in this country and, it is hoped, in Europe.

The national office of the Exposition of Indian Tribal Arts, Inc., is at 578 Madison Avenue, New York. The project has been indorsed by the American Federation of Arts, the College Art Association, the American Anthropological Association, and by museums of art throughout the country.

A SUMMER RETREAT FOR THE CHILDREN . . . AND THE GROWN-UPS, TOO!

Up at Westport, Conn., you will find the Stonybrook Colony. It is composed of a group of intelligent, modern families.

Stonybrook is a haven for children as well as for parents. There are 70 acres of lovely woodland over which the children may roam and play guided by an experienced counsellor. For parents there is a private lake, tennis and handball courts; golf and salt water bathing nearby. Convenient commuting for hard-working fathers.

Charming studio dwellings in wooded nooks and on hilltops. Stone fireplaces, sleeping porches, practical kitchens, tasteful furnishings, electricity, modern plumbing and food deliveries.

Here you may rent for a modest sum or buy and own on a financially painless basis.

May we drive you up soon some sunny day?

Spring Gardening

By HAL SAUNDERS WHITE

The prairie grows around him as he digs
Dwarfing the white farmhouse; the bending man.
From time to time he straightens to pause and look
Across the tidal earth's immensity.
Earth is a still wheel flattening between the rims
Of a blue-steel horizon; bending below
To depths beyond the curving ends of sky.
A flying arc holds up infinity—
The peopled deeps where spin the shoaling worlds
Sands upon drifted sands . . .
    O uncontrollable serenity,
    Intensity too vast for any motion
    Burn blue and endless under your dome of air.
    And man is motionless erect or bending,
    Swinging his tiny weapon, seaming the soil.

The Aphoristic Art

Afterthoughts. By Logan Pearsall Smith. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $1.35.

THE first tendency of most readers who glance through Mr. Smith's book of "afterthoughts" will be to underestimate them. There are at least two reasons for this. These brief sentences are printed separately, surrounded by ample blank space, sometimes only one or two on a page. Like all sayings thus separated they seem ostentatious. If they appeared casually in the solid text of an essay we should attach a higher value to them; we should applaud all the successes and perhaps never notice the failures at all, for we never recognize a failure unless we have reason to suspect an attempt. But a sentence in typographical isolation seems to say in effect: "Look at me; I'm so good that I can stand alone; I'm either devilish clever or very profound." The reader resents such self-assurance, and retaliates by putting sentences with these pretensions under a special obligation to make good. For sentences in paragraphs and sentences in isolation, in short, there is the same difference in our standards and demands as concertgoers make between the violinists who are part of a symphony orchestra (who, though of modest talents, may share in the applause for the whole orchestra provided they have merely not been out of tune) and a violinist who offers a solo.

The second reason why most readers may underestimate Mr. Smith's "afterthoughts" is that they are likely to start with a false preconception of what it is they are being offered. They are getting aphorisms, and they are probably looking for paradoxes. Now the paradox is usually little more than an aphorism or a proverb that has been stood on its head. This reversal may sometimes call attention to some more subtle aspect of the truth, like Mr. Chesterton's "Whatever is worth doing at all is worth doing badly"; but paradoxes—as Mr. Smith pointed out in his delightful introduction to his fine anthology "A Treasury of English Aphorisms," published three years ago —paradoxes, however much they may amuse us at the moment, have seldom weight enough to give them enduring value. "Wise sayings, to ring true, must be made of sterling metal, must embody a feeling more profound than the mere desire to flout general opinion and reverse its judgments; we soon tire of the sparkle, the glitter, the polished brass of these false coins of thought."

But this means that to be a master of aphorism is a more perilous as well as a higher ambition than to be a master of paradox. For while the aphorist will sometimes attempt to express in terse form some truth about human nature seldom or only vaguely glimpsed (though immediately recognized, upon its declaration, to be true), he will still be occupied largely with the task of trying to say in a more striking form what "oft was thought but ne'er so well expressed." Unless he is very careful, therefore, his truths will turn into platitudes. It is because Mr. Smith's own aphorisms skate at times so dangerously close to truisms that readers may underestimate his achievement; for most of us today, fed so often on the flashy epigrams and paradoxes of the Arlens, Chestertons, and Guedallas, are likely to find true aphorisms insipid, much as a restaurant eater, accustomed to treating everything to a blizzard of salt, ceases to find any flavor in food in a natural state.

And Mr. Smith's "afterthoughts," when successful, are true aphorisms. Some of them even stand very well the severe test that Hazlitt once proposed—that a good aphorism should contain the essence or groundwork of a separate essay. For example:

> The notion of making money by popular work, and then retiring to do good work on the proceeds, is the most familiar of the devil's traps for artists.
> All our affirmations are mere matters of chronology; and even our bad taste is nothing more than the bad taste of the age we live in.
> The test of a vocation is the love of the drudgery it involves.
> People say that life is the thing, but I prefer reading.

The aphoristic form seems peculiarly adapted to express cynicism and disenchantment; as Mr. Smith himself has finely said, aphorisms are the hornets and wasps, and not the butterflies of reflection. Many of his own fall short by this standard; they lack sting. Occasionally, however, he achieves a comment quite in the vein of that Napoleon of the aphorism, La Rochefoucauld:

> That we should practice what we preach is generally admitted; but anyone who preaches what he and his hearers practice must incur the gravest moral disapprobation.
> If we disregard what the world says of someone, we shall almost certainly live to repent it.

I have hinted that all of Mr. Smith's aphorisms are not successful. Even his best are doubtless not gems of the first water. But if he has produced no pearls or rubies, he has fashioned a few semi-precious stones not to be despised. Nowhere is it more necessary than here to be grateful to a writer for his successes and not condemn him for his failures. Perhaps it is harder today to write a good aphorism than a good sonnet. The field of general truths about human nature is not unlimited. La Rochefoucauld alone must have left less territory for his successors to explore than Petrarch, Spenser, and Milton together. The aphorism, moreover, is centuries older than the sonnet; it was old in the days of Solomon and Confucius, and in the years of the Egyptians. No field has been plowed more thoroughly, in so many directions, and the competition is still tremendous. A thousand men a day, in writing and in conversation, are trying to coin good aphorisms to every one who is trying to write a lyric. Ever since the prophet exclaimed, "All is vanity and vexation of spirit," we have all itched to sum up the universe in seven or eight well-chosen words. If Mr. Smith has added a few permanent grains to the world's store of gnomic wisdom, he is indeed a writer to be envied. HENRY HAZLITT

Figures of the Nineties

Men and Memories. By Sir William Rothenstein. Coward-McCann. $5.

UPON reading Sir William Rothenstein's first volume of his memoirs it is difficult to think of anything that he has done in terms of failure. Surely here if anywhere is the record of a successful life that sprang from the very heart of William Butler Yeats's "tragic generation."

The young man who came from the north of England to Paris to study portrait painting in Julian's studios was an extraordinary young man indeed. Those who knew Rothenstein, and there were many, must have regarded him with particular affection, for he was deferential, urbane, and worldly, with a gift for reciting choice bits of attractive gossip that never quite crossed the border line of malice or indiscretion. He was the Boswell of the Yellow Book, the Savoy, and the Saturday Review, a pleasant incidental figure in a broad canvas of celebrities.

We see clearly enough that they were not giants in those days, but brilliant young men of unusual talent in whom the social graces of the amateur were combined with faultless and professional craftsmanship. As Rothenstein presents them, they were all young, bright, radiating metallic splendor. First of all there was Max Beerbohm. Even now it is impossible to think of Max as the Sage of Rapallo; he is the graceful young fellow with the slender waistline that Rothenstein saw on his visit to Oxford. Ernest Dowson does not accept Rothenstein's invitation to sleep in the guest-room, but selects the polished floor under the grand piano in the parlor. Lionel Johnson is as drunk as Dowson, but never mind, he is correctly dressed, erect, walks home to his neat chambers in a modestly fashionable quarter of London. Oscar Wilde reminds Frank Harris that he, Harris, has been invited to dine in every house in London once, and we almost forget that Oscar's figure was that of an overgrown child who has eaten too much candy. Rothenstein makes every attempt to justify the conduct of those who may be looked upon as his enemies, and gives them all, even men well past middle age, something of the coloring of youth.

There were few who did not respond to Rothenstein's talents for friendship. We gather that Walter Pater, surrounded by a company of athletic young undergraduates, was one, and John Sargent another. Pater's vanity was injured by Rothenstein's lithograph, and Sargent, like Henry James, seemed to be ill at ease with everyone. Even at best, the Americans were a troublesome lot, particularly Whistler. Despite Rothenstein's obvious admiration for Whistler's work, Whistler's violent appetite for hero-worship of himself was never gratified by the young man's praise. Perhaps Rothenstein's quarrel with Whistler may be traced to the fact that he saw Whistler (a rare occasion) in a moment of self-depreciation. His story of how Whistler, tormented by doubt of his own genius, reexamined his canvases inch by inch by the light of a candle is a memorable portrait and one that Whistler would never have approved.

Rothenstein's friendships in Paris, though somewhat limited by his interest in the English-American colony, extended far enough to include an intimate relationship with Verlaine. He was responsible for bringing Verlaine to England for a brief series of lectures. He realized at once, and not without a sense of pathos, that given assurances of continued hospitality Verlaine would never have left English soil. Returning Verlaine to Paris—by actually bundling him off—was a sterling test of Rothenstein's ability to handle a difficult situation with the tact for which he was famous. It is evident that he remained even to the end of Verlaine's life, wrecked as it was by poverty and disease, one of the few to whom the poet could turn for a sympathetic hearing.

Rothenstein's present volume closes, appropriately enough, with the end of the nineteenth century. In the last few chapters another generation slowly emerges from the background. We are told that Watts-Dunton refused Epstein's offer to make Swinburne's death mask. Augustus John becomes the center of interest, a young man whose attraction for young ladies seemed indestructible. John takes charge of Rothenstein's London house in his host's absence, and we find him five nights out of seven climbing in first-floor windows because it is impossible for him to remember that the front door has a key. Young Masefield appears worshiping Joseph Conrad, who, in dismay, cannot return the compliment. We are left waiting for more, and we have every reason to assume that Rothenstein's intelligence and charm will not desert him as he enters middle age and the first two decades of the present century in his next book. The Unwise Thrush

Fatal Interview. By Edna St. Vincent Millay. Harper and Brothers. $2.

WHATEVER may be said now concerning Miss Millay's poetry will have little or no effect upon her position in American literature. Nor will the oblique attack of certain critics who prefer the intellectual and less personal poetry injure her. Such critics may not like personal lyrics, but this type of poetry from a true poet remains authentic. And Miss Millay's best lyrics will endure when the critics are very dead; in her own domain she is the artist. Miss Millay is preeminently the poet of the senses, the poet living in the intensity of the moment and capable of creating that intensity in the poetic image. She is able to project her own ego directly into its artistic complement: when the personal emotion is intense enough, the fusion of image and emotion in words is perfectly accomplished. There are times, of course, when Miss Millay is flippantly attitudinizing in verse, and these are sorry times; but when, as a result of the immediate, personal, and therefore somewhat limited play of her senses over the materials of life, Miss Millay writes poetry, she writes such lyrics as will live. The only cause for regret is that Miss Millay's sensitivity has not expanded with the expansion of the world about her; it assimilates nothing that is not, has not always been, very personal to herself.

Miss Millay has grown older, but she has made no adaptation to her own maturity, has accepted no wisdom. She cannot change herself from the lover of life at its full tide; anything else is repugnant to her. Therefore her dilemma. In "The Buck in the Snow" Miss Millay confesses her own inability to accept change; she realizes that her senses have betrayed her, that neither pain nor joy continues to have its earlier vitality. The rhythm of her poems in "The Buck in the Snow," the whole tone of them, is lowered in direct ratio to her loss of personal intensity and conviction. "The Buck in the Snow" is a sad book and a terribly honest book. Within its pages only one solution to the poet's dilemma is hinted at: the irony of such fine sonnets as the one beginning "Country of hunchbacks" suggests that the love of life, always Miss Millay's theme, might have its passionate darker side, the irony of life.

But it is not toward any philosophy or mood of irony that Miss Millay moves in her latest book, "Fatal Interview"; here she retraces her own earlier work and would again be known as the writer of love sonnets. Her earlier manner, somewhat more elaborately turned, is here; but her earlier mood is not recaptured. "Fatal Interview" is, therefore, not an honest book, it springs from no inner compulsion. One finishes it convinced that Miss Millay has faked her emotions—the one utterly destructive crime against her art. We cannot believe a beautiful word of these sonnets.

Let me be specific about one point: I am not concerned here with the autobiographical truth or lack of truth in "Fatal Interview"—that has nothing to do with the artistic sincerity of the sonnets themselves. There may or may not have been love—it does not matter. What does matter is that the emotional core of this sequence of sonnets is unreal—and in Miss Millay's case the emotional core is, with peculiar force, the personality translated into the artistic form of poetry. The stated emotional core is humility, and this humility is unbelievable. Not that Miss Millay's earlier arrogance and passion in the treatment of love would prevent her, personally, from humility; but that the humility written about has no intensity; we cannot feel it to be true. It is clothed in every conceivable literary image—Greek, Shakespearean, and Millayian—but it lacks reality. Despite Miss Millay's every trick—beauty of language, turn of phrase, knowledge of the beautiful image and of rhythm—this sonnet sequence is a shell wherein nothing lives.

And why? How can we know whether poetry is sincere or insincere, save intuitively? I have read the late sonnets alongside the early: most of the early sonnets—not all—are sincere, most of the late—not quite all—are manufactured. Within so conventionalized a technique as the sonnet sincerity is particularly difficult to analyze. And yet we do recognize it when it is there. Why, otherwise, would we be in agreement concerning the sincere sonnets among the many merely well-turned of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries?

Since the fusion of emotion or idea with the image is not solely the result of excellent craftsmanship, Miss Millay has in these later sonnets employed her technique to no avail. Lack of this fusion is indicated by rhythm, by a disparateness between the elaboration, the detailed working out of the image, and the value of the emotion which the image carries. One might point out that, save for the metaphysical school and its amazing facility in keeping decoration and idea in adherence, poets seldom find themselves able to refine upon an image without some loss of intensity. The process seems to be this: the poet recalls or notices certain details of life; a few of these details take on emotional value (they might do this for any man); still fewer become symbolic of larger meanings than themselves and take shape in the poet's mind as images. Usually only one or two aspects of an image are significant emotionally and symbolically; therefore in poetry only these aspects are emphasized, other aspects are either emotionally or deliberately ignored. In her earlier sonnets Miss Millay, concerned with her emotion, used only such aspects of the image, whatever it might be, as pointed the emotion. In these later sonnets she begins with an image and works it out completely. The result is pretty but unconvincing. Now and then, to be sure, she steps free of her literary reminiscences—including her own earlier poems—and in such an image as this one of the island women—certainly from personal memory—speaks again sincerely and intensely:

> There in the autumn when the men go forth,
> With slapping skirts the island women stand
> In gardens stripped and scattered, peering north,
> With dahlia tubers dripping from the hand:
> The wind of their endurance, driving south,
> Flattened your words against your speaking mouth.

But very seldom in this last book do we get that emotional rightness which is absolutely necessary to fine lyric writing. This, and this alone, makes the fine phrase, the exceptional image significant. This vehemence was there in these lines from an earlier sonnet:

> Dust in an urn long since, dispersed and dead
> Is great Apollo; and the happier he;
> Since who amongst you all would lift a head
> At a god's radiance on the mean door-tree,
> Saving to run and hide your dates and bread,
> And cluck your children in about your knee?

It may be there again when Miss Millay turns from reminiscence of an earlier self to feeling which absorbs her now.

EDA LOU WALTON

A Wilson Interpreter

Wilson the Unknown. An Explanation of an Enigma of History. By Wells Wells. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

WELLS WELLS, we are told, is the pseudonym of a New York corporation lawyer who has been a lifelong Republican notwithstanding that he voted for Wilson in 1912, and whose studies of Wilsonian politics have "consumed almost twenty years." A book produced under such circumstances ought, one would think, to be important, but such light as the author in this instance throws upon Wilson's career is overshadowed by a theory so startling as to give one pause. Wilson, we are asked to believe, is not an enigma at all, but an extraordinary personality who steered a circuitous course in strict accordance with a grand design. What Wilson wanted was to be President not only in 1916 but also, and more particularly, in 1920 and perhaps longer, not in order that he might become a mere personal dictator, but to give the United States a "new frontier" as far south of the Rio Grande as it could conveniently be located, and to make the United States, molded and controlled by the unique Wilsonian mind, the dominant influence throughout the world. As Wilson would be President all the while, what the grand project amounted to was that Wilson himself would be the world's autocrat, of course for the world's supreme good.

It is this, we are assured, that explains the stiff course with Mexico, since only with success there could Wilson hope for reelection in 1916. Wells Wells actually pictures Wilson contemplating a Mexico and Central America overrun by "several million Americans" busily exploiting the country ("a benevolent protectorate" is the chosen phrase) and demanding American goods, with perhaps half a million military police to keep things in order, and "all in the name of civilization, religion, and humanity." It was, he thinks, a "perfect strategy" then, and "it is today. Economic urge will sometime unite with altruism to spur us in that direction."

When the World War suddenly put the Mexican scheme in second place, Wilson turned his attention to fooling the American people into believing that he meant to remain neutral when in fact he intended to go in, and to championing the League of Nations as the best device for insuring Wilsonian world rule. The supreme moment, one gathers, of this continuing strategy came in 1918, when Wilson appealed to the country for support in the Congressional elections knowing pretty well that his party would be rebuked, but planning to use defeat to rally the people to him and enable him to absorb Mexico on the one hand and assert world autocracy on the other. The dream was dissipated only when Wilson's health broke down. The key to it all is audacity, "sheer, shining, superb spirit." Wilson was "eternally conscious of the audacity of his mind. He was daringly different! He was the Amazing American Adventurer!" The author can hardly take it ill if critics see in his bizarre book something of the same quality.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Back to Superstition?

Lo! By Charles Fort. Claude Kendall. $2.50.

AT first glance one is tempted to regard this book as a clever hoax in which Mr. Fort is having a good time with orthodox science without believing anything he himself puts forward. But a closer examination of the book, together with a reference to Mr. Fort's previous works, shows that we have to do here with somebody who is taking himself quite seriously—and who is taken even more seriously by a coterie of enthusiastic followers. In other words, Mr. Fort must be classed either as a genius or as a crank. Now a prosaic examination of his thesis will certainly not sustain the view that Mr. Fort's ideas will revolutionize our scientific conceptions about the universe; on the contrary, it will show how Mr. Fort is simply offering a new version of prescientific superstitions.

Mr. Fort has specialized for some twenty years in compiling records of unusual and incredible occurrences. The reports of these occurrences are taken partly from the daily press, partly from scientific periodicals. They vary widely in their authenticity. Some are doubtless hoaxes and hallucinations (as Mr. Fort disingenuously admits); others pertain to genuine occurrences in which a knowledge of the circumstances is incomplete and hence a scientific explanation necessarily conjectural; still others perhaps contain the secret of new relationships as yet uncharted in the scientific scheme. Mr. Fort cites them all without discrimination in order to bring out that science is prejudiced in its approach since it always tries to explain such reports or occurrences by invoking only known principles.

One class of facts which Mr. Fort particularly delights to cite is showers of frogs and fishes. The ordinary prosaic scientists would explain such showers by the operation of whirlwinds, but Mr. Fort thinks this is too timid an explanation. For him these frogs and fishes come from the firmament on high. Then there are the reputed coincidences between earthquakes, falls of meteors, and lights in the sky. Scientists, for lack of any known and verifiable connection, must perforce talk of coincidences. But that is too easy. One may as well, says Mr. Fort, talk of coincidence when children are born after marriage. Finally, there is the garden variety of facts that fill the psychical-research journals—transportation of objects without visible agency, vanishings and reappearances of persons, and the like.

On the basis of such facts Mr. Fort arrives at a blanket conclusion that the universe is an organism, and that all the unbelievable facts are to be explained by "functional teleportation." Functional teleportation is the principle by which the organism suddenly redistributes bodies according to the needs of the whole. Let Mr. Fort speak for himself:

> In every organism there are, in its governance as a whole, mysterious transportations of substances and forces, sometimes in definite circulatory paths, and sometimes specially, for special needs. In the organic view, Teleportation is a distributive force that is acting to maintain the balances of a whole; with the seeming wastefulness sometimes, and niggardliness sometimes, of other forces; providing, or sometimes providing, new islands with vegetation, and new ponds with fishes: Edens with Adams, and Adams with Eves; always dwindling when other mechanisms became established, but surviving sporadically.

In order to make room for this higher wisdom, Mr. Fort finds it necessary to revise astronomy. The world, in the first place, is not so large as the astronomers tell us. In fact, a good expedition could get to the roof or ceiling of the world without great effort. The earth is more or less motionless in the center, and the stars in heaven form a rotating, shell-like vault, exactly as our common-sense impressions tell us. The stars are not countless, nor are they at unbelievable distances from us. In most cases what are taken as stars are just the reflections of light upon the lands and lakes of the upper shell. When earthquakes occur, these lights in the sky are warnings of impending changes in the higher metabolism of the world organism—for in the organic view there are always warnings, portents, and revelations of cosmic purposes.

Such in bare outline is Mr. Fort's doctrine. As a revolutionary coup d'etat upon science it falls completely flat because it seeks to restore the prescientific method of explaining phenomena through the operation of cosmic purposes and occult qualities. Mr. Fort pretends that there is a good deal of the philosophy of Spinoza in his doctrine, but if he had read the author of the "Ethics" a little more carefully he would have found an explicit condemnation of everything that he stands for. "The truth," wrote Spinoza, summing up the spirit of the new science, "would have remained hidden from the human kind for all eternity had not mathematics, which deals not with final causes, but with the essences and properties of figures, shown to man a new standard." It is characteristic of the mathematical form of truth and its physical corollary, the mechanical principle of explanation, that they make possible a science which is a progressive intellectual analysis of phenomena. On the biological basis, which Mr. Fort would restore, all that we have is a harmony of the whole, which turns out to be quite verbal in the present and which offers no hope of biting deeper into phenomena in the future.

One good purpose that Mr. Fort's book may serve—if it is read properly—is to bring out the deliberate, voluntary character of scientific method, as against the conventional idea that science merely transcribes naked experience. Most books on scientific method defeat their own purpose because they begin by seeing the universe in terms of the simplified, mechanical picture which it is precisely the function of science to construct. As a result, scientific method becomes an obvious, tautological affair, and the pupil gets the feeling, not that Galileo was a great man, but that the people before Galileo were diabolically blind because they could not see the obvious. By reading Mr. Fort's book one gets a vivid sense of what scientific method deliberately has to reject—the biological categories which are so spontaneous to the human mind and yet so misleading, the multitude of individual facts which strike the imagination and impede clear analysis. Mr. Fort's book really ought to be adopted in all the colleges as a textbook of "don't's" in scientific method.

BENJAMIN GINZBURG

A New Faust Translation

Faust. By Johann Wolfgang von Goethe. Translated by Alice Raphael. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.50.

THE publication of a new translation of Goethe's "Faust," done in verse, is a real literary event. It means years of scholarly and poetical endeavor, first, to decide after listening to conflicting arguments what each word means and connotes, and then to find the best English equivalents, cast in approximately the same metrical mold and suggesting the same or a corresponding cultural picture. The new version of the First Part by Alice Raphael was announced recently by a brochure entitled "A Note on Faust Translations," by Carl F. Schreiber of Yale University. The "Note," and Mark Van Doren's Introduction, give welcome information on how this work came to have its present form. Large credit for scholarly advice and painstaking criticism is given to that rare Goethe enthusiast and scholar, the late William A. Speck, the founder of the priceless Goethe collection in the Yale library. A labor of love and devotion, fifteen times revised under such supervision, could hardly fail to achieve distinction.

This translation seeks to turn Goethe's masterpiece into the poetic English of today, avoiding archaic and out-of-the-way words and constructions, and employing no metrical patterns that would strike the present generation of readers as distinctly exotic. As it is neither humanly nor divinely possible, as a general rule, to translate rhyme-words into rhyme-words, it shows good judgment not to let rhymes stick out like sore thumbs. Since the Anglo-Saxon element of the English language, the idiom of warm and deep feeling, is so poor in feminine rhymes, very few of these are employed by the translator. But they are not missed by the reader. Further, it was wise not to employ such pungent rhymes as Goethe often uses. It is always better to recreate the form with slightly diminished technical brilliancy than to distort the sense and put the chief stress upon words of minor importance in the original.

The general rhyme scheme is followed quite closely, with occasional variation from the order Goethe employed, but taking no more liberty in this respect than Goethe exercised. The language itself is clear and simple, in keeping with Goethe's practice, whose poetry is singularly free from bombast.

This sumptuously printed "Faust" deserves warm commendation. It appears as a fitting overture to the celebration next year throughout the world of the centenary of Goethe's death.

WILLIAM A. COOPER

Cosima's First Husband

Letters of Hans von Bülow. Edited, with an Introduction, by Richard Count du Moulin Eckart. Translated by Hannah Waller. Alfred A. Knopf. $7.50.

THIS collection, correctly titled "Neue Briefe" in the original, is distinct from the seven volumes of letters which Bülow's widow published many years ago. The greater part of this fresh material had been in the possession of Bülow's eldest daughter, Frau Daniela Thode, in Italy. During the war the Italian government seized the Villa Cargnacco and placed it in the custody of Gabriele d'Annunzio. In 1921, with Daniela's sanction, Count Eckart undertook a diplomatic mission to d'Annunzio and obtained permission to take whatever letters he wished. Those presented here were written to Daniela, Richard Wagner, Cosima, Karl Klindworth, the pianist, Karl Bechstein, the pianoforte manufacturer, and Bülow's stepmother, Louise von Bülow.

Of Bülow's great interpretative artistry as pianist and conductor nothing remains outside the memories of those who heard him. To his bitter disappointment he was unable to compose music of lasting moment, but he could and did write letters which rank among the best from the pen of any musician. Spontaneous, witty, humorous, and frank, they reflect his temperament and character clearly. Musical subjects naturally occupy the foreground, but his frequent references to other matters reveal his keen judgments in politics, philosophy, painting, architecture, and literature.

In literary flair he surpassed many professional critics of his day. He found Baudelaire "most refreshing" in 1861, and he zealously elected Stendhal as "one of my favorite literary carnations." One finds him savoring the subtleties of Paul Bourget's "Essais de psychologie contemporaine," and the catholicity of his preferences encircled Goethe, Herder, Hugo, Calderon, Cervantes, Shakespeare, Gobineau, Hawthorne, and Alfieri. A polyglot in his reading, he wrote as fluently in French and Italian as in his native language.

JUST 40 YEARS AGO

In May, 1891, Pope Leo XIII issued his epochal Encyclical Letter to the Cardinals, Archbishops and Bishops of the Catholic world. It dealt with the social and economic problems of that time—strangely similar to those that now distract the world, such as (to quote):

*"the CONDITION OF LABOR; the enormous fortunes of individuals, and the poverty of the masses, * * * the general moral deterioration; the momentous seriousness" of it all.*

In a spirit of unqualified esteem for the Pope's elevated personal character, and profound respect for his high office, Henry George, great American philosopher and economist, wrote a now famous ANALYSIS of the Papal Encyclical, pointing to the insufficiency of the remedies proposed, and to the causes and cure of the world's social and economic troubles. These historic documents—the Encyclical of Pope Leo, and the Analysis of Henry George, entitled "THE CONDITION OF LABOR," each fitting today's conditions, are now reprinted VERBATIM—40 years after, in a 334-page volume, containing two other books by Henry George explaining his philosophy.

The most delightful letters are those to Daniela, in which the fondly admonitory tone of the early ones, adapted to her childhood state, is gradually replaced by an allusiveness indicative of their close mental sympathy. On the other hand, the most formal and punctilious (and at the same time the most moving under their dignity) are those to Cosima after their separation—pages that disclose the true spiritual stature of the man. As Count Eckart says, "a man who can write such letters is indeed truly great of soul."

Chronologically, the letters cover a period of thirty-eight years—from 1854, when Bülow was twenty-four, to 1892, two years before his death. To one who reads them discerningly they offer material for a well-rounded and just estimate of the man.

The translation is so deft and supple that one can take exception only to slight shades of meaning. For example, "our poor lonely great man" (Wagner) does not quite catch the spirit of "der arme grosse Einsame." One wishes that Mr. Scott Goddard's editing had been as sparing as his footnotes. "Having in mind the making of a manageable volume," he made many cuts in the text, in one case as much as seventy-two lines. Moreover, he omitted 110 letters entirely, with the result that the 712 pages of the original have been reduced to 434 in the translation.

Books in Brief

Gin and Bitters. By A. Riposte. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

The jacket on this book calls it "a novel about a novelist who writes novels about other novelists." The victim then would seem to be W. Somerset Maugham, who recently wrote "Cakes and Ale," which was a novel about two other novelists. Leverson Hurle bears so many superficial resemblances to Maugham—chief among them being the fact that he usually bases his fiction upon known lives, his own or others—that there can be no doubt about the direction of A. Riposte's animus. The only difference is that Hurle, unlike Maugham, is an insignificant author; and the only defect of the present work is that it loses all its force by being completely infantile in its anger. A trivial performance.

Civilizations of the East. Volume I. The Near and Middle East. By René Grousset. Alfred A. Knopf. $7.50.

This is certainly one of the most impressive undertakings in recent publishing. M. Grousset is an official of the Guimet Museum in Paris, which is devoted entirely to Oriental civilizations. The present volume, the first of four, deals with Egyptian, Mesopotamian, Hittite, and Persian art in ancient times, and with the Islamic art of the later Arab and Persian civilizations. M. Grousset adds to the savant's virtues literary skill and a supple understanding of how art explains and is explained by the social and political features of a culture. The book is exceptionally well printed and bound and contains 313 illustrations in half-tone.

World Without End. By Helen Thomas. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

Helen Thomas's "As It Was," published four years ago, carried the story of herself and her husband, Edward Thomas, as far as his last term at Oxford. "World Without End" continues it to the day of the poet's departure for Gallipoli, where he was killed. The present volume, reprinting "As It Was" along with the second narrative, gives the whole story, then, as Helen Thomas sees it. As a love story it is extraordinarily convincing and touching; the book as it stands may very well become one of the minor classics of our day.

The Flame of Islam: The Later Crusades. By Harold Lamb. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $4.

The faults of Mr. Lamb's first volume, "The Crusades: Iron Men and Saints," are exaggerated in his concluding volume. The very book titles indicate the faults. While Mr. Lamb is too conscientious a historian to romanticize the matter, he observes little restraint in the manner. This would be well if he were a natural stylist, which he is not. He interrupts his otherwise well-handled narrative with set passages of dull and irrelevant description. The romanticism edges over into his conception of character. Relieved of its verbiage the book would be an excellent account of the Christian attempts to recover Jerusalem from Islam by new crusades whose failures were chiefly due to their exploitation for political ends by kings and popes.

Children for the Grown-ups

I HAVE always had great admiration for writers of children's books. It is, of course, possible that their knowledge of child psychology consists only of a few tricks which, as they have learned from experience, never fail to impress their young audience. And yet much more than this seems to be present in a book or a play that is really popular with children. This is, I presume, mainly the ability to see and interpret the world with that freshness and innocence of outlook that gives the quality of adventure to most of the child's experiences. It is here, too, that the mystery of the adult metempsychosis makes its entry. For an adult author to regain the innocence of childhood while thriving on the forbidden fruit of knowledge seems to be as marvelous a feat as that of the proverbial Russian virgin who knew how to combine innocence with the benefits of sin. Many a time, as I recalled my early delights with the little Brownies, I have regretfully had to admit to myself that I no longer found anything amusing about them. But it is scarcely possible that Miss Mulock, their gifted authoress, felt similarly indifferent in describing their triumphs and tribulations, for she would have failed to convey them to her readers if she had not seen them herself through a child's eyes.

The conclusion to which I am impelled by this fact is rather disconcerting to me. It would appear that nothing short of a revelation from above could open my eyes and my heart to a masterpiece of art that sends into ecstasies my fellow-humans of a less cynical age. This probably accounts for my utter failure to be amused by newspaper comic strips. I say "probably," because I am not at all sure that the strips are primarily intended for children. On the other hand, I have every reason to suspect that a book or a film dealing with children that appeals to me is most unlikely to make an equal impression on children.

Now, "Skippy" (Paramount), although based on a comic strip, is a thoroughly delightful film. Grown-up men like myself find it both droll and wistful. It has humor and pathos that make one feel like brooding over one's own memories of that blissful age. Moreover, its youthful actors bring to their parts a more than usual amount of convincing naturalness, and there is a similar absence of stage heroics in its simple plot. A reserve like this, which is so rarely encountered in the offerings from Hollywood, merits every praise and goes far to make the film a decidedly pleasant entertainment. But it is unmistakably an entertainment for the grown-ups. Most of its comedy is of the type in which the ingenuousness of the thing done or said is its only claim to being amusing. Its pathos, too, seems to be a little oversentimentalized. And this brings me back to my initial problem: can the majority of us grown-up people ever see children as they really are? I am inclined to think that we cannot, although some of us may come perilously near to what is known as "juvenile mentality."

No particular subtlety of any sort will be found in "Dirigible" (Central), but the film has merits of a different kind, and these place it considerably above the Hollywood average. An aerial adventure involving the cracking up of a dirigible in mid-air, a flight in an airplane over the South Pole, and bloodcurdling incidents on land provide the spectacle and drama that lie in the grand tradition of the movies, and it is to the credit of Mr. Capra, the director of the film, that he has made such an effective use of his material. The film cannot boast of the photographic excellence shown in some of the scenes in "Hell's Angels," but its story is visualized with convincing vividness, and is told intelligently.

A more imaginative, if humorous, treatment of aerial thrills is presented in "Birds of a Feather," a Walt Disney animated cartoon (last seen at the Cameo) showing a striking advance in the application of rhythmic movement to linear design. By comparison, the Soviet picture "Cities and Years," shown on the same program at the Cameo, is pretentious but unconvincing, despite some originality of treatment.

Drama

A Play for Tom Mooney

IT is difficult to imagine what a person who had never heard of the Mooney case would think of "Precedent," a play at the Provincetown Theater which deals with this case under the thinnest of disguises. The author, I. J. Golden, a St. Louis lawyer, has for the most part been content with a mere change of names, Mooney becoming Delaney, Fickert becoming Riley, Oxman becoming Rossman, Older becoming Fremont, and so on. Otherwise he has rendered what I understand to be an unvarnished account of the case as he sees it and as all liberally disposed people have been seeing it for fifteen years. He has made his hero the victim of prejudice and plot, and he has made his villain, the district attorney, as black as villains can be made. But what would an outsider say? My guess is that he would find it all an improbable fiction—as life generally is, and as this particular set of events certainly is. He would call the play a melodrama; he would not know why it had been written; and he would have to conclude that it dealt with actions whose motives he could never expect to comprehend without a key. On the face of it, then, "Precedent" might be set down as incredible. Such things, it might be said, do not happen; only in a play could one man desire the death of another as Riley (Fickert) desires the death of Delaney (Mooney).

It is perhaps equally difficult to predict what effect "Precedent" will have upon those who are conservatively disposed—who either decline to believe that the war between capital and labor is as simple as this, and as simply enlists the service of the law on one of its two sides, or agree to overlook an occasional example of injustice in view of the protection which on the whole the present system assures them. Riley, they might admit, is a rascal, but let him be forgiven in that he is a district attorney. Of the man who would resemble and feel with Riley I do not speak, as I assume he never enters the theater except to get his mind off himself. Well, would "Precedent" convert a conservative? I doubt it. "Precedent" may be true in every essential detail, but to the unbeliever it must appear as biased as Bedlam, just as to the uninformed it must appear, as I have said, fantastic. That is how much good its truth will do it among the indifferent and the ill-disposed.

Among friends the case will of course be different. They are precisely the ones for whom the play was written; for them, believing as they do, the more truth the better. The audience I sat with on the opening night was already convinced. It came only to be moved. And it was very deeply moved. Mr. Golden knows how to write a propaganda play. He knows how to make it clear that he is writing a propaganda play, and how not to apologize for doing so in any line or gesture. The result, since the writing is intelligent and impassioned, and since the acting at the Provincetown is sincere and serious, is effective polemic. I, who was more than friendly but who had my doubts as to what sort of spectacle would offer itself for my sympathy, remained to be profoundly impressed. My only regret is that I cannot with any confidence of conversion recommend "Precedent" to those who believe Mooney guilty or to those who, if they are not sure of this, think he ought to remain in prison on general principles.

"Peter Ibbetson" as dramatized by John Raphael and a revised by Constance Collier has returned to the Shubert Theater with Dennis King playing the role once played by John Barrymore, and playing it in exactly the same way, walk, talk, and all. Since I am prejudiced against plays which exploit children and employ dreams, I cannot be expected to say much for "Peter Ibbetson." The recognition scene between Peter (Mr. King) and the Duchess of Towers (Jessie Royce Landis) was all that a recognition scene can be—and a third of my prejudices is that such scenes produce the most powerful moments possible on the stage. But after that moment the dreams came much too thick and fast. Particularly thick.

Spend 30 days in Russia on a carefully mapped out trip permitting a balanced survey of the social, economic and cultural aspects of the Soviet Union as well as the most picturesque sections. This tour, under the personal supervision of David Ostrinsky, co-leader of the American Economists' Party to Russia, 1930, first makes a survey of the sociological conditions existing in Russia: the large industrial projects figuring in the 5-Year Plan, schools, museums, theatres, as well as the state and collective farms. The second portion of the tour is largely recreational. You will pass down the mighty Volga, inspecting the state farm "Gigant" and view the colorful, national minorities in the Caucasus, Crimea and Ukraine. The route winds across the Georgian Military Pass, then across the Black Sea, with stops along the Caucasian Riviera and then to Crimea, journeying by automobile from Yalta to Sebastopol along the seacoast. You will visit Oriental bazaars and age-old Georgian Cathedrals and spend leisurely days in former palaces converted into rest homes for workers.

In Russia you will be in charge of Intourist. The cost of the trip includes entrance and exit visas, three meals a day, accommodations in best hotels, first class steamer passage on the Volga and Black Sea, upholstered cars on trains, motor transportation to and from stations, transportation of luggage, entrance fees to museums and theatres; guides, interpreters, etc. Soviet cultural organizations will cooperate with Intourist in arranging special interviews and programs.

This tour, for a limited group of academic and professional people, meets in Berlin, July 15th

Canada First

By JAMES BURNS

Ottawa, April 15

UNDER the leadership of Richard B. Bennett, Premier of Canada since August 7, 1930, the dominion is giving the world a demonstration of economic nationalism in an acute form, and the results so far are such as to justify the worst fears of those who opposed the Bennett formula for prosperity in the 1930 elections. In pursuance of a policy described by the slogan "Canada First," the Bennett Ministry has raised the Canadian tariff, closed the door to immigrants, and barred Russian imports. In spite of these salves to the country's economic wounds, business continues to be slow, farm prices do not improve, and unemployment is still widespread.

By birth and experience Mr. Bennett was well suited to lead a crusade under the banner of "Canada First," and to offer himself to the electors as the efficient architect of prosperity. He is descended on both sides from United Empire Loyalists, which is the Canadian equivalent of descent in the United States from signers of the Declaration of Independence, and is therefore "100 per cent Canadian." Born in humble circumstances, he has amassed, partly by his own efforts and partly by inheritance, one of the largest fortunes in the dominion. His associates are the most successful business and professional men in Canada.

By a "Canada First" program Mr. Bennett meant, to put it most briefly, a thoroughgoing upward revision of the tariff. He holds the extreme protectionist view that the dominion should import only what it cannot possibly grow or manufacture for itself, and he made it plain in his 1930 election speeches that no industry, primary or secondary, would ask his government for protection in vain. To sugar-coat the pill for sections of the country which tend to free-trade views, Mr. Bennett coupled with the promise of "adequate protection" a pledge to prevent the exploitation of consumers. He would do this, he said, by rescinding tariff increases if manufacturers took advantage of them to raise prices.

Almost the first act of Mr. Bennett on taking office was the abolition of the tariff advisory board which had been created by the Liberals in 1927 to study tariff questions and to hear representations from consumers and producers. At an emergency session of Parliament last September the Bennett Government raised duties on a wide range of goods, principally foods, textiles, metal products, and machinery. At the same session a bill was passed giving the Cabinet virtually supreme authority over the customs schedules. These may now be altered by executive action, without consultation of Parliament, and this dictatorial power has been employed several times to protect Canadian industries. Up to the present the beneficiaries of tariff changes have obeyed the warning against "exploitation," but no one can tell yet to what extent the official ban on price-raising has been, or will be, evaded by changes in the quality of goods. Further, it is a tenable view that manufacturers' prices would have come down in recent months had they not been held at the 1930 level by the emergency tariff.

The prize example of the Bennett Government's trade policy has been its stand-offish attitude toward commerce with Russia. Some time ago Colonel H. J. Mackie, a former Canadian M. P. who is now an unofficial Russian trade representative in the dominion, presented an offer from the Soviet Union to buy $10,000,000 worth of Canadian farm implements if the dominion would take payment one-third in goods and the rest in gold. The Bennett Government rejected this proposal, and capped the rejection by placing an embargo on Russian lumber, pulp, pulpwood, coal, asbestos, and furs. A memorandum announcing the embargo declared in grandiloquent terms that Canada could have no truck or trade with Communists.

The "Canada First" idea has been expressed also in immigration policy. For a generation the dominion has held out a welcome sign to the land-hungry of many nations, but today the door is all but closed. Financial assistance formerly given to British settlers has been withdrawn. Drastic regulations now in force admit only British citizens (not including Asiatics), American citizens, farmers, and their wives and children. And all these must be in funds and free of any suspicion that they may become public charges, a rule so severely enforced that immigrants to Canada in 1931 are not expected to number 25,000. Since the war the annual influx has run from 100,000 to 150,000.

Using the weapons of tariffs and embargoes in the economic sphere, Mr. Bennett's Government has taken over without a qualm the political nationalism of the Liberals. Between 1921 and 1930, when the Liberal Party was in power in Canada, Premier Mackenzie King successfully asserted the "national status" of the dominion, brought home from the 1926 Imperial Conference the famous Balfour report describing Britain and the dominions as equal nations, and launched Canada on a diplomatic career by sending ministers to Washington, Paris, and Tokio. By Mr. King's critics these achievements were alternately belittled and decried as likely to disrupt the British Empire. In office Mr. Bennett has decided that no Canadian prime minister can safely take the line that Canada is less than a nation. At the 1930 Imperial Conference he assented to a report extending dominion sovereignty. At the same gathering he was anything but a meek colonial when he presented his demand that Great Britain tax foreign-food imports.

Thus Canadians are witnessing the rather extraordinary spectacle of the Tory Party, supposedly the guardian of the old imperial tradition, espousing a full-blown and even slightly blatant nationalism. Yet no one denies that Mr. Bennett's policies correspond exactly with his election pledges. In the 1930 campaign he preached "Canada First" from end to end of the dominion, gaining not only normal support in Conservative Ontario but sufficient backing in usually Liberal Quebec and the west to put him in office with an impregnable majority. Quebec was enormously attracted by the slogan. Western Canada, populated by free-trade farmers, proved willing to try anything once, and turned to Mr.

Bennett in dismay at the failure of the Liberals to make really substantial reductions in the tariff.

Mr. Bennett has redeemed his election promises, but unfortunately for his prestige, the results he predicted have not so far appeared. He came into power in the midst of depression, and in flaming words undertook to set matters right, but the situation today is worse instead of better. The price of wheat, keystone of Canada's economic arch, was $1.02 a bushel when the Bennett Government took office, and for some months past has hovered between 50 and 60 cents. There is acute distress on western farms. The employment index, based on 100 for average employment in 1926, fell from 118.8 on August 1 last to 100.7 on February 1 of this year, more than the normal seasonal decline. In January 16 per cent of trade unionists were out of work, and unemployment and the poverty it brings would be more noticeable but for large programs of public works and relief which have sapped public treasuries. Internal and foreign trade have not picked up, and public revenues show such a decline that an increase in federal taxes cannot be avoided.

These are embarrassing facts for Mr. Bennett, and since he first met Parliament at a regular session on March 12 he has been subjected to a steady fire of criticism. The burden of it is that Canada, of all countries in the world, can least afford to attempt a policy of economic isolation, since Canada lives by exporting a food surplus. Lack of a profitable market for this surplus is the root of the country's economic troubles at the moment, and the question is how soon it will become clear to everyone that tariffs and embargoes can only aggravate the present distress.

PHILIP SNOWDEN'S BUDGET was a surprise. Facing a prospective deficit of $187,000,000, the Chancellor trusts largely to economy and improving trade, and proposes no added taxes for the next year except a four-cent increase on gasoline. But he recalls the glorious Lloyd George days of 1909 by renewing the revolutionary proposal for a land valuation and a tax on land values—the centrally important feature of this budget, and the one that will be hardest fought. As an emergency measure for the coming year he proposes to meet his deficit by raiding to the extent of $100,000,000 the dollar-buying fund that Great Britain maintains in New York, and by pushing forward income-tax payments. With income taxes (at the standard rate of 22½ per cent) yielding nearly $1,250,000,000, surtaxes an added $330,000,000, and death duties (running up to more than 50 per cent on the largest estates) nearly $400,000,000, it is not strange that Mr. Snowden has tried at all costs to avoid raising these rates this year. Sturdy free trader that he is, the Chancellor bravely denounces the very idea of protection, even in the bewitching guise of a revenue tariff. Great Britain actually collects nearly $500,000,000 in customs duties, however, on a handful of widely consumed articles, and a somewhat greater amount in excise taxes. Despite its temporary expedients, Mr. Snowden's budget, worked out under the greatest difficulties, is a piece of honest and uncompromising labor finance, economically sound and intelligently progressive. It will distinctly strengthen the position of the MacDonald Government against possible attacks from its political opponents.

MAYOR WALKER must surely have enormously increased the number of his critics by his ill-advised and intemperate remarks before the New York Fire Department Holy Name Society on April 26. There must already have been plenty of persons to see that he would not make satisfactory answer to the attacks on himself and his administration by calling his critics names. When he indulges in a performance that consists of waving his arms and shouting "Communist," "parlor reds," and "reckless charges . . . actuated by prejudice and bigotry," he displays prejudice, bigotry, and recklessness of the worst sort. Nor will he help his case, one suspects, either with Governor Roosevelt or Commissioner Seabury—before whom it will probably come eventually—by referring to "the glittering charges [against himself] I read hastily just once, and that was enough." It is possible that among the thousands of New Yorkers who voted for Jimmy Walker and would vote for him again there are many who, either for religious or other reasons, would be moved by such a defense as this, superficial, injudicious, and meaningless as it is. But there must be other thousands, and those among the most impartial minds in the city, who will, whatever their opinion of Tammany Hall or even of the Mayor, realize that to answer charges of the gravest nature, made by responsible and sincere citizens, with choleric mouthings is less than might have been expected of the usually astute Mr. Walker. It is not only bad taste but bad tactics.

ARE THE REPUBLICANS about to abandon their unbending support of a high protective tariff? Are they preparing to adopt a more intelligent attitude toward this uneconomical but long-cherished government policy? It is almost unbelievable, yet there are definite indications that some of them are beginning to see the light. First came Representative Snell of New York, member of the Republican triumvirate that for years ruled the lower house, and himself an outspoken proponent of tariff-grabbing. Mr. Snell has now decided that we have gone high enough in our tariff rates. Next came William Wallace Atterbury, president of the Pennsylvania Railroad, high in the councils of the Republican Party, and citizen of a State that has been loudest in its demands for ever-higher rates. Mr. Atterbury has concluded that among the factors "which must be corrected" before the world depression can be overcome are "the tariff walls which nearly all nations are building against one another, tending to separate the different countries into hermetically sealed compartments so far as commerce is concerned." Who will be next? The press has recently presented evidence that a movement to lower the tariff is afoot, particularly among the automobile-makers, railroad officials, public-utility magnates, and bankers. If the tariff ever is reduced, it will probably be in response to pressure from our export manufacturers. When Congress is convinced that public opinion is opposed to extortionate tariff rates, the rates will come down; but in the opinion of Mark Sullivan Congress next December will be faced with a demand for a prohibitive tariff on crude oil instead of lower rates.

IN ADDITION TO OUR TARIFF, official American policy on war debts and the sharp reduction in the amount of American lending abroad are expected to come in for heavy criticism at the meeting of the International Chamber of Commerce opening in Washington on May 4. This business men's organization is given to plain speaking on questions affecting world trade, and it is to be hoped that the Washington meeting may be no exception. With the piling up of gold in France and the United States and the obstruction of imports by our tariff, foreign loans by American bankers and investors have become more rather than less important as a means of keeping international trade going, and we are now getting an impressive lesson in the impossibility of continuous prosperity for the United States in isolation from the rest of the world. The recent visit of Montagu Norman, governor of the Bank of England, gave rise to wide discussion of the possibility of a great international institution to finance long-term loans in countries where they are especially needed, such as the Eastern European states or the producers of raw materials like South America. Dr. Herbert Feis, however, suggestively points out that if the individuals and concerns seeking such loans were in fact good credit risks, they could get loans from private banks. In reality, he suggests, they are too often bad risks because of the international economic and political situation, and it simply makes a bad situation worse to loan money to bad risks, as, for example, to Danubian farmers hampered by high tariffs and increasing competition. The right international allocation of credit becomes more and more important, but the power that would reside in an international institution actually exercising such control is so vast that it could not be left wholly in private hands.

AN END OF NAVAL PARITY and of all the other devices, adjustments, compromises, and arrangements by which the five great naval Powers have been professing to seek the abolition of competitive naval building is forecast in the rejection by Great Britain and Italy of the naval demands of France. Technically the impasse has been reached over the insistence of France upon building, between now and 1936, some 66,000 tons to replace vessels that will become obsolete during that period. Back of the dispute as to whether Great Britain and Italy did not know from the first precisely what France expected, and by what diplomatic hocus-pocus or ministerial forgetfulness the matter was overlooked, lies the intolerably plain fact that France has never intended to accept the Italian demand for parity, and is quite ready to wreck the whole cause of armament reduction and limitation rather than yield. The negotiations which began with professions of Anglo-American agreement at Rapidan that shortly turned out to be over-optimistic, continued with crises and fainting spells through the dreary sessions of the London conference, dragged on month after month in fruitless conversations between Italy and France, and took on for the moment a hopeful air when Arthur Henderson tried his hand at patching things up, have now, apparently, gone on the rocks. The wreck will be bad enough for Ramsay MacDonald and Mr. Hoover, both of whom desperately need diplomatic successes to offset political and economic troubles at home, but vastly worse for the world which must see naval competition revived because France knows no word for peace except force.

RAILROAD STATISTICS for 1930, just made public by the Interstate Commerce Commission, deserve careful attention. Operating revenues on the 242,169 miles of road operated declined from the prosperous year 1929 by the staggering amount of a round billion dollars to $5,281,196,875. Operating expenses were cut by no less than $576,327,942 to a total of $3,930,940,465, three-fifths of the reduction being in maintenance expenditures. After meeting taxes of $348,584,573 and other expenses, the roads had left net operating income of $868,907,367 and other income of $348,986,595. They paid out $502,673,366 in interest, at the rate of a little more than 4½ per cent on their funded and other debt, and $505,446,351 ($19,145,404 more than in 1929), partly drawn from surplus, at the rate of 5 per cent on the outstanding preferred and 6.6 per cent on common stock, and they transferred $335,633,469 to profit-and-loss account. The income and operating figures in practically all cases show steep declines from 1929; the results, contrary to much current discussion, are impressive evidence of the solidity of the present structure of railroad finance on the whole, to which solidity, we venture to believe, forty years of public regulation have contributed.

THE NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE, after rather prolonged study of the problem, has adopted final requirements for the listing of securities of investment trusts. What is significant is the remarkable scope and detail of these requirements as well as the "recommendations" accompanying them. Adoption of the latter is not compulsory, but will "weigh with" the listing committee in considering applications. The Exchange expresses its disapproval of the payment of incompletely earned dividends; frowns upon the acquisition by one trust of the common stock of another; lays down precise and detailed rules for uniform accounting practice; and suggests that trust directorates contain "qualified persons not directly affiliated either with the management of the trust itself or with its banking sponsors." These requirements are broader in scope than any previously issued by the Exchange regarding any one class of securities. They are thoroughly justified, however; for the investment trust exists ostensibly as a refuge for the small and perplexed investor, and as such it has been shockingly abused. The Exchange's new requirements cannot fail to have some indirect influence for the better even on trusts that do not apply for listing, but such indirect influence is not enough. State regulation of investment trusts remains as urgent as ever.

NO QUESTION as to what Dantes Bellegarde, Haitian Minister to the United States, did or did not say about the capture of Fort Rivière, or as to General Butler's use of the wicked word "hell" over the Philadelphia Elks' radio in describing that exploit, ought to delay the rapid carrying out of the recommendation of the Forbes commission for Haitianization of the public services of Haiti and withdrawal of the occupation. The Haitian Minister, who speaks English imperfectly, was apparently a victim of misunderstanding. Certain facts about Fort Rivière are too well known. On November 18, 1915, Admiral Caperton reported to the Navy Department: "Fort Rivière captured by forces under Major Butler. All avenues of escape had been previously closed so that none escaped. Fifty-one were killed. . . . No casualties our forces." Such "warfare" looks too much like something called by an uglier name, despite General Butler's medal of honor, and Americans must remember that this action constituted but one incident in the record of General Butler and the marines in Haiti. Small wonder, in view of such memories, that the Haitians long for the ending of the occupation. It is now more than a year since the Forbes commission finished its work, and the Haitians are reported as becoming impatient because Haitianization of the services is not getting forward. We hope that the Administration, in pursuance of its more liberal Caribbean policy, will not fail to give evidence of good faith by proceeding with all speed in the essential task of getting out of Haiti.

THE NEW SPANISH REPUBLIC appears to be making progress, although faced with difficulties which even the most colorless newspaper dispatches do not conceal. It is gratifying to observe that there is to be, for the present at least, no attempt to avenge the wrongs or weaknesses of the monarchy by putting on trial all of the monarchist leaders who can be apprehended and that plans for parliamentary elections in June are going forward. The suspension of the foreign-loan contract made just before King Alfonso withdrew seems also to have been accomplished without ill-feeling. The enthusiastic reception which Señor Zamora, Provisional President, received on his recent visit to Barcelona did not, however, hide the fact that the demand of Catalonia for something closely akin to independence is still very much alive, and that the formation of a federal republic with a really effective measure of central authority will prove a hard and delicate task. The course of the diplomatic representatives of the new regime, also, will be a matter of concern even though diplomatic recognition of the new state has been promptly accorded. Professor Salvador de Madariaga, who has been named as ambassador to this country, has been exceptionally acid in his published comments upon the United States, its people, and its foreign policy, and has arraigned American abstention from the League of Nations as the greatest present obstacle to internationalism and world peace. A former League official as a diplomat at Washington will make a situation worth watching.

DECLARING FLATLY that the payment of physicians on the present basis of private practice cannot go on much longer, and expressing strongly his disbelief in any system of state medicine for this country, Dr. Haven Emerson, professor of public-health administration at Columbia University, urges the organization of communities into voluntary associations providing medical service for members. The present cost of medical care, Dr. Emerson maintains, is due not to excessive payments to physicians, but to excessive demands by patients in hospitals and drug-stores (a statement that will certainly not be accepted without question) and to their failure to organize their medical expenditures. He believes that an adequate service could be organized at a cost of from ten to fifty dollars a year per individual, and that 20,000 persons constitute the smallest unit to which a complete service could be rendered at such prices. Irrespective of the sharp differences of opinion over the possibility of satisfactory government medical service, and despite the social conservatism of the physicians themselves, the opinion is rapidly gaining ground that the social organization of medicine in some form is becoming absolutely necessary if the ordinary family is to get adequate care without bankruptcy.

A FEW WEEKS AGO the Federal Council of Churches, in approving birth control through its Committee on Marriage and the Home, recognized "the necessity for some form of effective control of the size of the family and spacing of children." Now comes the unanimous approval of birth control because of economic and other considerations by the Special Commission on Marriage, Divorce, and Remarriage of the Presbyterian church. The report of the commission also makes some interesting recommendations concerning the education of young people with regard to sex and marriage in their physical as well as spiritual aspects. Church opinion, like all respectable and institutionalized opinion, is slow to change. For that reason it tends to be the brake rather than the leader of thought, sometimes with extremely harmful results. In the matter of birth control, for instance, it is largely the influence of the church which has prevented the spread of birth control among the very poor who need it most. On the other hand, once the church admits the necessity and desirability of controlling the size of families, the spread of knowledge on the subject will be immeasurably accelerated among those who most need it. Both pronouncements recorded here represent an attempt to narrow the discrepancy between church dogma and the exigencies of modern life, and they are as welcome as they are long overdue.

IT IS A PLEASURE to record that the suit for plagiarism brought by Miss Georges Lewys in United States District Court against Eugene O'Neill in the sum of $2,000,000 has been won by the defendant, with costs of $17,500 assessed against the plaintiff. Judge John M. Woolsey, in an admirable decision that should be a rebuke to any reckless charge of plagiarism in the future, took occasion to compliment the case for the defense, "in pleasing contrast with the plaintiff's case," and especially the testimony by George Jean Nathan, "whom I found . . . the most acute and competent of witnesses and I accept his evidence in toto." Miss Lewys could not, again in Judge Woolsey's words, "claim a copyright on words in the dictionary, or on usual English idioms, or on ideas." And her attempt to do so, in the form of this suit, resulted in a large monetary loss to herself which, for the sake of the defendants, it is to be hoped she can pay. It is a pity that the suit also resulted in a loss of time, thought, and energy by the defendants, the witnesses, and the defending counsel. But as a consequence, an interesting proposal has been made by a group whose spokesmen are Channing Pollock and Harry Weinberger, attorney for Mr. O'Neill. The plan is to introduce a bill in Congress providing that when a suit is brought for plagiarism, the judge, after considering the two works, may require from the plaintiff a surety bond to cover the costs, unless he considers that there is a prima facie case. Fewer irresponsible suits would probably be brought if this were done.

The Church Pacifist

OUT of 19,372 Protestant clergymen replying to a questionnaire sent out by the World Tomorrow, no fewer than 12,076, or 62 per cent, believe that the churches of America should now go on record as refusing to sanction or support any future war; while 10,427, or 54 per cent, are personally prepared to state that it is their present purpose not to sanction any future war or participate as armed combatants. These are surprising figures. Eighty per cent of the clergymen favor substantial reductions in armament even if the United States is obliged to take the initiative and make a proportionately greater reduction than other nations are yet willing to do, while 62 per cent believe that the policy of armed intervention in other lands by our government to protect the lives and property of American citizens should be abandoned and protective efforts confined to pacific means (critics of the Administration's present Nicaraguan policy please copy); only 43 per cent regard distinctions between "defensive" and "aggressive" war as sufficiently valid to justify their participation in a future war of "defense"; only 45 per cent could conscientiously serve as chaplains on active duty in war time; and only 13 per cent favor military training in schools and colleges, while 66 per cent favor immediate entry of the United States into the League of Nations.

The questionnaire, signed by ten prominent clergymen, was sent out to all the ministers of more than a dozen leading denominations, constituting 53,000 clergymen (including 3,000 theological students) out of the total of more than 100,000 in the United States. Unfortunately, because of limitations of time and expense, the inquiry was not extended to the Jews, Roman Catholics, Lutherans, Southern Baptists, and Southern Methodists, so it is impossible to make comparisons among some of the largest and most important religious bodies in the country. It is probably true, as Kirby Page suggests, that the opponents of war replied in larger proportion than did the friends of the military system, and the published returns offer some confirmation of that idea. It is probably true also that the pulpit is more pacifistic than the pew, and certainly everyone is much more in favor of peace at a time like this than at a period when Mars has displaced other deities as the object of state worship. Nevertheless, we find it impressive that more than half of the clergymen replying, constituting a fifth of all the ministers canvassed and a tenth of the total number of clergymen in the country, have declared their purpose, for whatever their declaration may be worth, to take no part in any future war. The friends of peace without undue elation may well thank God and redouble their efforts.

An examination of the returns by denominations yields interesting results. Taking the most searching question, that on personal participation in any war, the denominations stand in the following order, beginning with the most pacifistic: Evangelical Synod, Methodist Episcopal, Reformed, Disciples, Unitarians and Universalists, Congregationalists, Baptists, Presbyterians, United Brethren, Episcopalians. On the other six test questions (omitting that on the League), the Evangelical church stands consistently in first, second, or third place, except on the question of unilateral disarmament, where it suddenly drops to ninth place. May German antecedents and sympathy with a disarmed Germany in an armed world be in any degree responsible? The Methodist Episcopal communion, whose great numbers give it large influence in the total returns, runs along pretty consistently in second, third, or fourth place, followed in order by the Reformed and Disciples churches. At the other extreme are the conservative Episcopalians, who stand consistently in tenth place on every one of the seven test questions, with the Presbyterians eighth or ninth on all of them; the United Brethren doing generally a little better; the Baptists standing seventh or worse on every question; and the Congregationalists sixth, but with a strange individualistic aberration to second place on the question of armament reduction; and the Unitarians and Universalists fifth. We do not undertake to explain these differences on religious grounds, but leave to the students of such questions the interesting correlation of these results with the economic and social status of the various religious bodies concerned. Broadly speaking, in the church as outside it, wealth, social position, and in some measure intellectual sophistication are accompanied by a favorable view of the war system.

We have left the League of Nations question for separate examination. One might guess, perhaps, that the more pacifistic the group, the more strongly it would favor the immediate entry of the United States into the League. The opposite comes nearer being true, though the returns are not conclusive. The Evangelical clergymen stand first in their opposition to entering the League, while the Episcopalians, at the foot of the list in all that makes for peace, are surpassed only by the Unitarians and Universalists in their eagerness to get into the world organization, and are followed by the Congregationalists. The Methodists, however, desert their pacifist colleagues on this question, standing next to the Congregationalists, with the Presbyterians in sixth place. Putting the thing in the light most favorable to the League, it appears doubtful whether the pacifists in the churches believe that American adhesion to the League would really make for peace.

It would be foolish to attach too great importance to the results of this questionnaire, or to undertake to draw from it too fine-spun conclusions. No one can tell today how far the present pacifists in the pulpit or out of it would stand the test of war; and no one knows how far a pacifist clergyman, even if he were willing to go to the last extreme at such a time, would be able to carry his congregation with him. The church historically has been closely tied up with the war system, and those bonds are not broken today, however many the individual clergymen in actual or threatened revolt. None the less, making all necessary allowances, we welcome this showing as an encouraging sign that there is at work within the churches a powerful leaven, and that those great organizations are not likely to be swung over without powerful protest to the support of our next military adventure. Let the watchmen on the towers of Zion, then, cry aloud and spare not.

Midwest Discontent

OUT in the Middle West a member of The Nation's editorial staff, who has just returned from an extended trip through that region, found the voters filled with discontent. In their present mood they have had more than enough of President Hoover, and they display a striking eagerness for an opportunity to turn him out of office. Of course there is no telling what may happen between now and November, 1932, but if the election were to take place tomorrow it is a fair question whether the President would not lose three out of every four normally Republican States in the Middle West. The present revolt is directed against Mr. Hoover as the leader of his party, and the voters, in their present temper, would apparently be willing to accept almost anyone in his place. In the absence of unforeseeable developments, such a situation may give the Democratic nominee a chance to sweep the Middle West eighteen months hence, for of all the opposition groups the Democrats alone are actively seeking to benefit by the political unrest in that area.

In Wisconsin voters and political leaders alike declare that the Progressives, who are in a majority in that State, will support against Herbert Hoover any Democrat presently being discussed except Owen D. Young; and even Young, if he were nominated, it was said would have better than an even chance to win the State from President Hoover. Republican leaders in Illinois candidly admitted their belief that there was nothing the Republican Party could do either nationally or locally to win back enough lost ground to carry the State for Mr. Hoover next year. In Indiana a rapid growth in anti-Hoover sentiment was everywhere apparent. The Republican politicians, while admitting the State would go Democratic if an election were held within the next few months, expressed the hope that the party might get some sort of lucky break before the summer of 1932 so as to give Indiana to Mr. Hoover. The situation in Ohio was similar to that found in Illinois, while only in Michigan was there discernible any likelihood of a Hoover victory in 1932, and even there the Republican politicians were seriously concerned over the unrest in the industrial centers.

Reasons for the impending political revolt are not far to seek. With hundreds of thousands of workingmen's families if not actually starving certainly going without sufficient or adequate food, there is bound to be resentment against the constituted authorities or, more precisely, against the political party in power. Those out of work, however, are not only undernourished; they have not sufficient clothing, their children do not get the medical attention they need, they cannot pay their rent, they are going heavily into debt, they are losing their homes by the thousands, innumerable families are being split up. They are not sure who should be blamed for their predicament, but they are always ready in their despair to strike at the nearest head, and in the present case the head happens to be that of Herbert Hoover. But the workingmen's families are not alone in their suffering; as many middle-class families if not more are also plainly in distress. Throughout the Middle West thousands of lawyers, doctors, and engineers were found complaining about their reduced incomes; shopkeepers were working and living on a hand-to-mouth basis; bookkeepers and stenographers, or at least those among them fortunate enough to have jobs, were working at salaries far below those they had been getting two or three years before; other white-collar workers, including particularly retail-store clerks, had almost without exception had their pay cut, and in the case of several Chicago department stores the cut had amounted to more than 50 per cent.

Doubtless Mr. Hoover would have been the target of much of the rebellious feeling that abounds in the Middle West even if he had done everything in his power to relieve the situation, but his refusal to recognize the magnitude of the depression and particularly his failure to call Congress into special session have hurt him beyond measure. The Hoover do-nothing policy irks the Middle Westerners more than anything else. For one thing, they feel that the tariff has been harmful, and they would have liked to see Congress busy this summer restoring some semblance of sanity to our tariff rates. From a purely selfish point of view Mr. Hoover ought to realize that by going through this summer without Congress he is not only assuming sole responsibility for the economic situation as far as the government is concerned, but is also drawing upon himself, and upon himself alone, the perhaps unreasoning but none the less bitter criticism of those for whom the depression means want or privation.

A National Newspaper

THE session of the American Newspaper Publishers Association, just ended in New York, has brought up anew the problems that face any ambitious publisher, any journalist, and the newspaper-reading public today. Bruce Bliven, speaking at Princeton on April 23, predicted that the next few years in newspaper publishing would see a mechanical revolution more striking than were the tremendous changes of the past decade. Mr. Bliven said:

> My judgment is that we are just at the beginning of a revolution in journalism based on mechanical invention, the like of which we have never witnessed. I look to see half the linotypers of the country out of work within a decade because of the teletypesetter. Transmission of photographs by wire or wireless, plus air mail, has put a national newspaper just around the next corner, one made up in New York each night, page proofs photographed and transmitted electrically to half a dozen key cities, the paper printed in each of them, and distributed, partly by airplane, to the breakfast tables of a continent.

How far this idea of a mechanized national newspaper is from the old notion of a newspaper that should express the personality of one man and at the same time purvey news of interest to the many is easy to see. The tendency to merge newspapers, to develop the chain-store daily, has resulted so far in one-third of the 40,000,000 copies of newspapers that are daily distributed to the American people being published by chains; and that percentage is increasing every day. If Mr. Bliven means by a national newspaper one that shall reach and be of interest to the nation as a whole, the signs point to our having one. And the larger the publishing unit, and the wider the territory its products cover, the lower the average of intellectual content it must reach in order to be acceptable to so many thousands, even millions, of new readers.

A survey of "reader interest" conducted with nine dailies published in five large cities and with four smaller dailies in correspondingly smaller towns gives a fairly good idea of just what a national newspaper would have to offer. Chicago, Cleveland, Minneapolis, Des Moines, and St. Louis were included in the first group in a study made by the School of Journalism of Drake University; Iowa University made a complementary study of the Clinton (Iowa) Herald, the Richmond (Indiana) Palladium, the Richmond (Indiana) Item, and the Freeport (Illinois) Journal. What do the readers of these papers read? They read the romantic serials—50 per cent of the women read them; they read the cartoons and comic strips—as high as 90 to 100 per cent admitted that they faithfully followed the nationally known comics; they read syndicated "columns"—71 to 75 per cent of readers confessed to this; and from 18 to 25 per cent of them read the editorial pages. After that they give their attention to the news. Local news is, of course, by far the most popular. Only about 5 per cent of the readers of one newspaper would admit following the Washington news letter. Less than 10 per cent of the total readers were interested in foreign news or even in national politics with an international color. Curiously enough, the survey indicated that interest in sports pages is being greatly overestimated by the editors; the reader interest here ranged from 5 per cent of the women to only 29 per cent of the men. And a great lack of ardor was displayed for news of Wall Street or other financial matters; from 3 to 18 per cent followed the Stock Exchange reports and a much smaller number showed any interest in bond tables or the curb market.

What then would a national newspaper contain? Published from New York it might well be. But it would, if it were to be read by millions to whom New York is but a name, look little like the handsome and well-filled pages of the present Times or Herald Tribune. There would be national advertising in abundance to make up probably half of a fifty- or sixty-page paper. A couple of pages of local news could be added by the town in which the paper was printed; a modest page or two of international and Washington politics would just about fill the national need; a dash of "educational features" carefully selected might fill another page. And the rest could be safely devoted to editorials, mostly local, to Advice to the Lovelorn, Mutt and Jeff, Stories from Life, the Confessions of a Secretary, How to Be Happy Though Married, and Boots and Her Buddies.

The situation cannot, of course, be quite so bad as this. For the various metropolitan areas across the country there must always be a newspaper full of the real news of the day. But there is no question that some such boiling-down and leveling-off process will take place in the production of newspapers that will in time number their readers by the tens of millions. The days of the Greeleys, the Godkins, the Bennetts, even of the Pulitzers are gone. And in their place has come a great, impersonal, competent, all-inclusive newspaper which in its turn is threatened by boiler plate, journalistic vulgarity, the intellectual level of the comic strip. If the threat materializes it will be far simpler to cease publishing newspapers altogether and depend on the radio for news of what is happening in the world.

Revolt at Yale

It ought to be a matter of more than passing concern to the members and friends of Yale that the thing which has put the university "on the map" during the present academic year is not the pronouncements of its president or governing boards regarding educational policy nor the scholarly achievements of its faculty, but the pungent criticism of its methods and ideals by the editors of an undergraduate publication. Harvard has a reputation for indulging at times in rather frank self-criticism, but the extremest outbursts ever heard at Cambridge seem feeble and timid in comparison with the drastic excoriation of Yale methods and Yale men which has been administered by the Harkness Hoot. In the latest issue of that publication one of its editors, William Harlan Hale, returns to the charge in a valedictory well calculated to scorch the toughest academic hide.

What Mr. Hale complains of is that Yale does little or nothing to foster individual culture, and that the ideals which it follows and the methods it uses are such as to make such culture all but impossible. Instead of confining its efforts to the comparatively few who are able to respond to them, it has gone in for mass production and welcomed the unfit in larger numbers than the fit. It has lavished money on mongrel architecture and grandiose schemes for synthesizing "human relations," while ignoring the intellectual quality of its faculty and saturating its instruction with formalism. The resulting paucity of intellectual and social interest is now to be met by inaugurating an imitation of the Oxford college, and herding groups of students in houses where, under the benign supervision of selected members of the professoriate, the culture and social solidarity of gentlemen are expected to grow; all this, meantime, with the harassing restriction of an outgrown four-year course studded with elementary required subjects, and of accumulating endowments for the maintenance of useless show.

The situation at New Haven is not, unhappily, unique. Yale has yielded to the same educational trend which, with most American universities, has been a fatal lure. If it has not gone in for the danger of superficiality of the Meiklejohn Experimental College at Wisconsin, or aped the educational novelties that Rollins College seems to prize, or offered the imposing bill of fare which Columbia spreads out, it has nevertheless dallied with education in ways that stir amazement and invite rebuke. The rebuke now comes from a senior who, examining the bread which has been handed out to him for four years, finds it a stone.

The indictment has importance far beyond the academic limits of Yale. It matters a good deal to our national life that a great university, rich beyond avarice in present wealth and in reasonably assured access to more, should seem to its thoughtful undergraduates to have done so little to develop the proper function of a university and subordinated intellectual enrichment to academic formalism, grandiloquent notions of organizing the incongruous, and material display. The revolt of youth against the education that is offered to it is a warning of intellectual discontent which no university can afford to ignore, for unless such evils as have been courageously exposed at Yale are done away with, the revolt is likely to carry far and wide.

Easy Times in Middletown

By MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

South Bend, Indiana, April 16

MY purpose in coming to South Bend was to learn how Middletown, America, has been faring in the current panic. South Bend is not the real Middletown, but it is located in the same State, has most of Middletown's social and economic characteristics, has a very similar population, and has all of Middletown's problems. Three or four industries dominate the city; its church leaders are heard and respected; the American Legion has a strong voice in its civic affairs, as have also the various luncheon clubs, women's clubs, and literary societies; radicalism of whatever color or stripe is and long has been discouraged; the conservative elements are definitely in control. South Bend, moreover, has become famous for its Notre Dame football team, for being the home of Rome C. Stephenson, president of the American Bankers' Association, and for many of its products, including the Studebaker automobile, the Oliver plow, the South Bend watch, and the Singer sewing machine. In short, South Bend is an average American town, growing healthily, normally prosperous, and incurably optimistic. Its population numbers approximately 100,000.

Reading the local newspapers one would never guess that hard times had come upon the city. The press rarely mentions the fact; it refrains from calamity howling, but on the other hand it is not over-boisterous in predicting a sudden return of prosperity. It takes for granted, as do almost all South Bend's leading citizens, that good times are now returning, and that soon all the honest members of the community will be back at work. Outwardly everything in the city appears calm and serene, as though Middletown were enjoying easy times rather than going through a period of depression. Very few of its spokesmen seem to be at all seriously concerned; they will admit that South Bend has experienced a slump and that some of its working people have been out of jobs, but the slump they describe as a temporary depression, and the number of unemployed they estimate at less than 3,500. Anyhow, they add, nobody is going hungry or without clothing and shelter; the generosity of the well-to-do residents is seeing to that. Finally, they say, the working people are facing the situation more bravely than are the business and professional people; there have been no grumbling or protests of any kind from the workers.

Thus encouraged, I looked about me for confirmation of the general belief that South Bend was passing through the Hoover panic with as much stoicism and as little real difficulty or loss as this picture suggested. The Chamber of Commerce and one of the local newspapers I found trying to stir up a revival of the real-estate boom of the last decade. Full-page advertisements pointed out that certain persons who invested in South Bend real estate during the 1921-22 panic realized fabulous profits within a few years. Column-ength articles carried messages of faith and confidence rom the local bankers, manufacturers, and politicians. The alk of depression was minimized; everything was pointed toward further progress for the city. The suggestion throughout was that this is just another "business depression," without real significance to the city of South Bend, which is bound to grow until it has a population of 150,000 by 1940. Again, at a Chamber of Commerce luncheon and at various business men's meetings, this hope and belief were voiced. Two editors, a number of lawyers and real-estate men, and a leading banker poured it into my ear. Depression? In South Bend we are laughing off all such nonsense.

Dinner-table conversation among the polite folk of South Bend followed a slightly different vein. Most of the people whom I met were of the professional class. They talked principally of the state of business—with frequent references to their own reduced incomes; prohibition ran business a close second. Minor subjects included automobiles, the newest fashions, the local scandals, politics, bridge, the troubles of housekeeping, the current talkies, the latest books, and the Spanish revolution. Wall Street and stock speculation were rarely mentioned; the South Bend real-estate boom, despite the efforts of the Chamber of Commerce to pump life into it, had apparently been forgotten; the condition of the workers and the problems of labor generally were passed over very lightly and hurriedly; national politics, except in so far as it facilitated an unkind reference to President Hoover, was ignored; possible solutions of the country's economic problems were not talked about at all; every suggestion that these problems might be solved by a nation-wide plan or by organized effort was ridiculed. "We just have no use for panaceas," as one woman put it to me. These professional people were interested in the hard times only because their incomes had been cut a few hundred dollars a year; they entertained a blind hope that if everybody would behave in the accepted American manner business would soon recover and their normal incomes would be restored.

Among the clubwomen there was apparent a more sincere, though woefully ignorant, interest in the present problems of industry and labor. A group of these club members listened a week ago to one of the women officials of the Indiana State Federation of Labor. She talked to them about unemployment, gave them facts and figures, and suggested a possible solution for the local unemployment situation. After her talk the clubwomen held a round-table discussion and eventually came to the unanimous conclusion that the problem could be solved by compelling all married women to quit their jobs in the factories of the city. The labor representative retired in disgust.

Even the labor leaders in town, notwithstanding that they are much more alive to the reality of the situation than are any of the other dominant groups, took the position that the talk of hard times had been overdone. South Bend is largely an open-shop town. Its employers, supported by the bankers, insist on keeping it so. The typographical union is strong here, the building workers are organized, and so are a few minor trades; but the mechanics and laborers in the factories, normally numbering 30,000, are not organized.

These factory workers have been hardest hit by the depression; right now they are in the mood for organizing into unions, but organized labor has refused to lend them a hand. The American Federation of Labor, according to one of its local spokesmen, feels it has more to gain by concentrating its present efforts upon the Southern textile workers than by entering the field of the automobile mechanics. Also, the federation feels that no group of workers is worth organizing until the workers themselves are placed under such strong pressure by the adverse conditions under which they labor that they will voluntarily take the first steps toward organization without expert help. The local leaders are either unable or unwilling to assist in this task so far as the South Bend industries are concerned. They are for the most part ultra-conservative—earnest adherents of Matthew Woll and his principles. Their weekly newspaper devotes much more space to exposing Soviet Russia as "the greatest slave state in history" than it does to unemployment in South Bend. Before 1917 South Bend had an active branch of the Socialist Party, supported and financed largely by the trade unionists. Today the Socialists cannot muster enough strength to get their candidates on the ballot. World War patriotism and the red scares of 1919 and 1920 sent them to cover, and they have been kept there ever since primarily through the opposition of the unions. Organized labor in South Bend is bitterly opposed to radicalism of any kind, and in the present depression has been consciously minimizing the extent and significance of the unemployment situation in the vague hope that the spread of radicalism will thus be checked.

After interviewing many of the industrialists, bankers, business men, lawyers, social workers, ministers, and labor leaders of the community I was almost convinced that South Bend was not suffering from the depression. The unemployed were being provided for by private charity and by the township trustees. A representative of the governor of Indiana, who is also a retired official of the Studebaker Corporation, had opened an unemployment registry office in the Chamber of Commerce. Persons who could prove themselves bona fide residents of South Bend and who could also prove that they were actually out of work were asked to register at one of the fire stations. Some 4,800 men were permitted to register (after giving their life histories and satisfying the officials that they were really in need), and each of these men was given an identification card. This did not entitle him to a job, nor was he promised work; the card merely assured the holder that "you are in a better position to apply for work that will keep you going until times are better."

To be sure, some five or six hundred holders of these cards have in the last three months found employment, but not through the efforts of the unemployment committee, for this body considered its work done when the jobless were properly registered. Much of the relief work in the city has been carried on under the direction of the Community Fund, an organization comprising fourteen charities. The Community Fund this season collected $190,000, most of which it has now expended. Three soup kitchens were operated during the winter by this organization directly or indirectly. Other relief work costing the taxpayers of South Bend more than $100,000 has been carried on by the township trustees, while a few minor organizations and one or two churches likewise have distributed food and clothing. All of this relief work has been in the nature of unconditional charity. When South Bend learned that a rival Indiana metropolis, Fort Wayne, was forcing its jobless to work for their doles, and that by this means Fort Wayne was getting its parks cleaned up and much of its municipal construction and repair work done by the unemployed who were paid out of charity funds, many public-spirited citizens demanded that unconditional doles be stopped, and that the needy be put to work. But the storm blew over in time, and those hungry residents of South Bend who can and do present acceptable pedigrees are still being fed by the township or the Community Fund.

That is one side of the picture. The dominant groups are optimistic and unworried. They have documentary proof that the unemployed are being cared for, that there is no general distress, and that the workers are satisfied, if not altogether happy. One wonders, however, what has become of the 12,000 to 15,000 other factory mechanics, with their numerous dependents, who were employed in the industrial plants of the city in 1929. Two years ago the factory pay rolls showed approximately 30,000 men and women employed; today only about 15,000 workers are listed, and a large majority of these are working only part time. The Studebaker plant, for example, with a normal employment of 14,000, this last winter kept going with a staff numbering not more than 9,000, almost all of whom have been working only two or three days a week. It is estimated that some 3,000 men have gone back to the farms from which they came when high wages attracted them to South Bend during the boom period. That leaves about 12,000 workers, not to mention their dependents, who must be somewhere here in South Bend without employment and perhaps without food. These cannot all have been absorbed by the retail shops or personal services; indeed, it is doubtful whether any of them have been thus absorbed, for these services have been laying off rather than hiring help. And what about the part-time workers? Are their families getting enough to eat now that the bread-winners are earning only $15 or $20 a week, and often much less than that, when they were once getting $35 to $50 or more a week? Are they able to pay their rent bills? Have they enough fuel, clothing, medical attention? Are they going into debt?

I went into a dozen homes in the West End of South Bend and asked these questions. Some families had enough food "to get along on"; others frankly said "No," and the undernourished look of their children bore out their testimony. April has been fairly warm thus far, and so they did not mind the lack of fuel and the scarcity of clothing. Only five of the twelve families were paying rent; one family was ten months in arrears and another seven. Not one of the families had had a doctor all winter. Eleven of them had borrowed money on their furniture or other belongings at one time or another in the last six months. The head of one family was in prison, serving a year's sentence for an attempt to steal some pork from a farm near the city. I asked them about charity. Only the prisoner's family was getting charity; the others thought they did not need help; they would "get along somehow, and besides there are people around here who are worse off than we are."

From the real-estate dealers of the city I learned that there are hundreds of homes, mostly shabby cottages, on which no rent is being paid today. The owners either do not want to put these suffering people out into the street, or they feel that since South Bend is overbuilt—six or seven hundred homes are standing vacant—it is wiser to keep their property occupied, even by families who do not pay rent, than to let it stand empty and uncared for. A similar attitude has been manifested by mortgage-holders in cases where the owners of small homes have not been able to meet their interest payments. A foreclosure sale of a home in South Bend today would bring less than half the normal value of the property. By foregoing the interest the mortgage-holders are taking a smaller loss than they would by selling property in the present demoralized real-estate market. The loan sharks of South Bend have been equally practical if less charitable. An inquiry revealed that more than two thousand workers temporarily laid off by a single company here had pledged their household belongings with the loan sharks at interest rates ranging anywhere from 24 per cent upward. The Studebaker Corporation found that many of its idle workers were in similar plight, and loaned these men a total of $150,000, without interest, to clear up their chattel mortgages. Of this sum about $80,000 has so far been repaid.

The rest of South Bend may be ignorant of the struggle for existence confronting its working people, but the working people themselves are not. Many of them are facing the future with despair, and not a few of them are turning toward communism. I was asked upon more than one occasion what I thought of communism, what progress Russia was making. The Communist Party, unlike the A. F. of L., has seen fit to send organizers or agitators among them. Two of these agitators came down from Chicago a few months ago. One of them led a demonstration in front of the City Hall; his followers were dispersed, and he himself "lectured" in the police station. The newspapers carried no account of this incident, though some of the business men did not hesitate to boast about the manner in which the agitator was driven out of the city after having been beaten with the end of a rubber hose. The second man has been organizing meetings of factory mechanics out of work. These meetings have had to be held in a different place every night in order to dodge the police, who have instructions to break them up at any cost. The business men and police believe they have now put an end to these Communist gatherings. They say they have driven the agitators out of town and have lured their followers away with free meals. However that may be, I visited a Communist meeting held in an obscure hall in the West End night before last. More than two hundred men, all of them young and all of them with the mark of the experienced factory mechanic about them, were in attendance. The Communists are also reported to be publishing a clandestine newspaper and conducting a training class for school children, but of these I could learn little.

It is obvious that a small minority of the workers of South Bend are ready today to try something like the Russian experiment in this country; others among them are talking and thinking seriously about the Five-Year Plan, but are not yet ready to exchange their own insecure futures for the doubtful future of a Communist state. But for the rest of this Middletown called South Bend such a country as Russia actually does not exist. It is true, of course, that members of the Notre Dame faculty occasionally talk about Russia, but usually only to attack the Communists on religious grounds. The business men, or at least a few of the more intelligent of them, do not like Washington's Russian policy. South Bend has automobiles and sewing machines and plows to sell; before the war many of these were sold in Russia; the business men blame Washington for hampering this lucrative trade. They do not, however, want our Russian policy liberalized; they merely want it adjusted so that they can sell more of their goods in the Soviet Union.

The middle and upper classes in South Bend may think that the hard times have not been affecting them; yet beneath the surface of their life there is noticeable a vague feeling of insecurity. Thousands of them every week patronize the twoscore clairvoyant shops and fortune-tellers' parlors located in and about the city. I visited four of these seers. One, a woman, admitted that her income has trebled in the last year. A male fortune-teller and healer said that whereas his income averaged $35 a week in 1929, it is now running close to $200 weekly. The other two clairvoyants had similar tales to tell. Middle-class Middletown is groping for reassurance. The churches that have something in the way of mysticism to offer—the Roman Catholic, Episcopalian, and Christian Science churches—report increased attendance and contributions in the last year or so. The other Protestant churches, on the other hand, have experienced a slump in both attendance and revenues.

South Bend, then, is on the surface not seriously concerned with the depression, partly because it has not been so hard hit as some of the larger industrial centers, partly because it has chosen to close its eyes to some of the hard facts of the panic, but also partly because it neither understands nor seems to care what caused the depression or what its consequences may be. A few of its leaders, but only a few, realize that the city cannot afford to go into next winter in such blissful ignorance, unless a miracle occurs and the boom days of 1929 suddenly and unexpectedly return. The workers' debts are piling up, their children and to a considerable extent they themselves are undernourished, they are not getting proper medical attention. If in their weakened financial and physical condition they are brought face to face with another long winter of unemployment there doubtless will be trouble of one sort or another. A prominent lawyer declared frankly that "this thing cannot go on forever. We have had control of the situation up until now, and the warmer weather will help us, but if we have to go through another winter like the last one, it is not only possible but probable that we'll see any number of disturbances on a scale that will do grave injury to South Bend, but perhaps also wake it up." If the rioting that this man and a few others anticipate does come to pass, South Bend will be taken wholly by surprise, for its newspapers and its civic leaders have studiously refrained from keeping the city informed as to the seriousness of the underlying situation. The press did not mention the City Hall demonstration of last February; it has said nothing of several other demonstrations held in the West End; it carried not a line about the riot that took place a few weeks ago at the Bendix plant; it has observed complete silence concerning Communist and other radical activities. This Middletown known as South Bend can be optimistic about the depression, but that is only because it has not been allowed to know what it means.

Behind Spain's Revolution

By DEVERE ALLEN

Jaca, Spain, April 8

THEY say that when King Alfonso was very young he sometimes had to be shut up in a room by himself, whereupon he proceeded to yell at the top of his lungs "Long live the republic" until they let him out. Today the cry is heard all over Spain. It is particularly lusty in this frontier town of the western Pyrenees where the outbreak of last December began—a revolt which was not just a flash in the pan but which had been plotted throughout the kingdom, with a provisional cabinet chosen. This cabinet, be it noted, included both Republicans and Socialists, and for the first time in Spanish history the revolutionary manifesto was signed entirely by civilians instead of by a corps of military men. Military force was relied on to make the coup, but the guidance was non-military.

Under the leadership of Captains Galán and Garcia, two young officers who had a following for their radical ideas, the scheduled rebellion all but succeeded; Jaca's pro-Alfonso troops were locked up, and the revolutionary conquerors, crying "The republic, the republic!" piled into cars and hastened toward Huesca to join with comrades in an attempt to overthrow the royal power there also. But thanks to a telephone message which got through, the loyal troops were ready, and in a short time the rebels were captives themselves. The outbreak had come three days ahead of time, through inadequate organization; and in a few hours Galán and Garcia fell before a firing squad.

Alfonso was saved. But Jaca was still largely Republican, and in the very midst of the royal troopers who were here in large numbers and who were especially vigilant throughout the recent trials of the men implicated in the revolt, citizens carried in their pockets for circulation among all and sundry two fine post-card photographs of the handsome executed leaders. And although the courthouse, with its forbidding windows grilled by heavy iron, was well protected by colorful uniforms, the little chocolate bars that pass for cafes in Jaca did not require hushed voices for frank speech about Alfonso.

You get to Jaca from France by a new railroad winding up across the Pyrenees at an altitude of nearly 4,000 feet. Jaca itself is some 3,000 feet above sea level, and is in a formidable, inaccessible location. The Moors built its cathedral; Charlemagne took it on his Christianizing campaign. It is on the edge of the Basque country from which Unamuno hurls defiance at the throne, and not far from the Catalonian border of Aragon, beyond which exists a perpetual state of discontent where desires range from home rule to Sinn Fein separatism. Through Jaca Alfonso came to dedicate the railroad a year or so ago at Canfranc, the border station, and on that occasion he had the temerity to say in a speech addressed to Briand, who had come to share in the celebration, that Spain was a constitutional monarchy although the constitution was temporarily suspended pending its eventual restoration with certain reservations! The people do not forget these things. Spain is a country in ferment, divided by schisms innumerable and deep, as well as possessing in its temper a highly individualistic, disintegrating trend.

Spain has been a republic once, so voted by the Cortes, in 1873 and 1874. Alfonso XII, father of the present king, when entering upon his powers in 1876 at the beginning of the restoration, proclaimed loyalty to the new constitution, but at once demonstrated that by this he had meant only that he would bend it to his personal ends. Alfonso XIII was born a king, Alfonso XII having died before the birth of his son. Raised provincially under the narrow outlook of his mother, indoctrinated with the military ideas of the army schools, and dominated by the worst influences of the church in its reactionary self-aggrandizement, the young King began to assert his personal will, in violation of the constitution, soon after ascending to the royal power in 1902 at the age of sixteen.

Early he found that when he wanted something, the best response came from the army officers with whom he was always surrounded, or from the ecclesiastics with whom he fraternized. Both of these groups were quite willing to toady, if necessary, in order to win ultimate advantages. That they won advantages cannot be questioned—as witness the persecution of intellectual skeptics in the universities and the suppression of labor activities at the hands of the police and military. And thus, while Alfonso was always outwardly the dominating factor, Spain of the restoration was ruled by an actual triumvirate consisting of king, army, and church. There were army men and also ecclesiastics who stood out against the corrupt and cynical disregard of political rights which such a rule engendered, but they were usually as so many blades of grass before the sickle. Thus, long before the dictatorship of 1923, which placed in Alfonso's hands that directness of government which his mind had always relished, there was abundant unconstitutionality on the part of the king who had sworn, on the day of his coronation, loyalty to "the constitution and the laws, conscious of all that is implied in the solemn engagement contracted thereby before God and before the nation." Already the silver coins declaring they were of Rey Const. de España were counterfeit in sentiment.

Alfonso, turning his growing ambitions in the direction of Africa, had made so great a mess of his Moroccan war through his personal interferences that a parliamentary commission was due in 1923 to render a critical report; hence, if he did not deliberately connive at the establishment of Primo's dictatorship, he welcomed it with vast relief. The report was never made; Parliament was suspended—how many American business individualists know the happy feeling when Congress is out of the picture even for a time—and there was a rule of simple force, a method the King could grasp and feel at home with.

Primo de Rivera, truth to tell, did fairly well in many ways. He got things going when the old Spain was too sluggish to meet its surging new interests, created largely by the war; he developed roads and railways, instituted more modern customs, even finally read the handwriting on the wall and drafted a constitution. But the Spaniard does not easily fit into regimentation, and when the smoldering flames of working-class organizations were matched by business disquiet over the secret and futile efforts to conceal a budgetary collapse, Primo had to go.

What next? There was the army still to turn to. In Spain the army exists not for war but for political reasons mainly. You start with a private, who requires two corporals to watch him; these need the attentions of three sergeants, who have to have four lieutenants. And so it goes. For about 200,000 troops, the army has nearly 20,000 officers, more than 200 of them generals. From this group Alfonso picked Berenguer who, though severe in crises, talked glibly about Cortes and constitutions, and after withdrawing a promised election, promised it again. The Jaca revolt, even if it failed, was an ice-cold plunge to the clique in power.

The issue of Catalonia, the land-tenure problem, the stabilization of the peseta, even, are being laid aside for the elections, the first in eight years, granted because the serious danger of holding them was overbalanced by the greater danger of making further empty pledges.

Meantime, as the erstwhile jailbird Socialists and Republicans, imprisoned for their part in planning the December revolution but finally released after serving three months or so, go about their campaigning, they are the centers of tremendous crowds and are popular as never before. And while the prisoners condemned at Jaca for their share in the uprising set sail from Tarragona for island prisons, and their judge, also jailed for using the customary defense that a rebellion cannot be illegal when directed against an illegal government, leaves the port of Valencia, enormous masses of people line the quays, crying "Long live the republic!" The city council of Barcelona, repudiating a document they were constrained to sign in 1926 which attested loyalty and urged conformist behavior on the masses, made the occasion one of true Spanish drama by destroying it in an auto-da-fé.

The universities are sullen and angry, particularly the university at Madrid, where the police fired 4,000 shots at student demonstrators recently, killing at least one, wounding others, and hitting a medical ward where operations were being performed on children. Unamuno, who last May urged in Madrid the winning of freedom "in the streets" and was thereafter "escorted" to his home, has just gone to Madrid again and in the same great hall has again made a similar speech, crying out to a huge and cheering audience, "The blood and the deeds of December have separated Spain from her king." El Socialista, in a preelection review of the past rebellious weeks, upholds the revolutionaries as the truly legal forces in the country, and of their sentences declares: "Their judges may condemn them, but the nation will not."

Whether or not Spain contains a majority of people converted to the republican principle, the country wants no more of dictators and absolutists, either royal or military.

The Art of the American Indian

By HARTLEY ALEXANDER

AN exposition of Indian Tribal Arts has been announced for New York next November, at the Grand Central Art Galleries. The announcement states that "the art of the American Indian is just beginning to receive its due recognition as one of the world's greatest original expressions of design," and it goes on to say that the aim of the exposition is "to present American Indian art as art." It is just here that interest is stirred. Everyone knows American Indian craftswork as museum material, and there are literally thousands of private collections of "Indian curiosities" throughout the country, varying in size from a few articles to a few tons. But all these represent either the scientific or the antiquarian interest; an interest in Indian creations as art is less familiar and more challenging.

To one fairly well acquainted with the field the classes of objects that may sustain the challenge as objects of art for art's sake are not numerous. Rugs and blankets, baskets and pottery, ornamented skins and fabrics and especially beadwork, jewelry mainly of silver and turquoise—these, along with minor carvings and paintings, nearly exhaust the list. In the main they are utilitarian, having for motive either frank utility or personal adornment. What would seem to be a prime requisite of art for art's sake, namely, abstraction from immediate purpose, is almost wholly lacking. Yet if the Indian's art is genuinely to stand as a great "original expression of design," it must be because the patterns themselves possess intrinsic aesthetic qualities.

This is an exacting test, but Indian design is meeting it. The Navajo rug is an obvious example. Navajo blankets were first taken over by white men for purely utilitarian purposes, as bedding and body protection. The blankets were close in weave and light and strong in fabric; and it was to a great extent army officers, returning home or sending gifts, who were responsible for the first appearance of these blankets for household use. The blanket came to be used as a floor covering, and this development reacted upon both the supply and the design. The weaves became coarser, the texture heavier. The blanket became the rug, with modifications in size, shape, and design, and the craft expanded into an important industry, not only for the tribesmen but for the traders and dealers. It is significant that for purely aesthetic reasons the Navajo rug has come definitely to compete with other carpets. In many instances it has driven out Orientals, perhaps primarily because of its more stimulating color and pattern, but surely also in some degree because its geometric simplicities have so much in common with modern art, which is more concerned with form and motion than with bloom or modulation.

The pottery painting of the Pueblo Indians is certain eventually to prove a source of design even more universal, both because of its intrinsic richness and its more varied applicability. The production of this pottery, like that of Navajo rugs, has become definitely an industry, satisfying a demand for beautiful objects and not simply for curios or souvenirs. Owing to the freedom of the artist, painting at will upon a smooth surface, this art has naturally developed a variety of styles and a multiplicity of patterns far beyond the possibilities of the primitive weaver's craft. Apart from extinct types, displayed on museum shelves, there are today at least six styles of the Pueblo potter's design in active development. Each year from the Hopi villages, from Zuñi, from Acoma and Laguna, from Sia, from Santo Domingo, and from San Ildefonso come not only new patterns but frequently new techniques in pottery decoration. And many of these patterns are immediately adapted to prints of all sorts, paper and fabric. In fact, as a rich and fluent source of ornamental patterns Pueblo pottery is comparable to Greek or Chinese vessels and vases. The polychrome is limited. There are no beautiful glazes (though there is some hand polishing). Naturalistic forms are seldom employed with adeptness. But the conventional patterns are astonishing, for both their intricacy and their beauty. That the source of it, the imagination of the Pueblo Indian, is actively at work, inventive today as perhaps it has never been before, is certainly reason for felicitation. It represents one of our most important genuine artistic resources.

A third source of Indian design, which again is rich and varied, is the beadwork of the tribes of the Great Lakes and Plains regions. Their work is almost exclusively concerned with costume and accouterments, and is essentially the art of semi-nomadic peoples, concerned with the hunt and with the outdoors generally. Here are sunlit rather than shadowed spaces, glints caught in the distance, and, above all, motion, whether of dancer or horseman. Feathers and fringes, dressed skins and painted leathers go with it, combining to give us a picture of the costumed Indian as the theater would have him.

In detail, however, there is much that transcends mere costume in the beadwork patterns to be found, now on bands and bags, now on moccasins, dresses, cradles, horse gear. Here again there are schools of both technique and design. Sometimes beads are employed for outline, again they are blocked in in masses, as for color work. Patterns may draw heavily, now upon floral sources, now upon purely geometric sources, or again upon conventional symbols. The designs match those of Pueblo pottery for variety and far exceed them in change and beauty of coloring. At the same time there are almost no elements common to the two. As yet little transfer has been made of Indian bead design, which unfortunately lags as a living art, but in at least one notable instance its possibilities have been demonstrated. The ceiling of the Senate chamber in the State Capitol of Nebraska is covered with glazed tiles bearing a pattern which is wholly built up of Plains Indian beadwork motives, the work of Hildreth Meière.

In the three branches of Indian art which have been mentioned as fruitful sources of design, one may fairly inquire how much is unalloyed native, how much is due to the influence of an incoming race. The weaving of Navajo blankets is certainly recent, since it began with the flocks which supplied the wool. The wool is definitely of Spanish origin, but the weaving and the patterns may have existed among Pueblo populations who were working in cotton and other materials long before the day of the white man. There is no pronounced similarity in the designs of prehistoric and historic fabrics, though they belong to the same family, being composed of simple geometrical elements which are, after all, universal; and it seems altogether likely that the Southwestern Indians took many ideas both from the Spanish colonists and from the Mexican Indians who accompanied the Spaniards. But the important fact is that, whatever the impulse, the Navajo have made the design essentially their own and have developed it to a point where it embodies a living taste. Likewise in the case of the later art of silver jewelry—while the metallurgy came with the white man, the design and the art are native. Pueblo pottery has older and certainly native origins, but none can say that its modern florescence is entirely uninfluenced by the taste of the white man. The only example of obvious continuity from the prehistoric to the current style is to be found in Hopi pottery, and here it is due to the keenness of one woman, Nampeyo, who in studying the jars and shards unearthed by white archaeologists in her neighborhood mastered and revived the older fashion, to make of it one of the most notable expressions of the potter's craft. Latterly the potters of San Ildefonso have captured the white man's fancy, and deservedly, but while their art is full of invention it shows no tendency whatever to copy Caucasian forms.

In the case of beadwork, it is again apparent that its main reliance, as an art, is upon materials furnished by French and English manufacturers, and there are definite adaptations of motives of European origin. Yet the essence of the design is still autochthonous, harking back to wampum, quillwork, and cut-leather patterns rather than to any foreign ideas. In short, the materials—wool, silver, cloths, beads—have come with the trader, but the craft is native.

But all this has to do only with surface decoration; what is to be said of form in Indian art, form in its tridimensional developments? Here one may not so readily make a case. Indian jars and baskets are characteristically shapely, often finely proportioned; but they rarely show either classic grace or Oriental elegance, and certain of the later shapes are clearly after white men's models. It is quite true, as it is often said, that the birch-bark canoe is one of the most beautiful of boats, but here we are dealing in part with an accident of material. Many pipes, bowl and stem, are interesting, or even beautiful, yet this is a small art upon which to base a reputation. Carved masks are commonly grotesques, and modeled forms generally are crude. It is only among the tribes of the Northwest Coast that carving is outstanding, and here, in spite of the beauty of form of wood and stone vessels, the dominating note of animal-form heraldry leaves mainly an impression of the bizarre, even if this be in quality unforgettable. Indeed, there are few pieces of American Indian sculpture—the Singing Girl of Peten is one of them—even among the barbaric builders of the Mayan south, that are notable as sculpture in the round; the highest expression of their sculptors' art, the painted bas-relief, was still of the nature of the picture, still of the surface. African carvings probably surpass Indian, as certainly even the cruder examples of Oriental sculpture do also.

When it comes to painting, another story is to be told. The art, unfortunately, is one which invites ready destruction, and even from the Mexican civilizations few examples have survived. But these few include such a masterpiece as the Dresden Codex, along with fragments of fresco that immediately command our respect. In the United States virtually all of the older skin-paintings have disappeared. Those which do survive belong to the past century only, and mainly to the latter half of it. Yet among these survivals are enough examples of a quality which makes us understand that here is a genuine expressive art—no longer merely ornament. This is particularly true of the art of the Plains tribes, in which feats of arms and the chase of the bison are the dominating subjects. The power of the Indian in portraying animals in action is equal to that of the Magdalenians of paleolithic Europe, while his ability in handling picturesque groups of both men and animals, his power to compose impressively, is far superior to that of any other primitive people. Indeed, one is tempted to ask if any art of pictorial illumination has ever rivaled for excitement and motion the battle scenes of Amos Bad Heart Bull, or if any horse lovers have been so economically true to their animal as another Siouan artist, Kills Two. The art of both men, as of the Plains Indians generally, is wholly native and unsophisticated. Native also are the recent remarkable developments of Kiowa and Pueblo painting.

Only a blind imagination can fail to look forward with keen interest to the promised exposition, and there are many admirers of what the Indian has already achieved who feel that the exposition will lead to an awakened appreciation, and to renewed stimulation, of Indian art.

Among Those Surveyed

By GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS STEWARD

THE fact-finding procedure called the survey has become indispensable to research technique. And as object to be surveyed it seems that the Negro has become equally indispensable. When, momentarily, every socially misfit condition has been exhaustively studied, those whose investigative itch remains unsatisfied seek a human maladjustment to which to direct the attention of opulent philanthropic foundations, and having found it strive by talk to elevate it as a cause for alarm to such an extent that it will release funds for office space, salaries, travel, and questionnaires. If this calculated effort fails to produce a "problem" which "demands" a survey, there is always the Negro.

Such surveys usually adopt one of three methods. First, there is the casual exploratory visit. This is not properly a survey. It is, however, the favorite device of interracial bodies, classes in sociology, and mission study groups. For example, students of the State school at Auburn, Alabama, spend a few hours at Tuskegee Institute visiting shops, classrooms, and farms, are entertained with "spirituals," and thus acquire first-hand knowledge of the Negro. A class at Ohio State University makes a tour of business concerns owned by Negroes, parades through halls and offices, glances vacantly at clerks and equipment, comments in the semi-whispers one associates with deathbed scenes, and returns to the university, having gained in three hours' sight-seeing as much information about the Negro as the same effort in a zoo would yield about the home habits of the caged animals on view. A further illustration of this happy and useless method is the recent Pullman excursion through the South of the American Interracial Seminar.

The second method has more serious pretensions. Its chief instrument is the questionnaire. It concerns itself frequently with some particular phase of Negro life. A Negro, any Negro, may find one of these questionnaires in any day's mail. Here is one concerning illicit sexual relations between white women and black men—a question which however cosmically significant it may be to the interrogator is not likely to alter perceptibly the course of human progress. This questionnaire asks about white prostitutes entertaining colored men, about bastard offspring of white mothers and black fathers, about white common-law wives of Negroes. Unfortunately for the maker of the questionnaire, I am without experience or information in the field indicated, whites and blacks go right on intermingling sexually without legally registering their intentions, and I am forced to ignore the questionnaire.

The third method of studying the Negro is modern to the minute. It has efficient machinery and ample finance. There is a headquarters, which may be a desk in the office of a city welfare institution, independent quarters downtown, or the department of sociology of a big university. There will be a commission, a director, assistants, stenographers. Charts, graphs, data cards, "studies" in manuscript, and discussion will multiply amazingly. The survey may be a specialization or it may embrace the entire "life" of the Negro. The work of the Chicago Vice Commission and the study published last year by Dr. Charles S. Johnson of Fisk University are illustrations.

To many among those surveyed, the personal worker—the distinguishing feature of this method—is particularly disquieting. Sometimes he gains access to intimate facts through friendship or by failure to make a completely truthful statement about the use to which the facts are to be put. Or he simply approaches a home like a canvasser, armed with pad, pencil, and questions devastating to self-respect. Was your grandmother married to your grandfather? Was either white? Is there syphilis or insanity in the family? But the machine is efficient. Despite an occasional abruptly shut door information pours into headquarters, files choke with data-filled cards, and walls disappear behind pin-stuck maps.

Two questions arise here. First, what becomes of the material gathered? For the past three decades the Negro has been repeatedly surveyed. A vast store of material must have thus accumulated. Where is it deposited for public use? For these surveys have been undertaken in the public interest. So rich philanthropists have been persuaded, foundations have announced, and the unheeding public has been assured. Reports, necessarily limited, are given to and buried in the press. An occasional book appears, with a price so high or with subject so circumscribed or so technically expressed as to foredoom general interest. Ceremoniously embalmed by graduate-school faculties, much of the matter reposes as doctors' dissertations on shelves in university libraries. Where is the remainder?

Second, what good are these never-ending surveys? The stock reply the researcher gives to this question is that they furnish bases for reform programs. A summary of all programs for social betterment resulting from surveys would be illuminating. Considering the prodigious work involved, concrete benefits arising therefrom seem disproportionately small. Certain advantages to a limited number of individuals are apparent—well-paid jobs, public recognition of talent which might remain otherwise obscure, intellectual stimulation of scholastic groups. But that the general welfare is discoverably improved is doubtful.

A third question presents itself to the Negro. If he were either superman or missing link, that would have been discovered long ago. For he has been minutely examined, from his adroitly advertised nonesuch thick skull to his equally cleverly advertised nonesuch flat feet. Brain tissue, blood composition, bone formation, muscle distribution, nerve reaction have been compared. Over and over again his pet diseases have been card-indexed, his crimes catalogued, his sexual behavior described, his occupations listed, his housing conditions noted, his lack of grandfathers indicated, his birth- and death-rates determined. These labyrinthine examinations disclose only that he is mere man, with the common frailties and glories of all mankind. Then why postulate that he is still a thing apart to be separately studied and specially treated?

From the contemplation of the extensive labors and the unceasing flow of talk which these recurring surveys create, a thoroughly disillusioned Negro arises. For assurance has been given him that these detailed reviews are for his good. Nevertheless, he finds that after all this labored effort to reveal what he is and the conditions under which he exists nothing fundamental happens. A school may be built, an apartment erected, a playground provided, a community center founded, a Y. M. C. A. established, an urban league organized. But the Negro is still held down to the lowest economic level among the socially unwanted.

In the Driftway

WITH spring on and "public works" under way the Drifter grows anxious about trees. And he wishes, for once, that he were ubiquitous—that he might be present to speak a piece in favor of going around every giant oak and maple that will fall this summer to make way for barren asphalt, to make a straight way for foul-smelling, speeding automobiles, in order that fewer reckless drivers may smash their fenders and their necks in the mad rush to reach their destination, which most likely will turn out to be a place where there are trees. Thus we preserve, if not increase, the number of reckless drivers while we speed on toward the complete annihilation of trees. Yet, judged on its merit, the tree would win every time. That goes for any tree. As for the great oaks and elms, the maples and beeches that are lighting up the woods and fields and the back roads this month with red buds and green-gold leaves, the Drifter marvels that any man, merely because he has an ax or a saw or a contract to straighten out a curve, can take upon himself the responsibility for snuffing out the life of a tree that was growing when his grandfather was young, that will still be growing, but for his presumptuous ax, when his grandchildren are gathered to their graves. Yet thousands of trees fall every year in a holocaust that would fill the Drifter's heart with sorrow if it did not make his blood boil with fury.

* * * * *

PROGRESS is a fearful and wonderful thing, and the Drifter has no desire to impede its march. He would almost as soon—not quite—live without trees as without telephones. But he cannot, for the life of him, see why a choice is necessary—why ten young maples must be required, if not to give up their lives, at least to be disfigured forever by the lopping off of limbs to make way for poles and wires over which Mrs. Jones may gossip with Mrs. Smith to the great detriment of Mrs. Brown. Yet for some occult and apparently mighty reason the wires and the poles can never be set six feet to the west or to the east. They must go just where that line of maples has been growing since father was a boy. The Drifter thinks the reason is usually no reason at all. It is merely that a high-handed dictatorial telephone company, with an arrogance born of too much monopoly and too little contact with trees, orders the sacrifice; and the subscriber, overawed by progress, carries out the order. The public utilities of this country have committed many a sin according to what the Drifter reads in the editorial pages up ahead, but there is none more grievous than the ruin they have brought to fine trees. If only one could be sure that all tree-killers when they die would be consigned to a treeless desert and there be chased round and round forever by live, hungry axes and playful nipping saws.

* * * * *

THE Drifter knows one woman who thought, and proved, that the choice between trees and telephones need not be made. She wanted a telephone. The company assured her it would be necessary to lop off half the limbs of a row of twenty-year-old maples that she had set out with her own hands. "Never," said she, and meant it. The lady has a telephone, though. They brought it to her from another direction. It seems to fulfil its function—and the trees are among the most beautiful the Drifter knows about. For contrast there is the sad tale of a town in Connecticut where at least six magnificent elms a hundred feet high and more than a hundred years old were cut down only last spring. With what advantage to the town? Well, it is possible now to stand before the garish painted front of one chain store, look across a wide and desolate paved street, and see the garish painted front of another chain store without a single branch or trunk to obscure the vision —and what a vision!

* * * * *

AS for roads, has anyone ever thought to ask why every single curve must go? There are curves and curves. Some are dangerous, to be sure, and should be straightened. But some are so slight as to be dangerous only to morons. Must our roads, like our movies, be as dull and smooth as a moron's mind? Yet so far as the Drifter can make out, thousands of dollars and millions of bright branches are spent each year merely to keep fools from killing themselves. At the risk of appearing brutal, the Drifter submits that the game is not worth the candle if the candle is a maple that spring lights up. He will be told that the morons kill not only themselves but others who may be worth more to the community. That is true, but the Drifter holds out still for the occasional subtlety of a curved road and a spreading tree. It is still possible—though it grows admittedly more difficult every day—for intelligence to protect itself against stupidity. And the Drifter might, if pressed, even go so far as to point out that lives have been sacrificed for things much less worth dying for than trees in spring.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

A Word to the Dirt Farmer

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Our friend the "Dirt Farmer," who admits, in your issue of March 4, to being very much puzzled, would cut the earth in two if he had a big enough saw. He gives the impression that the government at Washington should, at one fell swoop, abandon its agricultural research and fire its entomologists, because these tend to increase production while the Farm Board—ill-fated though it may be—attempts to accomplish what the worms would do free of charge if left to their own devices.

If, on the one hand, the Farm Board advocates curtailment of production, the government does not necessarily oppose itself by ordering its entomologists to go after the very last insect. The true purpose of the agricultural department is to increase the production per unit area of land, per man, or per some other similar unit. It is only by eliminating insects and evolving more efficient methods that the present output will be realized from a smaller area and with less labor. Fewer worms and more efficiency do not necessarily mean more output but less energy in securing the same production.

Chicago Needs a Liberal Press

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: A short time ago the Chicago Evening Post was put up for auction. The Chicago Journal of Commerce purchased it, and its editions are sold on the streets of Chicago without any apparent change.

Many intelligent Chicagoans often wonder why a liberal newspaper has never attempted to gain a foothold in this city. We have Hearst, the McCormicks, the Strongs, a tabloid, and the above-mentioned brokers' organ. We wonder where the Scripps-Howard company and other liberal publishers were when the Post was put up for sale? In my opinion there is no city on earth more capable of supporting a liberal daily than Chicago.

Chicago, April 9 Tom Rylands

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: And now that the Chicago Tribune has triumphed, it can well pat Big Bill on the back, acknowledge that he put up a good fight, and shake hands all around. For almost twenty years "Bill the Builder," single-handed, fought one of the greatest powers in history, and got the decision in most of the rounds. The result, of course, could have been foreseen. How could one man, or a million men, conquer the Chicago Tribune? Yet Thompson never outgrew the spirit of American democracy taught him in grammar school, and childishly believed that Americans would not permit such powerful giants to dictate the government of a great city.

To us citizens of Chicago the change of mayors makes little difference. We shall continue to be ruled by self-seeking politicians allied with criminals. Cermak's myriad of job-seekers are not one whit better than Thompson's henchmen. And the people of Chicago will continue to bow their heads under the rule of crime and criminals just as long as their thinking is prescribed by the Chicago Tribune, the Chicago American, and the Chicago Daily News. We need a press in Chicago attuned to the ideals of The Nation. Under existing conditions no one paper of the sort can achieve the necessary circulation. A score of neighborhood papers edited by Americans of the Villard school could do the trick. Meanwhile, we must multiply the circulation of The Nation in Chicago.

The Barbarous "Wozzeck"

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: It seems to me that Arthur Mendel, in his article If the Metropolitan Should Go Musical, is rather dictatorial.

If anyone wishes to see the barbarous "Wozzeck," let him journey to Philadelphia. That is not too great a punishment for those who would help to discourage what few strongholds of conservative culture we have. Let there be a few institutions that will not be swept aside by every occasional wind of fad that blows through the field of art, or what in these materialistic and mechanical days passes for art.

Wenoneh, N. J., April 16 Elbert M. Conover

Mooney and Billings

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The writer would like to hear from all Nation readers in Montana and nearby places who would be interested in attending a conference to be held in Helena or Butte during the early summer of 1931 for the purpose of discussing plans to secure justice for Mooney and Billings. And I suggest that Nation readers in other States and other liberals would do well to hold a similar conference for the same purpose.

Another Macleod

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Contrary to your note about me in the contributors' box in your issue of April 1, I did not write "German Lyric Poetry." The Norman Macleod who did is, I think, an Englishman.

Birthday in April

By HORACE GREGORY

This is the day that I began; this is new year's in the terse calendar that opens with my name.
April and south winds in the sky repeat the same rhythm and the identical body sleeps, hears Spring at morning waking the same trees that always wear the sun on slender branches that somehow rise out of dark streets curved downward at night and men's eyes cannot discern the roots coiled and unwinding under doors and hallways.

It is not the season but inevitable return of seasons that destroys the days, the hours fixed in a man's brain and builds them new again; flowers and grass covering a ruined city. And full of these quick seasons, I retrace the day my breath first issued toward my third decade. Let stones, spires, earth,
O Trinity, answer death.

Economics: The Lively Science

The Nemesis of American Business. By Stuart Chase. The Macmillan Company. $2.

LIKE everything else that Stuart Chase writes, this book is alive. There is the same difference between it and the average economic textbook as between an athlete doing a pole vault and a skeleton hung in a classroom. Mr. Chase can dramatize his subject as few men can. He deals very little in abstractions, very much in concrete facts, specifically the facts of 1930 and 1931. His economic men are not calculating ghosts, windy concepts; they are fellows who wear fancy neckties, catch the 8:17, and dodge Buicks and Chryslers on the way to work. A distressingly large number of them, also, are men in frayed trousers, who stand stolidly for hours, three, four, and six abreast, in lines winding around the block, on the slim chance of getting a job. Mr. Chase does not talk solemnly and vaguely about Supply, Demand, the Principles of Distribution; but he tells you how the A. O. Smith Corporation, in Milwaukee, makes automobile frames with a machine filling a whole building, replacing 2,000 robots with 200 skilled men; or how integrity has become a luxury that few of us can afford; or how group-insurance rates are causing big business to refuse to hire men over forty; or how complicated and perilous the modern city is under its sidewalks. He contrasts the quiet economic life of the self-contained Mexican Indian village with that of the insecure worker in New York, Detroit, or Pittsburgh. He gives us the most vivid portrait ever penned of our obscene national messiness: he simply looks out of railroad-car windows and reports what he sees—rickety cottages, littered yards and inclosures, tobacco barns, abandoned motor cars, signboards and roadside eruptions generally, cut-over woodlands, factory sidings, coal and wood yards, dumps full of soggy newspapers, tin cans, go-carts, kerosene stoves, spring beds, glass bottles, tires, banana peels, farm machinery. In brief, the economics Mr. Chase gives us is not a blue-print diagram, but an oil painting in full colors, and even full stenches.

Yet this pictorial economics has the defects of its qualities: it is impressionistic, and a bit slapdash. Mr. Chase's diagnoses and remedies are sometimes too confident and racy. Let us take an example or two. Like many other recent writers, Mr. Chase is constantly referring to excess plant capacity as "the most immediately critical factor in the whole 'overproduction' situation." Now I doubt that this factor is as important or as necessarily evil as it is commonly represented to be. Plant capacity was even more "excessive" in some lines in 1921 than it is now; there were economists then who pointed to it as perhaps the most important reason why no recovery could be looked for from that depression; nevertheless, the recovery came. It is well known that for a factory to operate at its theoretical maximum is wasteful. And if only half the capacity is being used the situation is not necessarily desperate. A modern mass-production factory working at only 50 per cent capacity may still be immensely more economical than an older-type factory working full blast. The real question, it seems to me, is whether big mass-production plants can work at 50 per cent capacity and still make a net profit; and apparently many of them can, as shown by last year's record for the leading motor-car manufacturers. Moreover, it is better to have room to expand in than to have to throw up new factories in haste should a sudden increase in demand appear. When plant capacity becomes too excessive, the marginal plants, the older and less efficient plants, must be scrapped; it is real economy to scrap them; and so the situation tends to cure itself. The loss for foolish plant expansion, further, falls on the producer, who is compelled to write off its cost, and not on the consumer; the latter, in fact, reaps the temporary benefit of the price-cutting which excessive competition brings. I am not trying to show that plant expansion that is really foolish confers an actual social benefit, but merely that it is certainly not "the most immediately critical factor" in the present situation.

Perhaps we can recognize both the strengths and weaknesses of Mr. Chase's economics more fully if we consider, say, the seven brief recommendations in his chapter on the End of an Epoch. We may list and comment upon them:

First Remedy: Call "an immediate international conference on economic disarmament." Comment: The chief party to such a conference would be the United States. The chief things it could do would be to reduce the tariff and readjust war debts. If the will to do this existed in Mr. Hoover or in Congress it could be done without a conference.

Second Remedy: Get Congress to enact laws revising the credit structure. "The physical structure was never more sound. The basic difficulty seems to be a paper one—greenbacks, stock certificates, notes, foreign drafts, ledger folios. The engineer is a century ahead of the banker." Comment: Currency and credit do not seem to be Mr. Chase's forte; he has apparently taken too seriously the garbled nonsense of such writers as the Messrs. Foster and Catchings. His own doctrines of excess capacity, technological unemployment, and technological tenuousness (if I may use an ad hominem argument) mean that the physical structure is not sound; they mean that the engineer is one of the chief culprits responsible for our present predicament. Waiving this, however, it seems to me that our credit and currency structure is on the whole remarkably sound and smooth-working. As a cure for maldistribution of income or of "purchasing power," any tinkering with the currency would be largely irrelevant; the remedies here lie much deeper, involving such questions as minimum-wage and child-labor laws, old-age pensions, unemployment insurance, inheritance and income taxation, birth control, decent childhood nourishment, technical training. There is much to be said, of course, for revision of the banking laws (principally those of the States), chiefly in the direction of insuring the solvency of individual banks; but recent experience emphasizes the fact that such legislation by itself is futile unless our bankers are in the main careful and honest, and our State and federal supervisors incorruptible and alert.

Third Remedy: Set up a National Planning Board to prepare a Ten-Year Plan for "coordinated economic development." Comment: The program of such a board could probably not be carried through without a complete dictatorship, supported by force. When attempted on a limited scale, most recent governmental "planning" and "stabilizing" schemes have ended disastrously—e.g., the Stevenson rubber-restriction plan, Brazil's coffee valorization, Australia's wool scheme, Egypt's effort to bolster cotton, and the activities of our own Farm Board.

Fourth Remedy: "Amend the Sherman anti-trust law, and permit the regularization of production and the allocation of markets, but only when consistent with a proper regard for the conservation of natural resources, and with due protection, through public regulation, for the consumer against monopoly prices." Comment: An excellent statement of the problem; but the real difficulties lie in its detailed application.

Fifth Remedy: A vast slum-razing and home-building program. Comment: Admirable. But here again it is the details that raise the really difficult problems. To what extent can the cities go farther into debt? Are the cities to be permanent landlords and house sellers? If houses cannot be rented or sold at cost, shall they be rented or sold below cost? How much below? Who is to decide which particular persons are to benefit as tenants and buyers? Incidentally, there would be rich opportunities here for graft and corruption, as the post-war reconstruction in France showed; and the history of our cities does not indicate that such opportunities would be missed.

Sixth Remedy: "Abolish stock-exchange gambling." Comment: Organized speculation, in commodities as well as stocks, performs an economic function of immense importance, even though it is subjected to many abuses. No legal formula has yet been found that would separate reckless and ignorant gambling from intelligent and informed speculation, or even investment. Nearly all radical legislative interference with organized speculation—e.g., that in gold during the Civil War—has ended calamitously.

Seventh Remedy: "A determined resistance by all and sundry against wage reductions." Comment: This is a complicated question, not to be solved by any general slogan. There is no general "wage level"; that is merely a mathematical average, a fiction; each industry presents its own problems. Thus if we assume that a fair wage was being paid before the price collapse, and if there is little possibility of increasing in the near future the individual worker's productivity in a given industry, then intransigent resistance to any wage reduction in that industry may simply delay a necessary readjustment, and keep men out of work who could be otherwise employed. Further, to the extent that there is an actual fall in living costs through lower prices, a corresponding cut in money wages would not be a cut in real wages. So many employers, however, are eager to seize upon any excuse for cutting wages that no union ought to accept a reduction without a most careful scrutiny of all the relevant facts.

In sum, Mr. Chase has a tendency to gloss over the concrete difficulties, to offer all-embracing solutions which have not been thought through; he puts too much faith in magic words like "planning." But I should be leaving a very false impression if I failed to add that his profound awareness of the evils which the routineers accept with complacent blindness, his earnest and persistent reforming spirit, his remarkably fresh and realistic insight into what is actually going on, make him one of the healthiest seminal forces in American economic thought today.

The Bathos of Mr. Walpole

Above the Dark Tumult. By Hugh Walpole. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

TO notice properly Mr. Hugh Walpole's latest novel of Piccadilly blackmail on one winter night, one should really quote verbatim the whole first chapter of Somerset Maugham's "Cakes and Ale," a method of reviewing which would hardly be fair to the readers of this paper, or to the reviewer. Unquestionably Mr. Maugham has done the job for all time, and any mere reviewer who finds himself prodigiously bored by any Walpollyanna (he has already written thirty-one books, and is still a fine, upstanding young man, six feet in his socks) has only to underwrite: "Hugh Walpole's latest masterpiece! Vide Maugham: Vol. I, chap. i!" Somewhere in that fine, understanding, infinitely malicious performance there is mention of the celebrated tripe about genius being only the art of taking infinite pains. Mr. Walpole has swallowed this saying hook and line, and produced, as we see, thirty-one volumes.

My first introduction to the works of Mr. Hugh Walpole came by way of a nice little thing entitled "Prelude to Adventure," which might never have seen daylight had not Dickens once written his greatest book entitled "Little Dorrit." Having discovered his formula, the cool appropriation of another man's atmosphere, Hugh went virilely on to pastures new. He even went to Russia, and discovered the Russian novel; hence "The Dark Forest," "The Secret City," and what not. He found out that there was an Englishman named Trollope, much admired in the best circles, hence "The Cathedral," and a couple of others like it. In course of time the whimsical romance of childhood and school days had its innings, and Hugh shot out the Jeremy series, including a thing called "Jeremy at Crale," which is, without exception, the most odious example of sham-manly, bogus-virile adult infantilism I have ever read.

This is all very well, and there is no law against writing thirty-one books were it not that Mr. Walpole is acclaimed far and wide as one of the heads of his profession and masters of the English novel. He is a man without enemies, so we are told, and is cordially loved by everyone, especially his publisher. He is so manly, so ingenuous, so horribly wholesome. Every time that a new masterpiece crosses the Atlantic, in which the genius of Dickens, Dostoevski, Trollope, or Tom Hughes is wedded to the art of taking infinite pains, with a strong dash of cheap and spurious and watery mysticism, all Mr. Walpole's own, thrown in, the American undergraduate stirs on his pennants, and the American club lady goes off into the ecstasies peculiar to her.

I suppose the Piccadilly novel will be no exception to the rule, but I see that I have left very little space to deal with it. It seems to be an attempt to do for post-war London what Shorthouse did so consummately for post-Renaissance Italy; to establish some eerie plane between fact and fantasy, cruel realism and genial madness, with a rather nasty little plot of blackmail and murder as undercurrent and the dark turmoil of Piccadilly Circus playing ground-bass. Having got his idea, as usual, from somebody else, Mr. Walpole does his best with it, with the result that it is thick with his peculiar "atmosphere," and there are one or two very neat treatments of the Circus with its electric fires and falling snow done by a practiced hand, as what hand would not be after turning out thirty-one books? When the author, however, mounts his high romantic horse, and the mock-heroic, grand moral complications begin, we refuse to go farther with him. His Pengellys who make a religion of blackmail and dote upon their victims, his Helens more flatly unreal than any ringleted heroine out of Dickens, his blonde Elizabethan giants like Osmund, screaming shrill platitudes, make us, depending on our mood, either snicker with unintended mirth or, to use Miss Rebecca West's accurate phrase, "whimper with boredom." The great trouble with Mr. Walpole is that, like many Englishmen with a sound classical education, he has been blessed or cursed with an enormous verbal fluency, without anything to say. Bless his heart, he wants so to express himself in print, and, heaven knows, in this case, he does. He has all the literary temperament in the world, and absolutely no talent. It is the old story of the frog who thought greatness depended on auto-inflation. So—to adopt for a moment the style of Mr. A. A. Milne—the nice creature swelled and swelled, and . . . we all know what happened. Only it doesn't seem to be happening to Mr. Walpole. On the contrary, he announces that the second volume of the "Herries series" will appear in the autumn, and no one of his admirers appears to find anything indecent in the announcement. CUTHBERT WRIGHT

From Atoms to Galaxies

The Stars in Their Courses. By Sir James Jeans. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

Flights from Chaos: A Survey of Material Systems from Atoms to Galaxies. By Harlow Shapley. Whittlesey House. $2.50.

SIR JAMES JEANS, who has led us of late "into the deep waters" of abstract physics and metaphysics, cannot be said in his latest book to return to earth, for he deals with the vault of heaven, the planetary system, the stars, and the nebulae; but certainly in these enlarged and amplified radio talks he is speaking once more a tongue that any intelligent and interested reader can understand. Entirely up to date, clear, simple, and copiously illustrated, there could be no better volume to put into the hands of an inquirer, young or old, who has hitherto known nothing of astronomy but wishes to gain an aeroplane's-eye view of the sky and "that which in it is."

From this compact but compendious book the reader may be graduated to Dr. Shapley's survey of material systems, which leads him from light quanta, electrons, and protons to planets, stars, galactic and globular clusters, gaseous and meteoric nebulae, internal and external galaxies, multiple galaxies, and supergalaxies (forming together a vast Metagalaxy); finally—by including interstellar particles and radiation and terrestrial organisms—to an, at present, immeasurable Cosmoplasm. And the length of these words need discourage no lay reader: there is nothing in the book he cannot readily understand.

Perhaps the most astonishing facts set forth in this highly important volume are those tending to prove that our Milky Way is really a galaxy of galaxies, many of its contained star clouds being isolated universes or stellar systems. As Dr. Shapley says: "If we treat some of the Milky Way clouds as comparable to the Magellanic clouds, and therefore, effectively, as galaxies, should we not also consider as a galaxy the system of stars that closely surrounds the sun?"

Our sun is near the center of a "local" star system, or galaxy, and quite remote from the real galactic center. Our local system is inclined some twenty degrees to the plane of the Milky Way, and is displaced about 50,000 or 60,000 light-years (equivalent to 5,900,000,000,000 miles each) from the center of the supersystem outlined by globular clusters. Our local system has a diameter of the order of 6,000 or 7,000 light-years, although its dimensions may be considerably larger. Our local system may be "like a typical spiral or spheroidal galaxy, or irregular and broken like a Magellanic cloud." It appears that our local system is speeding northward toward Cygnus at a rate of about 250 miles a second.

As the title of the book indicates, these are flights from chaos, but no flight into an obvious plan and purpose. Dr. Shapley describes the twelve great ordinal systems, with their subsystems, as he finds them, effecting a fairly satisfactory progressive classification, but talks of neither evolution nor devolution, in a genetic sense. He may be thought of by the future historian (at least as far as this book is concerned) rather as a Linnaeus of astronomy—the first successful taxonomist of inanimate systems—than as a Darwin of cosmology. His classification, he explains, "represents progress toward order but not a complete escape from chaos." In any sample region of the universe we find evidences of apparent, if not actual, confusion. The layman has so long been regaled with pious references to the "perfect order" of the universe of stars, clearly pointing to a finished plan and an omniscient Designer, that he can but agree with Professor Shapley that it is "a relief to find that we need not assume our galactic system to be an organization of unique type and of abnormal consequence."

In place of the astronomical photographs which illustrate "The Stars in Their Courses," "Flights from Chaos" has illustrations both charming and unusual; Miss Muriel Mussells, the artist, is to be congratulated on her original drawings.

MAYNARD SHIPLEY

Three Poetesses

The Matchless Orinda. By Philip Webster Souers. Harvard University Press. $3.50.

The Singing Swan. An Account of Anna Seward. By Margaret Ashmun. With a Preface by Frederick A. Pottle. Yale University Press. $3.50.

Christina Rossetti. By Dorothy Margaret Stuart. English Men of Letters. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

BY a curious coincidence these three volumes deal with three women each one of whom was the most conspicuous poetess in England while she lived, and each one of whom flourished at a different century's end from the others. Katherine Philips, "The Matchless Orinda," was born in 1631; Anna Seward, "The Swan of Lichfield," was born in 1742; Christina Rossetti, nickname her what you will, was born in 1830. Coming thus at regular intervals, they nicely represent the minor poetry of their respective times; and their stories, in so far as they are more than personal, have something to say, I suppose, about the growing status of women in this greatest of English arts.

Yet it would be difficult to prove that Mrs. Philips, for instance, found the world any less disposed to accept her than Christina Rossetti found it. The Matchless Orinda was incredibly well known during at least a quarter-century after the Restoration; and Professor Pottle, speaking of Miss Seward's circle, says "it is hard for us to realize how famous these people once were." No, the poetess in England during any portion of these last two hundred and fifty years has inhabited a friendly world. If there is any moral to be drawn from the three books, it is that the friendliness has been excessive and undiscriminating. Had Mrs. Philips been a man and written the same poetry I think we should never have heard of her; the same goes for Miss Seward; and Christina Rossetti escapes by a bare half-dozen lyrics—enough, to be sure.

This is not to say that the three narratives were not worth writing. Mrs. Philips's mild Platonism, applied as it was to the business of friendship, makes her correspondence, and sometimes her poetry, quite worth talking about; she is symptomatic of much that is interesting in the intellectual life of her century. Mr. Souers has studied the documents in her case with excellent care, and has achieved, in addition to a definitive biography of his subject, a just understanding of the importance which her friendships had in her career. Miss Ashmun's subject has the least to recommend her of the three—unless the reader is so smitten with the desire to step into Dr. Johnson's circle that he is willing to enter it hand in hand with one whom the Doctor despised. For Miss Seward's chief claim to fame is that both Johnson and Boswell disliked her. They may very well have been wrong, as they so often were, and as Miss Ashmun in her graceful essay probably proves; but I cannot see that it matters in view of the poetry Anna Seward wrote. Miss Stuart, working with a much more picturesque and significant case, has made the most of it on the biographical side, where the relations of Christina Rossetti, first with her famous family and then with the two men whom she loved yet renounced for religious reasons, offer an almost sensational opportunity. Critically Miss Stuart is weak, as are so many of the biographers whom J. C. Squire has chosen to carry on the English Men of Letters series; weak, lenient, and perfunctory. Christina Rossetti can properly be praised only for her early lyrics—the ones everybody knows. Miss Stuart praises too much else; nor does she point to certain very definite flaws even in the gems; nor, as she might have done, does she go for perspective to the one really distinguished poetess in the modern world, Emily Dickinson of Amherst, who also was born in 1830.

MARK VAN DOREN

Notes on Fiction

Plagued by the Nightingale. By Kay Boyle. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.50.

It is not unlikely that this novel was written before some, if not all, of the stories contained in Miss Boyle's recent "Wedding Day and Other Stories." In that case it would be beside the point to compare it to her previously published work. We had better judge it simply as her first novel. The story is that of a summer spent by a young American woman with the family of her French husband. The husband is slowly being crippled by a hereditary disease and bitterly refuses to have children. His family, however, wants them. There is also a young doctor, regarded as a suitor by the three daughters of the family, who falls in love, however, with the young American wife. The reader who has followed Miss Boyle's work is pleased by the first part of this novel. Her dainty eye and her dainty sentences are once more in evidence. Quite effectively she employs the device of reticence, and it gives to her slowly unfolding story, as the summer days pass one by one, a Turgenev-like peace—and the illusion of a Turgenev-like mastery (in other words, nothing new, but the signs of an intelligent apprenticeship). As the end approaches, however, when death and disaster appear, the reader is appalled by the unreality of what he reads, which becomes the more striking as Miss Boyle's pretty sentences go on and on and her supposed "mastery" continues to the end. Looking back, one discovers a shocking inadequacy, a fundamental lightness of mind and feeling, which makes the greater portion of the book, even the beginning, appear to have been inspired by the most artificial of motives. Characters whom one had accepted at first are seen now to be supported by the flimsiest of tricks. Page after page appears to have been the expression of mere cuteness. The reviewer hopes that this first novel was written long ago, and that the next work of Miss Boyle's will proceed from where the best of her short stories left off.

That Royal Lover. By Konrad Bercovici. Brewer and Warren. $2.50.

"That Royal Lover" is an exposé of the Rumanian royal family and its musical-comedy activities which have undermined the economic strength of a nation. Mr. Bercovici, himself a Rumanian, is honest in his presentation of gossip as gossip and fact as fact; he thereby succeeds in convincing us that his amazing picture of royalty is true. Since this is the day for debunking rulers in general, the book should have a large popular appeal. The story of the amazing Marie and her tremendous ambitions, her many love affairs, her violent sentimentalities is a dramatic story. And this, following upon her visit to the United States, the purpose of which Mr. Bercovici discusses in detail, her constant public appearances, her photographs taken here, there, and everywhere, will prove illuminating. Mr. Bercovici has a more earnest purpose than this outline of his narrative would suggest—the purpose of discussing the sad position of the Rumanian people who suffer from misgovernment, and whose poverty is due in great part to the machinations of their rulers for power.

Tales Grotesque and Curious. By Akutagawa Ryunosuke. Translated from the Japanese by Glenn W. Shaw. Tokio: The Hokuseido Press. $2.

Akutagawa was only thirty-five years old when in 1927 he drank poison and ended a career of the greatest promise for Japanese literature. He was a stylist, precious in his tastes and with a strong tendency toward the macabre. His tales show a strong, frequently forbidding imagination. Mr. Shaw has chosen his best-regarded volume for translation, and though the graces of the author's style have probably escaped, he has preserved the curiously deforming vigor and the somewhat unpleasant humor of the original. So few works of contemporary Japanese literature find their way here that we must add to our thanks to Mr. Shaw for this interesting volume a plea that he give us more.

Music

Concerning the Chorus

THE Dessoff Choirs, which make a distinctive and valuable contribution to New York's music, are ill advised to include in their publicity material a critical comment to the effect that here, for once, is choral music without any "if's" and "but's." They are ill advised because choral performance depends on many "if's" and can rarely be praised without several "but's." Musicianship and taste, for one thing, are notoriously less wide and less thorough among singers than among instrumentalists. And, unfortunately, choruses made up of trained singers tend to be inferior to those whose members bring more enthusiasm than knowledge to their singing, for the former are rarely able to blend their individual vocal timbres in a common choral tone. The differences between ensemble and solo performance are much greater and more fundamental in vocal than in instrumental music. The chorister, unlike the orchestral musician, needs comparatively little preparatory technical training; his best training is singing in the chorus. This makes the conductor a much more important figure in the chorus than in the orchestra. Conductorless orchestras have serious obstacles to overcome, but a conductorless chorus of any size is hardly to be thought of.

Despite the all-importance of the choral conductor, he has, fortunately, largely escaped the attention of audience and critics, so that he is still concerned more with the music performed than with the eloquence of his own reading of it. If few choral conductors rise to the heights attained by the greatest orchestra conductors, they are not tempted, on the other hand, to the exaggerations and distortions in which their idolized colleagues indulge. Mr. Bodanzky's climaxes may be, as one of his critics recently said, more dynamic than spiritual, but he gives, at any rate, as good a performance as he knows how—competent, musicianly, alive, and free from affectation. Given as good a chance as this, the "Saint John Passion" and the "German Requiem" do not lack spiritual force, even though Mr. Bodanzky may not give them all the blinding splendor they might have.

If the first "if" concerns the conductor, the second concerns the repertory. For different styles of choral music demand radically different treatment, and since voices are less neutral and stylistically less flexible than instruments, concentration on one style may unfit a chorus, to some extent, for another. The Harvard Glee Club, for example, is often adversely criticized for stressing refinement instead of lustiness, and it does, of course, at times lack volume and power. But Dr. Davison has chosen to concentrate the Glee Club's attention on the unaccompanied music of the sixteenth century, undoubtedly the greatest period in the history of choral music, and that music demands great purity of style, sensitiveness in phrasing, and precision in diction, with especial attention to the rhythmic and emotional importance of consonants. In all these respects the Glee Club seems to be much the best chorus New York hears, and it is futile to complain that it makes less noise than other groups.

Similarly, the Friends of Music devote themselves chiefly to the greatest large works with orchestral accompaniment, and they are perhaps wise to leave the a cappella style to those choruses—at the moment a rapidly increasing number—which can give it the time and study it needs. For performances of more unusual works we need not look to them either, as the Schola Cantorum, with very creditable performances of the stirring "Stabat Mater" by Szymanowski, the lively "Rio Grande" of Constant Lambert, and many other interesting works, contributes generously in that field. For our familiarity with the latest developments in this as in most other fields, we must thank the League of Composers, who opened their season with a program containing some excellent choral music of Petyrek, Hindemith, Saminsky, and others. The league, too, has just sponsored the performance of Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex," with Mr. Stokowski, the Philadelphia Orchestra, and the Harvard Glee Club, while the Schola recently joined forces with the Boston Orchestra for Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" and with the Philharmonic for the "Te Deum" of Verdi.

The summary of the Friends' achievements during the ten years of Mr. Bodanzky's conductorship reminds one of so many deeply moving experiences afforded by them that one hesitates to complain of the few omissions. I know of no other chorus that gives so much great music so well every year as the Friends. They sing almost nothing but masterpieces, and if, in order to do the greatest works, it is really necessary to exclude many of the slightly less great, I think they are entirely justified in doing so. One wonders, though, whether the preponderance of German works need be quite so great as it is. The statistics issued on behalf of the Friends were said to prove that there was no such preponderance. But closer examination revealed that many of the German works had been repeated many times—which is as it should be—and that the non-German works performed were almost all orchestral and not choral—which is as it shouldn't. Certain omissions remain difficult to explain: the choral works of Elgar, for which he is especially eminent, and of which we know practically nothing; those of Holst, Vaughan Williams, and Delius, leaders in the recent brilliant revival of choral music in England; the third of the Debussy Nocturnes, "Sirènes," almost entirely unknown in New York, in great contrast to its companion pieces, "Nuages" and "Fêtes," and the other choral works of Debussy—"L'Enfant Prodigue" and "La Demoiselle Elue"; the Requiem and other choral works of Berlioz; the Requiem of Fauré and his "La Naissance de Vénus." With some such works as these the Friends' list could profitably be expanded.

The performance of Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex," referred to above, was an excellent one in most respects—much better than the première in Paris four years ago; but the work seems to me as empty now as it did then—an ineffective hodge-podge of unpleasant memories of a dozen composers, with occasional spots of interest, like the last part of Jocasta's aria. Nor did the very decorative puppets of Mr. Robert Edmond Jones, with their slow-motion gestures, make things any clearer, as far as I could see. If one did not know that the works that have come from Stravinsky since "Oedipus" are made of different stuff, it would be distressing to think of "Oedipus" as having been written fifteen years after the "Sacre," of which Prokofieff's "Pas d'Acier" was a pleasant echo. Mr. Lee Simonson's lively scenario was excellently adapted to Prokofieff's work and helped to make the second half of the evening diverting and at times exciting.

ARTHUR MENDEL

Art

A Defense of Sensibility

THOMAS CRAVEN'S measurement of the greatness of the heroes of Western painting* will agreeably surprise both those who remember his former art criticism and those who tend to associate the imprint of Simon and Schuster with ideas that are merely golden. Something of the old dryness and press-agency so apparent in Mr. Craven's former classical arguments persists in this new volume: the concluding section, relative to America, introduces appreciations of such artists as Yarrow, Burchfield, and Sloan, deplorably out of focus with the rest of the book and touching the field of politics. The work remains a popular mixture of historic, aesthetic, and psychological criticism, none of it actually profound or original. Yet the liveliness flowing from a genuine interest in a glorious subject plays over its solid pages.

Mr. Craven shows a refreshingly real feeling for the great originals, the individuals who have modified the form and language of Western painting. He has felt their largeness of nature, their courage, devotion, relish for life, and deep emotional and imaginative susceptibility; and brought us into touch with their health again. He does not derive art from environment and climate. He knows an individual will, an individual energy, a genius, in these men; and his work is a measurement of this root-feeling and of its realization in the material of art. He knows a sensibility toward life; and his book is its glorification and defense.

Thus, it is an attack on academism and all efforts to make art by recapitulating "the inspiration of men who are dead and gone"; all efforts to withdraw from direct contact with things and substitute for feeling the process of "sifting, measuring, and reassembling forms evolved by other artists through direct communication with the world." It is an attack not only on painting, but on poetry and music, made from "knowledge." The issue is clearly stated in the pages on that greatest of all French academicians, Nicolas Poussin.

* "Men of Art." By Thomas Craven. Simon and Schuster. $3.

> He confused knowledge in the abstract with knowledge that is living and useful. For knowledge . . . is both static and dynamic . . . the accumulation of facts, and the knowing of things. The first, without the leaven of direct experience and under no necessity of putting its store of facts to new uses, settles into molds, deifies precedent, and distorts a realistic view of life. It . . . declaims against and finds unsatisfactory all conditions of life which do not square with traditional observances. . . . The other form of knowledge [sees in facts] not an accumulation of fossils picked up on a dead seashore, but a procession of living things intrinsically related, living because directly experienced; related not through any conformity to precedent but because of their bearing upon one another, a unity determined solely by the creative insight of the artist. Here precedent may be useful if it facilitates technical procedure. . . . The cardinal weakness of the academic mind is the inability to separate the technique of procedure from the things affected by procedure. While scholarship of this sort may be defensible in certain fields . . . it has no place in creative art, which, whatever its subject, is occupied wholly with the organization of experienced things. When knowledge is divorced from current activities, from new needs and new experiences, it becomes the tool of the historian and the archaeologist.

How much our time stands in need of this defense of sensibility toward life must be known to many persons concerned for other things than art, and to all concerned with it. In the neo-classicism dominant in aesthetics today, at least in such champions as Eliot, Picasso, and Stravinsky, we have a school attempting to make poetry, painting, and music out of "knowledge." A dusty academism is concealed in the absurd humanistic Horse of Troy. American art houses a dozen little academies founded on Cézanne and Picasso; some of Mr. Craven's proteges are to be found not far from their doors. Consequently, it is not only Raphael and Poussin, Ingres, Picasso, and the better part of Parisian art Mr. Craven is attacking. It is the spirit of a time dominated by a victorious official France; for which reason one regrets that Mr. Craven's understanding is not always equal to his spirit; and that his vision is so literal. Less narrowly, more largely, finely equipped, he could not but have struck a better, more enduring blow. His point of view is sympathetic, attentive to general human experience and its expression. Art for him is a heroic affirmation and embrace of the world; and while occasionally coarse, his individual judgments remain consistent with his robust premises. His definitions of ideas and artistic problems are succinct. His narrative is fluent and forceful; his reference ample and literary.

Unfortunately, his interest is circumscribed. It is doubtful whether Mr. Craven ever sees a picture as an entity. At least he never sets us before one as before a physical reality, so that we experience the imponderables expressed by the abstract components of art— shape, color, and line. He does not seem to recognize the symbolic function of art, its apprehension of the unknown, the unseen, the impalpable by means of the known, the visible, the substantial. This is immensely apparent in the page devoted by him to the Cena of Leonardo: in attempting to interpret the picture, Mr. Craven arrives at nothing more significant than "the appalling effect on men of ordinary clay of the presence of supreme intelligence." Indeed, it is to be suspected that what Mr. Craven chiefly sees is subject matter, the literary element of painting; exaggerating its importance for that reason. Apparently under the impression that the subject is the creator, that the greatness of a painting is proportionate to the universality and heroism of the point of reference, the illustration, he is easily misled by depiction of heroic matter. He finds an expression of great sensibility in the anatomical nudes of Signorelli; attributes spiritual vigor to Goya; and utters a panegyric on the evasive Rembrandt almost incomprehensible to anyone with an eye for the completeness of the canvas and the tension of forms. Indeed, one suspects that were Mr. Craven directed toward literary criticism, he would be found placing "Paradise Lost" above the "Iliad" for the reason that heaven, hell, and the human soul are "greater" subjects than the wrath of a Greek chieftain during the siege of an obscure Asiatic city; and Josh Barlow's "Columbiad" above the epic of the wanderings of the petty prince of Ithaca. To such absurdities are we led whenever we take our eyes away from the artist's grasp of his subject and the intensity of his imaginative and plastic processes; or whenever we allow ourselves to be persuaded that powerful stimulation at the hands of life invariably releases itself through a naturalistic representation of the object through which stimulation appears to come.

It is also a pity that Mr. Craven's enthusiasm for murals, his theory that they constitute the supreme form of painting, and his desire for a reunion of art and architecture should prejudice him in favor of much that is merely large, herculean, grandiose. No doubt the glowing contents of the Salle Rubens in the Louvre are magnificent. And still, it can serve no worthy interest to disregard the fact that in all their pompous acreage there is to be found no expression comparable for depth and comprehensiveness to that which swells from Rubens's nude portrait of Hélène Fourment in Vienna, or from the little picture of her in a feathered cap in the Old Pinakothek. Or that anything but wilfulness can permit one to see weight and power on the wall spaces of the New School for Social Research decorated by Benton, and thinness in the small landscapes and still-lives of Georgia O'Keeffe.

Again, it is irritating that Mr. Craven should have weakened his effect by excluding the painters of the Upper Rhenish school, particularly Grünewald and Baldung Grün, and Cranach and Dürer, from an argument which admitted Hogarth and Ryder. And almost compromised it by an attitude toward modernism and photography savoring as much of quaintness as of sheer imbecility. But it is proof of "Men of Art" that for all its partiality the volume should remain so rewarding. Mr. Craven's deflation of French art, his description of the nefarious role of the dealer in the realm of painting are timely deeds. His attack, we repeat, is healthy. And while the chief effect of his book may be the introduction of many persons hitherto ignorant of the meaning of art into a great field of reality, it will not fail of entertaining many others able to appreciate its many excellent points and performances.

PAUL ROSENFELD

Drama

The Child Husband

TO say that Henri Bernstein's "Melo," adapted from the French by Arthur Pollock (Ethel Barrymore Theater), treats what is called the eternal triangle is not to say that it is stale or trivial. If the triangle is eternal it cannot be unimportant; neither can it grow stale, since by definition it has as much future as it has past. Certainly it has an infinite variety, for I can imagine no mathematician who could establish the limit of its possibilities. We not only have three persons at the three extremities; we have two sexes to distribute among them; we have a choice of love or marriage, not to speak of friendship and ambition, as the thing that two of them are to be rivals for; we have perhaps a hundred social relationships in which the principals can stand—father and son, brother and brother, friend and friend, stranger and stranger, husband and wife, employer and employed, and so on to the bottom of this page; then on top of all that we have the innumerable accidents of personality. No matter how many triangles have been constructed for the stage, we can be sure that as many more are waiting to be constructed.

M. Bernstein's triangle is a new one not in the sense that it is unique but in the sense that it belongs to a new class. Its distinguishing feature is already familiar, but so far as I know it has not been familiar very long, and I suspect that it has a special significance for today. This feature is the child husband, who, now that all of our literature demonstrates the superiority of woman over man, takes the place of the child wife. He is virtuous and simple-minded; he prattles and plays charming little games; sensitive as a seven-year-old, he just must not be hurt; he needs protection, and gets it in the form of a compassionate deception; he almost never knows, even as the play ends, that his wife has been completely transformed by her love for some nice man who perchance is his oldest friend. There is a husband like this in "Tomorrow and Tomorrow"; he emerges in a kind of foolish and incredible triumph from "As Husbands Go"; he was in "Strange Interlude"; and with a struggle he can be recognized in "Candida." M. Bernstein, who calls him Pierre Belcroix, makes him almost intolerably pathetic. I wonder if women from their high eminence weep to see him lose the love of his little wife Romaine, who as the play opens is herself a child, but who within fifteen minutes has left her playmate centuries behind in the company of sad, mature Marcel. Not, of course, that Romaine ever lets Pierre know she has deceived him. No, she will commit suicide first, and does; the child husband must not be hurt. Compassionate deception, it would appear, could go no farther; yet it is carried by M. Bernstein to an end beyond this end, for the last scene, a long and very good one, shows Marcel, still sad and mature, shielding Pierre from the truth with an elaborately acted lie. The child husband may be broken and in a sense abolished, but he never must be hurt.

Possibly this sort of situation is more interesting just now than it ever will be again. Possibly, on the other hand, it is the situation of the future, with the result that we shall never return to the husband who raged around and committed murder, or to the fumbling old fellow of seventeenth-century comedy whose jealousy, which nobody kept him from feeling, made him undeniably ridiculous. At any rate M. Bernstein has been interesting. There are touches of bathos in his text, and certain moments of the performance the other night were less convincing than they could have been. But Edna Best as the wife, Earle Larimore as the husband, and Basil Rathbone as the lover played their parts as if they understood them, and "Melo" altogether came off more than average well.

The revival of Pirandello's "Six Characters in Search of an Author" at the Bijou Theater, though it brings to Broadway a better play than "As You Desire Me," brings also to mind the central weakness of this dramatist, which is that he is not dramatic. At the same time that he announces an excellent, even a thrilling theme, he announces an idea which he has about it; and all that happens thereafter is that one or two characters insist with an awful patience upon the importance of this idea. Since we get the point at the beginning—or should, Pirandello being so very explicit—there surely is no need of our having to hear it labored for two hours with a positively insect shrillness. Which is not to say that "Six Characters" lacks its interesting moments, or that in the present performance Eugene Powers as the father lacks the intelligence and the power to convey them.

"Company's Coming," a farce already closed, made all that could be made, which apparently was not much, out of the pawning of a tennis cup by a champion who had not yet earned it.

Opium—China's Ancient Enemy

By ELLEN N. LA MOTTE

CHINA, for a century and a half, has made a gallant fight against opium. She fought two wars to keep out opium from British India. She lost both times, and paid high penalties for her protests. She had to pay indemnities. What was worse, she was forced to open treaty ports which later became the foreign concessions. Into these treaty ports Indian opium flowed by the ton, and the Chinese, bound by the treaties of two unsuccessful wars, could only stand by helpless.

Next, China, determined that all her money should not be drained away in the purchase of foreign opium, began poppy cultivation herself on a gigantic scale. This meant a double quantity—an immense supply. Things went from bad to worse—China became a nation of addicts, with the consequent poverty and demoralization. Finally, in 1907, the United States took a hand. President Roosevelt called a conference in Shanghai to see what could be done.

The upshot of these Shanghai gatherings was an agreement between Great Britain and China by which the imports of British opium (from India) were to be decreased at the rate of 10 per cent annually, at the same time that China agreed to reduce her opium cultivation by the same amount—10 per cent a year. Both sides kept the bargain, and by 1917 the incredible had happened—China had ended her cultivation of opium.

This extraordinary achievement took place under the old monarchy. Meanwhile, the European Powers, safe in their concessions, did nothing to aid China during this ten-year struggle. At any time a Chinese could step across from China, where opium was forbidden, to European soil, the concessions, and get all he wanted. In spite of this, however, by April 1, 1917, the long struggle was over, with China the winner against an age-old vice.

There are no statistics as to the extent of opium addiction during the heyday of the traffic. Some say that certain provinces counted as addicts from 50 to 70 per cent of the population. Certain it is that if no steps had been taken to rid China of opium in 1907, the whole country might have succumbed. But the fighting spirit, the determination of the people themselves to end this habit, won for them a victory the like of which has never been known.

Then what happened in 1917? Civil war, and a gradual return to the cultivation of the poppy. It was a contraband crop, but so disturbed were the conditions that no suppression was possible. Since then the country has been gradually slipping back into its old habits, until today opium is being produced on an immense scale with vast profit to the various rebel chiefs and others who engage in it. .At the same time European drugs, such as morphine and heroin, are being smuggled into China in great quantities. The outlook is dark. China faces the double menace of being drugged from within by home-grown opium, which the present government seems powerless to combat, and drugged from without by high-powered drugs made in Europe and smuggled into China.

The Hague Opium Convention was signed in 1912 by various European Powers having colonial possessions in the Orient. Great Britain has eight such colonies—the Straits Settlements, Hong Kong, the Federated and Unfederated Malay States, North Borneo, Brunei, and Sarawak. France has Indo-China. The Portuguese have Macao; Holland has the Dutch East Indies. In these colonies opium is sold by the government to the native peoples. The revenues from the sale and from the licensing of shops where opium may be purchased or smoked have always been large, ranging from 10 to 50 per cent of the total revenue, according to the colony. The average for the lot is 25 per cent. The revenues are so large, in fact, that the Europeans living in the colonies have always been lightly taxed.

The Hague Convention among other things provided for "the gradual and effective suppression of the use of opium for smoking" in these various foreign colonies. Nearly twenty years have passed since that agreement was signed and ratified; more than ten years have passed since the League of Nations undertook to see that the obligations of the Hague Convention were carried out. Yet nothing has happened. Opium-smoking goes on just the same—it has never been stopped—and the revenues continue to pour in, to the benefit of European administrations and European colonists. The excuse of the European Powers is that if they gave up their opium monopolies the sale of contraband opium would replace legal sale—contraband opium from China. China is always the scapegoat. And now that China is slipping back into the cultivation of opium, China becomes more than ever the scapegoat, the excuse for preserving a source of revenue and for repudiating an international contract.

And now comes the rumor that China itself is about to establish an opium monopoly. After fighting against opium for more than a century, China, if the rumor is true, is about to give up the struggle and go in for government control and sales, with revenue. It is pointed out that through monopoly China can make from fifty to one hundred million dollars a year in revenue, and that is dazzling bait. Good collateral, these opium revenues, for foreign loans!

The League of Nations recently sent a committee of inquiry to the Far East to make a report on opium-smoking in the various foreign possessions. This report runs in part as follows*:

> The expense of addiction being out of proportion to the smoker's income; insufficient funds left for the sustaining of the smoker and his family, resulting in impoverishment or impossibility of improving the standard of living; increasing dependence on the temporary stimulation of opium for ability to perform work, and, as a consequence, gradual decrease of working ability and a possible total loss of earning power. . . . Judging by the evidence, the possible reduction of the earning capacity would be, on the average, as high as 50 per cent.

* Report of the Commission of Inquiry into the Control of Opium-Smoking in the Far East, Geneva, 1930, p. 27.

In the case of wealthy people, the harmful effects of opium-smoking may not be so generally apparent, but they cannot be disregarded. The working classes and small merchants feel all the effects of addiction in a far more serious degree than the well-to-do, and contribute more to the retarding of economic and social progress. As for the opium-smoker of the coolie class, he spends on opium from 40 to 70 per cent of his daily earnings. What little is left has to provide for food, housing, and clothing of the smoker and his family.

China faces a momentous decision: Shall she establish a monopoly and gather in revenues to the tune of a hundred million dollars a year? Or shall she protect her people from a vice which cuts their earning power in half, and diverts from 40 to 70 per cent of these lowered earnings into the purchase of opium—a diversion, by the way, which falls hard upon the dealer in foodstuffs and the manufacturer of clothing, textiles, and other commodities, since millions of potential customers can afford to buy only one commodity, opium.

There are protests in the Chinese newspapers. They refuse to accept the sop thrown out—that the monopoly, if established, will be discontinued in fifteen years. The China Weekly Review for February 14, 1931, has the following to say:

> It was alleged that the creation of a government monopoly in China would have the effect of prolonging the evil similar to what has occurred in the various European colonial administrations in the Far East. It was also alleged that certain European interests connected with the League of Nations had been responsible for suggesting the scheme to China, as a means of prolonging the opium monopolies in various colonial dependencies in the Far East.

The same paper on February 21 said:

> The scheme for the establishment of an opium monopoly in China undoubtedly would be beneficial if there could be any assurance that such a system would eliminate the evil, but the practice has been that the monopoly system does not prohibit, but on the other hand leads to perpetuation, owing to the revenues derived from the monopoly. Every colonial administration in the Far East (with the exception of the Philippines) has an opium monopoly, and while most of them were designedly for the announced purpose of curbing the use of the drug, the actual experience has been that they serve to perpetuate the system, because governments do not want to relinquish this important source of revenue. In fact, there is strong evidence that China has received her inspiration from the European colonial administrations, which desire a perpetuation of the system.

European influences have undermined China in the past. Will China let them put it over on her again? Or will she listen to Bishop Brent, one of her best friends, who during the opium conferences at Geneva in 1924 made this impassioned appeal:

> The greatest service we can render China is to induce her government to resist all temptation to establish a monopoly. It is monstrous to maintain that if we do not reap a golden harvest from the nefarious trade, somebody else will; or for a nation to think it possible to build up an honorable and righteous commonwealth with revenue gained from the exploitation of the weakness and vice of human beings.

TO ROBERT FROST for his collected poems the Pulitzer prize for poetry is justly awarded. Mr. Frost is a poet whose worth and reputation grow steadily with each year; his poems are strong, sharp, and unforgettable. He has long been recognized as in the front rank of poets, living or dead, and that recognition is only made more sure by rereading of his works. With the rest of the awards it is, as usual, possible to quarrel violently. Mrs. Barnes's novel, "Years of Grace," is good second-rate work, but since it is concerned with three generations and since it faithfully depicts a corner of the American scene, it is considered to be of prize caliber. Susan Glaspell's "Alison's House" is not nearly so good a play as Mr. Kaufman's "Once in a Lifetime," which is equally concerned with an aspect of American life. But since the latter play is comedy it is evidently not quite suitable for anything so ponderous as a prize. The prize-winning history, Bernadotte E. Schmitt's "The Coming of the War," has already been criticized as heavily partisan and as inferior to Sidney B. Fay's book, and it is only incidentally concerned with American history. The newspaper awards are interesting. That to the Atlanta Constitution compliments a paper with a long and honorable tradition of public service; that to Edmund Duffy for his cartoon honors one of the best American newspaper artists, although the prize-winning cartoon is hardly up to Mr. Duffy's average. Mr. Ryckman's editorial on Senator Norris is little more than bad-tempered. Thus the balance wavers from one side to the other, missing good work here, honoring good work there. To be a prize judge is not easy; to be a prize winner is not always glorious. It would seem, however, that the Pulitzer judges this year had distinguished themselves by the mediocrity of their choices.

WITH THE DEFICIT on April 30 at practically $879,000,000, indicating a Treasury shortage for the fiscal year rising to the staggering sum of $1,135,000,000, and no indications of prompt business recovery in sight, the need for tax increases becomes plainer with every passing day. Secretary Mellon is in no such position as that of Philip Snowden, who faced the practical impossibility of raising most of his tax rates farther. On the other hand, our individual income- and estate-tax rates are at an extremely low level, as modern taxes go, and both could be raised without threatening further disturbance to business, however distasteful such action might be to great numbers of individual taxpayers. In view of the existing outlook, there is no valid economic reason for refusing to raise taxes, and there is every reason for raising them; so the Treasury's reiterated determination to recommend no change, but to meet anticipated deficits by increasing the public debt, cannot be defended. It is a purely political move designed to prevent further popular dissatisfaction in the coming Presidential year. We wonder whether the Administration would not be better advised, even politically, to do the honest, straightforward, and fiscally sound thing, instead of trying to play good politics.

WHAT A CHANCE the Democrats missed when they let Alfred E. Smith sell them out by indorsing a protective tariff in the campaign of 1928! If there had been a courageous reaffirmation of the party's historic and economically sound opposition to the protective fraud, how impregnable would have been its position today, with Republican leaders one after another coming forward to the mourners' bench ready to do penance for the Smoot-Hawley abomination. Best Friend Julius Barnes is the latest to follow Messrs. Snell and Atterbury. Beyond the immediate issue of American prosperity, and underlying it, is the larger question of restoring world trade, in order that Europe may not sink deeper in unemployment and misery. An honest free-trade party in the United States would find itself today on the right side of an issue that seems to involve literally the whole future of Western civilization—and by reason of their apostasy the Democrats are in no position even to make effective political capital out of that issue. Truly it sometimes pays to have political principles, even in practical politics!

TYLER DENNETT, one of the foremost students of international relations in this country, has resigned his position as chief of the State Department's Division of Publications to become professor of international relations at Princeton University. His decision to accept the latter post was given in the official announcement as his reason for resigning. However, according to Drew Pearson, diplomatic correspondent for the Baltimore Sun, the resignation was in fact "inspired partly by the rivalry between two State Department cliques," and "partly by Secretary Stimson's suppression of many important diplomatic notes which previous secretaries of state have published about ten years after they were written as a matter of routine." Mr. Stimson may have been justified by circumstances of which we are not aware in withholding some of this correspondence, but that a man of Mr. Dennett's high standing should resign in protest against this action is a strong indictment of the Stimson policy. More serious is the suggestion that Mr. Dennett felt compelled to step out because of factionalism in the department. There have long been two cliques in this office, one made up mostly of the wealthier "career" diplomats, the other of the permanent department staff, whose rivalry more than once has embarrassed the government in the execution of its foreign policies. Factionalism has driven more than one good man out of the diplomatic service. It now appears to have lost to the government a man who for many years worked quietly and faithfully to bring about a better public understanding of American diplomacy.

TALK OF A WHEAT POOL of international scope that is going on in Europe has not progressed very far, although the signing of the Chadbourne sugar-marketing agreement naturally suggests that the world wheat market might also be brought under some central control. Aside from the difficulty of inducing wheat-growers anywhere to reduce their acreage sufficiently to prevent the production of a huge surplus, it seems unlikely that Canada, the United States, or Argentina can be induced to cut down their exports in order that European producers may have a larger share of the European market. At the recent grain conference at Rome the Argentine representative vigorously resented the charge that overseas importations were the main cause of the European wheat crisis, and the Canadian delegate pointed out that no democratic government could order its farmers to plant so much wheat and no more. The crux of the situation, it is generally recognized, is the huge American surplus, estimated now at some 275,000,000 bushels, and the proposed dumping of 35,000,000 bushels upon world markets by the grain subsidiary of the Federal Farm Board. Russian dumping, too, is an obstacle to price regulation, although fear of the Russian wheat menace will grow less as Russian consumption increases. The whole subject is to be discussed at the wheat conference which meets at London on May 18, and it is entirely possible that something will be done to induce restricted production and point out how cooperative marketing arrangements can be improved. It is acknowledged on all hands that something must be done if the position of the wheat-growers is to experience the prompt improvement so sorely needed.

OHIO'S criminal-syndicalism act has been declared unconstitutional by Judge Walter B. Wanamaker of the Court of Common Pleas of Akron. This is one of the many vicious laws directed against radicalism which were enacted by several State legislatures in that hysterical period of red scares after the war. The Ohio law was designed to curb the Communists and other extremists; in effect it has tended seriously to limit the right of anyone disagreeing with the constituted authorities to give free expression to his opinion. This is the view of Judge Wanamaker. He made it clear in dismissing the indictment against Paul F. Kassay, Goodyear-Zeppelin mechanic, who was charged with having attempted to sabotage the work of building the navy dirigible Akron. Not only is the Ohio law "insufficient to protect the rights of the people of the State, as guaranteed to them by the Constitution," the judge ruled, but the State "has not the right to prohibit the liberty of speech to the extent that mere doctrines, as such, cannot be exchanged and used and considered in the exchange of ideas on the public forum." Pointing out that when carefully examined the charges against Kassay simply accused him of having boasted that he would resort to sabotage, Judge Wanamaker declared that "mere talk, in and of itself alone, unattended with the evil consequences that might reasonably be expected to flow therefrom, cannot be made by law a crime in Ohio." Here is a return to honest and forthright Americanism that is most welcome in this dark time when civil liberties are being threatened on all sides.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS are spreading rapidly. New Jersey has just enacted a law providing that all dependent persons seventy years of age shall receive a dollar a day whether they live in the homes of relatives or in public institutions, and it is expected that the age limit will be reduced to sixty-five years as soon as the plan is in operation. Seventy-five per cent of the cost will be met by the State, the remainder by the counties, administration being left in the hands of county welfare boards. In order to insure the permanency of the pension fund, the State will set up a reserve fund out of the proceeds of inheritance taxes. Agitation for old-age pensions has been active for some years, but the problem of finance proved difficult. The recent death of John T. Dorrance, proprietor of Campbell's Soup, leaving a fortune estimated around $150,000,000, and without leaving a dollar to charity, brought the State a windfall of about $20,000,000 in inheritance taxes and suggested the idea of using the proceeds of such taxes as a reserve to insure the permanency of the pension fund. Mr. Dorrance thus builded better than he knew. There is a dispute between Pennsylvania and New Jersey as to which shall collect the tax. In the hope of becoming a director of the Pennsylvania Railroad, whose directors must be residents of Pennsylvania, Mr. Dorrance had for some years maintained a Pennsylvania home, but he voted in New Jersey and died there, and his will has been probated there. There seems little doubt that New Jersey will be able to establish its claim, and repair an outstanding example of the lack of public generosity in the bestowal of a fortune that runs up into the hundreds of millions.

A PARIS CABLEGRAM to the New York Herald Tribune asserts that "France has decided to negotiate a commercial agreement with Russia to start trade with the Soviets on a larger scale." While the correspondent is careful to point out that the negotiations "are likely to be slow and laborious," and may eventually prove fruitless, the suggestion that France is even thinking of taking such action is interesting in view of that country's long-standing antagonism toward Soviet Russia. The post-war foreign policy of France has been largely based upon this antipathetic attitude; French assistance to the Little Entente countries and Poland has been undertaken as much with a view to strengthening them as buffer states against possible Russian expansion into Western Europe as it has been to use them as pawns in preserving the European status quo; most of the proposals brought out since 1918 to erect a cordon sanitaire about Russia have emanated from Paris. Today, however, with France engulfed in the world-wide economic depression as are all of its neighbors, that country likewise must look where it can for the foreign markets it needs. It has seen much of Russia's trade going to Germany and Italy; it has seen its own people buying Russian goods, despite all the anti-dumping barriers it has raised, without at the same time being able to dispose of French products in the Soviet Union. It would not be entirely surprising if Paris should seek to come to terms with Moscow on the question of their commercial relations.

WITH THE ADVENT of warmer weather China again is moving toward civil warfare. Several of the southern provinces, including Kwangtung, of which Canton is the principal city, have joined the Kwangsi rebels in declaring their independence of the Nationalist Government sitting in Nanking. In reality this means that the war lords of the south have tired of giving lip service to Chiang Kai-shek and his Nationalist group, which is all their allegiance amounted to, and are now preparing to challenge Marshal Chiang for control of the potentially wealthy Yangtze valley. According to Shanghai dispatches, the Cantonese troops are already "moving northward." American diplomats in China have been hoping against hope that the country would settle down to a period of peace. They have felt that a few years of quiet would do more to help China economically, and incidentally to revive China as a market for American goods, than could any kind of silver or other loan; but apparently the war lords are not yet prepared to do themselves and the American manufacturers that favor.

ANOTHER DICTATORSHIP has, to all appearances, been brought into existence in Europe, this time without any advance publicity of a bombastic or chauvinistic nature. King Carol of Rumania has heatedly denied that he and Premier Nicolas Jorga have laid the groundwork for a new government patterned after the Italian Fascist regime, as charged by Julio Maniu, former Premier and leader of the majority party in Parliament. Nevertheless, recent political developments point strongly to the creation of such a dictatorship. Julio Maniu resigned last October, but his Cabinet was continued in office under the premiership of George Mironescu. The Mironescu Government lasted until April, when it fell, according to report, because of pressure from the monarch. Nicolas Titulescu, Minister to Great Britain, then undertook to form a coalition Cabinet, but his failure to include M. Argetoianu, close friend of Carol and a sworn foe of parliamentary government, caused Carol to refuse to accept the Cabinet. In Titulescu's place the King named Jorga, his boyhood tutor and an educator rather than a politician, who promptly selected Argetoianu as Foreign Minister and Minister of Finance. One of the first acts of Jorga was to dissolve Parliament, which Maniu's National Peasant Party controlled by an overwhelming majority. Jorga did not even wait for a vote of non-confidence, which surely would have been forthcoming. He then announced that new elections would be held early in June, adding, according to the New York Times, that 60 per cent of the seats in Parliament "will be reserved for representatives of non-political professional organizations and supporters of the government," the remainder going to the parties that will agree to the conditions of the election as laid down by the government. Here certainly is the framework of a dictatorship. Whether the Rumanian people will welcome it remains to be seen.

AT LAST a really significant student demonstration in one of our American institutions of higher learning, and our faith in the colleges is restored. The students of St. Lawrence University, incensed at the calling off of the upper-class "paddling bee" for freshmen, presented an ultimatum demanding the extension of time for parties until 2:30 a.m. and the abolition of a ruling "forbidding the parking of girls on fraternity porches during the daytime," and threatening, if these demands were not complied with, to call a strike "against all extra-curricular activities." Here are real issues and a threat of real action. Let those who despair of American students note the incident and take courage; for the spirit of Lexington and Bunker Hill is not dead. Consider a strike against all extra-curricular activities with the baseball season nearing its culmination and outdoor theatricals and Commencement festivities approaching! The blood in the snow at Valley Forge becomes pale pink by comparison, and Gandhi's non-resistance movement in India appears like a Sunday-school picnic. Owen D. Young to the rescue! Let not this threatened sacrifice of our dauntless young heroes become a grisly reality!

THE CAREER of the late George F. Baker, one of our greatest American capitalists, who died on May 2 at the age of ninety-one, was synonymous with the tremendous capitalistic development of modern America. Always modest and unassuming, never willing to make a public address, he came to New York practically without means, and through the success of the First National Bank over which he presided, together with most powerful connections in the financial world, he amassed one of the greatest American fortunes. If it is right and just for a single man to obtain such means and power, the country was probably fortunate to count him among its leaders, for his personal life was blameless, his modesty incomparable, his industry unfailing, his generosity without bounds—far greater than most people realize because so many of his benefactions were anonymous. That his business methods were sometimes challenged deeply pained him and his friends and others who honored his personal integrity. It is a fact that he simply profited by the methods and opportunities of his time; his business life was so long that when new standards and new ideals began to appear, it was naturally hard for him and his generation to adapt themselves to them, or to reconcile themselves to criticisms of policies which had for many years not only gone unchallenged, but had seemed to be of the utmost value to the country and to society. He will be long remembered as one of the ablest, most conservative, and most successful of American bankers.

Business on the Defensive

WITH the Chamber of Commerce of the United States meeting at Atlantic City on April 29 and the International Chamber of Commerce opening its sessions at Washington five days later, the public has had an unusually good chance to learn something of the best business thought about the present depression and what is to be done about it. Business leaders plainly realize more clearly than they did a year ago the threat to their control of our social arrangements that is involved in a continuance of present conditions. Professor Wesley C. Mitchell, in discussing at Atlantic City the necessity for business stabilization, declared, according to press reports, that unless business begins improving soon, "angry discontent will spread rapidly; changes will be demanded and some of them will be put into effect." This moderate professorial statement reflects a view that is plainly becoming rather widespread among thoughtful business men, and the Atlantic City discussions give plenty of proof of this.

The new attitude of business men toward unemployment insurance offers one of the plainest examples. For years students have pointed to the growing insecurity of American life as one of the greatest weaknesses of our present organization; but while the years of prosperity continued there was no effective interest in the matter, and business leaders paid almost no attention to it. Security yielded no profits. At Atlantic City things were changed. No one, apparently, wanted compulsory insurance against unemployment, and it was attacked from many angles. Yet despite all criticisms and objections, the conviction appeared widespread that unless industry itself initiated measures of security on a voluntary basis, government action was inevitable. Edward A. Filene pointed out that at least twenty State legislatures have the matter of insurance under consideration, and other speakers agreed that the present depression is creating an irresistible demand for action of some kind.

The same point of view was apparent in other discussions. According to press reports, "the keynote of the many addresses which concerned the need for industrial stabilization was that it was industry's problem to integrate production and consumption and set its house in order rapidly to avert threatened political action." Various speakers advocated the budgeting of production, the organization of industries separately, and the coordination of industries with one another so as to prevent undue expansion and recurring crises. Our business men, as a means of protecting themselves and maintaining their dominant position in our present society, seem to be feeling their way toward a "planned economy" such as has been advocated with increasing frequency by students during recent years. In order to be free to carry out joint plans they are demanding the repeal or modification of the anti-trust laws and other measures that have been enacted to protect the body of the people from the dangers of monopoly. They are unlikely to meet with great success in such efforts until they can guarantee greater public benefits than have yet appeared from giving industry a free hand, which it has used in the past primarily to increase its own profits.

In the international field business faces staggering problems of another kind, and the Washington meeting needs the uttermost of industrial statesmanship. In his address of welcome President Hoover dealt exclusively with disarmament, thus serving notice on the conference that our government was not officially interested in the commercial and financial questions that are agitating every thinking mind. But despite official discouragement the business men were bound to discuss those questions.

Tariffs strangle trade, and peoples are standing idle and going hungry because of inability to buy and sell goods. The only remedy for the situation that politicians can devise is to raise the tariffs higher and strangle trade more completely. But the politicians are not responsible for the tariffs. They enact those measures in response to the demands of blackjacking business interests seeking their own immediate advantage at whatever cost to the general well-being. In the mad surge of nationalistic feeling during the war and the years that succeeded it, we completely forgot the commonplace fact that the very existence of modern peoples is based on their ability to buy and sell, and the Europeans have engaged in a process of mutual starvation by making it progressively more difficult for one another to carry on trade. The United States, fortunate beyond all others, was for years apparently free of the disasters that it helped bring on the rest of the world; today it too is in the depths of the depression.

But tariffs are only part of the story. The financial equilibrium necessary to orderly and regular trade was completely upset by the enormous changes brought about by the war, whereby the United States was suddenly transformed into the world's leading creditor nation. Not only were huge new commercial obligations created, but the world was left with a heritage of government debts and reparation payments that have hung like a millstone around its neck during all the period since the armistice. During all these years political jealousies and war-born hatreds have blocked successive efforts at adjustment and settlement in Europe, and the United States has refused to use its tremendous power to help bring about a state of affairs in which people might once more work and live. Instead, it has insisted on the payments which its debtors have ultimately wrung out of the German people. Instead of reconciliation has come further misunderstanding; instead of good-will, hatred. As this development has gone on, the task of business has become harder and harder, until now trade has gone down in a disastrous crash that stopped the plow in the furrow and brought to a standstill the wheels in the factories. Are the business men of the Western world capable of meeting this situation? Will they put on political leaders the pressure necessary if anything effective is to be done? The prompt reduction of tariffs, the readjustment of debts and reparation payments, the provision of international control of gold and materials and markets — are matters such as these beyond the understanding and competence of the men who today direct business in the United States and Europe? If so, the outlook is dark for the industrial order they represent.

The Naval Crisis

THE deadlock that has been reached in the negotiations between Great Britain, France, and Italy leaves the whole question of naval reduction and limitation in a highly perilous position. When Arthur Henderson, British Foreign Secretary, intervened some months ago in the Franco-Italian controversy, it was with the hope of inducing France and Italy to accept a compromise that would keep the vexatious issue of naval parity in abeyance until 1936, when the London naval treaty comes up for reconsideration. The accord which was announced at the beginning of March was understood to have accomplished this purpose, and there was considerable felicitation of Mr. Henderson, M. Briand, Signor Grandi, and others for the amicable way in which they had dealt with the matter and for their success in clearing the path for the general disarmament conference in 1932.

Unfortunately for Mr. Henderson's diplomatic reputation and the world's peace of mind, the Italian government was not informed of a French claim which, if it were conceded, would not only insure to France practically all the tonnage superiority over Italy that it had insisted upon having, but also upset the balance of naval strength that the London negotiators had labored to arrange. What France claims is the right to begin in 1934, 1935, and 1936 the construction of tonnage which it would be entitled to have after the latter date to replace tonnage then obsolete, the total of such replacement aggregating some 66,000 tons. The French aver that there was never any secret about this demand; the Italians declare that they never heard of it until a few weeks ago, long after Mr. Henderson had announced that all was well; while as for Mr. Henderson, it is not denied that he knew of it but for some unaccountable reason failed to mention it when he was at Rome.

The mere announcement of the French claim was sufficient to transform the March accord into no accord at all. It was pointed out that if France were allowed to begin its replacement construction by 1934, its superiority to Italy after 1936 would consist almost wholly of new tonnage, whereas its present tonnage excess is mainly old. The British government promptly repudiated the French claim, and let it be known that if the program were carried out the "escalator" provision of the London treaty would probably have to be invoked to keep the British navy from being outclassed. The Italian government stands firmly with Great Britain, rightly insisting that disarmament means less building, not more. Various compromises, of course, have been talked of, but none of them appears to be more than a mere device for fending off a definite decision, and none meets with any real favor in France.

The resulting situation is serious in the extreme. The MacDonald Government is in no position to make further concessions even if it were disposed to do so, since any move in that direction would invite a Conservative attack which a very large section of British opinion, inveterately sensitive about "the fleet" no matter what the party alignment may be, would unquestionably support. French opinion, on the other hand, averse from the outset to conceding anything to Italy and well aware that no disarmament conference would be likely to approve the French demands, is stirred to resentment at what it regards as a denial by Great Britain of a fundamental French right, and the near approach of a presidential election in which M. Briand may be a candidate makes the great French pacifier discreetly cautious.

The reported feeling of the Washington Administration that the dispute is not serious, and that in any event it concerns Europe and not the United States, is mischievous camouflage. Irrespective of whether a Franco-Italian accord should be regarded as a supplement to the London treaty or as an independent arrangement, it is clear that if there is no accord and Great Britain proceeds to build, the old naval-armament race will be on and the "big-navy" forces, in Congress and out, will move heaven and earth to bring the United States into the competition. There is only too much reason for fearing that Mr. Hoover is in favor of building up to the limits set by the London conference and that the next Congress will be asked to vote the money. Once that policy is officially launched, we shall be well on our way with preparations for the next war.

Governor and Tiger

THE City Club of New York on March 7 presented to Governor Roosevelt charges against the District Attorney of New York County of incompetence, ineffectiveness, and futility in the conduct of his office. These charges made up a document less than 1,000 words in length, and contained the following sentences, after the general introduction:

> Without limiting the generality of the foregoing charges, your petitioners specify thereunder the following:
> A. He has been guilty of misfeasance of office in failing to prosecute persons whom a diligent public officer would have prosecuted.
> B. He has failed to enforce the criminal law against persons evidence of whose criminality has been adduced in the investigation of the magistrates' courts. . . .

At no subsequent point in the charges were these two accusations elaborated. Nevertheless, the Governor, without such elaboration, and considering the charges sufficiently serious to warrant immediate action, took that action on the following day by appointing Samuel Seabury commissioner to investigate them.

On March 17 the City Affairs Committee preferred charges against Mayor Walker. These charges, verbally five times as long as those made against Mr. Crain and easily ten times as detailed, were acted on by the Governor not after a day but after six days, when he sent them to Mayor Walker for reply. The reply was made public a month later, on April 21, and after another week the Governor dismissed the charges against the Mayor in a statement that, among other things, said: "The present charges are so general in character . . . that I hesitated as to whether I should take any action on them at all." The Governor found no such need for hesitation in considering the charges against District Attorney Crain, and since his behavior in the two cases has been so different, one may ask why.

The Tammany Hall rulers of New York have been under fire for months; the Governor of New York has been urged to do something about it; but after all the Governor of New York State can personally do little to eliminate graft and corruption in the city of New York. It is true that the charter has conferred upon the Executive certain powers of investigation, but the initiative is rarely expected to come from him individually, unless he is petitioned to act to set aside the principle of home rule in municipal affairs or the legislature itself empowers him in a given case. As it is, the Governor has been quick to act in the matter of the District Attorney. Mr. Crain was being criticized on every hand for doing nothing and doing that badly. The lesser game in this case plainly offered the greater and easier prey. Mr. Curry, personal friend of the District Attorney as well as leader of Tammany Hall, grumbled at first and was particularly disgruntled by the choice of Judge Seabury to conduct the investigation. But Tammany is a practical political organization. When the charges against the Mayor were filed, it began to feel less keenly about Mr. Crain's jeopardy; it knows well that goats can have their value.

As for Mayor Walker, far from being a goat he is Tammany's darling. He is not one of those sometimes troublesome Al Smiths who on occasion desire the Tiger to reform. He is regular; he runs the business of the city in the time-honored Tammany way. There is not the slightest desire to sacrifice him. No one else could be so eminently satisfactory. Any effort to disturb him was therefore bound to bring down upon all who participated in it the wrath of Tammany Hall. Hence it is extremely regrettable that the Governor has by his action in both cases placed himself in a position where multitudes are bound to believe that his political ambitions dictated the courses he has pursued. He has lately openly entered the lists as candidate for the Democratic Presidential nomination by giving permission for the formation of Roosevelt-for-President clubs. It was plainly of the utmost importance that he should take no step which might be construed as being influenced by the thought of the votes that the Tammany Hall delegation will cast in the next Democratic Presidential convention. Had there been no other alternative course as to the charges against Mayor Walker, such impressions could not have arisen. But there were other courses open to the Governor, even if he could see, what we cannot, that there was some genuine difference between the vagueness of the charges against Mr. Crain and those formulated against the Mayor.

There was no need for Governor Roosevelt summarily to dismiss Mayor Walker. He had the machinery for investigation of the Mayor and of the Mayor's conduct of office ready to hand, in the form of the legislative committee which Judge Seabury heads. He might quite properly have refused to act at all on the Walker charges; the fact that he sent them to the Mayor the day before the legislature voted the investigation makes no difference. He might quite properly have turned the matter over to the Seabury committee for investigation; he might have returned the charges to their authors, declaring that it was no longer incumbent upon him to act since the investigating committee was actually sitting. Instead, he took a step which must pain deeply his warmest friends. For he has played directly into Tammany's hands, so that Mr. Curry has said of his action: "It is but another vindication of Mayor Walker's splendid and unparalleled record." In consequence, the Governor himself today occupies a most unenviable position and will find himself faced with the charge of playing politics.

Edwin A. Alderman

THE turn of the century found Edwin A. Alderman president of the University of North Carolina, from which he went to the headship of Tulane University in New Orleans, to be quickly called to lead the University of Virginia. More important than that, he was one of the group of men who in 1900 determined to bring about a new era in education in the backward Southern States to which they were so loyally devoted. With Governor Charles B. Aycock, Charles D. McIver, and numerous others in North Carolina and other States, he was ready for the undertaking begun from the North by Robert C. Ogden, Walter Page, and J. L. M. Curry, which with the aid of the Rockefellers resulted in the formation of the Southern Education and General Education Boards. He was regularly a member of those "excursions into ennobling experiences" which from 1901 to 1906 were made possible by the generosity, the tact, and the talent for headship of Mr. Ogden.

No one who was present on these occasions could fail to realize that besides being a great leader he was one of the greatest of American orators and one who in later years spoke all too rarely. Here was a man with extraordinary oratorical gifts who refused to exploit them for private profit or personal political advancement. Had he so desired he could have ranked as high as his great personal friend Woodrow Wilson, for whom he kept to the end a profound admiration, and to whom he paid a magnificent tribute, by invitation of Congress, in the Capitol on December 15, 1924, when he called Mr. Wilson the "one undaunted advocate of hope for a successful world." To the rare beauty, the vision and stylistic charm of his discourses, he added a natural spontaneous humor and a wealth of humorous stories, which was also so characteristic of Woodrow Wilson. Not even Mr. Wilson, however, found stories more to the point or more apt for driving home an argument or enforcing a moral. For example, no one could forget the joy with which he told of his admiration for a certain man who, on being tarred, feathered, and ridden out of town on a rail, calmly remarked: "You know if it hadn't been for the distinction of the thing I really would have preferred to walk."

For twenty-seven years Dr. Alderman as president guided the evolution of the University of Virginia from a small but distinguished college into the great, diversified institution that it is today. Through him there came large gifts for its physical development. Through him its small circle of distinguished scholars was steadily enlarged. Yet the changes, often far-reaching, usually came without hurt feelings, as if naturally and easily. It is characteristic of the modesty and simplicity of the man that he refused to obtain for himself as the executive a fine modern office building, but preferred instead a couple of exquisite rooms in one of the buildings dating from Jefferson's days. There he toiled unceasingly, not a radical in education, but none the less open to new ideas, and well aware that in a university as elsewhere stagnation means death. To an extraordinary degree he had the affection and regard of undergraduates, graduates, and faculty, and indeed of the entire State and of the collegiate world everywhere. A great, a useful, and an unselfish career is at an end.

I Work for Russia

I. State Trust and Five-Year Plan*

By WALTER ARNOLD RUKEYSER

MUCH has been written and spoken concerning the Five-Year Plan. Will it succeed? Will it fail? Equal attention has been given to dumping, convict and forced labor, communism versus capitalism, trade menaces, in fact to every possible aspect of what is perhaps the greatest political, sociological, and industrial experiment the world has ever seen. But how the workmen live, how they pay their bills, how these Russian human beings—people of flesh and blood and not mere abstract ideas—react to this gigantic experiment, how they work, how they obtain their food and clothing, what their amusements are, what their punishments—these questions have thus far been neglected in discussions of the Soviet Russia of today. Still another set of neglected questions would concern the everyday life of the American engineer in Russia. How does he work, live, eat, obtain his necessities, amuse himself, travel? What are his relations with the heads of his state trust; with the Russian engineers working with or under him? How does he get things done?

It is the purpose of this series of articles to attempt to answer such questions as these; to set down without varnish or veneer the direct personal observations and experiences of an American engineer who has been doing either consulting or supervisory work for a Soviet Russian trust since 1928 and who has spent the greater portion of his time since August, 1929, in the U. S. S. R.

The locale of this account is the Ural district, geographically Asiatic, politically European, temperamentally and climatically Siberian. On the gentle undulating plain forming the eastern slope of the Ural Mountains, fifty-six kilometers east of Sverdlovsk, the capital city of the district (formerly Ekaterinburg, where the Czar and his family were shot), and some two or three hundred kilometers east of a signpost on the Trans-Siberian Railway bearing the words "Europe-Asia" is the station of Bajenova. It is some 2,200 kilometers east of Moscow and is only a local station at which the "express" does not deign to stop. Yet Bajenova, with its sprinkling of peasants' houses, its little "hotel" for the overnight accommodation of staff employees of the trust who must perforce break their journey there, its store-sheds and store-yards, is in reality an important place. It is the gateway through which has poured an ever-increasing stream of one of the world's important commodities—asbestos. North of Bajenova and the Trans-Siberian, thirty-four kilometers by a tiny narrow-gauge railway, lie what are potentially perhaps the world's greatest asbestos deposits; and from Bajenova there already flows east and west, to the value of several million gold rubles annually, a steady stream of asbestos fiber which has been mined from the ground, separated from the waste rock inclosing it, and processed for adaptation to a multitude of uses.

At the northern end of the little narrow-gauge lies the mining community known as Asbest, where are centered the activities of the state trust "Uralasbest" by which the industry is administered. In this community and its vicinity there are today nearly 40,000 people, of whom more than 13,000 are employed in the many ramifications of the trust's work. Chief among these are the mining and milling of the asbestos-bearing rock. Auxiliary thereto are power plants, railway and transport systems, brick factories, foundries, repair shops—all the instruments necessary to carry out a great expansion program involving mechanization and modernization of existing mines and mills, the erection of new plants which are the largest of their type in the world, and, finally, the carrying out of a housing program for this army of workers and their families, with all the civic requirements of hospitals, clinics, primary schools, trade schools, water supply, lighting, fuel, stores, workmen's clubs, recreation centers, theaters, roads, administration buildings, and even a hotel and a geological museum.

Asbest was the laboratory in which my own work on the experiment of the Five-Year Plan took place. I was the only American engineer there. Except for a portion of the time when my wife was with me, there was no other English-speaking person nearer than Sverdlovsk. German was our main working language with the engineers and executives; at the end of six months I had a sufficient grasp of Russian for our other contacts—the details of the language problem will be discussed later. From August through December of 1929 I was observer and consultant; from the following June through January of this year I was an active participant in the work, with a trip out to America in the interim to orient myself and to permit of comparisons upon return. So much, then, for my apologia.

First of all, let us examine the organization and workings of a state trust of the Soviet Union. Later we will investigate the everyday life of the worker in the mines and in the cities, and finally the life of an American engineer living and working under the Soviet regime.

I believe that it is not generally appreciated how closely the organization of a Soviet state trust follows, externally at least, that of a large corporation under the capitalist system. The larger industries approximate in structure and function what is known in the United States as the European cartel. In the first place, many if not most of the Soviet trusts have a share structure. The shares, however, unlike those of corporations under capitalism, are not owned by private individuals or distributed into the hands of the public; they are deposited in toto with the state bank. Any earnings on these shares accrue to the national treasury and are socialized for use in the ultimate betterment of all the people. An American corporation may have two or three hundred thousand stockholders owning on the average only twenty to thirty shares each (is this a form of socialism?). Each stockholder has the right and is able to dispose of or increase his holdings as his wish or his pocket-book dictates.

* The first of a series of six articles. The second, The Individual Plant and the State Trust, will appear in the issue of May 20.—EDITOR THE NATION.

In the Soviet trust each and every enfranchised member of the entire population is a theoretical shareholder in each and every undertaking and industry comprising the entire national economy under the present regime. There are, in effect, roughly 150,000,000 shareholders in every Soviet state trust.

The state bank may be likened to a trustee with whom the capital stock is deposited. As trustee, the bank votes the stock and collects and dispenses income accruing thereon; likewise, in its capacity of trustee, it is responsible through the Supreme Council of National Economy for the satisfactory and profitable conduct of operations. So, although in what follows there will be evident a close resemblance in form between the state trust in Russia and the corporation of our experience, it becomes immediately obvious that such similarities are merely those of form and external functioning—the objectives are diametrically opposed. Whereas in the capitalistic organization the aim is the enrichment either of a private closed ownership or of a relatively greater number of people who intrust their smaller capital to the management of this or that corporation, in the Soviet trust the one and only object is to produce a commodity which by its production will benefit the entire mass of the Russian people either through supplying some human need and thus raising the standard of living or through making possible an exchange with some other country which can supply a needed product.

It is particularly in this respect that Soviet industry can be said to be socialized. In the detailed structure of the trust usual corporate procedure and organization are followed, from the duties of the officers down to the method of payment of workers. Now, having shown how the trust is socialized, it may be interesting to point out the other outstanding difference between the trust of Soviet Russia and the corporation as we know it. The Soviet trust is nationalized or, better, "rationalized." In other words, the development or operation of any industry in Russia is dictated in minutest detail by the demands of the Five-Year Plan. But contrary to common belief, the tremendous and varied details of the plan as applied to each industry do not originate from Moscow. They are worked out at the point of production and upon completion are forwarded to Moscow for approval or change.

So much has been written concerning the larger phases of present-day Russian economy that I shall point out here only for the sake of emphasis that the plan operates through the Central Planning Commission and the Supreme Council of National Economy (known in Russia by its initials B. C. H. X., pronounced Vay, Ess, En, Cha) to develop natural resources and industries according to a definite, scientific plan so as to yield without waste, duplication, or lack of conservation what has been established as requisite for the national economy.

When, for instance, it was decided to produce asbestos, the Bajenova deposits were chosen for intensive development and rationalization because of their immediate accessibility, the known extent of the deposits, the extent of former development, and the availability of labor, power, and transportation to markets and points of consumption. The mineral is to be found in many districts—in the Caucasus, in Georgia, in Eastern Siberia—but these other deposits will be held in reserve until such time as consumption justifies their development and operation.

Highly centralized and large-scale operations, with attendant efficiency, minimized waste, and reduced overhead, should eventually characterize Soviet trust operations. The mistakes and ills arising from the magnitude of the undertaking and from the lack of experience and precedent have been emphasized, although not exaggerated, by most observers, who have not taken into consideration the fact that in such a stupendous undertaking as the present Russian experiment a certain inefficiency and accompanying lost motion are bound to be evidenced in the initial stages. Should the mistakes and blunders not be eliminated they will multiply and devour; but if, as I suspect, they are being recognized and will be overcome, the ultimate result—perhaps not in the short span of the remaining two years of the plan, but within the life of the present generation—will be a new standard of efficient, planned, and coordinated production.

Each trust may be said to have its head office in Moscow. There has been a recently increasing tendency to group smaller industries under a major division having a natural, common basis of administration. Uralasbest was until last year an independent trust completely administered from Bajenova, the point of production. Now this comparatively small industry has been grouped with the production of other non-metallic minerals, such as magnesite, talc, and chromite, to form a division of the larger and important national trust known as "Mineralrud" (Mineral Ores). Mineralrud has its executive offices in Moscow, administered by a president and three active vice-presidents. The presidents of the trusts, in all cases that I have personally observed, are members of the Communist Party. So also are the two non-technical administrative vice-presidents. The third vice-president is usually an engineer, who may be a party or a non-party man. Usually he is not a member of the party.

It is the function of the head office to confer with the Supreme Council of National Economy and lay down the production norm for each operating unit under its jurisdiction. Likewise the permanent and operating capital required by each is predetermined and supplied through the head office. All production is routed and disposed of through this office. Credit from the proceeds received from sales is allocated by the accounting department to each unit. The amount of imports—material, equipment, technical services—allocated annually to each operation is fixed by the Moscow office on the basis of the amount of exports either contracted for or estimated as probable. In these matters the final word, again, lies with the Supreme Council in conjunction with the state bank and the Central Planning Bureau. All decisions with regard to major policy emanate from the head office in Moscow.

It can be seen therefore that the head office of a Soviet state trust, generally speaking, performs approximately the same functions as the head office of an American corporation —financing, sales, setting up of production norms for individual units, control of major policies, determination of programs of development and capital expenditure, control over expenditures and receipts, criticism of operations, including production costs, and final word on all matters pertaining to technique.

It will be the purpose of the next article to describe the organization and functioning of one of the typical production units forming a division of a Soviet state trust.

What I Think About

By J. B. S. HALDANE

I AM a fortunate man. The majority of my fellows are engaged in work rather as a means of livelihood than for its own sake. I am a biologist and find my job so interesting that I cannot keep my mind off it out of hours. Today, for example, I have been thinking over three problems. I have been thinking about how ferments work, about the laws of inheritance in dahlias, and about some curious alterations, apparently something like the changing of gear in a motor car, which take place in my nervous system when I go to sleep. They are all of practical importance, the first and third for medicine, the first for chemical industry, and the second for fruit-growing, because the laws of dahlias and apple trees are probably similar.

But if future antiquaries dig up this document, they will find these questions no more exciting than do most readers of the Daily Express today. For one of two things will almost certainly have happened. I hope that civilization, and science with it, will have gone on. If so, the excavators will probably be citizens of the world state, and the answers to my problems will be part of general knowledge, as the movements of the planets and the functions of the heart are today. But perhaps we shall have slipped back toward barbarism, and the men of Middlesex will gaze across the Thames from the ruins of north London toward a foreign and hostile Surrey. In that case, too, my questions will not interest them. They will probably be treasure hunters, and uninterested in mere paper.

Now that alternative is one of the things of which I think fairly frequently. For it is quite likely that the fate of our civilization will be decided in the present century. I am intensely interested in the Romans and their forerunners, the Egyptians and the men and women of Mesopotamia whose wonderful works are being unearthed while I write. Rome fell, and the lesson is there for us if we could read it. But we cannot. Some attribute its fall to the provision of free bread and amusements to the poor, forgetting that the Empire survived for nearly five centuries after these doles were instituted. Others believe that Rome should have educated her working classes. They forget that she was conquered by still less educated Goths. But even though I cannot rede these riddles I find this large-scale history far more interesting than the details of more recent years.

Today the old civilization of Europe which we share is adapting itself with some difficulty to the new conditions created by modern industrialism. But it is also threatened by two new types of civilization on its east and west, namely, communism and Americanism, which claim to be improvements on it. Both of these interest me intensely, and I think that we could copy some features of each with advantage. I should like London to have as good operas as New York and as good biological teaching for the average person as Moscow. But I do not desire that London should adopt either of their standards of personal liberty. I follow with immense interest the fierce and sometimes bloody struggles of the American and Russian governments against wets and whites respectively, in which they display a vigor and intolerance to be found only in young and growing civilizations. I am particularly interested in the Five-Year Plan of economic expansion in Russia. If it succeeds it will prove that socialism is a practicable system, and I shall probably live to see some form of socialism adopted in England. If it fails, Russia may revert to capitalism, and socialism all over the world experience a great setback.

I cannot accept the American and Communist ideals because both are too exclusively economic. They agree in taking economic efficiency to be the principal human virtue, even though in one case the benefits go mainly to private individuals, in the other to the state. They are both moving toward the mechanization of life and the standardization of man. Now I am not interested in machinery, and very much so in life. I have not got a motor car or a wireless set, but I have a large and rather beautiful garden. The people who interest me, and with whom I surround myself so far as I can, are not standardized people, but people who do unexpected things, such as carrying messages from Belgium to Holland during the war, and joining a jazz band or the Communist Party.

And the applications of science that interest me are not those to dead matter, on which our economic system is based, but to life. I am interested not only in medicine, but in the attempt to make ordinary people think about their own bodies in a scientific way. Last year about six thousand women died of cancer of the breast in England and Wales. If they had been treated when the first symptoms appeared, at least four-fifths of them would be alive and healthy today. This is only one example out of many. So I think that it is even more important that the general public should learn elementary medicine than the curb-step.

But I find the attempt to apply scientific principles to man in non-medical fields still more enthralling. I am extremely suspicious of most of them. Much of what passes as scientific psychology seems to me profoundly unscientific. The same is true of eugenics, criminology, and many other ologies. The small and cautious army of scientific men and women working in these fields is surrounded by such a horde of vociferous quacks that I can sympathize with the snipers, like Beachcomber, who are fighting a rearguard action against the advance of science. Their verbal missiles generally hit these unwanted allies. But science is advancing. We do know enough psychology to cure some criminals and neurotics, and enough about inheritance to say that some types of feeble-minded should not be allowed to breed. But this does not mean that no criminals should be punished, and no stupid people be permitted to marry. I am interested not only in the progress of science, but in trying to detect the still, small voice of common sense among the shouts of the anti-scientific and pseudo-scientific extremists.

Though not an adherent of any religion, I find religions an absorbing topic. They represent man's attempt to adjust himself intellectually and emotionally to the universe. The intellectual side of this effort interests me mainly because of its fantastic character. The stories of how hundreds of millions of people came to believe in the Immaculate Conception, the uncreated Koran, or the spiritual advantages of bathing in the Ganges are fascinating both as history and as psychology. But the emotional side seems to me an altogether more serious affair. If science is not to leave a gap which will inevitably be filled by superstition, man must learn to feel himself a citizen of the universe as depicted by science. Fortunately I know that such a state of mind is possible.

I am less interested than the average person in politics because I am convinced that all the political principles of today are makeshifts, and will ultimately, though not in my time, be replaced by principles based on science. I am a rather lukewarm supporter of the Labor Party because I consider the present distribution of our wealth unjust, and because in certain industries the age of free competition is passing, and I would sooner see a unified industry controlled by the state than by financiers. I am interested in the movements toward larger economic units, such as the British Empire and the European federation, though I hope that these two movements are not mutually exclusive.

I am only moderately interested in modern literature and art. They are largely experiments with technique, and often unsuccessful. At the moment modern French literature, as represented by men like Giraudoux and MacOrlan, interests me more than English. I am not musical, but even I can notice that broadcasting has improved musical taste.

Women interest me, for I am a normal man, but my interest in them is not intellectual. Children, and especially boys, are another matter. The average boy is something of a scientist, and an artist too. We grown-ups do our best to knock such nonsense out of him, and generally succeed. But until this process has been successfully carried out, a fairly bright boy is far more intelligent and far better company than the average adult. I am interested in our increasing knowledge of the child's mental processes, but even more in the attempts which are being made, in the face of ferocious opposition, to teach the child the subject which most children find the most fascinating of all, namely, human biology.

By this I do not mean "sex education," but a knowledge of the child's place in nature, and how his body works. The child represents the hope of humanity. We are not giving our children a fair deal. Many of those who could benefit most from higher education do not get it. Others are given more education than they either want or can assimilate. Hardly any are introduced to the scientific outlook until their minds have been so filled with prescientific ideas as to make scientific thought very difficult. I think that justice for children is even more important than justice for adults.

These are some of the topics which occupy my mind. But as a biologist I realize that all men are different, and I do not offer them as a pattern for others.

Detroit's Liberal Mayor

By MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

Detroit, April 21

OUTSIDE the City Hall were gathered two or three hundred Communists listening to a red-faced, bareheaded man while he earnestly and breathlessly denounced capitalism and all its works. He centered his fire on "that man Murphy, the mouthpiece of the capitalists of this city." The crowd roared its approval; dozens of passersby stopped to inquire the reason for the applause; the lone policeman in sight shifted his weight wearily from one leg to the other. Inside the Mayor's office, which overlooks the square where the Communists were assembled, sat eight or nine of their representatives. Frank Murphy, Mayor of Detroit, sat with them while they talked. They complained of the food served at the municipal lodging-houses; they argued that the city ought to pay them fifty-five cents an hour during their idleness instead of asking them to work for their board and keep; they demanded that the city policemen be more courteous toward the lodging-house guests; they asked that the order forbidding policemen to play checkers with the guests be rescinded. Mayor Murphy replied briefly but sympathetically, explaining why the city could not comply with their demands. The Communists withdrew, plainly chagrined over their failure to embarrass the Mayor, or to maneuver him into a position of appearing to be an oppressor of the working people.

Detroit has come through the hardest winter in its history without any sign of labor or other disturbances. More than 200,000 men have been without jobs, most of them throughout the cold months. Virtually all the other factory workers have been employed only a few days a week, their incomes being correspondingly reduced. In consequence, unrest and radicalism have spread over the city. It is estimated that there are some 30,000 Communist sympathizers in the Detroit area. Last winter, under Mayor Charles E. Bowles, the police took to clubbing the Communists whenever they appeared in the vicinity of the City Hall; this winter they have been under strict instructions to refrain from molesting Communist meetings.

Despite the opposition of the industrialists, the press, and the politicians, the Mayor has preserved for the oppressed classes their right to use the City Hall steps as a forum from which to criticize or denounce capitalism and the government. (The Free Press believes this forum ought to be abolished "out of consideration for the pigeons" which formerly made this square their feeding place.) He overrode opposition from the same quarters in granting the Communists a permit to hold a demonstration in Grand Circus Park on May Day, although the permit had been withheld by his own police commissioner, who feared that the shrubbery might be spoiled. The Mayor has made it a fixed rule to receive anyone and everyone who wishes to see him, and his anteroom is constantly filled with persons of every description waiting to see him, while an overflow from this crowd usually extends even into his private office.

Frank Murphy was elected mayor last fall as a liberal. The sincerity of his liberalism, based on the eighteenth-century philosophy of personal freedom, cannot be questioned; he has abided by his faith as far as has been possible in a bank-ridden and corporation-controlled city. He has driven the politicians from the public feed-box; he has given the city an honest and efficient government; and he has thus far carried its people safely through a crisis the end of which is not yet in sight. He has found time with all his municipal duties to take part in the fight against the power trust, against the restoration of capital punishment in Michigan, and against the efforts of some of Detroit's wealthier citizens to push a privilege-grabbing bill through the State legislature.

Nevertheless, Frank Murphy has made mistakes, most of which can be attributed, first, to his political inexperience, and, secondly, to his vague feeling that eighteenth-century liberalism is not enough to solve the problems of this era of machines and mass production. He believes that government should be run by experts. So believing, he has gone to the bankers and business men of Detroit for his official assistants and advisers. In doing this he has laid himself open to criticism, much of it justified, from the few political liberals active in Detroit.

Among his appointees are John Taylor and Mrs. Josephine Gomon, his secretaries, who are known to be sincere liberals; Frank Couzens (son of the United States Senator) and Colonel Sidney D. Waldon, two friends of municipal ownership who were put on the commission that manages the city-owned street railways; James K. Watkins, Rhodes scholar, former corporation lawyer, admitted by Murphy to be a conservative, who was named police commissioner; Joseph Mills, erstwhile purchasing agent for one of the big automobile companies, more recently purchasing agent for the city, and now commissioner of public works; Douglas Dow, son of Alexander Dow, head of the Detroit Edison Company (an Insull-controlled property), who was selected to succeed Mills as city purchasing agent; G. Hall Roosevelt, former General Electric man, later an official of the American State Bank, and now city controller and chairman of the Mayor's Unemployment Committee.

Liberal criticism of the Mayor's appointments is for the most part directed against Roosevelt, Dow, and Watkins, though the liberals point out that all Murphy's major appointees, with three exceptions, are persons formerly connected with banks or corporations notoriously hostile to liberalism of any sort. It is charged that Watkins introduced police censorship, something Detroit had never known, when he ordered a newsstand biography of Al Capone suppressed. Critics fear that this action may prove the opening wedge for the adoption of censorship as a weapon with which to fight labor and the radicals, despite the Mayor's views on the rights of free speech and a free press. Dow's selection is challenged because of his family, which puts him too close to the power trust to suit the liberal opposition. As for Roosevelt, it is frankly asserted that he was named controller because of "the magic of his name." The critics contend that he has been too intimately identified with the power trust and the American State Bank, which failed a few weeks ago under suspicious circumstances, to be an asset to a liberal mayor.

In replying to these charges Mayor Murphy told the writer that he would have been glad to pick his expert assistants from the ranks of the Detroit liberals, but that he found few of them qualified for the positions to be filled. He said that Roosevelt, Dow, and the others were entirely of his own choosing, and that he had undertaken no commitments of a compromising nature by appointing them. Answering the charge that he has been favoring power-trust hirelings, the Mayor pointed out that only a fortnight ago he helped the voters of a nearby town to defeat the attempt of the Detroit Edison to buy the community-owned power plant. In that campaign Murphy spoke in favor of public ownership and sharply criticized the power trust.

The most serious opposition to the Mayor comes, however, from the financiers and industrialists and from the local press, except the Hearst paper. It is based upon his efforts to relieve by direct methods some of the suffering and distress resulting from the industrial crisis. These interests consider his election and administration a huge and costly mistake. They look upon him as a red, his radicalism dating back to his participation in the fight to save Sacco and Vanzetti. Most outspoken of his journalistic critics is the Free Press, owned and published by Ed Stair, multimillionaire and corporation director extraordinary. Loudest among his industrial foemen is Henry Ford, who contributes not a penny in taxes toward the maintenance and operation of the municipal government. These opponents try to convince the voters that Murphy is bringing socialism to Detroit, that he has given the city a bad name by his vigor in pushing his relief program and in exposing some of the conditions arising from the widespread unemployment, that he has attracted thousands of bums to the city to be fed and housed at the taxpayers' expense, and that he has brought Detroit to the verge of bankruptcy.

The Mayor's handling of the problems of the depression has been divided into two major sections. First, an unemployment committee has been intrusted with the task of registering and finding work for the men and women let out by the factories and business houses. The jobless have been registered by families instead of individually, upon the theory that more families can be helped by giving only one job to a family. Up to April 19 a total of 112,282 families had been registered. New applicants for work are coming in at the rate of 600 weekly, indicating no lessening of the unemployment crisis. Upon the basis of the registration of April 19 it is estimated that between 175,000 and 225,000 persons are out of work in the city.

The committee has had little success in finding work for those who have registered. It has endeavored to create jobs by persuading employers to readjust work schedules, to reduce hours, and to employ only registered labor, by inducing citizens to hire odd-job men they would not ordinarily employ, by apportioning city jobs requiring unskilled labor to a greater number of persons, by helping unemployed men sell apples on the streets, and by various other means. Yet from September 16, when registration began, to April 19 only 23,926 persons were given work, and in more than half of these cases the work was of a temporary nature. The unemployment problem is far too large to be grappled with successfully by a single municipal government. In addition, most of the great employers of labor in and about the city have refused to lend a hand, and one or two of them have openly attempted to obstruct the work of the committee.

Quite another story can be told about the relief work. Perhaps in no other American city have families in distress as a result of the present depression been helped by their municipal officials as they have been by the Detroit Public Welfare Bureau. When Mayor Murphy took office, he immediately enlarged that organization, filled its headquarters staff with experts, and even went outside the city to recruit many trained field workers. Even then he did not find enough to take care of the immense relief problem. Families in distress need only show that they are bona fide residents of Detroit; the few persons who have come to Detroit for the specific purpose of "living off the city" have been weeded out by investigation. Last month 45,464 needy families were being supported by the Welfare Bureau. In January, the peak month, 47,312 families—approximately 190,000 persons, or more than twelve per cent of the population—were being directly assisted by the municipality. March expenditures totaled $1,448,000, of which $920,000 went for food, $242,000 for rent, $173,000 for fuel, $79,000 for shoes and clothing, $9,000 for sundries, $4,000 for medical and surgical supplies, $1,600 for transportation, $1,600 for boarding of children, and $4,000 for burials.

The Homeless Men's Bureau has been set up by the Murphy administration under the direction of John Ballenger, executive secretary of the local American Red Cross chapter. During the week ended April 11 this bureau fed 6,897 men daily, and gave meals and lodgings to another 4,010 men, making a total of 10,907. Most of the men take their meals at the two municipal lodging-houses, and approximately half the men sleep there, while others are put up at the Y. M. C. A. or at private rooming-houses and hotels. At the municipal lodges it costs twenty-two and one-half cents a day to feed and keep a single man, while the city pays out fifteen cents a night for lodging and twenty cents a day for meals for men who have to be cared for elsewhere.

It has been charged time and again by Henry Ford and others that this bureau has been feeding bums at the taxpayers' expense, but no man is given relief unless he can present a certificate from a taxpayer showing that he actually has lived in Detroit for at least a year. Men without such affidavits are given a bath, a night's lodging, and a free meal, and then told to be on their way. Mr. Ballenger has found that more than 35 per cent of the men fed and kept by this bureau are former employees of Henry Ford, and that 11 per cent of them are married. In virtually every one of these latter cases the man came to Detroit several years ago, found a steady job, and on the strength of it married, bought a home, and started raising a family. Since then he has lost his job, his savings, his home, and his family. These men were not bums a few years ago, though they may fall in that category today.

Mayor Murphy's relief program has unquestionably proved a drain on the city's finances. Detroit faces a heavy deficit, and its uncollected taxes are growing monthly, primarily because of the depression. At the best there will have to be an increase in the tax rate within a year or two, though the Mayor so far has succeeded in preventing an increase by practicing the strictest economy in his administration. He estimates that by eliminating politics and the politicians he has saved the city an average of $1,000,000 monthly since he took office last September, and the records to a large extent bear out this estimate. Nevertheless, he realizes that the tax rate must go up if his relief work is to continue, and he believes that the additional burden should be carried by the city's industries. But most of the persons receiving direct relief are former employees of companies like the Ford, Briggs Body, and Chrysler, whose plants are just outside the city limits and therefore cannot be taxed by Detroit. Incidentally, the officials of these untaxable corporations are among the loudest critics of the relief program.

Frank Murphy has proved himself a sincere, honest, and fearless mayor. He has gone ahead with his plans despite the opposition of the press, politicians, bankers, industrialists, chamber of commerce, organized labor, and Communists. For the time being he appears to have won the confidence of the Detroit rank and file. His weakness is his lack of political experience. It is probable that he will be reelected next November, principally because the two men now thinking of running against him are disliked more than he is by the press and politicians of the city, but after that his political future is none too secure.

Broke at Fifty-five

By FRANK G. MOORHEAD

I'VE done a good deal of thinking in the past year, largely because I haven't had anything else to do. Prior to that, for twenty-five years, I wrote editorials, without thinking—sort of caught ideas out of the air, mechanically, as a riveter catches red-hot bolts.

Most of the editorials were intended to comfort the poor and downtrodden. I didn't know the poor and downtrodden personally. But they existed in large numbers, and subscribed to the paper for which I wrote. It was a farm paper, one dollar a year. A difficult kind of journal to edit, because on the one hand we must espouse the export debenture, the equalization fee, individual loans to farmers on crops, and every other panacea which offered to relieve distress and suffering on the farm; and on the other we must assure the advertisers that no better market exists anywhere in all the world than the farm market.

There was good money in it, for publisher and editor both, as well as a trip back East every little while, usually just before elections when a conference of "farm experts" was called in Washington for the purpose of helping the farmers to vote for the right candidates. It looked as though the condition and the position were permanent. It really wasn't a bad job, as jobs go, telling the farmer how poor he was, for $200 a week, with an annual bonus if advertising remained good.

I had a knack of writing things that would make folks cry, about people who had died and gone to where they were much better off. I used to look out the window and get to crying real hard myself over some person I had never seen, or cared for, or even heard of before. Good stuff, though, when one is editing a paper which is read by a million farmers who don't often get to see better sob-stuff. Some of them weren't so bad. I recall one written after the death of the mother of the man who owned the paper and signed the weekly pay checks. I sent a copy of it to a man in Washington named Hoover, who wrote back: "I had heard of the terrible accident to Mr. ——'s mother and I telegraphed him some time ago with respect to it. I have never seen a finer tribute than that which you sent me." I'm keeping the letter for two purposes: first, to use as a recommendation, if I ever find the right parties; second, to sell as an autograph, as a last resort.

I remember how I used to get down to work early Monday morning, and then taper off, or peter out, a bit later each morning, until Saturday wasn't much of a day at all. One Monday morning I brought in the newspaper early, and found myself out of a job. The paper I had worked for as second in command for twenty years had been sold the day before, on Sunday.

A few weeks later a national bank in which I had invested the residue of what had seemed a small salary, until I lost it, found it advisable to merge with a larger bank. Before that, stock which had cost $250 a share went so low that it made a fellow wake up in the middle of the night, all hot and scared, and hearing every board in the house creak, he was so sure the morning mail would bring the notice of a double assessment on the poor innocent stockholders.

There's the picture: broke at fifty-five, and four hungry people still demanding three meals a day. What was the sensation?

I was greatly surprised, taking my first airplane flight, to find I had no sensation at all. I did not even know I was moving. It was somewhat the same at first when I went broke. I did not even know I had stopped moving. It should have been more dramatic. I should have paced the floor. I should have mouthed tragedy and made a pass at the chandelier with my walking stick, given me by the office force after many years of faithful service. I had written stories (fiction) about men in similar situations. I must admit they acted altogether differently, at rates varying from one to five cents a word. They said an awful lot in the higher-priced articles.

A man's egotism is an anaesthetic allaying the first pains. He works fifteen, twenty, twenty-five years, no matter how many. He is either good or he becomes acclimated and the boss lets him stay on, like an old piece of furniture hardly worth carrying away. He loses his job. He says to himself, "Well, I've worked hard and faithfully a good many years. The last three years I didn't take my regular office vacation, at full pay. Sorry now that I didn't, but a rest won't hurt me. In fact, it will do me good. I was getting in a rut. And while I'm resting other firms or plants or factories will hear that I'm out, and I'll choose from among the good offers they make me."

"Well, you're fixed all right; no need for you to worry; you'll get along fine. You can always get a good job, anywhere." So the home folks said, as they stopped me on the street and then hurried on, remembering I was no longer in the newspaper business and therefore no longer useful to them, and their children's parties, with layout, on the Sunday society page.

"It seems to be the tendency of the times; reducing overhead expenses." This from a few editors, still permanently located and pretty sure of a few years more.

As for the offers, they never came at all. It was weeks before I could figure it out. The little notice about me in the home-town paper had been hidden away between a patent-medicine advertisement and the notice of a concern passing its dividend. Maybe I'd better send out a few letters to prominent publishers and editors to let them know my address. I had opened up an office in one of the bedrooms at home and was typing, "Now is the time for all good men to come to the aid of the party," hour after hour, in order to make the neighbors think I was still writing—for a living.

I have a large number of very splendid indorsements which I shall be glad to loan to anyone prepaying the postage. The name can easily be changed. So many of those to whom I wrote giving them first chance at my services would have grabbed me off just a little while before, but "recent additions to our staff make it impossible," "we have built up a stalwart organization which we hesitate," and so on. "Surprised to hear that you should have been let out." No more surprised than I was, and the italics are not mine, either. You can't eat words. You can't even get credit for them at the cash-and-carry grocery stores.

The trusting hopefulness of the first few weeks turned to bitterness. "A fine fellow, when he had a paper back of him; quite a dub without one." "Pretty cocky, wasn't he? Sort of held himself aloof from the gang. Oh, well, roll out another money ball and let the ancient and noble game of Kelly pool continue." I was sore for a while; then I laughed it off. No doubt I had done the same thing many a time. Nobody ever considers anything until it comes right home. I've often wondered if Longfellow wrote "There is no death" with his fingers crossed. He sure slipped it over on them that day.

First, indifference; next, reassuring faith; third, galling bitterness; fourth, morbidity. And the last is what hurts and causes folks to fall out of ten-story windows, accidentally. "Nothing wrong with his accounts; happily married," say the newspapers. How about the rapidly dwindling bank balance; the determination that the loved ones, who were in no way to blame for the bad luck, shall go on having the things they were accustomed to having; the stiff upper lip the grand old Scotch mother used to talk about, before you ever had a penny of your own and were too young to go out in the world and work?

Around fifty a man loses nerve—I don't mean the nerve it takes to accompany Wilkins under the ice to the North Pole, or to fly with Byrd and moving-picture men over the South Pole. I mean the nerve it takes to ask a stranger for a job, when you've turned down thousands of men yourself without batting an eye; to tell a friend how good you are, and watch his face continue blank; to approach the banker whom you puffed in your paper for years and who was only too glad to lend you whatever you wanted at 6 per cent, and not even take the interest out in advance. This time he suggests that the wife sign the note, too, and makes it 7 per cent, in advance, and asks for a credit statement.

You have just as much ability as ever. You've got a book half started—a whale of a plot never used before, good dialogue, nice, clean, moral sort of a book. You'll sell it soon and then you'll be all right. Maybe you'll make $10,000 out of it. But the home folks know you've lost your $200 a week, and that's ever so much bigger. And nowadays if you're counting on a $10,000 book, the home folks are right; the $200 check is much bigger—and surer.

Finally, in course of time, you begin to feel toward yourself as you imagine other folks are feeling toward you. I've never cared a rap for money. I never carried much, however far from home I went. I could always get it somehow, from somebody. There would be whole days at home when there wasn't even a penny in the pockets of any of the two suits. Now that I'm broke I always carry a few silver dollars, so I can jingle them and not feel so downcast. It has the effect on listeners, too.

Have you read Stevenson's "The Amateur Emigrant"? If you have, read it again. He tells of coming over on a steamer, second cabin, when that was different from what it is now, while the class of people with whom he was wont to associate were traveling first class. They ignored him. "In my normal circumstances," he says, "it appeared every young lady must have paid some tribute of a glance, and though I had not often detected it when it was given, I was well aware of its absence when it was withheld." He reflects a bit and concludes, "I wish someone . . . would find out exactly at what stage of toilet a man becomes invisible to the well-regulated female eye."

I have a similar problem. I should like to find out at what stage of your poverty other people realize or sense it, and pass you by as one no longer interesting or useful to them. You wear the same suit, more carefully brushed and pressed than ever before to conceal your poverty. You walk just as cockily. You know as much; you know a lot more, in fact—things you didn't suspect or believe before. I guess, after all, it's the droop in the shoulders, the look in your eyes—furtive, expectant, resentful.

The nights are the worst; the time when all you can see is the unseen. You've done everything humanly possible to avert the inevitable. You've gone over your life-insurance policies, to be sure they are all incontestible after the first year. You've taken out additional accident insurance. You realize that for the first time in your rather carefree, indifferent life you are worth more dead than alive—a good deal more.

The boards in the house creak. Your heart gives a jump. Will it be the last one? Perhaps it's a burglar. Your last chance to be a hero. To have the papers, which you pretend to scorn, use you as first-page copy. X marks the spot where the burglar was killed. Don't laugh! It's all terribly real; no make-believe. But it's a grand joke on the burglar—robbing the house of a man who is broke, at fifty-five. Poor devil!

Another board creaks. You hear Andy figuring his income tax. "Five million." "Seven million." You go over, in your head, the dwindling bank balance. "Three hundred and two." "Two hundred and eighty." "Two hundred and forty-nine."

You're wide awake now. The perspiration runs from you. It's only the ring of the window shade hitting the glass this time. The birds are beginning to sing. Pretty little things. They don't have to work on a salary. They don't take men's words, and find them salty in the mouth. A little light in the east window. Everybody else is sleeping. You've stopped all the clocks. You can't stand them any more. Every tick is one of the few remaining dollars gone.

Another day. Nobody knows, but yourself. And you're getting terribly close-mouthed about things lately.

In the Driftway

NUDITY as a cause is apparently as lusty as ever. Someone has just written a book about a trip around the world of which the points of interest included all the nudist colonies in existence. Meanwhile, the approach of summer conjures up a cloud of clothes being flung in all directions in the business-like and slightly pathetic rush of an urban civilization to pile on its back all the sunshine it can against winter office life. The Drifter will be found rushing with the rest. Being a sun-worshiper of the first water, he will peel off his shirt for any stray sunbeam that is not escorted by a swaggering, icy breeze, and he will stick to that sunbeam's trail with all the persistence of a sunflower until day's end. It is because he is so devout a sun-worshiper, in fact, that he is not a nudist. The reason for a sun bath is pleasure; the result of a sun bath is, or should be, relaxation. Being a nudist, on the other hand, strikes the Drifter as one of the most uncomfortable, unrelaxing pursuits in life. He is not speaking just now of moral considerations and martyrdom. He is speaking of physical discomfort.

* * * * *

HAVE you ever sat on grass or sand in the nude? Have you ever tried to sleep in a meadow with nothing between you and nature but your skin? Of course, it is possible that nudists never try to do such things. It is possible, as someone has suggested, that they spend all their time running in circles, pointing their toes, and throwing their heads back. But even people with causes have to sit down, sleep, and eat occasionally. The natural habitat of the nudist the Drifter takes for granted to be the fields and woods, and he has already indicated his doubts about the quality of rest to be drawn from a fir-bough bed without benefit of blankets. When nudity goes into the average house, the prospect is even more pathetic. Between the wicker furniture on the porch and the sharp corners on the dining-room chairs there could be no comfort anywhere except perhaps in the plush divan in the living-room—and plush can prickle a fiendish prickle.

* * * * *

"DON'T be silly," replies the nudist, "your remarks apply only to novices among nudists. Toughness comes very quickly." Still, though he were tough enough to sit plain on a fallen tree trunk all afternoon and not wear the marks, the Drifter could not contemplate life in New York City, say, with any pleasure, even if the whole population were to go suddenly and unanimously nudist, thus relieving him of any possible embarrassment. Brick and pavement, subways and sharp-cornered skyscrapers, not to mention humidity and blown dirt, are not the Drifter's idea of nude living unless one desires to go in deliberately for taking punishment—and the Drifter never did have much admiration for St. Simeon Stylites and his like. And there are other objections. The fallacy still persists to the effect that the human body is beautiful. It is a pretty and comforting fallacy. The Drifter hopes it will not be spoiled by a successful nudist revolution. But grant such a revolution; then imagine a population, not of Greek statues come to life, but of average human beings gone nudist and endowed with the toughness of hide earlier referred to. The Drifter, for one, would not care to stay in the world a day longer. It would be aesthetically unbearable. Personally, he would much rather contemplate a rough-tweed golfer than a tough-kneed nudist on a subway excursion to Van Cortlandt Park.

* * * * *

YET even if the nudists should tear down the cities, invent a velvet grass, put snubbers on the stings of wasps, round off all corners, and by some miracle make all human bodies beautiful, the Drifter would still refuse to join their ranks unless they changed at least one of their arguments. Scratch any nudist and he will protest that the purity of the nudist's mind is such as to make ivory soap go into hiding; to prove his point he will go on to say that your full-blown nudist is so pure-minded that he is unconscious of sex to the extent of not knowing, except intellectually, whether he is talking to a woman or a man. If that is true, the Drifter has as little use for the nudist as he has for the feminist who insists that women are exactly like men. Both would rob the world of all variety and interest. The pure mind, granted that it exists, is immensely overrated. If an active, competent mind is one which grasps all the implications of any given idea—and surely no one would quarrel with that definition—who could find either desirable or useful a mind that saw only those implications which would look well in a Sunday-school textbook? As for a person who is unconscious of the difference between men and women, the Drifter hopes he may never meet one. Fortunately, he never expects to, even though he, too, should visit every nudist colony in the world.

Are Our Fingers Crossed?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It was quite gratifying to read The Nation's editorial on Americans in Nicaragua. But it seems to me that you could have carried your point a little closer to the mark than you did.

We wonder, some of us, why South Americans fail to return our hearty handshake forever extended to them in such brotherly fashion. It is because they have ample reason to believe that our fingers are crossed. Isn't it going to laughable extremes when, after the President's recent conciliatory utterances, the Herald Tribune, one of the leading papers in this country, blandly takes Mr. Stimson to task, in two leading editorials, for attempting to bear out Mr. Hoover with a true act of faith?

The American interests that President Coolidge was so insistent should be protected were literally forced on a smaller and weaker country, and the Americans who invested their money in Nicaragua were not ignorant of the conditions under which they did so. They were thoroughly aware of the fact that American exploitation of Nicaraguan resources was being maintained under the shadow of American battleships. In response to the continued protests of Latin Americans and Americans, it was stated that our marines were to be withdrawn and the Old King Cole was a merry old soul,

And a merry old soul was he,
He called for his pipe and he called for his bowl,
And he called for his fiddlers three.

MY, my, what a rumpus when the robot appeared! It seems that the Prime Minister, in a fit of economy, had installed canned music and fired the King's rollicking fiddlers. The jolly old monarch was wroth.

But King Cole could remedy the trouble. He had only to order the robot to the attic, send for his beloved fiddlers, and have the Prime Minister publicly spanked.

control of finance was to be placed in the hands of the Nicaraguan government. Now when actual steps are being taken by our State Department to carry out a policy of hands off, there seems to be considerable doubt as to whether we really want to give up wielding the big stick.

We have been spouting a deal of oratory in an attempt to cover up the truth. The time has come for an open statement of our position. Either the United States intends to maintain control over Nicaragua for the sole benefit of American investors or we will withdraw our marines and battleships and prove the truth of our altruistic statements. Are we going to deserve Latin America's faith in our good-will, or are we going to maintain our present cross-fingered position at the expense of that faith which we insist we desire?

Sorry

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Some essential words were omitted in the printing of my article on political prisoners in your issue of April 29. Inadvertently I was made to say: "the six industrial unionists who are serving sentences of from twenty-five to forty years in Centralia, Washington." This should have read: ". . . who are serving sentences . . . for defending their hall in Centralia, Washington." The six I. W. W. hall defenders have been confined in the penitentiary in Walla Walla since 1920.

Librarians Again

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I did not agree with Constance Auer in her article on librarians which appeared in The Nation several weeks ago, but I think that I agree even less with the letters of her critics. I have been actively engaged in library work for the past seven years. Neither libraries nor librarians are perfect. But Miss Auer is basing her estimate of the profession on information which is pretty much out of date now, and while it has the ring of truth in it because she undoubtedly knows what she is talking about, she loses sight of the fact that libraries are constantly and consistently going forward.

But while the critics of Miss Auer may seem to be more reasonable than she is, it seems to me that they are really much less so. For one thing, Miss Auer's critics declare that library salaries reward at least partly the time spent in professional preparation for a library job. That is simply not so. I do not know what the average library salary is throughout the country now, but I do know that a few years ago the American Library Association compiled a table of statistics which showed it to be somewhere between $1,600 and $1,700 a year—no great reward for a bachelor's degree from an approved university, and perhaps one year of graduate work in library school on top of it all. Library salaries are increasing but librarians are still the most poorly paid of professional workers.

Miss Auer's critics further ignore the fact that most public libraries in the United States are very small, with fewer than 50,000 volumes on their shelves. Work in small public libraries certainly does not proceed in accordance with the latest business methods; routine is not eliminated even from the work of the trained people on the staff. Whether it should be or not is an open question. I firmly believe that it should be in every possible way, but the fact remains that it simply is not.

Nivernais Sheep

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I feel compelled to arrogate to myself the rather pedantic task of calling attention to an inaccuracy in the translation of Rolland's Broaden, Europe, or Die! in your issue of April 22.

I refer to the phrase "Nivernais sheep (they're chamois—it takes but three to strangle a wolf)." The words in parentheses should have been put in quotation marks; the original is simply a rhymed proverb which serves also as an epigraph for the second chapter of "Colas Breugnon." And moutons de Chamoux has nothing to do with chamois, but is evidently just a synonym for moutons du Nivernais, both of them designating "the soldiers that M. de Nevers, our duke, sent us for our defense."

Ante Wells

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In his review of "Rational Evolution," by Robert Briffault, in your issue of March 25 Scott Buchanan makes it plain that he is under the impression that this book is a successor to Wells's outline of history.

All well-informed readers, however, know that Briffault's book was first published in 1919 by George Allen and Unwin, London, under the title "The Making of Humanity." It appeared one year before Wells's outline.

The Silent Land

By JAMES RORTY

There is wild singing, and the songs
Man makes with nature; this
Is neither, for this land belongs
Not to the old gods who have gone,
Nor to the new, whose unimagined grace
Flees from our question; here is space
Gone voiceless, time gone dumb.

Last night I listened to the hiss
Of the wind between the fallen moon
And dawn's first flutter, pondering this Invincible revolt of Things.
One voice I heard, the fox's cry;
Four times he circled in the snow
Hunting under an empty sky,
And what he said was like the woe
That cries from windows where bewildered souls
Beat on the bars, and count the idiot sum
Of chaos till the new gods come.

Storm after drought, and stones that speak again;
Song after silence, time gone terrible and loud,
All earth in labor and the fearful rain
Of godhead falling: this, when man is proud.
This is the song we may not sing;
Not now; the new gods have not come.

John Bright

The Diaries of John Bright. Edited by R. A. J. Walling. William Morrow and Company. $7.50.

JOHN BRIGHT would not have approved of this publication. "I am against biographies and portraits and statues. . . . I have been and am a victim of the habit of my time to commemorate the ordinary labors of ordinary men." So he wrote in the last of his diaries, within two years of his death. When it was proposed to bring out an edition of his speeches, he did not object; his life, he used to say, was in his speeches, and to their preparation he devoted much thought and care. But the entries in his diaries were intended for the most part merely as aids to his memory and were jotted down without regard to literary form. He was not an ordinary man, but many of the events recorded in his diaries were ordinary events. Yet even these are often significant for the light they throw upon his character, habits, and interests; and his private and informal comments on current events often disclose, with palpable candor, his opinion on men and measures of his day. The diaries are now in the possession of one of his granddaughters. George Macaulay Trevelyan was permitted to examine them when he was engaged in the preparation of his "Life of Bright," but apart from this no use has been made of them by historians.

The least difficult part of the task that faced Mr. Walling as editor was to select from a journal extending, with some discontinuity, over a period of fifty years such passages as seemed suitable for publication. If these were to be made intelligible to the reader and convey any adequate impression of Bright's public career, they had to be placed in their historical setting, references and allusions had to be explained, and hiatuses in the diaries had to be bridged. This laborious work Mr. Walling has accomplished in praiseworthy manner. It was not his aim to deal fully and objectively with all the great public controversies in which Bright figured, and it may be that he has not always done full justice to causes and policies which Bright opposed. His purpose, as he tells us, was "to intervene as little as possible between the reader and John Bright," and in this he has succeeded. He has made an important contribution to the political history of Victorian England. I have noticed very few errors in matters of fact, the most serious being a statement that President Johnson demanded "severer conditions for the return of the Secession States than Congress was prepared to impose."

Bright's fundamental opinions were formed in youth and underwent little modification as a result of later experiences. His life, as Mr. Walling suggests, cannot be understood without a realization of the influence exerted upon him by the Quaker doctrine of the Inner Light, and the Inner Light is not evolutionary. He lived in an age when the drafts of science and philosophy were blowing through the corridors of orthodoxy, but they seem to have had little if any disturbing influence upon the serenity of his faith. He retained to the end the religious beliefs of his childhood, and it was with deep propriety that he was buried in the graveyard of the Friends' Meeting House of Rochdale, his birthplace. What he thought in his youth about aristocracy, tyranny, monopoly, intervention, war, intolerance, established churches, bishops, and Turks he continued to think in his old age. His diaries begin with the journal of a tour of the Near East which he made at the age of twenty-four—"a kind of philosophical Baedeker," Mr. Walling calls it—and when he reread these early impressions and reflections years afterwards he found nothing to which he could not still subscribe. The inflexibility of his convictions gave him magnificent courage in supporting them, but it also made it difficult for him to appreciate new issues and points of view. A contemporary said of him when he was approaching old age that his mind was singularly inaccessible to novel ideas.

The diaries bear abundant testimony to Bright's sympathetic interest in plain people and his admiration of the homely virtues. He was not one of those humanitarians who love mankind in the abstract but care little for concrete men and women. Such an entry as this is worth a hundred protestations of devotion to humanity:

> Called upon poor Mrs. Hughes and took some supplies of tea and sugar, etc. Her cheerfulness and resignation unchanged. She has been nineteen years confined to her bed. To visit her is a lesson from which all may learn.

His regard for Queen Victoria seems to have sprung from his sympathy for her as a woman who had known deep domestic sorrow; as a Friend and as a democrat he was never awed, as Gladstone was, by the majesty of monarchy.

The diaries shed more light upon the diarist, of course, than upon anybody else, but Bright's long political career—he was a member of parliament from 1843 till his death in 1889—brought him inevitably into contact with all the outstanding political figures of the Victorian Age, and to those who are interested in the personalities of statesmen no passages in the diaries will seem more important than those in which he interprets the characters and motives of his famous contemporaries. On all matters of principle he and Disraeli were as far apart as men could be, but they formed an odd sort of friendship that lasted for some twenty years. Under date of December 15, 1852, following an extraordinary conversation in which Disraeli, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, proposed a coalition between the radicals and the protectionist Conservatives, Bright writes:

> This remarkable man is ambitious, most able, and without prejudices. He conceives it right to strive for a great career with such principles as are in vogue in his age and country—says the politics and principles to suit England must be of the "English type"; but having obtained power, would use it to found a great reputation on great services rendered to the country. He seems unable to comprehend the morality of our political course, and on this ground was probably induced to seek the interview with me.

When the great careerist reached the goal of his ambition, the premiership, Bright comments:

> A great triumph of intellect and courage and patience and unscrupulousness, employed in the service of a party full of prejudices and selfishness and wanting in brains. The Tories have hired Disraeli, and he has his reward from them.

The list of notables who make appearances in the diaries includes Queen Victoria, Cobden, Lord Brougham, Peel, Lord John Russell, Palmerston, Cavour, Garibaldi, William Lloyd Garrison, Gladstone, Cardinal Manning, Parnell, Goldwin Smith, Joseph Chamberlain, and Lord Rosebery.

Another Epic of the Soil

The Good Earth. By Pearl S. Buck. The John Day Company. $2.50.

HERE is another of these novels concerning man's love for and struggle with his land, but this novel is different in that its setting is China. Like her first novel, "East Wind: West Wind," Mrs. Buck's second narrative has the peculiar interest which the foreign and exotic always call forth. We read with interest of the Chinese farmer's life in the small village, of the many detailed family customs, of the social and economic changes in status that come about as the family slowly wins its struggle and grows wealthy. We learn, too, of city life in China during one of the uprisings of the poor against the rich. We are given a complete cross-section of Chinese life. All this has a great fascination; it is material which no Occidental writer would attempt without special preparation, and Mrs. Buck, who has lived all her life in China, has of course this special preparation. Her complete familiarity with her material allows her to present her characters as very human and very real, as people who engage our sympathies. It is interesting to note, in this respect, that her women characters, even the most inarticulate of them, are more clearly interpreted than are her men characters.

Such a novel as "The Good Earth" calls at once for comparison with other novels of the same general design—novels of the soil on the one hand and novels concerning Oriental life on the other. Any such comparison brings out the fact that despite Mrs. Buck's very good narrative style, despite her familiarity with her material, her work has a certain flatness of emotional tone that is not characteristic of Knut Hamsun's studies of the toiler in the earth, nor again of the autobiographical narrative of a Korean childhood and boyhood, "The Grass Roof." Both Hamsun and Younghill Kang have much more than an accurate observation and objective analysis of their characters and scenes to present; both of them are able intuitively to penetrate into the emotions of their characters. This ability derives from their own traditional knowledge and racial inheritance. The result is that they write books which are more convincing and more exciting. Mrs. Buck is undoubtedly one of the best of Occidental writers to treat of Chinese life, but "The Good Earth" lacks the imaginative intensity, the lyrical quality, which someone who had actually farmed Chinese soil might have been able to give it.

EDA LOU WALTON

Lenin

Lenin, Red Dictator. By George Vernadsky. Yale University Press. $3.

Lenin. By D. S. Mirsky. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

Lenin. God of the Godless. By Ferdinand A. Ossendowski. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.75.

THE thing that made Lenin really great was what he wanted. When the goal is a villa in Florida or the director's office in a New York corporation, success makes one a little big man. But Lenin's goal was the forging of a new world. Even partial achievement, especially when coupled with the living legacy he left to complete the task, therefore places him above all other modern statesmen. It is the stupendousness of Lenin's conception that increases his stature a thousand-fold. Ossendowski and Vernadsky have no eyes for such perspectives. Only Mirsky suspects them.

A biography of Lenin should reveal first the man and the workings of his mind, second the revolutionary leader and his role in history. Weighed in these very simple balances, all three volumes under review will be found wanting. The man does not emerge from any of them. Mirsky attempts no estimate of Lenin's human qualities. Ossendowski writes pure fiction. Vernadsky has facts, facts. But facts without the infusion of understanding are sterile. In the few pages of Krupskaya's reminiscences or of Trotzky's "Lenin" there is more of the human being than in all three of the present biographies combined. Lenin, for instance, liked poetry. He read and reread Pushkin, and preferred him to the revolutionary Mayakovsky. Yet you wouldn't think it from Vernadsky's tale or from Mirsky's. They create a non-existent, dried-up, fanatical, mechanical Communist-Jesuit.

Still less do we see how Lenin's mind functioned. It was plastic but tempered by inordinate intransigence when the occasion demanded. Mental agility fathered opportunism. Opportunism, however, represented a compromise with conditions, never with principles. Vernadsky is totally unequipped to grasp this. Ossendowski is not concerned with the real Lenin.

A good biography of Lenin is yet to be written. Biographies can be written only of dead men. A true "Life" of Lenin would reflect the effect of his work on the second half of the twentieth century. Few dare or are able to look so far ahead.

In a society that had any serious regard for truth Ossendowski would be ostracized. His work passes as a biography but makes no pretense to being a historical record. There is no photograph of Lenin, no quotation from Lenin, no bibliography, no date of Lenin's birth. Ossendowski bothers with few dates, and most of those are wrong. Speeches Lenin never made and proclamations never issued are given in full. No respect for facts checks Ossendowski's inventive talents. He quotes long dialogues that allegedly took place in Russian brothels between the young Lenin and prostitutes. The Winter Palace, he asserts, was looted on the opening day of the revolution with Lenin's approval. This is untrue. On the same November 7 Ossendowski takes Lenin into a Petrograd cathedral, where the leader of the victorious coup d'etat personally stops the services and argues about God with the priest. Then the tombs of the Czars are opened and sacked while Lenin looks on. None of this ever happened.

Polite pornography and sadism abound in Ossendowski's tale of the ascetic Lenin. There is just enough eroticism to excite the sex-starved without inviting the Post Office's ban. One scene is classic disgrace: Dora Frumkin, a ravishing Jewish beauty, has tried to assassinate Lenin. He wishes to witness the cross-examination in the dungeons of the Cheka. He goes with Dzerzhinsky. As they enter, Dzerzhinsky's first assistant is buttoning on his jacket while Dora is still lying on a velvet-covered couch. He boasts to Lenin of the delectable morsel he has had. The examination commences. Dora remains naked. Lenin's "thoughts were animal"—the Song of Songs runs through his mind—and Ossendowski quotes them at length. But the questions interrupt these reveries. Who inspired her to fire at Lenin? She is silent. The Chekists cover her with oaths and threats. They beat her aged mother. Dora is silent. At a signal from Dzerzhinsky, four Chinese mercenaries thereupon seize her and cut off her beautiful breasts. Now will she tell? She will not. The Chinese then dig out her eyes with their long sharp knives, while Lenin watches. "She wept tears and blood." Again the demand for a confession. Dora is silent. But Lenin can stand it no more. "Finish her off," he cries. A Chinese stabs and kills her. Hot stuff, what?

The Situation of Labor

Labor and Coal. By Anna Rochester. International Publishers. $2.

Labor and Lumber. By Charlotte Todes. International Publishers. $2.

Labor and Textiles. By Robert W. Dunn and Jack Hardy. International Publishers. $2.

LEFT-WING unionism has enlisted the services of one of the most able labor-research staffs of America. Publishing a series on "Labor and Industry," of which five volumes have already appeared, the Labor Research Association has thrown out a challenge to the industrialists of America as well as to the American Federation of Labor. The three volumes under review treat of the situation in three of the most demoralized sections of American capitalism. They are indispensable to any student of labor, whatever his point of view.

"Labor and Coal," by Miss Rochester, contains many hard facts concerning an industry which has for a decade been the despair of the nation. For ten years workers have averaged less than 200 days of work a year, one-fifth of the men being employed less than 150 days. Cutthroat competition between areas has reduced wages to an average of barely $1,100 a year. Stupid union leadership during a prolonged depression has made unionization of such little force that the annual earnings of the unionized Illinois miners ($1,098) are below those of non-union West Virginia and only equal to Kentucky. Annually 2,100 miners are killed in the course of their work, many because of inadequate precautions by employers. Living conditions for workers in company "patches," who buy goods from company stores and have justice administered by company-dominated police, have usually been miserable. Mechanization of the mines has aggravated the employment and wage situation.

In "Labor and Lumber" Miss Todes deals with another depressed industry employing more than a half-million workers. After tracing the dubious origin of the titles to lumber areas, she turns to a treatment of the concentration of ownership which has brought the Weyerhäuser syndicate into possession of 50 per cent of Idaho, 37 per cent of western Washington, and 15 per cent of Oregon timberland. Elsewhere similar concentration is taking place. With the decline in the production of lumber from 44,000,000,000 board feet in 1909 to 34,000,000,000 in 1927, and the use of improved mechanical devices, fewer men have been employed. In 1930 forces had been cut more than 30 per cent below the 1926 level. Wages have been low, the average in 1927 being less than $1,000. In the South wages are especially depressed. In Mississippi the average is $15.35 a week, in Georgia $10.76. The ten-hour day is universal in the South and applies to more than half the Western lumber workers.

In the description of unions in the industry the rise and decline of the "Four L" organization is noted. This curious hybrid union was launched on a wave of war patriotism to crush the I. W. W. and to head off A. F. of L. advances into the industry. The organization has since become largely a welfare unit of certain employers, with little vigor to press worker demands. As for the I. W. W., the writer declares it to be practically non-existent, suggesting that "only the fighting traditions of the past remain." The only functioning union organization appears to be the International Shingle Weavers' Union, which remains independent of the I. W. W., the Communists, and the A. F. of L.

The Dunn-Hardy book is an amazing indictment of the textile industry. After careful research into the profits and investments in the mills, tidbits of gossip are introduced from the trade papers. The enthusiastic chamber of commerce of a South Carolina city is found to advertise, "Labor in Spartanburg is free, unchangeable, and contented." The Atlanta organization, not to be outdone, adds, "Put your plant where labor helps instead of hindering," while Houston boldly proclaims, "Unorganizable Mexican labor in inexhaustible numbers can be secured in Texas for new textile mills."

But the unbelievably long hours and low wages of the Southern mills are not alone indicted. Attention is also given to New England and New Jersey. There a concealment of profits is found to be common. The ever-increasing "speed-up" of workers is condemned. Employment was found in 1928 to be 35 per cent below the 1923 level and wages also suffered considerably. The Massachusetts cotton-mill workers averaged in 1928 $16.46; those in South Carolina $9.56.

The union struggles in textiles are next passed in review. The United Textile Workers is indicted both for apathy and for its policy of attempting to conciliate employers. The "Pequot Plan" is especially condemned.

Through all the books runs the note that these industries are in chaos, that workers are subjected to insecurity and low wages, and that the American Federation of Labor has launched no effective organizing. Constant reference is made to the introduction of the seven-hour day in Soviet Russia and to the absence of unemployment there. American miners are urged by the writers to join the Mine, Oil, and Smelter Workers' Industrial Union; the lumber workers, the Lumber Workers' Industrial Union; and the textile workers, the National Textile Workers' Union. These unions are affiliated with the Trade Union Unity League.

Many will feel upon reading these books that the writers have overstressed the promise of the newly launched left-wing unions. For these unions have little financial backing and in addition operate under the handicap of the general hatred of Communists. In the South the belief in racial equality is also a heavy burden for the left-wing textile union to carry in the present situation. President McMahon of the United Textile Workers does not appear able to organize extensively on the platform that "we aren't talking higher wages. We aren't talking shorter hours. . . . We want to sit down with the mill owners, we want to take up their problems as our problems." Can militant believers in the class struggle win the fight with force instead of an olive branch? In the coal fields, likewise, the left-wing union is a poor third in membership strength. Its vigorous struggle in 1928 brought its leaders into jail and exhausted its treasury. Can it secure the millions necessary to wage an effective battle in the coal fields where in ten days evictions are secured and where wholesale jailing is customary? As for the lumber camps, is it likely that the I. W. W. influence is as dead as it is pictured? That organization appears to have an ability to persist long after its obituary has been written.

Still, however optimistic their predictions, it remains true that the writers of these books have produced a careful analysis of the situation faced by labor in three major industries. Can the American Federation of Labor be prodded into effective action or will the left-wing unions be alone in the field? Or will the Conference for Progressive Labor Action secure an active foothold? At the moment it appears that the A. F. of L. forces are being outgeneraled. For solid research, mingled with propaganda for a cause, is a far more solid basis for effective unionization than speeches on the mutual interests of capital and labor. Mr. Green might be reminded that little union organizing has been done in Rotary Clubs.

COLSTON E. WARNE

The War at Home

Mrs. Fischer's War. By Henrietta Leslie. Houghton Mifflin Company. $2.50.

IN a foreword to this novel of war on the home front John Galsworthy remarks that few books have been written on the poignant theme of the war as it was or seemed to mothers and wives. Here, then, one might expect a new angle of vision and perspective on a tale of human ignominy and woe that is slowly losing force through sheer weight of repetition; but Mrs. Leslie, unfortunately, is limited where her material is not. Her characters are, for the most part, puppets moving through an aura of misapprehension and exaggeration that seems as pathetic now as it was real at the time of the war, and one suspects that tragedy which is so limited in time and so local in nature is hardly worth more than an essay.

Any method in fiction that seizes on a theme and draws its characters as mere illustrations of it is likely to leave a bad taste on the reader's tongue. If there is nothing new under the sun there are certainly no new sermons to be preached, and if human beings were really angels there would have been no war at all. The sentimental approach to the tragedies of the World War at this late date seems particularly unforgivable, and "Mrs. Fischer's War" is a piece of sentiment made from whole cloth.

Obviously the predicament of an Englishwoman married to a German subject during the war was not enviable. The war at home threw open the gates for every bit of unrestrained maliciousness of which human nature was capable, and one has only to recall the rabbit hunts for enemy aliens conducted on this side of the water to sympathize with the woes of an Englishwoman whose husband fought in the German army against his own son. But once grant the general nature of such a tragedy, and its implications narrow at once to the individual and specific. Mrs. Leslie is well enough off in presenting her general problem. It is when she tries to give it human and individual proportions that she fails rather badly.

And here at once we come across the only real and valid test for any war book. The business of fiction is neither to lament nor to prophesy. The habit of referring to classic examples would naturally recall Tolstoy's "War and Peace" as a work in which character stands foremost and in which setting and local problems as such are merely incidental color. If we can share in the life of a character while reading a book we realize at once that the stresses of war and those of peace are sides of the same coin. Such a re-creation of life on its own terms Mrs. Leslie is unable to give us. It is the more unfortunate in that her theme is unusual.

EUGENE LÖHRKE

Books in Brief

The Magnet. By Maxim Gorki. Translated from the Russian by Alexander Bakshy. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $3.

This sequel to "Bystander" will be rather heavy going for those who have not a special knowledge of Russian intellectual history between 1895 and 1905. The first instalment of Gorki's great and apparently endless novel took its hero, Clim Samghin, from his birth to the accession and marriage of Nicholas II. Clim's younger years, in which he only dimly became aware that a revolution was brewing in Russia, had their fascination, as did his love affair with Lidia. But the later pages of "Bystander" ran into the shallows of discussion; and now "The Magnet" moves wholly there, if it moves at all. The story is partly of Clim's relationships with three further women—Varvara, Nikonova, and Duniasha—but chiefly of how Russia talked aimlessly for ten years. The last pages deal with the Bloody Sunday of 1905, and deal with it brilliantly. Indeed, the whole work is brilliant; but it is also, in great stretches, a bore. The translation by Alexander Bakshy is spirited and skilful.

Coronado's Children. By J. Frank Dobie. Dallas: Southwest Press. $3.

"Coronado's Children" is fine for a swashbuckling imagination. Spanish gold, pirates, bandits, Indians, cutthroats, gringos, and Mexicanos—all moving in pageant-like glory, resurrected out of a glamorous four centuries of our Western history—these are the theme. The motive is the gold fever, from the tales of Cibola on down to express-train hold-ups, and in particular the search, still going on, for the cached treasures of desperate men who buried their plunder and never came to reclaim it—jack-loads, pay chests, loot, nuggets, millions, imaginings. The dramatic center is Texas (as it should be), but the margins are from Missouri to California, and north to the Kansas line. The stories are drawn from verifiable traditions; they are genuine local lore, with sources given; and while the author has given them an engaging telling, more or less journalistic, the flavor of soil and society is but a part of their justification. This flavor is very real. Here we have a genuine collection of an American, western American folklore, which had not been reduced to form, and which cannot be allowed to escape us. The book's full title is "Coronado's Children: Lost Mines and Buried Treasures of the Southwest." Mr. Dobie has done a good job of it, and there are excellent illustrations by Ben Carlton Mead, the best being the treasure map that lines the binding and adorns the jacket. Not least interesting is the fact that this well-made volume is published locally in Dallas, Texas.

Religion on the American Frontier. The Baptists. Edited by William Warren Sweet. With a General Introduction by Shirley Jackson Case. Henry Holt and Company. $5.

Attic junk frequently becomes priceless. Though casual readers may think this collection of documents from the Midwestern frontier is valuable only to the religious antiquarian or the professional historian, any serious observer of American life must discover in its pages an authenticity and freshness which no amount of second-hand history can supply. These autobiographies of itinerant preachers, these church letters, records, and minutes introduce the reader directly into a rough and free environment and make real to him what otherwise might seem incredible. Professor Sweet and his associates with this volume have initiated a series which will be a monumental achievement in American history. Both layman and scholar can now have access to materials which have hitherto practically been sealed. The brief chapters of the introduction give us an admirable historical framework which serves to make the source materials more intelligible and more significant.

Wall Street and Lombard Street. By Francis W. Hirst. The Macmillan Company. $2.

This is a detailed and highly competent description of the collapse of the New York stock market, by the former editor of the London Economist, who was in this country during the most dramatic phase of the break in October and November, 1929. There is an account of the international crisis which followed and suggestions for remedies. Mr. Hirst believes that the world depression was precipitated by the Wall Street break, and presents a more than plausible analysis to support this conclusion. His suggestions for remedies, however, seem somewhat unrelated to his original diagnosis. They include: cancelation or a very sharp reduction by the United States of the war debts owing to it, reduction of the American tariff, and a reversal of America's alleged policy of "hoarding" gold. The tendency of the book—and of the widespread European view that it reflects—to centralize the blame for the depression in the United States and to look to us for all the chief remedies does not seem a very healthy one. Surely it is time that British financial writers recognized that our accumulation of gold is the result of deeper world causes than our "currency and credit" policy. Mr. Hirst, moreover, would have done better to throw his emphasis on the need of a general reduction of tariffs.

Green River: A Poem for Rafinesque. By James Whaler. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

James Whaler's "Green River" is one of the most interesting of recent narrative poems. Here is the history of the great but almost forgotten naturalist who came to America from Italy, fleeing unhappiness, and who found here at last the great cave of Green River. The story is dramatically told in dialogue, the poet thus avoiding dull expository passages; the emotional interest is kept at high pitch, and the character is very well drawn. The symbolic use of the Proserpine myth to indicate first Rafinesque's love of nature in the sunlight and then his rediscovery of her wonder in the underworld, the cave, shapes the whole poem into a greater significance. The verse form is a rather free use of the couplet which allows the emotion of the dialogue to take its own rhythms. Whaler, in his selection of detail and his handling of language and of character, shows definite poetic ability. This is his second book; his first was "Hale's Pond."

Wit and Wisdom of Morocco. A Study of Native Proverbs. By Edward Westermarck. Horace Liveright. $5.

This volume completes Dr. Westermarck's trilogy on the customs and ideas of the Moors, the previous two volumes having been "Marriage Ceremonies in Morocco" and "Ritual and Belief in Morocco." Dr. Westermarck here supplies the Arabic text and the English translation of 2,013 proverbs with commentary. The long, pithy introduction is the most valuable part of the book, however, the proverbs rarely being as interesting or in the translation as aptly put as analogous European proverbs.

Films

The German Invasion

FIVE or six years ago the German films were the great sensation. They demonstrated to the general public that films could be made with intelligence and imagination, that there was such a thing as the art of the film. Although the lesson of this demonstration was clear to all who cared to see it, the hopes for a renascence of the film in Germany and under the German stimulus in Hollywood were doomed to an early disappointment. The Germans in Germany and the Germans in Hollywood, succumbing to the same system of commercial mass output, lowered their standards to suit the big public almost as quickly as they had sent them rocketing to the heights of "The Last Laugh" when their main concern had been to express themselves with the utmost power of conviction. To complete their downfall the Russians displaced them from their leadership, and the talkies delivered the coup de grace by disorganizing their production and introducing a new technique.

Thus, for a couple of years we heard very little about German films. Then one German talkie after another found its way into the smaller movie houses of New York, and today, if we glance at the list of films current in this city, the number of German films on it is likely to give us quite a surprise. This week, for example, out of the twenty-one first-run films shown in New York, fifteen are American films and six are German. That does not mean, of course, that a third of the movie audiences of New York patronize German movies. Probably the entire daily audience of the six little theaters exhibiting the German films does not reach a quarter of the number visiting the Roxy alone. The significant fact is not the number of people who go to see the German films, but the emergence of the German work by the side of the American and the apparent eagerness with which it is sought by the so-called little theaters.

In the face of such an unmistakable revival of interest in the product of the German and Austrian studios—an interest that is only partly accounted for by the presence of a large German-speaking public in this city—it is worth inquiring into the quality of this product. Do these new German talkies contain a message or even a promise of an art essentially different from the banalities of Hollywood? Do they suggest a new understanding of the use of sound and dialogue on the screen? Do they place the Germans again in the van of cinematic progress? Without attempting any hasty generalizations and speaking only on the basis of what has been seen in New York, the answers to these three questions must all be no. A brief review of the German films shown this week—and they are fully representative of other weeks—supplies the reason for this unfavorable, though provisional, verdict.

The film that more than any other is responsible for the present German invasion is the famous "Zwei Herzen im ¾ Takt" (Europa), famous because of its continuous run now entering upon its eighth month, which is an unprecedented figure for any foreign film. What, it may be asked, is the reason for this extraordinary success? Despite some authoritative opinions to the contrary, I am convinced that the reason is not so much in the picture as in the New York audience. There is a marked reaction in certain sections of the public against the jazz tempo of our life, and a nostalgia for the quieter, more romantic moods. Moreover, the public and the critics have, happily, forgotten what a good waltz is, which makes them ready to acclaim as a masterpiece anything that reminds them of the old days. If we add to this that "Zwei Herzen," besides being tuneful and romantic, is also as entertaining as any Hollywood comedy, the success of this ordinary, if well-made, film will contain no further mystery, particularly if the inertia of success is also taken into account.

To take another film that has had a fairly good run, "Wien, Du Stadt der Lieder" (Little Carnegie), one again finds a musical comedy of the stage type made more authentic and entertaining by an old-world setting. "Skandal um Eva" (Eighth Street) is another old-world comedy, with all the music, romance, and oddity of manner that go with it. Though probably the best of the German pictures here reviewed, it is rather slow and deliberate in movement, and certainly does not come up to the artistic standard set by the German silent pictures. By appropriate contrast, "Das Mädel von der Reeperbahn" (Fifth Avenue), acclaimed as a masterpiece, suggests the pitfalls that brought about the downfall of the German films. It is the familiar pseudo-profundity of treatment that makes this picture, with its completely trivial theme, so pretentiously inflated and unconvincing. I only have to mention the perfectly stagy farce "Lumpenball" (Cameo), not particularly funny and rather crude in performance, to confirm the already suggested conclusion that so far the German producers have shown us very little that is valuable in itself or significant of future developments.

ALEXANDER BAKSHY

Drama

The Color Line

IT would be hard to imagine a directer and clearer statement of the fact that prejudice against color exists in the South than is made by DuBose Heyward in "Brass Ankle" (Masque Forty-fifth Street Theater). Mr. Heyward has invented a story, or perhaps used one that he has heard, for no other purpose than to put this fact outside the circle of things that can be doubted. Whatever else the play means, it means that the prejudice in question is something to be taken seriously—or, failing that, something that is as a matter of record taken very seriously by those who possess it at all. More than one moral may be derived from the spectacle presented; patrons of the play may go away with a variety of opinions as to what ought or ought not to be done about the "situation"; but none of them will forget what he saw in the theater.

He will have seen a young South Carolinian and his wife, both of them to all appearances white, happy in a house which contains one child (played by the whitest child actor, apparently, who could be found in North America) and is soon to contain another. The story is of how while the father, Larry Leamer, waits for his son to be born, he leads the agitation in the town against a family of whites who have suddenly turned out to be tainted with Negro blood. Much is made of this agitation, and of Larry's blind loathing for black blood generally—no matter, either, in how little amount. Much is made, because that is what gives point to Larry's unspeakable horror when the doctor announces to him that his son "shows traces," and explains to him that the mother, though she never knew it until now, comes from a family of Brass Ankles—people neither black nor white who live in strangely isolated communities and have a special, only semi-recognized status. There is so little of the Negro in Ruth Leamer, the doctor says, that her child's color amounts almost to a miracle of nature. But there it is, and Larry must decide what he shall do about it.

What he does, or rather what Ruth does when after two acts she is made to realize how her husband's mind and life have been blasted, is the contribution of the play. Larry loves Ruth. That is still clear. But Ruth is able to decide that he will be better off without her than with the knowledge that she and her two children—for the first one now comes in for retroactive contamination—belong to the despised race. So she calls in the neighbors and in their presence, as well as in the presence of the doctor, who significantly says nothing, tells Larry that she is not tainted after all in the way he thinks. She is tainted in another way; she has borne an illegitimate child, and a Negro was its father. This lie clears the older child and so clears the mind of Larry, who now knows what to do. He chases his beloved wife out of the room with a double-barreled shotgun and performs two executions, one on her and one on the son she holds at her breast. Larry now will have to go on living with the conviction that his wife was vicious and with the memory that he had killed her in a particularly bloody fashion. But this will be better, it seems, than the consciousness that one small drop of a certain kind of blood still runs in his family.

"Brass Ankle" would seem by this report to be a shocking play, and it is. Evidently it has not tried to be anything else—for instance, tragedy. Tragedy is never harrowing in the way "Brass Ankle" is harrowing, and the reason is that its heroes are great and complicated individuals whose ruin is impressive even while it is terrible. Larry is so barely, so nakedly a representative of his section and class, so thinly drawn for a specific purpose, that he fails to be other than a fearful case with a painful history. He was played very efficiently toward this end by Ben Smith, who with Alice Brady as Ruth conducted the piece to its conclusion. Miss Brady, powerful and vivid as usual, gave, as usual, one of the best performances of the year. Lester Lonergan as the kind country doctor was likewise admirable. Indeed, the entire performance was nicely sharpened to show the purpose of the play. What the purpose was, or what the result is, might remain a question. I can imagine an outsider saying: "If this is the way you feel in the South, then something has to be done about it." I can also imagine a Southerner saying: "This, sir, is the way some of us feel. And since we do feel this way, what can be done about it?"

"The Bellamy Trial" has been made into a better-than-average murder play by Frances Noyes Hart and Frank E. Carstarphen (Forty-eighth Street Theater). The whole thing takes place in court, and the mystery, which is mild but real, is largely the mystery of what goes on in witness boxes.

Spain Wins Freedom

By DEVERE ALLEN

Madrid, April 16

IT is April 16 and the people of Madrid are going about their business as if nothing had happened. The order is perfect; anyone reaching the city today would never know that matters had been different for a feverish five days. But out on the squares the white-helmeted traffic cops wear red bands around their sleeves, something no man could have done in this city six days ago and stay out of jail or keep his skull intact. On faces everywhere there is an air of satisfaction. This is a happy town. And it is happy because the people of Spain have won something most of them desperately craved, and won it by magnificent self-control and revolutionary discipline.

On Friday, April 10, I arrived in Madrid. There was, all over the city, an air of tension and uncertainty. The royalists were afraid, though not going so far as to believe themselves seriously menaced by the voting—a lot of agitation, possibly, but it was only rubbish to think the Spanish people wanted to shelve the monarchy. Business groups, foreign and Spanish, were afraid, because they knew that at any moment widespread violence might break out, upsetting the normal life of trade for an incalculable period. The student and working-class youth were afraid, and rightly, of the police swords and guns, which nevertheless, by demonstration, they had determined to defy. And the Republican leaders were afraid that their cause and their strategy, carefully prepared, might be demolished by unruly elements.

All Friday afternoon bands of labor, Socialist, and Republican youths scamper about the city distributing red handbills and white fliers, calling upon the students, the workers, the elders, to throw away old fears and hesitations, take faith in their own ability and power, and at the polls strike a great victorious blow for freedom. The sins of the monarchy are repeated in fulsome rhetoric, but less against Alfonso or any specific policy is this barrage of argument directed than against monarchy as an institution. When a group of these youths descend on a street with their "literature" they take three swift looks at the nearest policeman or carabineer or civil guard, and proceed to weave their way like lightning through the crowd that invariably gathers. The people want this stuff. They seize it hungrily, go off reading it, stand and debate in clamorous forums of two and three. The cafes are alive with people, alert, interested, talking, talking, talking. And out in the Puerta del Sol, Madrid's huge central open space, are police. Police on horseback, on foot, at the steps of the Gobernacion, or administration building, at the corners, up the side streets, in front of statues and all public places.

The weather is campaigning weather. We have had only mild air and sunshine for a week. Saturday, when the sun is still low in the east and the first workers are clattering to their jobs—for nobody ever walks, talks, rides, drives, or runs a tramcar quietly in Madrid—the campaign organizers are at work. In the morning it is much the same as on the preceding afternoon. But soon there comes a change. Somehow, around three o'clock, the masses of people always present in the Puerta have become a crowd—a milling, jostling multitude. If anything ever breaks in Madrid, it is sure to break at the Puerta del Sol. The police are even more numerous than before. To the outlying districts are sent the civil guard; they carry rifles and wear green uniforms, with hats nobody could describe but which perhaps look most like a cap that grew into a sofa pillow at the rear and was hit by a stuffed club and knocked flat. Other troops are on reserve in the Gobernacion building.

Suddenly, from down one of the ten side streets that empty into the mammoth rectangle of the Puerta, comes a raucous shouting. The automobiles pouring into this thoroughfare, which leads in the direction of the royal palace, are blocked. They pile up far out into the square. Fifty feet down the street I can see what is happening. Several youths hold armfuls of red stickers fifteen inches long, while others rub sponges across the gummed backs of the stickers and slap them against the cars. When a car is covered with three or four labels it is allowed to pass. Not till then; and inside some of the cars expensively dressed gentlemen grip their canes tightly, their mouths set in thin lines across white faces. By the time the police have shouldered their way into the mob and dispersed the youths, a half-hundred automobiles are on their way through other streets crying out in red: "Viva la República!" Promptly, as if by a mysterious wizardry, the horde of youths evaporates—but in ten minutes the same scene is repeated four streets away.

As the afternoon wears on, many more cars blossom forth with stickers. From up the side streets come groups of youths marching abreast, carrying red flags or crying revolutionary songs. And now, alas, hoodlumism has added its own excuse to the policemen's orders. These squads of youngsters from fourteen to twenty-one years old are broken up at once. If they do not give way to threats they have to run furiously into alleys and duck into friendly stores, for the mounted police with drawn swords rush down upon them. Now and then a rock comes hurtling out of nowhere and lands near a policeman, though most of the missiles sail wide of the mark. Once, when a horse is struck and a mounted officer is nearly upset, he draws his revolver and gallops into every available alley; even two soldiers walking harmlessly toward the melee look up, stand paralyzed for a second, and dash into a church. Nobody knows what will happen next; when a car backfires, fifty people jump.

Yet the people stay. More keep on coming. Every street, as far as you can see, disgorges people who want to get on to the Puerta del Sol. These are allowed to filter through, a few at a time. But the students are not allowed to demonstrate. By eight o'clock the students have become only a small percentage of the rioting youths; every last youngster in search of adventure and a chance to be a hero is out to bait the cops. Periodically the rushes continue. Policemen, many of them already anti-monarchists in their hearts but bent on carrying out orders, are touched in a ticklish spot when in front of thousands of people they are jeered at and called prostitutes. Ugliness begins to creep into the conflict, and cracked heads are on the increase.

By late evening it has settled down into a determined battle. The students and hooligans and demonstrators are bound to get to the front of the Gobernacion building. The police won't let them if they can help it. Three of us, with more zest than discretion, convince the jefe, or chief of the police forces, that we are writers; he had never read a word that we had written and so was prepared to believe it. Although we were shoved around at times by nervous officers, and ordered a dozen times in vivid Castilian to get out of this privileged box seat, friend jefe intervened to give us an unobstructed view. But what we saw was not exactly reassuring. Judging by the signs, hell was going to be let loose.

On Sunday the twelfth I walked about Madrid for nearly thirteen hours. In the morning I went through almost every accessible section of the city. There was no violence; order was kept at the polls; not only were the official police out to prevent disturbances, but representatives of the Republicans and Socialists were on hand for the same purpose. These latter had another purpose also. It is well known that votes have been habitually counted out by the reactionary groups in Spanish politics. This, plus the local boss and the use of money to buy votes wholesale, used to be effective. It was not effective now. The bosses were watched; I am told by astonished Republicans that in several places all over Spain where votes have always been for sale, they could not be bought for a hundred pesetas, ten times the usual price; and to insure correct counting, 2,000 watchers in Madrid alone stood at the polls and checked off their men as they went in to ballot. In many districts the voting, which legally closed at four, was all over by ten-thirty. I doubt if there was ever a finer job of organizing votes.

Late Sunday afternoon, as the results begin to trickle in, fear seizes the police still deeper. Their tormentors, feeling with every bulletin the rising of the anti-government tide, make up their minds that this time they will break through. It is a grim time for a while; many are the backs bruised from truncheons, and right into the middle of the mob the police, blinded with rage, swing swords and cut their way through to arrest such culprits as they can. The red flag appears in the streets, and groups begin to sing the "Marseillaise" and revolutionary songs of the Spanish workers. One, apparently concocted for the occasion, roars vociferously "Alfonso, Alfonso, Alfonso, you must go!" A policeman, enraged at something someone has done from inside the refuge of a tramcar, plunges his sword through the glass of a window and jabs and flays about, with no mortal results it seems. A young man of twenty-five whose head is bound up and who wears a red badge on his coat is paraded past the doorway of the Gobernacion headquarters as a rebuke to the police. He gets ten feet past, when he and his companions are efficiently collected and taken inside.

Meantime, the results of the polls continue to pile up. They are indeed amazing. It became perfectly obvious by Sunday evening that a grave decision rested with Alfonso and his Cabinet. All that night jubilant Republicans were demonstrating their exultation in the streets, and there was apparent a lessening of the tension. Monday, Madrid had the most foolish-looking police force one could well imagine. They were caught between two masters. They were hesitant. They used no force this day, but rode and walked around, joked quietly by the crowds and grinning sheepishly back. By afternoon, whenever they appeared in impressive numbers, they were greeted by handclapping and cries of "Long live the Republican guards." That evening Alcalá Zamora, Republican leader who was still in prison a few weeks ago for his part in planning the December revolt, received a telegram from Barcelona addressed to "Zamora, President of the Provisional Republican Government, Madrid." It was from the chief of the anti-monarchist forces in Barcelona. In the evening there were further demonstrations, and one worried and angered official gave an indiscreet order; down on the Paseo, the promenade of the town, a group headed for Zamora's house was stopped, sharp words were exchanged, and several Republicans were soon lying in the street, wounded badly by police bullets. It was shortly after this that Zamora, a man with no authority but with virtual control of the situation, held a conference with the heads of the guards and police and demanded that they allow the people freedom to demonstrate, arguing that this way would be safest.

Tuesday morning the contrast was breath-taking. The people had possession of the Puerta del Sol; but police, civil guards, troops, business men, and workers all chatted amiably, and traffic went on. It was a city of order, despite the expectancy in the air. The Cabinet, following a long consultation the previous night, told Alfonso frankly that in the face of the returns they could not hold power any longer.

All that afternoon, throughout the cities of Spain, the republic was proclaimed and peaceable possession taken of the government buildings. In mid-afternoon, when a Republican flag was run up on the government headquarters in the Puerta del Sol, a policeman in front of the building turned dramatically and kissed the new Republican flag of red, yellow, and purple. An official leaned out of a high window, signaling that he, too, wanted a flag; and in a moment a daring human fly scaled up the straight front of the building and put a flag in his hands. Red armbands appeared on the arms of soldiers; flags came from everywhere, some of them hastily improvised, with the colors in all possible orders; badges of the new colors were being sold on the streets. Here was a danger-point. There was reason for apprehension. A mob of young enthusiasts rushed to the Plaza Isobel near the palace and pulled down a statue of Queen Isobel II, breaking off the head and wantonly defacing all but the pedestal. The name "Plaza Isobel" was immediately torn from the wall of the corner building, and "Plaza de Galán and Hernandez" tacked up in the form of a cardboard square. The Plaza Orient soon became the Plaza de la Republica. Wondering what might happen in other places, we found at the Plaza Mayor a gang of irresponsibles in the act of tearing down a really fine equestrian statue of Philip III, pounding with iron bars at the inscription, inoffensive enough of itself. Was this going to be the signal for a general outburst of unrestrained vandalism ending in bloodshed? True, the subways were running; the post office was open; trains were coming and going on time; the radical leaders had asked the employees on public conveyances and works to stay calmly at their posts. But where were the leaders now?

The leaders, 250 of them, although we did not know it at the time and it has not been published in the press over here, were camping for the night in the palace. Alfonso, early in the evening, had decided to depart; at half-past eight he was gone. And the Republican and Socialist leaders had determined above all else to prove their ability to govern the masses and prevent that "anarchy" which has been for years the helpful slogan of the monarchists to hold their supporters in line. It was enough to make one's faith in human capacity rise high in the glass to see a thin line of policemen around the palace, without force and only by advice and pleas, keeping back the thousands that swarmed around the neighborhood. Never before, I venture to think, was there a revolution such as this.

On Wednesday the provisional government had already taken power and declared a day of festival. Everything was closed that could be closed, while essential services, even to the washing of the streets, went on unchecked. Procession after procession marched all over the city from early morning until dawn of Thursday. How they kept it up, I cannot say. The trade unions had their banners and insignia; the youth groups and students' and women's organizations were all out en masse. Trucks roared through the town, tramcars contained hundreds of free riders on the roofs. Cafes remained open most of the day, but there was almost no drunkenness. This country was drunk on a very different wine. Great pictures of Galán and Garcia were carried around, and men and women kissed them repeatedly. Colors, music, the "Marseillaise," cheers, "Viva la República," more "Marseillaise," dogs dressed in flaming red blankets, children with red jackets, men with red suits, youths performing mass around an impromptu bier for Alfonso, a dozen imitation kings hastening nowhere very fast with suitcases in hand. The revolution, incredibly peaceful, had been won.

THE OUTBREAKS against the Catholic church in Spain are not surprising. If ever there was a priest- and nun-ridden country it is that. Under the old regime there were fully 100,000 or more priests, nuns, and monks, one for every forty families, all of them enjoying special privileges and all immune from civil punishment except for serious offenses. Not only did high church dignitaries occupy important posts in the government, they were prominent in the personally chosen assembly of Primo de Rivera. In addition, that dictator subsidized the religious press, the Jesuit periodical El Debate being practically an official organ. Small wonder that the church should seem to the public to have been part and parcel of the monarchy, or that the republic should have moved at once to separate church from state. These facts would seem to be a sufficient explanation of the public hostility which was unquestionably further aroused by the pastoral letter issued last week by the Primate of Spain, the Archbishop of Toledo, in which he called upon all Spanish Catholics to vote for deputies in the coming elections of the National Assembly who would "defend their religion." What could be more stupid or more tactless than such an appeal at such an hour? It therefore does not seem to us necessary to attribute the deplorable mob excesses wholly to Anarchists or Communists as does the Spanish government. Beyond question, however, the new regime is still in a critical stage. We hope that it will profit by the sad example of Kerensky and that it will act promptly, vigorously, and radically.

SECRETARY STIMSON'S radio talk on May 9, telling about the work of the State Department and reviewing some phases of American foreign relations, was, like most such addresses, significant for its silences as well as for its declarations. The country should be glad of the renewed assurance that the American army and navy are not to be used to collect debts abroad, and that American citizens in Nicaragua are not to be denied the protection to which they are entitled under international law. The emphasis upon the efforts to "eradicate the sore spots of Latin American diplomacy," while it comports with the rather obvious bid for Latin American good-will that stands out in the address, nevertheless represents a thoroughly commendable Administration policy. It seems strange, on the other hand, or it would if Mr. Stimson were not a politician, to hear the London Naval Conference, with its aftermath of a complete naval deadlock between Italy and France, touted as something which has given a "great stimulus" to "the prospects for success of the European conference on general disarmament" which is scheduled to meet next February, and at the same time to be left quite in the dark as to whether any preparations for that conference are being made by the United States. It would have been just as well, too, if Mr. Stimson had not pointed with pride to his ill-starred irruption into the Russo-Chinese quarrel as a reason for praising the anti-war pact. None the less we are heartily grateful for a restatement of our historic policy toward Latin America, from which we should never have departed.

THE SUGAR PACT which was signed at Brussels on May 9 is a unique and interesting attempt to deal by voluntary agreement with a world industry which for years has been almost hopelessly disrupted. Under the lead of Thomas L. Chadbourne of New York, representatives of 80 per cent of the sugar-exporting industries in seven countries, with a capital investment of more than $2,000,000,000, have agreed to a plan which contemplates the adjustment of sugar production to world consumption through the gradual liquidation, over a period of five years, of a surplus of 2,500,000 tons of sugar whose menace to the market has kept export prices below the point of profit. As the price of sugar rises, the council which is to administer the agreement will release designated percentages of the surplus. It is hoped that the price may reach 2½ cents a pound within the period covered by the agreement, that being the figure at which the Cuban industry can make a profit. It would be hasty to conclude that other world industries can be subjected to similar stabilization, for the sugar industry has its own peculiarities, the Chadbourne plan has yet to show that it can work, and the reaction of public opinion to rising sugar prices under an agreement that has some of the attributes of a monopoly is an element of importance. Nevertheless, the scheme is highly significant as an example of international industrial cooperation.

INEFFICIENCY AND WASTE have long been considered cardinal sins in Soviet Russia. Yet American engineers working in Russia have for months been complaining—without result—of the lack of efficiency, the great waste, the fear of responsibility, and the tendency toward sabotage on the part of their Russian colleagues and assistants. They have sought to convince the Soviet officials that the success of the Five-Year Plan depends largely on their ability to eliminate inefficiency and economic waste, which thus far have taken an exceedingly high toll. These complaints have taken definite form in a report prepared by the American firm of Stuart, James, and Cooke. The Russian authorities now appear to have awakened, though rather belatedly, to the sound logic of the American argument, and they are proceeding with their characteristic vigor to correct the situation. Nine officials of the automobile factory at Nijni-Novgorod have been brought to trial on criminal charges of "wilful neglect and suppression" in connection with forty-two projects recommended by American engineers. Doubtless the Soviet authorities hope by means of this trial to instil the fear of prison sentences in the hearts of their workers who either cannot or will not keep up with the furious pace demanded by the Five-Year Plan, but it remains to be seen whether a threat of imprisonment will suffice to make the Russian worker any more efficient than he is today.

FRANCE IS DETERMINED to defeat the Austro-German customs union if it can, or, failing that, to develop a counter-plan which will make the Austro-German scheme relatively unimportant. The chief argument of the French, naturally, is that a customs union is a first step toward a political union, and no amount of denial that a political union is intended receives the slightest credence. European opposition to the customs union, however, has become somewhat attenuated now that Italy declines to worry about it and opinion in the Little Entente is divided, so the supple M. Briand has been turning his attention to evolving something competitive. To the meeting of the League Council and the European federation committee at Geneva "France will go," he told the Chamber of Deputies on May 8, "with a constructive plan for the absorption of the excess harvests" of Central and Eastern Europe, "for financing their agriculture by loans, and for the organization in Europe, which is totally without it, of a system of production and exchange." The reception of this ambitious proposal, which seems to include in its scope most of the economic disorders from which Europe is suffering, will be awaited with interest. Meantime the German and Austrian chancellors hold their ground, and Foreign Minister Curtius quietly remarks that the Briand plan would merely supplement, but not replace, the proposed customs unions. The idea of supplementing a German effort instead of leading off can hardly be very agreeable to M. Briand.

PROFESSOR ALBERT EINSTEIN and the German writer Heinrich Mann have publicly accused the Jugoslav government of being responsible for the murder on February 18 of Professor Milan Sufflay, the noted Croatian scholar. While walking to his home in Zagreb, Professor Sufflay was struck down from behind with an iron rod. He died within a few hours. The Einstein-Mann letter, which was addressed to the League for the Rights of Man, asserted that the name of the murderer is known, but the government has refused to take action against him. The murderer is a member of a terrorist organization called Young Jugoslavia, the letter said, adding that during his visit to Zagreb in January King Alexander addressed this organization and "told how the Croatian representatives to Parliament had been put out of the way at his request." After the King's speech the government press openly called for the assassination of the political and intellectual leaders of Croatia. Several murders resulted, including that of Sufflay. This sort of terrorism has been visited upon the Croats time and time again since Jugoslavia was created after the World War. It is the price that they have had to pay for refusing to submit peacefully to the illegal domination of the Serbs, who have sought to run the country for their own benefit to the exclusion of the Croats and Slovenes. It is a striking commentary on the interest the United States takes in these European questions that the Croatian murders should have run along virtually unnoticed until this protest by Albert Einstein.

THE PUBLIC INTEREST guided Governor Roosevelt when he selected the personnel of the newly created New York State Power Authority. He could hardly have found five more competent men than Frank P. Walsh, James C. Bonbright, Fred Freestone, Delos Cosgrove, and Morris Llewellyn Cooke to serve on the board which has been charged with the important task of supervising the construction, financing, and operation of the projected State hydroelectric plant on the St. Lawrence River. Mr. Walsh is the noted liberal lawyer; he has devoted much time and thought to public-utility problems. Professor Bonbright, of the School of Business at Columbia University, is an authority on the power question. Mr. Freestone is master of the New York State Grange, and thus represents the farmers of the State. Mr. Cosgrove is a lawyer practicing in Watertown, where he has been active in furthering the interests of his fellow-citizens in their management of the local municipally owned power plant. Mr. Cooke, an efficiency engineer whose home is in Philadelphia, has gained wide renown for his public service in the power field. Not one of these men is a professional office-holder. Governor Roosevelt is to be congratulated for his selection of men who can be counted upon to serve the people rather than the power trust or one of the political machines.

SEVERAL PEACE ORGANIZATIONS and liberal groups in Chicago have decided to stage a counter-demonstration to the army air show scheduled to be held in that city on May 20, similar to the one to be held in New York City on May 22-23. Their plan is not only to voice their protest against the air show, in which 670 military airplanes are to participate, but to use this as an occasion for countering the militaristic propaganda of the War Department with propaganda designed to promote world peace. May 18, anniversary of the founding of the Hague Tribunal, will be observed as International Good-Will Day. Arrangements have been made by the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, the Y. W. C. A., the League for Industrial Democracy, the Chicago Church Federation, the Workmen's Circle, the League of Nations Non-partisan Association, the Chicago Federation of Labor, and the Socialist Party for a public mass-meeting to be held on that day on behalf of peace. Peace programs have also been arranged for in the churches and schools, while on May 20 the Cinema Art Guild Theater will present an anti-war program sponsored by the Good-Will Day committee. Thus the residents of Chicago will have an opportunity to learn that there are two sides to the question of war and peace. One wishes that every city over which airplanes will presently roar could be similarly edified.

WITH ONE AWARD of the Pulitzer Prize Committee we are entirely in accord—its choice of the series of articles on Russia contributed to the New York Evening Post and the Philadelphia Public Ledger by their Berlin correspondent, H. R. Knickerbocker. As a piece of clear-cut, straightforward, and honest reporting it won the admiration of all journalists who are familiar with Soviet conditions. That those articles were hastily written is true; that the style was journalistic and by no means beyond improvement is also true. But no one can question Mr. Knickerbocker's sincerity or his desire to be entirely objective. He undertook an extraordinarily long and difficult trip, from which he returned physically exhausted, for he spared himself not at all, even clambering down into deep mines where there were no lifts to see for himself. Unfortunately his editors unduly sensationalized much of his work; the headline fiends did their uttermost to convey the impression that his articles were lurid to a degree. Even the title of the American edition of the book in which his articles were given more permanent form was misleading and unfair—"The Red Trade Menace." None the less, these articles gave, we believe, the very best picture we have of Soviet Russia as it was in the fall of 1930, and they mark Mr. Knickerbocker as one of the most promising members of the corps of American correspondents now stationed in Europe.

THREE GERMAN LADS who had the bad judgment to fight and die for the Fatherland—though they fell before the entry of the United States into the World War—may have their names inscribed in the new and costly Harvard memorial chapel, but on a separate tablet to distinguish them from their more fortunate fellows who died for the Allies. This puts God on the right side and at the same time indicates that He is not without pity for an enemy. President Lowell has explained that under the conditions on which the Harvard alumni gave money for the chapel, it would have been impossible to admit the German soldiers on the same terms as those who fought on "our" side. To the suggestion that the question of doing so might have been put to a vote of the alumni, emphatic answer was given by Harvard authorities that merely at the suggestion of making the chapel other than strictly an Allied memorial much of the money already pledged would have been withdrawn. Since the memorial chapel is an indefensible monument to war and neither a necessary nor a desirable adjunct to the university, this would have been an excellent outcome. But as things stand, Harvard insists that it has been as liberal as it possibly could be. Inspired by the Cambridge example, however, Cornell University is refusing to inscribe on its war memorial the name of Hans Wagner, a graduate who died for Germany. One can only recommend that nowhere on either memorial building appear—except it be with proper qualification—the ancient and time-honored inscription: "Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori."

AT THE AGE OF SEVENTY-FIVE Sigmund Freud has lived to find himself, with Albert Einstein, one of the two minds that have most profoundly influenced the thought of our time. It is true that the physicist's work seems much more securely established than the psychoanalyst's, and that many of Freud's theories are still the subject of heated controversy. But to one person who understands the theory of relativity or its implications there are a hundred whose outlook on life has been deeply colored by the theories of Freud. The influence of his work is felt in every social field—in the treatment of insanity, in criminology, in education, in morals, in literature, in the "normal" man's understanding of his own motives. No matter what the ultimate fate of Freud's ideas may prove to be, it will never again be possible, as Dr. William A. White, superintendent of St. Elizabeth's Government Hospital for the Insane at Washington, pointed out in his admirable address at the recent birthday dinner in the Viennese doctor's honor, for the world to think of the human mind as it did before his work appeared. The mind is a vastly more complicated mechanism than our ancestors ever recognized it as being; the hard-and-fast dividing line between the "normal" and the "abnormal" has disappeared, probably never again to be restored. We have learned that pathological processes are different from so-called normal processes only in degree, and that disorder and disease are experiments of nature from which the rest of us can hope to learn about ourselves.

ROBERT W. DE FOREST, who died in New York on May 6, was one of the finest examples of the American of means and position who devotes himself to civic service. A member of the most distinguished group of really old New Yorkers, born to wealth which he steadily increased by honorable service at the bar and as the painstaking and high-minded executor of great estates, he gave his long life to notable public service, with an extraordinary catholicity of interest. Thus at his death he was president of the Metropolitan Museum of Art (to which he donated the superb American Wing), of the Charity Organization Society, of the Russell Sage Foundation, of the Associates who publish the Survey, and of the National Housing Association, besides being honorary president of the Welfare Council of New York, a vice-president of the Prison Association and of the State Charities Aid Association. For fifty years he was general counsel of the Central Railroad of New Jersey and for twenty-two years one of its vice-presidents. For forty-three years he headed the Charity Organization Society; indeed, it can be truthfully said that under his leadership charity in the metropolis emerged from a state of chaos and went far in its effort to become intelligent, organized, and scientific. Mr. de Forest was, moreover, the sponsor, if not originator, of the Committee on Regional Plan for New York, as he was the city's first commissioner of its Tenement House Department. If anybody was entitled to be called the first citizen of New York it was Robert W. de Forest. Certainly no man in America ever recognized more selflessly and more devotedly the duty of noblesse oblige which birth and inheritance and personal character imposed upon him.

The United States Blocks the Way

THE members of the International Chamber of Commerce had a remarkable experience in Washington during their annual session. Coming to this country in the expectation of attending the meeting of a non-governmental organization, offering a forum for free discussion of all important international business questions, they found themselves blocked at almost every turn by the influence of the United States government. They discovered not only that there was to be no free forum, but that they were expected to be guided in all they did by consideration for the American political situation. Many of the foreign delegates were actually warned to "go easy" on the question of tariffs, on debts and reparations, and on the gold problem. Since these are perhaps the most important economic issues facing the world, the delegates can hardly be blamed for feeling that the entire conference was emasculated, or for resenting interference by our government for selfish ends.

Throughout the entire session this conflict was reflected in the news dispatches and the headlines. It was the United States against everybody else and especially against the united front presented by the Germans and English on the question of debts and reparations. Finally, on the last day, a compromise was reached between the foreigners and what the New York Times correspondent described as "the opposition of the Hoover Administration against action on so-called political topics by a convention of business men," and a couple of mild resolutions "were permitted." Waiving entirely the question of manners involved, the impudence of this Hoover interference with the sessions of the chamber leaves one gasping. As a result, many of the foreign delegates are leaving this country so indignant that the question presents itself whether the conference was not more harmful than helpful. One can be sure that the delegates will return to their own countries convinced that more than ever the government of this country seeks to block the way to the world's economic sanitation.

And that it does. The weak resolutions passed, containing such general phrases as "while the integrity of international obligations must be maintained . . . the observance of this essential principle, however, is not inconsistent with an impartial examination of the effects of these obligations upon international trade, if warranted by changed economic conditions," and "tariffs should not discriminate unfairly between nations," speak for themselves. They contribute not one whit to the solution of any problems and, except as face-saving, are not worth the paper they are written on.

So another opportunity to bring the United States to a realization of the international character of the world crisis, the necessity of dealing with it in an international way, and the need that the United States should lead in this matter has been thrown away. We are continuing to refuse to face obvious facts; we are trying to ignore our partial responsibility for the crisis and are still cherishing the delusion that we can recover and become prosperous while the rest of the world remains in economic chaos and drifts toward violent social changes. The unfounded optimism of Washington was clearly shown by the address of Secretary Mellon, who declared that the present crisis is "not unprecedented." Ten years ago, he said, "the problems left by the war had not been settled." "Banking and currency problems were in a chaotic state; debts and reparations were a source of great uncertainty, paralyzing action in every direction"(!). Now, he asserted, everything is much better and "no one should be discouraged about the ultimate outcome." Then, finally, emerged one bit of startling frankness: "I have no means of knowing when or how we shall emerge from the valley in which we are now traveling."

Exactly. The Administration of Mr. Hoover, who as late as March 7, 1930, assured his fellow-countrymen that "all the evidences indicate that the moral effects of the crash upon unemployment will have been passed during the next sixty days," now admits that it has no remedy to offer and no suggestion as to when relief will come. In this it is justified as long as it persists in its refusal to admit publicly that this crisis is different from any other and calls for international action and cooperation if it is to be ameliorated. That is the fundamental step to be taken by the Administration. If it should take this action and if it then should ask the heads of the leading European governments to meet with the United States to consult as to joint remedial action, the whole aspect of affairs would be changed. The mere announcement of this change of policy would send an electric thrill of hope and courage throughout Europe, even around the globe. But Mr. Hoover and Mr. Mellon will not. They are politicians facing a Presidential campaign, for one thing; for a second, they have sold themselves, body and breeches, to the protected interests in this country.

Yet we venture to prophesy that, unless through some now undiscernible events there should be a sudden revival of world trade, they will be forced to act by dire necessity. At home they will be compelled to face not only a dole for the unemployed, but a rising tide of protest against the Hoover tariff, of which the formation of the Council for Tariff Reduction in New York is a welcome sign. Abroad, Chancellor Brüning in his latest speech at Kloppenburg has declared that Germany will endeavor to put its own house in order before it seeks further amelioration of its reparations burden. That is the correct, and a most excellent, move. But when one reads the latest figures as to the German railways, it is hard to see how the Chancellor can have much time left for house-cleaning. By cutting expenses and salaries and dropping 30,000 employees the company managed to earn in 1930 $110,000,000 of the $157,000,000 reparation charge on the railways, to say nothing of dividends and interest and service on loans. Only by the Reich's cancelation of a loan of $34,000,000 and by using the greater part of its reserves was the company able to meet its obligations. No one in Germany believes that a request for a moratorium can be put off twelve months longer. When that comes, Mr. Hoover and Mr. Mellon will have it unmistakably brought to their attention that neither reparations nor war debts are settled, that they must yet be grappled with as one of the most disturbing influences in the industrial world. Meanwhile, the United States blocks the way.

Hoover and Our Army

IN addressing the International Chamber of Commerce in Washington President Hoover diverted for the moment the attention of the assembled foreign business men, bankers, and industrialists from such delicate problems as the tariff and war debts by calling attention to the terrific drain on the world's economic resources caused by the heavy expenditures of the leading Powers for armament. He asserted that "the world expenditure on all arms is now nearly five billions of dollars yearly." "Endeavor as we must," he continued in his amazing English, "in support of every proposal of international economic cooperation that is just to our respective peoples, yet we must recognize that reduction of this gigantic waste of competition in military establishments is in the ultimate of an importance transcendent over all other forms of such economic effort." He closed by urging the "business men of the world to insist that this problem shall be met with sincerity, courage, and constructive action."

Splendid, Mr. Hoover. Every honest advocate of world stability and world peace will agree with you. Let us get at this important task immediately. If you have the sincerity and courage that you mention, and the will to constructive action, then you can tackle this job at once and without getting up from your chair in the White House. You can begin right here at home, for we in the United States are spending more money on armaments than any other nation. This we are doing notwithstanding your statement that "the United States has a less direct interest in land-armament reduction than any of the foreign nations, because our forces have already been demobilized and reduced more than all others." Your statement is misleading in that it gives only half the picture. We have cut down the size of our standing army, it is true, but at the same time we have doubled our national guard, added 110,000 men to our reserve officers' corps, increased the scope and efficiency of military training in the colleges and summer camps, and redoubled our efforts in other directions where it has been possible to build up important trained reserves. Even Mr. Hoover's conference with the army chiefs on May 9-10 dealt only with economies in methods, rather than with radical cuts.

It may be, of course, that the White House has not in its possession any comparative statistics concerning military expenditures in this and other countries. In that event Mr. Hoover doubtless will be interested in the following table (taken from the "Armaments Year Book" published by the League of Nations) showing the sums laid out by the principal Powers for their military and naval services in 1928-29 (except in the case of Russia, where the figures are for 1927-28):

United States	$772,984,000
Great Britain	550,080,000
Russia	422,916,000
France	357,556,000
Italy	221,096,000
Japan	215,876,000

This table puts France, reputedly the most militaristic of nations, fourth in the list, and Italy, land of the saber-rattling Mussolini, fifth. Leading all is our own United States. It has been argued that we spend a smaller proportion of our national income on arms than does any European country except Switzerland and Austria, but after all $772,984,000 is three-quarters of a billion dollars, almost one-fifth of the total of the world's armament expenditures. If Britain's half-billion or France's one-third of a billion is a drain on the world's resources, surely our three-fourths of a billion must also weigh heavily on the world's economic structure. Had we reduced our military outlay a year ago we should not now be facing a Treasury deficit of perhaps $1,200,000,000. Moreover, our expenditures are out of proportion to our need for security. European countries which consider themselves beset on all sides by potential enemies are spending less than we are. If it could be reduced to a dollar-and-cents basis, the security given this country by the Atlantic and Pacific oceans would probably be found to be worth several billions of dollars.

Why, then, this great military expenditure, especially in the light of the fact that we have one of the smallest armies? A few days ago the Japanese Military Commission decided to recommend a reduction of 28,000 men in its standing army, using the money thereby saved in developing and improving military ordnance and equipment. This shows the trend of militarism; it is toward smaller regular armies and more efficient matériel to be used in killing men. A large part of our huge military budget goes toward the development of aviation, ordnance, and the chemical-warfare service. This is far more significant than the number of men we have in our army, for these are the weapons with which our military leaders expect to fight the next war for which they are preparing. It is idle to boast about the small size of our army, Mr. Hoover. Your plan to help the world economically by cutting down armaments expenditures should and must begin here at home.

The People's Land

WHEN Philip Snowden entered the House of Commons on April 27 to make his budget speech he was greeted by Labor members singing the well-remembered song of twenty years ago, "God Gave the Land to the People." The scheme of land-value taxation proposed in the budget speech was approved by the Commons on May 6 by a vote of 289 to 230, and will be included in the finance bill for consideration by the House of Lords. Conservative objections to the tax in the Commons took the form of protests against "proposals not for taxation but for political tactics," and it is perfectly true, as was made clear by Philip Snowden in the course of the debate, that the economic and political implications of the measure are more important than its fiscal aspects.

On their face the Snowden proposals are moderate in the extreme. In fact, the Chancellor apparently proposes nothing that we have not had in the United States throughout practically our entire history, and it is only when their implications are considered that the importance of the suggested measures appears. Mr. Snowden proposes a valuation of all land, to be repeated at five-year intervals, and a tax at the rate of a penny in the pound (5/12 of 1 per cent) on its capital value. The new tax will not apply at first to agricultural land unless it is used for other than farm purposes, or to small allotments or market gardens, to sites for churches, hospitals, or almshouses, to cemeteries, or to land owned by the national trust and local authorities. Interestingly enough, university lands and playing fields are to be taxable. The tax will be remitted to any individual whose land tax does not exceed ten shillings, so it is figured that practically all the working class will be exempt. While the full details of the measure will not be known until it appears as a part of the annual finance bill, what Mr. Snowden proposes, so far as appears from the press accounts, is a trifling tax on the capital value of non-agricultural land. The extreme moderateness of the proposal is evident.

Why, then, do the Conservatives denounce it as an extreme piece of socialistic class legislation, and why do the single taxers acclaim it as a great step forward in their long battle against private receipt of income from land ownership? To answer these questions it is necessary to consider both the history of land ownership in Great Britain and the announced purpose of the Labor Party in putting forward this new taxation measure. From the days of the Conqueror the rights of the British nobility have rested primarily on land, and the privileges of the landowner have carried with them no corresponding burdens of taxation. With the World War and its staggering loads for all classes of the people, however, the process of breaking up the great estates got under way, and now Mr. Snowden boldly suggests that the present tax measure is really the first instalment of a policy of nationalization. He says:

> By this measure we assert the right of the community to ownership of the land. If private individuals continue to possess a nominal claim to land they must pay a rate to the community for the enjoyment of it. They cannot be permitted to enjoy the privilege to the detriment of the community.
> Land differs from all other commodities in various respects. Land was given us by the Creator, not for the private use of the dukes but for equal use by all His children. Restriction in the use of land is a restriction on human liberty.

Americans may well rub their eyes in astonishment at seeing such revolutionary implications ascribed to a land tax to which they have been accustomed all their days. When they consider British history regarding land taxation, when they consider the British method of bringing about fundamental changes, and when they consider the announced purpose of this measure in the light of present British conditions and needs, they will realize that they are witnessing the first steps in a process that will perhaps end only when the ownership of all natural resources has been transferred to the state as representative of all the people. What Russia accomplished by the sudden process of violent and bloody revolution Great Britain may yet bring about by the method of peaceful and orderly change. If so, we shall see another triumph of British common sense and British genius for intelligent political action. In the present position of world affairs, the methods of social change are of scarcely less importance than its ends, and Americans may well contemplate the meaning of the peaceful revolution that Mr. Snowden proposes and the methods by which he would bring it about.

Albert A. Michelson

ALBERT A. MICHELSON, who died on May 9 at the age of seventy-eight after a singularly well-rounded career, had the distinction of having made with his colleague, Edward W. Morley, the most famous and revolutionary scientific experiment in modern times. The intent of the experiment was to determine the nature of the mysterious "ether" through which the earth was supposed to move. Did this ether move with the earth or remain fixed? Clerk Maxwell had suggested this could be determined by measuring the speed of light in two directions—in that in which the earth was traveling on its orbit and at right angles to it. Maxwell had no instrument to make this exceedingly fine measurement, but Michelson, by developing the interferometer, was able to do it. The two beams of light showed exactly the same speed. This crucial experiment was made in 1887. Professor Fitzgerald of Dublin offered in explanation the theory that all bodies shrink in the direction of their motion. Professor Lorentz of Leyden extended this view and introduced the idea that time is "local," and varies in different parts of the universe. From this the step was made to the conception of space and time not as two separate entities but as measurements or aspects of a single space-time continuum, and on this foundation Einstein erected his revolutionary theory of relativity.

Thus without the Michelson-Morley experiment the great theories of Einstein might never have been developed. But Michelson's reputation by no means rested solely on this crucial test. His development of the interferometer made possible accurate measurements of the stars; Michelson himself demonstrated by means of it that the diameter of Betelgeuse was 260,000,000 miles. He possessed what to the non-scientific mind must have seemed an almost morbid passion for accuracy. His incredibly fine experiments had established the speed of light at 186,213 miles a second, with a probable error of only about one mile a second, but just before his death he was trying to eliminate even this.

If the widespread notion that the man of science is a mere prosaic fact gatherer had not already been completely discredited, Michelson's career in itself might serve as a sufficient refutation. Like Einstein, he was constantly fascinated by the aesthetic side of his subject, by those "higher beauties" of nature which appeal to us, "not directly through the senses, but through the reasoning faculty." Far from being unresponsive to sensuous beauty, he was, again like Einstein, himself an accomplished violinist; more, he was proficient as a painter. His capacity for enjoyment and his zest in life were reflected not only in his interest in the arts, but in his other diversions. He was fond of chess, and when he was nearly fifty he started to improve his tennis game.

He was, finally, another example of that essential humility which science seems to breed in its votaries. In his later years he was loaded with honors, but he seemed completely indifferent to them. Perhaps all great scientists come to realize, far more than the rest of us, the extent of our ignorance, and seem to themselves, as in Newton's unforgettable comparison, like boys playing on the seashore and diverting themselves with a few pebbles or shells, while the great ocean of truth lies all undiscovered before them.

Europe's Darkest Hour

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

EIGHT months in Europe—ranging from London to Constantinople and studying conditions at first hand. What is the final upshot? What are one's ultimate opinions? What does one make of it all?

Primarily, the gravity of the situation and the dangers which overhang Europe stand out in my mind: the economic and financial chaos on every hand, the bad psychological state of one country after the other. And then the dread specter of militarism and war that looms over all. Everywhere it appears as if the present economic system were tottering to its fall. To one of the foremost German statesmen I summarized my impressions by saying that there was agreement among those with whom I talked in Germany that if Europe continued to be governed as it is there would not be a capitalist government left in ten years. To which the statesman replied that the figure was entirely too high; that it would be nothing like ten years if things went on as they did. He himself is, moreover, terrified by the tension on the Polish-German border; he had just returned from there and was astounded by the state of nerves and the absorbing fear of his countrymen. What would happen if an officer commanding a Polish or German patrol should lose his head and permit some minor aggression? He did not know; he lived in dread of it.

Fear, hate, hunger, poverty, the deadly lack of work, the loss of hope—one meets them on every hand. They dog one's footsteps in the streets of Istanbul, the byways of London, in every lane of every German town. Turn where you will they are there. You cannot escape them among the bare hills of Sicily, on the plains of Rumania, on the mountain slopes of Bulgaria, wherever farmers produce and cannot sell. "How is Budapest?" you ask of friends when you arrive there. "Dead, dead," is the answer. "And no hope anywhere." Yet everybody knows there are ways out—if only statesmanship could lend itself to the task; if only old hatreds, old nationalist ambitions, old, long-since-outworn rivalries and jealousies did not prevent. Let no man look upon this scene and declare that there is a bright side to war, or that war accomplishes any moral reform, or frees men's minds, or safeguards democracy, or creates a new order of life. The truth is that you cannot wander about Europe and believe that the World War is over; it will not be in its consequences in our lifetime.

Next to the danger of economic collapse the specter of war and the preparations for war remain, I repeat, most vivid with me. Soldiers everywhere. The late General Tasker H. Bliss, when acting as one of our peace commissioners in Paris, said to me: "Don't let anybody fool you about the causes of this war. It came just because there were too many fellows running around Europe with rifles in their hands." There are a million more fellows running around Europe with rifles in their hands than there were when the murder at Sarajevo started the disaster. Why should anyone think that Europe is safer with all this additional preparation for war than it was then? President Hoover is right to insist that disarmament is absolutely necessary for the financial sanitation of Europe. Far more than that, it is absolutely necessary for the moral sanitation of Europe. I have come back more than ever in favor of the canceling of war debts and the stopping of reparations, but I certainly do not wish to see America take a step in this direction without exacting the most definite pledges for radical disarmament on sea and on land.

Everywhere nations are helping to impoverish themselves by keeping fellows, often ragged and dirty, with rifles in their hands. There is Angora, the new capital of Turkey, placed high up in a desolate region purely for military safety by that able dictator and despotic ruler of his country, Kemal Pasha. It is hardly safe to drive in any direction out of Angora because of the military zones you constantly run into. Sometimes you may enter under restrictions; into other zones it is a deadly offense to set foot at all. But Kemal only remembers that under the peace treaty Constantinople can be neither fortified nor defended; that he defeated the Greeks in the war after the World War when they were within twenty miles of Angora. And so he arms, arms, arms. The suffering of his people is very great; Constantinople, the goose that laid the Turkish financial egg, is steadily decreasing in numbers and waning in power, but Kemal arms and arms and drills and drills and thus robs his people of much money they sorely need.

Please let no man think that I am unduly impressed by this. Hubert Griffith, the English journalist, has just published a "travel notebook" of a journey over much the same ground that I have covered. He is not a pacifist, but he surely has the right to talk as a pacifist, for from his seventeenth to his twenty-first year he was a private, a staff officer, and in the flying corps. And this is what this ex-soldier writes:

> What have I seen tragic? . . . The last thing, and the continuous thing that includes all other things, is armies. I have seen armies, I am sick of armies. One cannot get away from them. I saw an army in Poland—at my first cafe in Warsaw I thought I was at a military musical comedy; Hungary has an army, Jugoslavia has an army—and policemen wearing bayonets and revolvers; Turkey has an army—not only armies proportionate to the country's population, but large armies, and armies that swarm up and down the streets with swords and medals and spurs and uniforms. . . . A present peace-time army is the idlest, most mischievous, and most dangerous thing in creation, and to dress it up in a Hollywood dream of gold braid and scarlet or blue cloth is a senseless provocation of mob mentality.
> How many wars can a man even now only in middle age recall in his lifetime—the World War, the Balkan War, the Russo-Japanese War, the Boer War, the Sudan campaign, Somaliland. . . . Has the river of blood ever for more than a few years together ceased flowing? The only method that has never been tried is the method of there being no armies. . . . My quarrel with half the nations of Eastern Europe has been that one cannot go into a cafe without tumbling over someone or other's sword. One officer at least resigns his commission.

Thus Mr. Griffith in an impassioned plea for the United States of Europe. He held no brief, when he made his trip, for anybody or anything. He had no orders from his newspaper as to what he should write; he owed no allegiance to any political party or creed, and yet as he took his way over this same track he found his whole soul crying out against the monstrous doctrine that because wars have been they must be again, that the United States of Europe is a chimerical dream. His conscience revolted against these preparations for the next war that struck him in the face at every turn, and spelled not the avoidance of war, but invitations to the final disaster of Europe.

So this is what Europe looks like today, dressed up in its uniforms, in its old uniforms of hate, oppression, and slaughter, those uniforms meant to hide the most grinding poverty, suffering, and despair. Not in Germany, of course, nor in Austria or Hungary, for these are disarmed. Yet so strange is humanity that in those countries the demand grows steadily that they, too, shall be armed, shall dissipate their resources, shall have the right to waste man power, to pile up debts upon debts, to be as stupid and as foolish as all their neighbors. Mr. Griffith is right, there are ways of escape from all this chaos. I have stressed in my letters from Europe during the last eight months the various problems to be grappled with, the tariffs which throttle one country after another, armaments, the psychology of fear and of hate, the heaping up of gold in Paris and in Washington, the folly of reparations and of the war-debt payments. These and others are the breastworks to be taken. They can be conquered only by international action and cooperation. Let no man be in any doubt about that point. The present crisis is the worst in history because it is world-wide. It is the simple truth that no one nation can hope to work out of it except by some fortuitous happening. Why are the nations not working together, through their rulers? Why are the latter not meeting like the executives of a great endangered bank, if only to get to know one another, if only to exchange views, to plan for united action and a united front? One of the best-known diplomats in London declared not long ago that he had never been able to see why the rulers were not meeting for just this purpose. It is an international problem, he said, not a national one, and can be solved only by men with authority sitting in almost continuous session.

The beginning has been made. The British Prime Minister has invited the German Chancellor to come to Chequers to talk. Not until June, unfortunately, and M. Briand will not be there. Perhaps by that time the latter will have fallen, or will be so very securely settled in the presidency of France as to have lost already his influence in the European scene. And this brings us to the chief obstacle to a better world—France. If Europe goes down in the next five years the responsibility and guilt of France will be greater than those of any other country. Rotten with gold, still the victims of a psychology of fear, constantly whipped up by conscienceless politicians, the French seem bent upon throwing themselves in front of every movement that makes for the peace of Europe, excepting always Briand's adoption of the plan for a United States of Europe. But even here M. Briand has his limitations and his country its blind eye. They are outraged at the proposal for a German and Austrian Zollverein, although that is the most statesman-like move since the peace of Locarno, and Germany's renunciation of any possible reconquest of Alsace-Lorraine and a long step toward a united Europe. I do not deny that there is in France much genuine fear of Germany. It is groundless, and the French state of mind could be cleared up on this question if there were only French leaders honest and unselfish enough to undertake it. Instead, the politicians and dishonest journalists play upon it as the politicians in our South so long played up and whipped up prejudice against the Negroes for their selfish ends. Today, one feels like writing, France is the enemy of mankind. For it arms and arms and arms. It makes no determined effort for immediate economic cooperation; and M. Briand plots for a customs union against Germany and Austria.

All this instead of another step which could be taken at once—a genuine rapprochement between Germany and France. Either side could move in this direction. Because of political ineptitude, or because of a fear of rebuff, or for some other reason, Germany has not made the advances that it could, though there is a strong group in and out of the German press which knows that that is the quickest way and the soundest way to lay the specter of hostility. In France the will to a complete union in friendship is sadly lacking. Yet the very first move on the French side to proceed in the spirit of Locarno would be acclaimed in Germany. Instead, they are lining the German frontier with the most up-to-date defenses. Yet the more they defend and arm and prepare, the greater appears the funk in which they live. Their vast superiority in airplanes, poison gas, tanks, and heavy guns, all of them absolutely denied to the Germans, apparently means nothing to them. They are credited with having 5,000 military airplanes. With these they could destroy every city on the Rhine with all their men, women, and children in forty-eight hours. Against them the Germans have nothing but relatively few commercial airplanes. That by itself would seem to be military superiority enough for the French. But they apparently cannot be reasoned with as long as their politicians and their journalists capitalize their fears. Exceptions there are enough. There are many men and women in France with good-will toward Germany and every other nation. All last winter Frenchmen and Frenchwomen of distinction were accepting invitations to Berlin and other German cities and making welcome addresses upon the subject of German-French fellowship, but officialdom prevents these voices from becoming the voices of the nation.

I thought it highly significant that when Frederic R. Coudert of New York recently returned to Paris after some time in Germany he gave to an American newspaper in Paris an interview which constituted a vigorous criticism of the French attitude in European affairs, quite along the lines that I have written. He declared that Germany was disarmed and pacific, and suffering the greatest distress, and that French policy was all wrong. I cite this because nobody has been a more distinguished friend of France in the United States than this New York lawyer who is himself of pure French descent. The truth is that the French are now as self-satisfied and as smug as were the Germans before the war; their praise of their own culture sounds highly Teutonic. More than that, they feel, even at the moment when they proclaim their fear of Germany, that they are in a highly favorable position since they have most of the gold in Europe and the largest army on the Continent, while they are developing their colonies as vast military reserves.

The only hope in France is that the coming elections will produce a violent swing to the left; that the pinch of the industrial crisis, which is becoming acute, may make them realize that after all they are of the economic fellowship of Europe, and that they cannot rise superior to that for anything more than a short period; that if Germany goes down and Austria and Hungary starve, France will inevitably follow suit; that if bolshevism conquers in Germany, their own doors will not be unassailable. Time should bring reason with it. Unfortunately there is little time to wait, to lose. That was what leading German statesmen said when I told them that public opinion in America was changing on debts and reparations, but very slowly. "We cannot wait so long," was what they said. Quite true. Europe cannot wait. It must move. The roads to safety, peace, and happiness I have named are open. Will they be taken?

Upon the answer to this question depends the fate of more than one nation. Meanwhile, if I were a Bolshevist, the last thing I should do would be to propagandize, to seek to convert others, or to stir up unrest and rebellion within any other country. I should just sit still. For the rulers of Europe are deciding, and not the men in the Kremlin in Moscow, whether Europe shall go Bolshevist or not.

I Work for Russia

II. The Five-Year Plan in Action

By WALTER ARNOLD RUKEYSER

I AM attempting in this series of articles to record only my personal observations and experiences together with information given to me by persons whose statements I have reason to feel are authoritative. It follows that everything I record here is specific in nature and I make no attempt to generalize. It is a truism that it is impossible to draw general conclusions regarding Soviet Russia from the study and observations of one person, even though that person may travel throughout the length and breadth of the Soviet Union. Russia occupies one-sixth of the land surface of the world. To traverse it would be in itself a tremendous task; and as soon as one had finished one's tour of observation, conclusions drawn at the beginning of the trip would no longer be valid.

Soviet Russia is a land of continual flux, of shift of commodities, resources, and man power from "front" to "front." Everywhere one hears war terminology; "shock-brigades" is an everyday expression in the mouths of man and babe alike. The psychology of 160,000,000 people, made up of more than a hundred races, speaking as many, if not more, different languages, is being deliberately influenced and controlled by a handful of men who stand at the helm of this gigantic experiment. It can easily be understood why generalizations are impossible—why a condition which exists on this "front" today may be totally changed tomorrow, perhaps for something better, perhaps for something worse.

I discussed in my first article the functions of the head office of a Soviet state trust. Now let us turn our attention to the organization of the operating units of the trust—the producing end. The unit, in this case Uralasbest, of the state trust Mineralrud, has its own president, who under the new organization will probably be called director, and three vice-presidents, who, similarly, will be called vice-directors. The director and two of the vice-directors are party members. Incidentally, it must be remembered that there are only about 1,100,000 full-fledged adult members of the Communist Party; that to become a member of the party seems to be a very difficult undertaking. To those 1,100,000 men and women falls the gigantic task of administering politically and industrially the entire Soviet Union.

The director or president functions in practically every detail of his work as does the president of an American corporation. Subject to Moscow's approval, his word is final in every phase of administrative activity that falls within the scope of production, development, and new construction. One vice-president, a Communist, is administrative assistant to the president. The second, also in this instance a Communist, is director of building operations; in the case of Uralasbest he is director of a subsidiary known as "Stroiuralasbest" (Construction Department of Uralasbest). The third, not a party member, is an engineer who is called the technical director and would correspond to the works manager or perhaps the general manager in America.

Under the authority of the administrative vice-director is the commercial director. His duties correspond quite closely to those of the treasurer of an American corporation. He is responsible for inventories and for shipments of finished products. He also provides the financial liaison with the head office in Moscow—he must obtain the necessary money for the pay roll every fortnight from the branch of the State Bank at Sverdlovsk. He is concerned, too, with the product after it reaches the market.

Also under the authority of the administrative vice-president is the office manager, usually a party member. As his title implies, this official is responsible for the detailed conduct of the general offices. He directs the stenographic staff, all incoming and outgoing communications, the bookkeeping department, all cash expenditures. Under him are the chief secretary, the head bookkeeper, the clerk in charge of dispatch and receipt of communications, and the pay clerk.

The administrative vice-president, who is, of course, primarily an assistant to the president but who takes full charge when the president is absent, has authority also over the department of the chief economist. To me this department was perhaps the most interesting of the trust. The chief economist is responsible for all the control figures of the Five- (now Four-) Year Plan as applied to his particular industry. I cannot overemphasize his importance or the magnitude of his responsibility. Assigned a norm or quota set by Moscow, it is his duty to work out all the day-by-day details of the plan—the costs of production, capital required, and every other problem involved.

To most Americans the Five-Year Plan means hardly more than those three words; it is a mysterious economic program stating what the production of each and every industry shall be for each year for five years; its consummation may or may not, depending upon the personal bias, destroy all the institutions with which we are conversant. Actually, as I saw it, the plan is best described as an intensively developed budget system. Budgets are drawn up for each industry and activity. But these budgets are constantly being revised to conform to the results of day-to-day experience, and it is indeed true that the revisions are usually designed to increase the tempo. For example, at the expiration of the last fiscal year—October 1, 1930—it was decided by Moscow that the fiscal year should be brought into conformity with the calendar year. This made necessary the creation of an extra quarter extending from October 1 to December 31. Coming as it did almost exactly in the middle of the five years covered by the plan, the change in calendar meant a change in all detailed as well as general control figures for the remainder of the five years. I personally saw the plan, as it related to our industry, changed at least five times in fewer than five months. But the net result was to increase by nearly 25 per cent the planned production for the coming year in total tons of output. It is a byword in Russia today that when the control figures are changed it is always a revision upward in production and downward in costs.

To one inexperienced in the application of the Five-Year Plan it may appear that Moscow is concerned only with setting the figures for the production norm for each industry. Production, to be sure, is the ratio existendi. But setting the control figure is only the beginning. Here, again, it is necessary to remember the extent of the Soviet experiment. The plan concerns the lives and needs of 160,000,000 people representing a hundred races, nationalities, and languages, whose customs and demands vary as they inhabit arid desert, mountainous semi-tropics, frozen steppes, or the forest tundras of Siberia. The requirements of a wandering nomad tribe as well as those of a city of two million people were predetermined and planned for five years ahead. It is no wonder that mistakes occur in the accomplishment of the plan, that revisions must be made, that in some cases, in some industries, blundering inefficiency creeps in. An attempt to transform, even partially, a backward and essentially agricultural country into a dominantly mechanized and industrialized nation within five years would seem to one who has not actually observed what is going on in Russia today nothing short of madness. Yet it is being done.

The plan is not only being carried out. It is being speeded up. Let us take a case in point. The tempo of steel production is stepped up. Each ton of steel added means so much added mechanical equipment and plant capacity, which in turn requires so many more kilowatt hours of energy to make the wheels go round. Each furnace turning out steel must be supplied with the necessary pig iron, fluxes, and other necessary materials. Each ton of pig requires coke and limestone; these in turn mean a greater demand on quarries and mines. All the materials necessary to produce this extra ton of steel must be transported to the plant and the finished product removed. This requires railway building, which in turn requires the manufacture of rails and rolling stock. Everything requires maintenance. Above all, everything requires man power. And man power must be housed, fed, clothed, schooled, supervised, and paid.

Trucks, tractors, and cars are built. The plan is speeded up. More are required than was at first planned. These require brake-linings. Brake-linings mean asbestos. The production of asbestos must be speeded up. And always in the background lurks the bogy of counter-revolutionary activities, the "enemy from within," and the equal bogy of short-term credits and imports purchased with cash which must be paid for on time by the only device possible—the exporting of more, or at least no less, than is imported.

What is expected of the chief economist can best be exemplified by studying his duties as I observed them at Uralasbest. He starts with the production norm sent him from the head office in Moscow. This has been arrived at after painstaking and infinite calculations by the Central Planning Commission which correlates the entire plan. This production norm is predetermined for each year of the five. The production must then be allocated by months—and it must be borne in mind that in few if any industries can production be maintained at an even rate throughout the year. In asbestos production, where the greater proportion of the rock removed comes from open-cut mines, winter conditions slow down operations. Then, too, the available labor varies, seasonally and otherwise. Finally, during this expansion program, just when and at what point newly projected plants will come into production must be judged to a nicety, as well as when rationalization of old, existing ones will be effected, along with the accomplishment of mechanization of mining methods. So, in his monthly distribution of production, the chief economist must report in his plan the amount of imported and Soviet-made machinery, raw materials, and other supplies required, and the amount of money needed by the trust each month, first for capital expenditures, secondly for pay rolls and other direct operating costs. Man power, also, must be predetermined for each month and this man power allocated to the various phases of the industry from the office force to the "Mops"—a small army of roustabouts, cleaners, and others not involved actually in the production of the asbestos. Finally, he must calculate not only the requirements for the production of asbestos, but also for the maintenance of more than 13,000 employees and their families.

The chief economist, moreover, is responsible for the daily, monthly, quarterly, and annual statements showing the amount of production of each grade of finished asbestos and the itemized costs of producing the various grades. These reports are similar to those required in an American corporation, with this difference: the Soviet economist must report not only what has been done each day, week, and month of the year; he must show, in a second column, the predetermined control figures set up for each item by the plan, and in a third column he must show realization of the plan in plus or minus percentages, daily and cumulative.

The next article of this series will be an attempt to describe the daily life of the worker and his relation to the trust and to his superiors. And since the technical director, whose responsibilities and duties we have not yet discussed, is directly connected with the actual conduct of the operations, which means with the man power, we shall take up his activities along with those of the worker.

Power for Public Profit

By MAURICE G. POSTLEY

THE report of the St. Lawrence Power Development Commission contains an interesting body of evidence, completely overlooked by most observers, that is highly encouraging to advocates of public distribution of power.

The commission in its study employed three groups of specialists—engineers, lawyers, and cost analysts versed in the intricacies of marketing electric current. The marketing board comprised Dr. John Bauer and Colonel John P. Hogan, who submitted to the commission the results of a minute survey containing as striking a set of facts on municipal ownership and operation of power plants as is to be found in any official report in recent years. In summary, their figures bring out the following facts:

1. Forty-nine municipalities in New York State which are now in the business of selling electric current to small consumers are doing business at rates which compare very favorably with those of private corporations immensely larger in scope.
2. These municipalities, notwithstanding handicaps that will be shown here, are distributing electric current at costs measurably below those of the private companies and in fact below the average costs of the whole State.
3. The lowest rates in any city in the State are those in Jamestown, where the municipality owns and operates its power plant and sells current to its citizens in competition with a private company.
4. The twenty-three municipalities of Ontario, Canada, show definite economies in rates to domestic consumers and in cost of distribution superior to those of any private company in New York State.

The St. Lawrence Power Commission is deeply interested in the cost of distributing electric current for the reason that once the power is generated, the price at which it can be sold to consumers depends upon how much it will cost to bring it to them. The marketing board's report clearly shows that in New York State the municipalities have done a more economical job of distribution than have the private companies. This conclusion is arrived at by a comparison of ascertainable, relevant facts. The record of operating expenses per kilowatt hour involved in distribution was applied by the board as a measure to both types of operation, private and municipal. The figures do not include generation and transmission costs, taxes, interest, return on investment, or depreciation, which are not concerned with the question at issue, namely, the actual operating expense involved in distributing the current. This is what we find Dr. Bauer and Colonel Hogan reporting in the appendix to their formal statement to the commission:

> The municipal plants [in New York State] taken together as a group show [a distribution cost of] 5.21 mills per kilowatt hour, which is only slightly higher than for Mohawk-Hudson—4.53 mills—but lower than for any other company or system. The municipal plants serve mostly small communities and have relatively few power consumers [italics mine].

The Niagara-Hudson Power system, which includes the Mohawk-Hudson, the Buffalo, Niagara, and Eastern, and St. Lawrence Securities, sells a relatively large amount of power to industry. Such sales are highly important factors in striking averages, for bulk sale is possible at prices that are not to be compared with those affecting small consumers. Recognizing this fact, Dr. Bauer and Colonel Hogan select the Mohawk-Hudson as a "more nearly typical condition for the State." The choice appears charitable; for the average of the whole State, private and municipal plants included, but with Niagara-Hudson excluded, is 11.52 mills, against 4.53 for the Mohawk-Hudson. Even with the Niagara-Hudson system included, the State's average is still 6.35 mills, compared with 5.21 for the municipal plants. The Mohawk-Hudson may therefore be "more nearly typical," but the "nearness" depends upon how near 4.53 may be considered to 11.52 or 6.35.

Any further consideration of the showing of the municipalities in the electric business requires a glance at the sort of communities involved. It is the view of this writer that the municipalities in New York State running their own power plants are, on the whole, of such negligible nature from the standpoint of profit for private enterprise that few companies would have accepted franchises in them as a gift when the municipal plants were first opened. In short, the view is here held that municipal operation is a reality where private enterprise would not undertake it because it would have been deemed unprofitable. According to the Legislative Manual of the State of New York for 1930, the forty-nine communities involved boast a total population of 227,621. The largest is Jamestown, with a population of less than 45,200; the smallest is Dering Harbor, which is credited with thirty-nine residents. There are only three cities in the group. They are Jamestown, Dunkirk, with a population of 18,021, and Salamanca, with 9,570. All the rest are villages.

During 1928, the Bauer-Hogan report shows, these communities spent $2,508,660 on their power-plant operations and collected $3,389,915, showing a profit of $881,255. This money "spent," however, is partly a hypothetical cost, as it includes not only actual operating expenses, but also computed interest and depreciation on capital invested, but no charge for taxes. In many cases the computed figure is much higher than the actual amount expended—for example, where the municipality has created improvements out of its earnings and where there is no bonded indebtedness. In short, the municipalities have been treated as if they were private companies, but of course they are tax free. The average total cost per kilowatt hour, including depreciation and interest on investment, was 3.28 cents and the average revenue was 4.43 cents. To take a specific case or two: the village of Arcade, home town of Senator Knight, the Republican Senate leader, with a population of 1,643, incurred a total cost of $38,094 during 1928, and received $56,013 from its consumers, showing a clear profit of $17,919 for the community coffers. Some audacious souls assert that the municipal plant in Arcade is so profitable that the village does not have to impose any appreciable taxes. Jamestown, which has the lowest rate of any city in the State, had a total cost of $347,088 and collected $551,541, returning $204,453 in profit. Records like these, in view of the plainly limited opportunities for savings in the operation of small plants, are definitely significant to anyone who can understand the multiplication table, or who pretends to an interest in the "facts."

To return to the telltale 5.21 mills per kilowatt hour, representing distribution expenses, what do we find when we compare that figure with those of the behemoths of private power? This is a list casually selected from the Bauer-Hogan report. Outside New York City: Consolidated Gas, 21.84 mills; Central Hudson Gas and Electric, 14.10; Long Island Lighting, 13.54. In New York City: Consolidated Gas, 11.48; Queens Borough Gas and Electric (Long Island Lighting), 21.08; Staten Island Edison, 8.83.

The Niagara-Hudson reaches the low figure of 1.77 in this grouping. While this showing is not to be discounted as utterly worthless, for the present consideration it is palpably inapplicable. The Niagara-Hudson makes relatively large sales of industrial power. One can no more compare such a system with one in a small community than one can compare the square-foot output of a coal mine and a diamond mine. The problems of each system differ. Each system must be given special allowances in any study. No pretense is made here that precisely the same rule can be applied to all companies. In general, however, the only system that, because of its fundamental nature, may be omitted for comparative purposes is the Niagara-Hudson. That is the position taken by Dr. Bauer and Colonel Hogan in their report.

Little need be said in behalf of the much-heralded Ontario plants, for it is generally known that they have shown splendid results, despite the supposed handicap of municipal operation. The Bauer-Hogan summary comments as follows:

> The Ontario municipalities show an average expense of 5.8 mills per kilowatt hour for all the municipalities computed on domestic and commercial sales alone, compared with 6.35 mills for New York State, where, however, power as well as domestic and commercial sales were included in the divisor.
> Including the estimated power sale for Ontario, the average distribution expense for the twenty-three municipalities comes to 2.9 mills per kilowatt hour. This is much less than for any New York company except the Buffalo, Niagara, and Eastern and St. Lawrence Securities, which deal largely in industrial power.

The two experts then listed over-all costs in Ontario and arrived at a figure of 6 mills per kilowatt hour as compared with 12 mills for New York State municipal plants. This sounds worse than it really is. The Ontario communities studied had populations exceeding 10,000 each. The New York State average population in the forty-nine communities studied was substantially under 5,000. The comparative figure for private companies was unfortunately not available.

An idea of the importance of population can be had from a comparison of the distribution expenses per kilowatt hour in the city of Jamestown with the average in the municipal plants of the State. The figure in Jamestown is 3.1 mills, compared with 5.21 as an average for all municipal plants in the State, and even at that the 3.1 figure, including general expenses, is high. In arriving at the figure of 5.21 Dr. Bauer and Colonel Hogan excluded general expenses. Thus the distribution cost in Jamestown, with general expenses thrown out, would be in the neighborhood of 2.5 mills, compared with 5.21 for all municipal plants. In short, the larger the population, the greater the probability that exists for lower distribution costs.

Just one ironic fact of major importance remains to be recorded: in Jamestown, where the municipal plant has been selling current at 4 cents per kilowatt hour to domestic consumers in the smallest classification, 20 kilowatt hours a month, there is a private corporation doing business. That company is the Niagara, Lockport, and Ontario, a part of the Niagara-Hudson system. It, too, charges 4 cents. Recently the municipal plant reduced its rate to 3.5 cents and the company is now reported ready to reduce its rates accordingly, though it tried, in an unsuccessful court action, to prevent the city from putting into effect even the 4-cent rate.

The record of how the municipal plants have benefited domestic consumers and others, based upon the facts to be found in the commission's reports, cannot be related here in detail. To give one example, the municipalities have succeeded in making a better showing in "promotional rates," that is, in lowering prices proportionately with the increased use of current. The purpose of the promotional rate is to encourage use by providing current at an economical price. The private companies, in the main, have fallen behind in this as in other fields.

Lack of space also prevents a minute presentation of a comparison of consumer rates. No direct ratio of this kind, comparing municipalities and private companies, is available. The best authority on the subject is the St. Lawrence Commission itself. In its report only one direct reference to the benefits of municipal plants is made. That statement reads as follows:

> Your commission is aware that a considerable number of municipal distributing systems are already in existence in New York State and that they are charging rates which compare very favorably with the rates charged by private companies operating under similar conditions.

The commission's report does not include, presumably because it was considered not pertinent to that body's major problems, the clear savings in distribution that the municipal plants have effected, which are described here, but Commissioner Thomas F. Conway, who filed a dissenting report, made this observation: "Their success [the municipal plants] is attested by the benefits they have brought to consumers in greatly lowered rates."

If these facts prove nothing else, they prove that the presence of municipal plants assures a healthy competitive spirit that may have some influence in keeping rates reasonable. Unfortunately, municipalities cannot institute and operate their own plants whenever they wish to do so. The law does not permit them. Those communities now operating plants do so only by specific permission of their charters. It is obvious that a more general permissive method is desirable from the point of view of the consumer.

Is Advertising Honest?

By T. SWANN HARDING

A GOVERNMENT study was recently made of the material advertised as fine-quality honey sold by 411 retail stores in New York City. The study at once disclosed how easy it is to fool the American people on quality and quantity, provided your advertising and your containers are attractive. When sold in tins honey was found to be from 10 to 15 cents cheaper per pound than when sold in glass jars of the same size. In five-pound tins honey sold at a rate of 23 cents a pound, while in two-ounce glass jars it sold at $1.20 per pound. To show how discriminating the consumer is, it is startling to learn that both two- and five-ounce glass jars of honey regularly retailed at the same price, while fourteen-ounce containers were very popular because the consumer almost invariably mistook them for full pounds in spite of the fact that the net weight appeared plainly marked on each container. In some cases fourteen-ounce glass containers of honey sold for more than sixteen-ounce containers in the same store.

When governmental regulation of advertising truth was recently proposed, protestants exclaimed: "From the standpoint of its application and its effects, such censorship would be costly, troublesome, and unnecessary. From the standpoint of principle, it would run counter to the tide of American ideals." This comes very near to stating a great truth. It does actually seem that a demand for truth in advertising would run counter to the tide of American business ideals. The research department of the National Confectioners' Association itself, in its frenzied eagerness to combat the increasing popularity of the cigarette, actually sponsored in advertising the grotesque statement that eating sugar would make you thin, because "fats burn in the flame of the carbohydrates." This phrase, sometimes used by physiologists to describe picturesquely the interrelationship in the intermediary metabolism of dextrose and fatty acids, is here used to give pseudo-scientific warrant to the idea that a diet high in sugars (such as candy) would effectively inhibit obesity. The reference cited a textbook of Bodansky as authority; the author immediately wrote to medical and scientific journals denouncing this use of his work.

This is in line with the general spirit of much American advertising. There has long been a celebrated ginger ale which featured in its advertising the statement that it had been "aged six months." This was said to make it taste like good old French wine. The prospective consumer was asked if he would eat a green apple and was then implored, for his health's sake, never to drink green ginger ale. All this seems too grotesque to believe, but when printed with a properly signed certificate by a distinguished "scientist," with his degrees attached, this rigmarole had decided sales value or it would not have been used. Then in the summer of 1929 the manufacturers "signed a stipulation agreement with the Federal Trade Commission to discontinue advertising its product as 'aged six months' unless and until such time as this beverage is in truth and in fact aged for the length of time specified. The respondent agreed to discontinue use of the statement 'aged six months,' or any other statement so as to imply that its product was and is aged six months, when such is not the truth." There seems some legalistic excess verbiage here but the point is plain. The ale was not aged six months. It was advertised in the best magazines as aged six months. Its advertising bore the certifying signature of its chemist to this effect. It found sales value in such advertising. Does advertising need regulation?

The same year, "The manufacturer of a tooth paste sold as 'The Iodine Tooth Paste' has agreed to cease and desist from the sale of this tooth paste under unjustifiable claims." Why? The advertisements, again in the best magazines, ran: "The Iodine Tooth Paste." "Its iodine protects you." "Contains just enough pure, active iodine to accomplish the purpose." "The full iodine efficacy is there." "The chemical element—iodine—has been in general use for about one hundred years. Dentists have used iodine in their general practice for over forty years. Its germ-destroying power and stimulating effect upon inflamed tissues have been fully tested and accepted beyond any question. Iodine is one of the finest elements that can be used in a tooth paste to keep the gums and mouth in a healthy condition." "That is why this development in the use of iodine will interest you." This sounds very erudite and convincing. It had sales value. What were the facts? "As a matter of fact the tooth paste in question did not contain any free iodine, but did contain potassium and calcium iodides, which do not possess the antiseptic or germicidal qualities of free iodine."

About the same time the United States Food and Drug Administration delivered a severe blow at the insecticides sold to farmers and advertised as capable of curing the external parasites of poultry and farm stock if given internally in the drinking water! Other spurious preparations were widely advertised as capable of being absorbed by the sap of trees and bushes in order to control insects and fungi on the outside of said trees and bushes. One of these preparations was sold for $64 a gallon and could be prepared at a cost of 18 cents a gallon. Finally, glittering and attractive little cases said to contain deadly chemicals which would kill moths and other insects if they were only hung in the room were found neither to purify the air nor kill insects. Obviously there is money in fraudulent advertising.

Shortly before this the administration announced that the market had been recently cleared of fake "worm expellers" which were glibly advertised to cure live stock of worms, when no drug or mixture of drugs at present known to medical science will act as a vermifuge for all types of animal and poultry worms; many of the drug preparations examined do not act at all. Some of these "honestly" advertised preparations were found to contain 95 per cent water, a little gum, and cod-liver oil.

Americans are unbalanced on the subject of health. They are particularly insane about what is politely called "chronic intestinal stasis." So many clever charlatans and crooks have lied about constipation in so many cleverly worded advertisements of subtle mendacity that laymen will buy almost anything to rid them of an evil which is not, physiologically, half so dangerous as they imagine, as many competent medical specialists well know and frequently proclaim to their colleagues. The market was and is quite naturally loaded with bran cereals and "health foods" of all sorts. They are advertised not only in popular magazines but in the best medical journals, where they entice physicians into menacing the intestinal health of patients too sensible to do that on their own account. For roughage, used excessively, is very dangerous.

After completing an investigation, the Food and Drug Administration announced that many of these products, advertised as laxatives, contained only from 25 to 36 per cent bran, which should really be the predominating ingredient if they were to be truly laxative. "If the manufacturers do not desire to make them at least one-half bran, we insist that they refrain from representing them as laxative and that they label the articles so that the purchasers will not think they are getting products high in bran." So reads the official press release. Then there are the products advertised as "100 per cent bran" or "all bran," though the administration's analyses demonstrated that they contained as high as 20 per cent flavoring materials. A more important point may be given in the words of the administration report:

> Practically all the bran products were held forth as remedies for constipation. This disease, or rather symptom of many diseases, may arise from many causes. Bran is not a competent treatment for many forms of constipation, but is contraindicated in some cases. It is our position, therefore, that the unqualified term "constipation" should not be used on the labels of these articles. . . .

The position of the administration is scientifically sound. Human physiology backs it up. But the products may still be, and still are, advertised in the same old way, even though their package labels are rendered honest by legal compulsion on the part of the government.

Yet once more, after a long investigation which had some publicity, the administration came out with a statement on radioactive waters and drugs. It found that but 5 per cent of hundreds of such preparations examined were actually radioactive, and declared that the use of radium-containing substances should at all events be strictly supervised, as it was exceedingly dangerous. Meantime, as the Journal of the American Medical Association remarked in an editorial (September 7, 1929), the Council of Pharmacy and Chemistry of the American Medical Association some years ago admitted to "New and Non-Official Remedies" various preparations containing radium and various devices for causing radium emanation to pass into drinking water. Why had this not been done some years ago? For any scientific reason? Let the editorial explain in its own words: "True, the evidence was not extremely well controlled or profuse in amount, but there seemed to be a demand by physicians for such preparations." In short, while the American Medical Association, which represents organized medicine in America, and which claims to guard so cautiously the scientific character of its advertising, felt there was little scientific reason for the use of such preparations at the time, it yielded to the importunities of individual physicians.

However, light came at last. In September, 1929, the council (the United States Food and Drug Administration having acted in July) at long last decided to reject such solutions and devices, whether for bathing or injection, for even if they did contain radium there was no evidence that they would remedy the diseases they claimed to remedy—arthritis, anemia, boils, and pimples—or that they would rejuvenate! There never was any scientific evidence to show that the products or devices would so act. It actually seems that if organized medicine would do its part to keep its own advertising honest and ethical, the work of the government would not be so difficult. Nothing whatever is said in the Journal of the American Medical Association editorial about the work of the Food and Drug Administration. It is apparent that the advertising supervision of the best medical journals leaves much to be desired; hence it is unreasonable to expect laymen not to be duped when physicians themselves are so careless. Finally, there is need for some impartial, objective agency, basing its findings on science, to make health advertising honest—a thing manufacturers in keen, competitive business can never be expected to do.

This is not all, but it is enough. The recital could continue through many pages. Advertising is not and perhaps cannot be honest in a competitive society where, even in medical therapy and pharmacy, the existence of a physician or of a manufacturing house depends absolutely upon ability to get money. In medicine this means a conniving at all sorts of abuses which are ethically objectionable. In industry it means the cutthroat tactics so common in American business, and of those tactics untruthful advertising is a necessary by-product. The objections of part of the drug trade (for the American Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association has gone on record as indorsing the Food and Drug Administration policy and also governmental control of advertising honesty) are beside the point. Impartial government regulation, based on science, is needed. Let money be made from human credulity or vanity in spheres of luxury and the superfluous where deception is relatively harmless. Health is too fundamentally important to be trifled with. Advertising related to health should be truthful. It is demonstrably false today in hundreds of cases. Certain agencies would prefer to see it restricted to fact. The public so far has not been heard from.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter has chosen this week as letter week. The first letter, from Normal, Illinois, is brazen enough to mention another columnist and another paper, but the Drifter will be generous and let the advertisement stand—especially since the paper no longer exists.

> Since I am a subscriber to The Nation [writes John A. Kinneman] and also to Consumers' Research I must write you concerning razors. F. P. A. in the World used to remind us of his campaign to eliminate dry sweeping. Since I am a lay expert on straight-blade razors, you and I might begin a campaign for the restoration of the manly blade—you providing the publicity and I obliging you with some of the technical nuances of edge, honing, and stropping. While some of my neighbors take great pride in their golf sticks (or maybe it is clubs), in their water lilies, or even in their tomatoes, I have found no small amount of pleasure in conditioning my four straight blades. I am confident that I have one of the few "three-line" Swaty hones outside the ranks of the elder statesmen of barberdom. Do you know the Swaty? Ask your barber.

When you cease drifting and I stop teaching, we'll buy a tinker's outfit in partnership. You'll do the umbrellas, I'll do the scissors and razors, if there are any open blades left then.

* * * * *

WORSE ways of spending one's old age might be found than setting up as a tinker. But the Drifter will not promise to undertake the partnership so long as there are still some open roads left in the world. And he might as well make it clear right now that he will have nothing to do with umbrellas. Having scorned them all his life as the refuge of cowards and at the same time a reproach to the reckless, the Drifter will never minister to an umbrella's broken ribs if he can help it, or do anything that might mitigate the reverses that umbrellas so often meet with from disrespectful winds. He might do the roller skates.

* * * * *

LETTER Number Two is also concerned with razors. It comes from Charles James, who lives in Los Angeles, and it reads as follows:

> Much belated, but I hope not too late for publication, I want to add my mite to your correspondent's comments on razors. I agree with all he says except his partial indorsement of the foreign safety blade. While much better than our native product, it still falls far short of an average good razor, necessarily so, for the latter is hollow-ground and individually tempered—two essential processes for a good razor which are impossible in a mass-produced, thin blade—especially the tempering, which even in the hands of experts is far from being uniformly successful. That is the reason why buying razors is largely a matter of luck and why really good ones are so highly prized. I shall never cease to mourn the accidental loss of two Wade and Butcher razors, and I am guarding a Wostenholm and one unnamed blade like the apple of my eye.
> I sometimes wonder if the benighted users of these much-advertised instruments of torture—so they appear to me—realize what crude contraptions they are. Perhaps the following test will convince them. Let them try to cut a hair with one. I have never succeeded with anything finer than a horsehair, while with one of my pet blades I can split one of my very fine hairs half a dozen times into almost invisible shavings.
> The best thing I know about Calvin Coolidge, whom I regard as the smallest of the goodly collection of nonentities who have rattled around in the chair of Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln, is the fact that he uses an old-fashioned razor which he knows how to keep sharp. It is his only claim to greatness, if we accept, in the inverse sense, Napoleon's dictum that great men shave themselves. By that standard Coolidge is greater than Napoleon, who had his razors kept in shape by his barber, for Calvin sharpens his own.

* * * * *

OTHER letters, many others, press for publication. There are many among them full of excellent wisdom. But the Drifter cannot with any conscience follow up with another letter one which manages to get Washington, Jefferson, Lincoln, Napoleon, and Coolidge into one paragraph. That is as great a feat as splitting a hair six ways.

Australia's Wool Scheme

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Mr. Hazlitt, in his admirable and remarkably concrete criticism of some of Stuart Chase's proposals for making our economic system somewhat less insane than it now is, mentions Australia's wool scheme as an example of the failure of government planning on a limited scale. This does the Australian experiment somewhat less than justice. Professor Edward Shann's "An Economic History of Australia" touches on this matter. Professor Shann writes:

> After August, 1922, the wool-selling brokers refused to be bound by the association's allocation of quantities of wool, old and new, to be submitted at the Australian auctions. The plan's success, however, in removing the fear of unlimited offerings had by then made possible a sharp recovery in prices, especially for merino wool. . . . The powerful wool-selling brokers were active in hostility to the proposals for the continuation of the plan, for they were not ready lightly to submit their excellently run and lucrative businesses to a central control. . . . The vast majority of pastoralists mistrusted anything that would put their wool nearer to the grasp of governments in whose policies they have seldom had part or trust.

In concluding Professor Shann quotes the closest student of the plan's operation as saying, "The Australian wool industry as a whole lost an opportunity, which is unlikely to recur, of creating a powerful instrument for its own advancement."

It would thus appear that the plan was wrecked by the great conflict that runs through Australian social politics, the conflict between the urge toward state socialism and that toward individual enterprise.

It would be very interesting and perhaps profitable if some radical thinker of Mr. Chase's ability would investigate all these plans and set out the reasons for their "failure."

"All Spots and Jumps"

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The first requirements of a philosopher are sound logic and good horse sense. Scholastic requirements come second. There are many men possessing much knowledge but very few who have wisdom. That's the reason why philosophers are scarce. Bertrand Russell in his article What I Believe in The Nation of April 29 gives a classic example of modern philosophy.

Beholding the topsy-turviness of our man-made civilization, he reasons as follows: "Academic philosophers, ever since the time of Parmenides, have believed that the world is a unity. . . . I think the universe is all spots and jumps, without unity, without continuity, without coherence or orderliness . . ."

How can any earnest student of nature come to such an absurd conclusion? But granted that the above viewpoint is right, how can Mr. Russell draw the following conclusion on the same page: "Order, unity, and continuity are human inventions just as truly as are catalogues and encyclopedias"? How is it possible for a created or evolved being of nature to be superior to its maker? Is it any wonder that "the universe is all spots and jumps"?

Ambition

By MARK VAN DOREN

Ambition is a white line
Of rock and nervous wrath,
Drawn around the will of one whose knees are burning knives
Upon a path.

Ambition is the knowledge lost
Of how a day pauses,
Letting the sky lift—with seven colors casting off
Their straitened gauzes,

Floating in a loose band
As far as light can go;
Then home again, the seven, while as lazily as air
The streamers blow.

Ambition is a day gained
Against the long night—
Look up at evening, see it there—a phosphorescent, brave Escaping kite.

In Dispraise of Fine Books

THERE is an immense to-do nowadays about functionalism in architecture, but one never hears anyone discussing functionalism in book-making. It seems high time that such a discussion began, for the ways of the edition de luxe publisher grow more fearful and wonderful daily. Here are two volumes published by Random House, limited editions of 360 copies each, in two colors, measuring 15½ by 11¾ inches, designed by Vojtéch Preissig and printed in Czecho-Slovakia "with the entire resources of the new state printing plant at Prague put at his disposal." One volume is "The Way to Wealth," the preface to "Poor Richard's Almanack," the other Walt Whitman's "Salut au Monde!" It would be hard to think of two authors for whom such sumptuous editions seem less appropriate. What would the thrifty soul of Poor Richard think of all this sybaritic gaudery? The expansive Walt, perhaps, would like the immense format, the enormous type, but what would that lusty sloven make of these pure white covers, with their delicate yellow lines? And aside from the appropriateness of these particular volumes to their particular authors, who buys such books as these, and what do they do with them when they have them? Whose shelves are sixteen inches high? Who likes to read Franklin—or anybody else—in such Hear Ye, Hear Ye type?

These two volumes, of course, are merely extreme examples of publishing tendencies that have been running riot in recent years. They could be cured, it seems to me, by a simple return to the concept of functionalism in book-making. Books exist to be read. A book too exquisite to be read is as preposterous as a house too exquisite to be lived in, a car too fine to drive, a bathing suit too lovely to wet. As soon as an edition de luxe becomes so luxurious that it seems a desecration actually to handle it, to read it, its taste has become doubtful, even, at bottom, vulgar. This essentially vulgar taste, which would be condemned by any genuinely functionalist standard, prevails in most limited-edition work today. The current fine-book-making canons are those branded by Veblen as leisure-class canons. Foremost among these is conspicuous waste. The paper and binding, durable or not, intrinsically beautiful or not, must at least be expensive enough to be out of the common reach. On top of this is conspicuous physical waste—waste of margins, waste in type sizes, excessive weight. It seems to be agreed that whatever else it is or is not, an expensive limited edition must be bulky and cumbersome. Finally, there must be implied waste of time: reading, if one is so irreverent as to attempt it, must be made as difficult and annoying as possible by uncut leaves. A typical example of all these standards is the limited autographed edition of Eugene O'Neill's "Strange Interlude," published by Boni and Liveright several years ago. An exquisite book without question, but with about six times the weight and cubic displacement of the trade edition of the same play, with uncut leaves, and with a white and gold binding that it seemed a sacrilege for human hands to touch. Much the same criticism might be made of the edition of the Boswell papers now being printed by Edwin Rudge: those gorgeous Venetian-red covers must literally be handled with gloves or a handkerchief; they take a thumbprint that would have made the late M. Bertillon squeal with delight; the type and margins are extravagantly large, and the books are built to stand upright only on the bookshelves of a Brobdingnagian.

Am I, perhaps, biased against all fine book work? Am I merely parading some thrifty personal prejudices under the delusion that they are principles? Well, I confess to a weakness for compactness, for something light in the hands, something that is not ruined or spoiled by a reasonable amount of reading. For my own use, for example, I prefer the neat little one-volume edition of Rabelais published by Simon and Schuster to the two-volume edition, published by Boni and Liveright, with the Papé illustrations; I would rather, for sheer convenience, read "The Decameron" in the little 95-cent Modern Library edition than in the handsome two-volume edition published at $17.50 by Covici-Friede, though I like the garish Bosschère illustrations, and immensely prefer the new Richard Aldington translation to the John Payne translation adopted by the Modern Library. I can stand, of course, a little luxury: to me the ideal editions of the classics are those published by the Oxford University Press in the Oxford Standard Authors series—the two-volume edition of the Trechmann translation of Montaigne, for example, or the three Nonesuch Press books published here by Random House—the Blake, the Donne, and the selected essays of William Hazlitt (the last two, incidentally, remarkable bargains at $3.50). These volumes are compact, durable, reasonably light, able to stand up physically under repeated readings, and admirably printed. Nor do I even object to the rich new $33.50 edition of Pope's translation of the Iliad, with the English on the left-hand pages and the Greek on the right, also published by Random House.

It is somewhat bulkier than I personally like for reading, but the whole-morocco binding has a fine masculine eighteenth-century toughness: here is a de luxe volume that does not look as if it had been designed by a perfume manufacturer.

The nouveau riche book collector, who thinks that money can buy even intellectual prestige, has been debauching our standards long enough. Is it unreasonable to maintain that printing and binding should exist for the sake of books, not books for the sake of printing and binding?

HENRY HAZLITT

Pershing's Three Wars

My Experiences in the World War. By General John J. Pershing. Two volumes. Frederick A. Stokes. $10.

GENERAL PERSHING waged three wars at once and won them all. The one to which he devotes least space in this work is the one against the Germans. Evidently he had no quarrel with them. He fought them because it was his business. They were good soldiers, and so was he. More ruthless than Foch or Pétain, he wanted no armistice at all—nothing short of unconditional surrender. But his sternness was free from rancor. Technically, Pershing and Hindenburg were "enemies" for the duration of the war; in fact, they are of the same breed. Professional types are far more real than national types; true soldiers form a freemasonry the world over.

Pershing does not keep the same serene temper in relating his second war, that with Washington. The memory obviously rankles; no Locarno pact has been signed. No hostility to Wilson; nothing but praise for Secretary Newton Baker; no allusions to politicians, journalists, contractors: the sole enemy is the War Department. The War Department wanted to consider him as their instrument; he was the spearhead, but they should direct the thrust. For Pershing, the Commander-in-Chief was the All-Highest, the sole War Lord. Washington existed only in order to supply his requisitions. He bristled when it was suggested that Goethals might take charge of transportation and the services of supply. He would have liked, instead, to reach back across the Atlantic and bring Washington under his own supreme authority. Washington and Chaumont fought bitterly the Battle of the Sam Browne Belt. On the whole, Pershing was right. Politically, the war could and should be directed from Washington. Strategically, it had to be conducted on the spot.

The third and fiercest fight was with the Allies. Pershing's one idea was the creation of an absolutely complete and independent American army. On this rock he stood impregnably. In 1917-18 the war was a race with disaster. Russia was in helpless chaos; Serbia and Rumania were hors de combat; Italy had almost collapsed; ominous mutinies had broken out in the French army; German divisions released from the Eastern front were pouring against the exhausted West. But General Pershing's dominant thought was still to build up his separate army. To the Allies such a policy seemed suicidal. For the common cause: the Germans might triumph before Pershing was ready. For America herself: soldiers can be trained in three months, but to match an improvised staff against the tried German machine would be tempting Providence.

Balfour, Lloyd George, Haig, Pétain, Foch, Clemenceau, blandly, insidiously, petulantly, were urging him; he remained adamant. Tasker Bliss understood the plight of the Allies, but he could not move the Commander-in-Chief. He suggested appealing to Washington; Pershing declined. "Even though the President should lean that way," he would not have budged. He was reminded of his responsibility; he realized it and did not flinch. Obstinacy on such an epic scale ceases to be mulishness and becomes heroism. He was freely accused of personal vanity. He had been appointed—on the strength of his French, which, in France, was found unfit—at a time when the A. E. F. seemed a mere gesture. But he wanted to be the real commander of a real army, not a mere messenger of good-will. His egotism, although undeniable, was not his sole motive. Pershing was purely and simply a soldier, and could not think except in strictly national terms. That a soldier, priest of the flag, should serve under any flag but his own struck him as an absurdity—a rabbi officiating at St. Patrick's. Amalgamation, the constant desire of the Allies, to him was anathema.

He claims that "national sentiment demanded a national army." Not at that time. National sentiment demanded that the Germans be licked; we did not care by whom or how. National sentiment was not pleased that ten months after war had been declared, when our Allies were in direst need, we should have brought only 25,000 men to the fighting line. National sentiment was enthusiastically with Pershing when, under the stress of impending disaster, he abandoned his position for an instant and offered his troops to Foch: "I have come to tell you that the American people would consider it a great honor for our troops to be engaged in the present battle. Infantry, artillery, aviation, all that we have are yours; use them as you wish. More will come, in numbers equal to requirements."

His second argument is that soldiers cannot do their best except in their own army. But actual fighters seldom look beyond their regiment; the brigade commander is to them a mythical personage. Some of the finest work done by our troops was in amalgamation with the French, particularly under Mangin. Even the army that reduced the St. Mihiel salient was mixed.

Pershing had his way; but, as the Allies won, everybody was satisfied. Clemenceau, Pétain, Joffre, Foch, Haig, nationalists themselves, could not help sympathizing with Pershing's attitude as soon as the emergency was past. So he will remain in history a fine, sturdy, uncompromising, one-flag man. Had the Germans had a little better luck, Pershing's obstinate refusal would have made his name opprobrious.

On the other hand, we fully understand Pershing's reluctance to subordinate himself to Allied commanders at a time when their prestige was at its lowest ebb. No American wanted to be amalgamated with the British; and amalgamation with the French offered special difficulties on account of differences in language and methods. Frequently the Americans would chafe under the good-natured but no less insufferable superciliousness of the French; not a few wheezy quartermaster officers acted as though they had saved Verdun single-handed. Our men were tempted to retort in kind. I was once ordered: "See what those damn Frogs are doing, and tell them not to." There is something of that spirit in Pershing's book, and generations of hundred-per-centers will love the man who told the French where to get off.

Finally, Pershing felt that an autonomous army, even though not needed against the Germans, would come in handy at the peace conference. A cynical thought, but shrewd—Clemenceau's action fully justified Pershing's foresight. Justice was flung to the winds; minor allies, even Belgium, were swept aside, because the Big Five alone had the proper number of guns for Wisdom and Righteousness. Clemenceau! On the last page we find him and Pershing in each other's arms, choking with tears. They belong together; radically different in wit and culture, they had the same rugged, elemental simplicity in their ideal. Joffre, Pétain, Mangin were also men after Pershing's own heart. Not Foch, although Foch dealt far more diplomatically with him than Clemenceau. Foch was too much of "a student and professor of strategy." To think overmuch is unmilitary. I am sure you want to know whether Pershing actually said: "Lafayette, we are here!" He did not, any more than Cambronne said: "The Guard dies but never surrenders" (or, more tersely, M——). That inspiring and much parodied phrase was obviously not in character. I have but recently discovered what a "Monadnock" is: Pershing deserves that title.

ALBERT GUÉRARD

Can England Come Through?

England's Crisis. By André Siegfried. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

M. SIEGFRIED is that rara avis, a much-traveled Frenchman who is keenly interested in countries other than his own. His study of the United States in his "America Comes of Age," although not to be compared in acuteness of observation and philosophic breadth with the now classic comments of his fellow-countryman, De Tocqueville, a century earlier, deservedly ranks as one of the best contemporary analyses of our civilization. His new book, on England, falls very distinctly below the level of his earlier one on ourselves, and one fears for the quality of his third, which rumor asserts is to be one on Russia. It looks a little as though M. Siegfried felt that he had struck "pay-dirt" and was going to make the most of it. As a trained observer, his reactions to any national scene would be interesting and valuable, but it may be questioned whether any man is capable of publishing very profound studies in quick succession of three such different nations as America, England, and Russia.

In "America Comes of Age" M. Siegfried's touch was usually sure and his treatment competent, but in "England's Crisis" he frequently fumbles rather badly. The critique this time has taken the form throughout of an economic study, buttressed, apparently, at all points with figures and statistical tables. Siegfried is excellent so long as he keeps to the high, dry ground of social observation and analysis. One cannot escape the conclusion that he has mired himself in the bog of statistics, which are notoriously dangerous ground for any but a highly trained economist to enter upon. Figures, like Bible texts, can be cited to prove almost anything, and even Siegfried's logic is far from displaying that impeccability that we consider peculiarly French. His deductions are often far from compelling, his thought is confused, and his conclusions are oddly contradictory. Sir Walter Layton, the editor of the Economist, certainly a much abler statistician than Siegfried, was able to draw quite different inferences from the figures in an article in the Revue de Paris, which may be considered in part a refutation of Siegfried's reasonings.

Interesting as the book is, it may easily prove misleading for the average reader. If the author has shown himself weak as an economist, he retains, in his social and psychological comment, all the suggestive brilliancy of his earlier work. We Americans, as well as the English, may well ponder, for example, his claim that because of the careless lack of efficiency and sensible thrift in domestic economy, the higher wages in England as contrasted with the Continent are only in part needful to maintain a really "higher standard" of living, and that the rest of the higher wage scale represents merely individual and industrial waste. Many of his other thrusts at English characteristics, which in general he greatly admires, are sound as well as shrewd.

For the thoughtful reader one of the most interesting points of the book is one that the author had no intention of making. That is the clear relief in which one aspect of our new age is made to stand out. Siegfried makes both certain charges against the English and certain admissions concerning them. He considers that they insist upon being too much individualists in their lives; that they are too much amateurs instead of professionals in life; that something deep in their nature forced them, unwisely, to bring their currency back to par and to pay 100 per cent of their debts instead of repudiating four-fifths of them, as France, in the author's opinion, more wisely did with spiritual ease; that the best minds in England still prefer statesmanship to business; that Englishmen insist on too much leisure; and so on down a long list. He insists that the nation is going to the dogs economically, yet admits that the condition of the working classes is better than it was before the war; that the life of the upper classes was never so distinguished for social and intellectual charm as today; and that England and the Empire still have "unlimited powers of adaptation and life." This phrase, the last in the volume, is a curious ending to a statistical jeremiad. The whole book is an odd jumble of keen social analysis, bad economics, the application of the new doctrine that national statistics somehow are more important than the lives of the individual citizens, and the apparently unconscious assumption of the Nietzschean philosophy in economics comparable to that of pre-war Germany in statecraft. The moral aspect of England's paying her debts as contrasted with France's repudiation and the possible effect on their several credits in the long run seem never to occur to M. Siegfried at all, in which he is a true son of the "new era" philosophy of life.

As an economic study of contemporary England the book is dangerously misleading. As a social study of post-war Englishmen, which it is to a much lesser extent, it is often brilliantly suggestive. As another of the innumerable portents of the altered scale of social and moral values in a post-war world, it is worthy of serious attention as coming from the pen of so distinguished a citizen of the nation which claims to lead civilization.

JAMES TRUSLOW ADAMS

An Ambassador's View

I. Americans. By Salvador de Madariaga. Oxford University Press. $2.50.

NOW that the Professor of Spanish Studies at Oxford and former Director of Disarmament in the League of Nations secretariat has been named Ambassador of Spain at Washington, there will be at least a momentary curiosity to know what he thinks of the United States and what policy, if he is permitted to be anything more than a diplomatic rubber stamp, he is likely to pursue. If what he has said in the magazine articles which make up the present volume is an accurate indication, he may be expected to tell us that we are a tolerably decent people, considering what a complex of bad and not so good the world is at the present time, but that we are making a deplorable mistake not to join the League and help develop a world point of view. For his amused and often cynical attitude toward history and politics Professor de Madariaga has, of course, abundant justification, for neither history nor politics need be taken seriously if one does not choose to look at them that way; while as for a world consciousness and a world state, it must be difficult for a devoted member of the League secretariat to get the taste of League ideology out of his mouth even in the sterilized air of Oxford or in the smoke-laden atmosphere of the American Babylon where most of his articles have been published.

At first sight it seems a little unkind for Professor de Madariaga to use "Americans" as a comprehensive label for all those people, heavily in the majority everywhere, who still exhibit nationalistic traits and provincial prejudices, and to whom a world order is still something vague notwithstanding that they have some interest in it. Happily for our feelings, the illustrations of this generalized Americanism are not drawn exclusively from this side of the Atlantic. Peace-loving Britain, for example, keeps a keen eye open for commercial advantage, and boasts of free trade as if that were not, quite as much as protection, an effective means of conducting commercial war. White imperialism appears to Professor de Madariaga to have bedeviled the black races at least as much as it has helped them, and diplomacy and religion make a notoriously ill-matched pair. The rowdyism of parliaments is quite what we should expect since we have always had it, and Fascist rule in Italy gets rid of debate, and hence of thought, by well-known methods of physical persuasion. When, after a great war, the victors settle down to the business of ordering a peace, they are likely to produce such a "jig-saw puzzle" or international "nuisance" as the German-Polish or Franco-German frontiers. On the whole, the political world is a bewildering mess, irrational, fantastic, tragic.

Professor de Madariaga is of course opposed to war, but he cannot be enthusiastic about the Paris anti-war pact so long as there is no international machinery for interpreting and applying it. As for the amiable M. Briand's United States of Europe, that is a chimera, because "no one but God can unite that which God created apart," and a European customs union is not much more practical. The only sure hope of peace, apparently, is in the development of an international-mindedness which in time, through the perfection of the now imperfect League, may work out a world government. Hence the mortal sin of American abstention: "the most republican nation of all is doing more than any other toward maintaining the reign of force in the world." It will be interesting to see whether Professor de Madariaga, from the vantage-point of an ambassador's office, will be able to further a rapprochement with an organization to which successive administrations at Washington have thus far been moved to extend only the assurances of their most distinguished consideration.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Sun-Worship vs. Nudism

Among the Nudists. By Frances and Mason Merrill. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

THIS book is all about the boys and girls—yes, the gaffers and grandams—who strip. Down to the buff they strip, in mixed company, and hurl medicine balls at one another under the pine trees. Our authors blushed, stripped, blushed, hurled medicine balls, and blushed no more. They had become nudists. It all happened in Germany, and later in France. They tell in detail, with formidable statistics, of the inroads of nakedness on the Continent; and they describe in detail—with not too self-conscious photographs—the day-by-day life at a nudists' sanctuary, and just how it feels, from loosening the first shoe lace to the final conquest of all one's puritanical complexes—leaping with wild exhilaration in the sunshine. The movement, indeed, is growing by leaps and bounds. There are already some two million Germans who belong to organizations which either have stripped or are likely to strip at any moment.

To a confirmed sun-worshiper like myself all this is not so novel and exciting as it may be to the gentle reader. Such is the sad penalty of shedding one's clothes; it takes all the tingle out of nakedness. One comes to look upon a human body as one looks at a tree or a horse. Some are worth observing and some are not—and by and large the males stand up better than the females in this entirely casual survey. When one has seen fifty thousand Russians, more or less, devoid of clothes, these cavortings of little groups in Freilichtparken seem a bit cloistered. Furthermore, I shrink from the Teutonic organization of the modern nudists. I like to sun-bathe when the mood seizes me, and I enjoy the adventure of finding a proper spot, with due regard for (a) sun elevation, (b) wind, (c) bugs, (d) spectators. But I realize my good fortune in having more time and space than the average workingman. If he and his family are to sun-bathe at all, they must have the facilities organized. I should like to see air parks all over this great Republic, but I doubt if I should spend much time doing calisthenics in them. I do not need company to give me courage, nor do I see why stripping needs to be a social pursuit. The city of St. Petersburg in Florida recently built a beautiful solarium, but after a couple of trials I deserted it for the wild shingle of the Gulf. Perhaps the trouble was that the city fathers segregated the sexes rigorously, which the Merrills say is a most unfortunate arrangement, if not positively perverse.

Of the pleasures and advantages, physical and mental, of shedding one's clothes, our authors give a just, balanced, and well-documented account, including a rich historical background. To the well-known fact that morality varies inversely with the amount of haberdashery they adduce eloquent testimony. Unsegregated nakedness in large doses is undoubtedly the best medicine conceivable for persons suffering from dirty minds, perverse desires, and snooping complexes. When nothing is left to the imagination, the imagination turns to fresher fields, leaving the sufferer free at last. Stripping is also just about the healthiest thing one can do, provided the proper time and technique are selected.

It ought to be anybody's privilege to strip or not as he or she pleases, so long as he does not leave his clothes on every hickory limb. Specifically and particularly, growing children ought to run naked far more than they do. Bathing costumes, on all but the most public beaches, should be optional. But as the Merrills point out, America is less civilized in this respect—I believe there are one or two other respects as well—than Europe. Any movement for health and morality such as this will be greeted with violent, uproarious opposition from every nationally advertised organization, from the Ku Klux Klan to the Daughters of the American Revolution. Its supporters will be ostracized, branded, and stoned. I should like to see the movement come, fight for its life (not too solemnly either), and win. But I cannot wait for it. Do you see that ledge far up on the flank of yonder mountain? It has an enormous flat stone, sheltered from the wind, the despair of ants, and at just the right angle for morning sun . . .

STUART CHASE

Books in Brief

The Letters of John Keats. Edited by Maurice Buxton Forman. Oxford University Press. Two volumes. $14.

This should be the standard edition of Keats's letters for years to come; indeed, there is little likelihood that much will henceforth be added to our knowledge of what Keats wrote to his friends, his relatives, and the mistress of his dying heart during the last five years he lived. Few authors have left so perfect a record of themselves over an equivalent period. Not only are there nearly six hundred closely printed pages in this beautiful edition; the letters themselves are scarcely to be matched in literature for fulness, zest, variety, and budding truth. The wisdom of Keats, which promised to be great, was ripening rapidly between his twentieth and his twenty-fifth years, so that we get here, along with sentiment and gossip, a number of highly important judgments about life and poetry—two things which, whatever his idolaters say he did, he kept wholesomely apart in his mind. Poetry was his life, but his life was not poetry, and he never grew so silly as to say it was. Mr. Forman, who has the great advantage of being the son of Harry Buxton Forman, has radically improved his father's already excellent edition of 1901. He has added thirteen new letters, two of them, those to Tom and George Keats, containing enthusiastic accounts of a walk taken through the Lake Country in June, 1818; and wherever the originals of previous letters were available he has restored Keats's misspellings, which were many and picturesque. He has also put us in his debt by supplying an exhaustive index and a biographical dictionary of Keats's correspondents. Here then is the most authentic text of two hundred and thirty letters by Keats that research at present can prepare. It is a rich and particularly human exhibit.

The Aristocratic Journey. Being the Outspoken Letters of Mrs. Basil Hall. Edited by Una Pope-Hennessy. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $5.

The letters printed in this volume were written during a fourteen months' sojourn in the United States by the wife of that Basil Hall whose book of travels is well known to all who are interested in early transatlantic comment on our manners and customs. The couple arrived in 1827 armed with introductions to an extraordinary number of notables, and traveled pretty generally all over the United States of that day, from the coast to the Mississippi and from Boston to Savannah. Mrs. Hall was a keen and, on the whole, a friendly observer. A woman accustomed to high society at the Spanish court could hardly be blamed for noting the fact that at one of the best houses in Washington the gentleman on whose arm she leaned as they proceeded to the dancing room spat his tobacco juice ahead of them as they advanced. The fact is that American society a century ago, with exceptions which Mrs. Hall is glad to note, was almost unbelievably crude. Here and there were cultivated families or groups, but the general criticism from foreigners must be taken as indicating a condition and not a conspiracy. If most travelers see only the surface—in our case tobacco juice spattered—that has been the way of travelers, and we may take satisfaction in seeing how far we have gone in improving some things at least in three generations. The book is worth reading, though one may wonder why the publishers felt it needful to charge five dollars for a volume of this size and format.

I Remember. By Opie Read. Richard R. Smith. $2.

The incident of President Cleveland at a meeting of the Chicago Press Club when the Columbian Exposition was on, at which the Egyptian maidens danced with their faces veiled "but all else exposed to the glaring light," is but one of a long list of Opie Read's adventures in love, war, the newspaper business, and with great men. In his autobiography this old-timer who can remember the opening of the Civil War and who now recalls with glee his early literary struggles has written his best novel and described his most fascinating "character." But it is more than an entertaining personal record; it is the history of a period. Read begins by describing his scapegrace grandfather, who was proud of being descended from Benjamin Franklin's brother-in-law, and follows with his own early schooling and farm life, his love for books, his first character description published in a local newspaper when he was about eighteen, his learning the printer's trade (like Benjamin Franklin), his tramps around the country looking for jobs (including his idyl with a gipsy girl), his marriage, and his newspaper career. He describes in turn scores of celebrities, from Mark Twain and Thomas Edison to Floyd Gibbons and Frank Crane, not forgetting Bob Ingersoll and Adelina Patti and Isadora Duncan. The story is rounded out with the incredible coinci-

THE MAN WHO DIED

A Novel by

D. H. LAWRENCE

"The swan song of the greatest spirit of our time" is what J. Middleton Murry called this story which Lawrence brought to its final perfection shortly before his death. It was originally published in an edition of 500 copies by the Black Sun Press in Paris in 1929 under the title The Escaped Cock and is now for the first time available in a trade edition.

Das Amerikanische Theater und Kino. Von Joseph Gregor und René Fülöp-Miller. Leipzig: Amalthea Verlag.

When Julius Bab in 1928 published his "Theater der Gegenwart" he remarked that the American theater could no longer be left out of consideration in a review of the modern stage, and now the first German book on the American theater has appeared. While Dr. Gregor does not esteem the American drama very highly—even Eugene O'Neill appears to him rather naive when measured against European dramatists—he does find that first-class work is being done in New York in several other branches of the theatrical art. Our stage lighting he considers the best in the world, and he admits American stage designers—Geddes, Urban, Simonson—to the ranks of the very greatest. In the field of the dance America also ranks very high; it was an American, Isadora Duncan, who gave the first impulse to the modern revival in this field. In our Negro population, our Chinatowns, and our Jewish theaters American dramatists have at hand interesting and exotic inspiration, a substitute for the folk-plays of the European civilizations. Finally Dr. Gregor holds that the many college playshops and other experimental theaters are a hopeful sign, quite the opposite of the usual European idea of American commercialism.

Vale and Other Poems. By Æ. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

In these poems, intended it seems in farewell, we find the Irish mystic treating the subject of death with a renewed concreteness, stripped as it were of a few of the mystic veils. And how would a mind like Æ's, believing, as it always has, in the essential happiness of life, once it is understood in vision, come upon the subject of death? Must not such a mind of necessity find in death the consummation of happiness?

> Death brings us to a so transfigured past
> Within the Everliving, and we can take
> From all that is whatever is our own
> Life has been justified.

Yes, here is this happiness for the poet; and there is in these latest poems no lack of the mystic certainty of peace and rightness, nor on the other hand any lack of the intensity of human emotion carefully felt out. These poems are human documents of the mind which wishes to understand itself even to the very end.

> When this shadow show shall be over, the masks we wore >   thrown away—
> The monstrous masks that veiled us, satyr, demon, and >   faun,
> And be lovely, starry, and ancient with you as we were >   in the dawn.

Poetry and the Criticism of Life. By H. W. Garrod. Harvard University Press. $2.

These are the lectures given last year by the Charles Eliot Norton Professor of Poetry at Harvard. Mr. Garrod was previously professor of poetry at Oxford, and it would seem that his doctrine had suffered some dilution by crossing the Atlantic. For his earlier books made a good case for the moral interpretation of poetry; but this one is merely didactic, as if it had been composed for children. Not that Mr. Garrod, who is a very competent critic, has failed to say a number of agreeable things about Matthew Arnold, Emerson, Clough, and "The Testament of Beauty"; but the volume as it stands is utterly lacking in fresh ideas.

Drama

Happy, Happy, Happy Pair

THE lobby of Erlanger's Theater the other night was buzzing at ten o'clock with one of the most blissful multitudes it has been my fortune to see. There could be no doubt that these people were pleased, and pleased so deeply that the last thing to occur to them would have been the necessity of expressing their pleasure. It was already expressed—in countenances that for a moment had lost all care, in an eager, good-natured exchange of cigarettes, in attitudes which spoke of a serene certainty that what was to follow this intermission would be quite as nice as what had preceded it. So far as I could tell there was little conversation about what had just been seen and heard. That too was unnecessary, in the same way that it is unnecessary to talk very long, if at all, about the weather on those evenings when it is obviously and pervasively fine. These people simply beamed.

The neighborhood seemed to know how much happiness was here, for beggars appeared as if by magic on the wide walk outside the doors, and, peering in, entered to do their business. A hunchback with pencils, a swarthy Neapolitan with a bandaged elbow, a blind man with his wife, women with cups for pennies moved among the throng; and not for nothing. Two little Negro boys clogged and clicked in the street till they thought they heard a policeman coming. No policeman came, and they returned to clog and click. Their alarm, I thought, had been unnecessary. Even an officer of the law would have caught the infection that raged within.

The occasion was a revival of "The Mikado" by the Civic Light Opera Company, which during the next month or so will revive in addition "The Gondoliers," "Pinafore," and "Patience." Gilbert and Sullivan, in other words, are here again. It is a familiar enough occasion, yet we should never grow tired of celebrating it—though how to celebrate it in a dramatic article is more than I seem to know. All I know is that this pair is not only happy in itself but the cause of happiness in other men. The music of Sullivan must make anybody feel good in every portion of his person, mind or body. The words of Gilbert, and his antics and his situations, must, by their very perfection of malice if by nothing else, cleanse any soul of malice. There is nothing in the world to fear after one has seen these operas. All has been seen; all has been heard; one mind has contained it all—comfortably, calmly, and with condescension—and has given it forth in rhyme.

The present performances do not promise to be as generally good as those of Winthrop Ames, but judging by "The Mikado" they will be good enough, and in several particulars they will be very good indeed. William Danforth, the best of all Mikados, is in the company; Frank Moulan clowns brightly—sometimes too much so—as the Lord High Executioner; Herbert Watrous and William Gordon make a great, grave pair as Pooh-Bah and Pish-Tush; and Hizi Koyke, a newcomer to the role, adds new charms to the part of Yum Yum. That she is Japanese does not altogether explain her success, or explain it at all, since nothing else about "The Mikado" is Japanese. But her knowledge of how to wear the prescribed clothes may in small part explain her exquisite grace.

Lew Leslie's new Negro review, "Rhapsody in Black" (Sam H. Harris Theater), must be set down as a pathetic failure to rise above the level of Negro reviews thus far. As if that had been low! The high art of this medley was palpably a bore, as art that is higher than it need be always is.

Germany's Bid for Independence

By JOHN ELLIOTT

Berlin, April 13

WHEN Germany arranged the plan of a customs union with Austria, she proclaimed to the world a declaration of independence. For the first time since the war the Germans had taken the diplomatic offensive. The French were at first dumfounded with astonishment and then they roared with rage. Indignation in Paris rose to the fever-point when shortly afterwards it was announced in London that Chancellor Heinrich Brüning and Foreign Minister Julius Curtius had been invited to Chequers by Ramsay MacDonald. Of course, this visit had been arranged long before anything was known abroad about the Austro-German agreement, but the British invitation was rightly interpreted in the French capital as a public admission by Downing Street that in the future the Germans must be consulted on equal terms with the other Powers when the shaping of Europe's future was considered.

This was most unpalatable to the French. The Quai d'Orsay, of course, did not question the British government's right to invite the Germans, but it felt that London was obligated to explain its action. French and English statesmen have frequently in the course of the last twelve years been closeted in confidential conversations, but except for the periodical meetings at Geneva the leaders of Germany and Britain have never come together.

But if the French were annoyed with their English friends at what they somewhat unreasonably considered an act of bad faith, they were positively infuriated by the action of the Germans in arranging their trade accord with the Austrians without so much as a by-your-leave. Briand, it must be admitted, had cause to be offended. The lavish asseverations by the German officials and their press that the Austro-German treaty was only a first instalment of the Pan-Europa scheme were disingenuous, to say the least. If that were so, Briand as the chief apostle of this plan had surely the right to expect to be informed of what Berlin and Vienna had in mind.

Yet it had never occurred to the French to keep the Germans au courant of their negotiations with the Italians for a naval agreement, although Germany is vitally interested in everything concerning the great disarmament conference that is to be held next year. France has not yet become accustomed to the idea of seriously treating its neighbor across the Rhine as its diplomatic equal. The most irritating aspect of the Teutonic trade pact to the French was not that it marked a notable advance toward Anschluss, although that was bad enough, but that it revealed a display of independence on the part of the Germans which that defeated people had not shown since the end of the war. To France it came as a disquieting omen. She scented a challenge to her hegemony on the European continent which she has successfully maintained since 1919.

The proposed customs union between Germany and Austria challenges the existing order of things in Europe. Just as the old German Zollverein prepared the way for Bismarck's creation of the German Reich, so it is probable that the tearing down of tariff barriers between the two Teutonic countries will ultimately lead to their political amalgamation. And that is the very thing that the French government has worked and intrigued against since the day Clemenceau observed at the peace conference that there were twenty million Germans too many in the world.

The economic union between Germany and Austria, if consummated, spells Germanic leadership in Central Europe. Such a development will end forever the dream of a Danubian confederation which, under French inspiration, was to form one big economic area of all the Succession States along the Danube. The Austrians frustrated that project by preferring to throw their lot in with their fellow-Germans to the north. That does not mean that a Germanic economic bloc is likely to be realized in the near future. For one thing, nationalism in Prague is still too rampant, and many years will probably pass before Czecho-Slovakia realizes that it is to its interest to form an economic entente with the Germans who bound its territory on three sides.

With his usual quiet firmness Chancellor Brüning has told the world that Germany and Austria are determined to go through to the end with their pact. He is willing to permit the League of Nations to scrutinize the legality of the proposed customs union, but he will not tolerate any examination of its political bearings by outsiders. Dr. Brüning spoke with the finality of an American Secretary of State forbidding Europe to meddle in the affairs of Latin America. The German Chancellor firmly repudiates the "policy of adventure" that the Nationalists urge upon him. But he may be counted upon to defend to the limit what he considers the just rights of his country. And for all his quietness and unassuming air, Germany, under his leadership, will pursue a more energetic and aggressive policy than it did or could under the late Gustav Stresemann.

When that famous statesman was at the helm in the Wilhelmstrasse, he acted on the principle that the Treaty of Versailles was being revised by the force of events. He believed that the less openly said about "revision" by German politicians, the more rapid would be the process of altering the treaty. His policy was based on the conviction that by standing for the maintenance of peace and for European co-operation, Germany could gain the good-will of the nations, and so gradually improve its international status. Stresemann kept ever before him one goal. He aspired to be to Germany what Thiers was to France and to win the honorable title of "Liberator of the Territory." He worked with the object of bringing about the end of the Allied occupation of the Rhineland before his death. Ever an incurable optimist, Stresemann expected more immediate and bigger concessions from the French in return for his "Locarno policy" than he could possibly get. Consequently he suffered many disappointments and laid himself open to the reproach from his Nationalist foes that his Locarno policy was one of "give" but never "take" by Germany.

The New Demand

TWO years ago the American public was deep in a drugged slumber. Nothing, it seemed, could arouse the people from their stupor, complacency—call it what you will.

But the economic earthquake and the upspringing of new spiritual forces throughout the world have roused a host of the lethargic into a state of awareness.

All these people, rudely but necessarily awakened, are evidencing a taste for facts unparalleled in the present century. They are becoming more and more critical of unsupported statements, of the propaganda which once they swallowed without a twinge. Thousands of them are turning to The Nation.

That constitutes a challenge to this paper which is bringing into play its finest powers. A splendid series on Russia is now in its third week. Other serial and single features of the most penetrating and enlightening order will follow on each other's heels throughout 1931 . . . . The situation has radically changed since Stresemann's day. Germany is no longer content to play a mere passive role in the European drama. The evacuation of the Rhineland is now an accomplished fact. As Foreign Minister Curtius predicted during the celebrations in the Rhineland last summer, German foreign policy therewith began a new chapter. The withdrawal of the Allied troops not only gave the Wilhelmstrasse a freedom of action it had not previously enjoyed; it lifted a load that seemed to be weighing down the German people. A vigorous breath of nationalist feeling swept over the land, finding expression in the phenomenal rise in the fascist poll in the September elections.

Whatever may be the future of Hitlerism, it has left its mark on the course of events. Just as Trotzky and the left-wing movement in Russia, despite their proscription, saw their ideas taken over by the victorious Stalin, so National Socialism, though it may perhaps have passed its heyday, nevertheless has influenced to a very notable degree the development not only of German policy, but of European diplomacy. Heinrich Brüning, not Adolf Hitler, is the beneficiary of the "Nazi" wave. But for the menace of German fascism it is exceedingly unlikely that the League Council would have registered in so sharp a manner its disapproval of the treatment of the German minority in Upper Silesia by the Poles. But for the Hitler movement it is highly improbable that the Austro-German customs union would have seen the light of day at the present time. Holding power, as he does, by a thread, Brüning realized the necessity of obtaining a diplomatic success that would satisfy the demands of his right-wing followers and the cry in the country for a more active foreign policy. For a time the German government toyed with the idea of requesting a revision of the Young Plan. But the cold douche that was thrown from London on the suggestions to that effect made by the German Cabinet spokesman at President von Hindenburg's New Year's reception convinced the government that the time was not yet propitious for a demarche in the "tribute" question, and a diplomatic triumph was sought for in the Austrian agreement.

It is, however, only a matter of time before the Brüning Government will reopen the reparations issue. Equality, in German eyes, implies equality of war burdens among all the former belligerents. The rise in the value of gold has made the obligations of the Young Plan resting upon this country far more onerous than the experts foresaw when they drafted their scheme at Paris in the spring of 1929. From the time that he took office a year ago the Chancellor has been preparing for the reconsideration of the reparations question which every responsible leader in this country has recognized to be inevitable. The reform of the national finances which Brüning has made his principal care was undertaken in knowledge of the fact that it was the precarious state of the German treasury and its resultant dependence on foreign credits that compelled Germany to emerge second best from the duel with the Allies at Paris two years ago. Never again must that mistake be made, the Chancellor has stated over and over again. When the hour comes for the next revision of the reparations problem, Germany, if Brüning has his way, will enter the conference hall with her budget in order and with the ability to negotiate as an equal with the representatives of the creditor nations.

The test of French willingness to meet the Germans halfway will of course be furnished by the general disarmament conference. Germany is determined, if the Allies do not fulfil their pledge given at Paris in 1919 that her enforced disarmament was to be but the prelude to general disarmament, to recover her liberty to determine for herself the size of her fighting forces. The debate in the Reichstag on the Reichswehr estimates was an impressive demonstration that all parties in the country with the exception of the Communists stand behind the demand of General Gröner, the Minister of Defense, that Germany is entitled to as much security as her neighbors.

The invitation of Brüning and Curtius to visit Chequers, one of MacDonald's famous "gestures," is England's recognition of the fact that no disarmament treaty can accomplish its object unless Germany is an equal and voluntary partner to it. Will France also recognize this truth? On the answer to this question depends the future of the Locarno policy and of the Franco-German Verständigung which Stresemann and Briand have so honorably striven to establish. An obstinate insistence by the French that Europe must be organized upon the basis of French hegemony instead of upon the footing of friendly and equal co-operation between France and Germany will be followed at no long time by the abandonment of the Stresemann course by Berlin. In that event, Germany will probably be thrown into the arms of Fascist Italy, which is likewise profoundly dissatisfied and crying out for "parity" with France.

THE NATION, No. 20 Vesey Street, New York City, Cable Address: NATION, New York. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising, Miss Gertrude M. Cross, 23 Brunswick Square, London, W. C. 1, England.

WE ARE WITNESSING a new and a most interesting division of the Supreme Court of the United States. This has just been clearly illustrated by its vote of five to four that the Indiana law imposing a graduated scale of license fees according to the number of chain stores within the State is constitutional. Five to four votes have been common enough in the past, but usually the liberals on the court have been in the minority. This time the majority comprised the Chief Justice and Justices Roberts, Brandeis, Holmes, and Stone. The conservatives and reactionaries—Justices Sutherland, Van Devanter, McReynolds, and Butler—formed the minority. There is every indication, we are glad to say, that we shall see more and more divisions of this kind. Beyond question the appointment of Mr. Roberts marks a great gain for liberalism, and Mr. Hughes's occasionally liberal votes are in themselves encouraging. The Indiana decision is of great importance. Every State now has it within its power to limit definitely the number of stores which any company may open within its borders. There are similar cases pending for North Carolina and Mississippi and there is no doubt that legislation of this kind will now be passed in those Southern and Southwestern States which have not yet acted. The majority of the court held that "the fact that a statute discriminates in favor of a certain class does not make it arbitrary, if the discrimination is founded upon a reasonable distinction."

FOR SHEER EFFRONTERY and unsurpassable impudence commend us to the speech of Congressman Tilson of Connecticut at White Plains recently. Appearing before the Women's Republican Club, he declared that Mr. Hoover's "steady hand at the helm kept the recent [sic] depression from being as bad as other depressions, and Mr. Hoover's guidance can be counted the great factor in saving this country from the serious economic conditions found in other parts of the world." Doubtless he was moved to this bit of oratory by the decorations of the room in which he spoke: "Two large signs were displayed depicting a golden sun emerging from pink and blue clouds. On the sun appeared the word 'Prosperity,' and on the clouds were the words 'Happy Days Are Here Again.'" How delighted our 7,000,000 of unemployed must be by the reports of this meeting! But somehow the harmony chorus isn't quite so complete as it ought to be. We commend to Mr. Tilson and the Westchester County women the following statement made the next day by Dean Wallace B. Donham of the Harvard School of Business Administration:

> America faces the dole system unless the federal government between now and next winter starts work on a large scale. . . . Capitalism is on trial. . . . Our present situation both here and in all the great industrial nations of the world is a major breakdown of capitalism.

Even the American Legion is getting out of hand. Its Executive Committee demands an immediate non-political conference to seek a solution for the crisis, and declares that there are 750,000 veterans still without work in Mr. Tilson's "recent" depression.

TWO MILLION ACRES more of winter wheat for 1931 than for 1930 in eleven countries, with complete returns from Russia not available, is the news with which the Department of Agriculture speeded on their way the American delegates to the wheat parley at London. What with uncertainty about the Russian crop and its probable disposition, and equal uncertainty about the Federal Farm Board policy in disposing of its storage wheat, Russia and the United States easily hold the center of the stage at the London conference, but even without those two countries the estimated surplus of 704,000,000 bushels in Canada, Argentina, and Australia, according to data which the conference appears to be using, nearly equals the estimated importers' requirements of 784,000,000 bushels for the year ending next August, some 584,000,000 bushels of which are reported to have been already shipped, while the United States is counted upon to show a surplus of 240,000,000 bushels and Russia of 120,000,000 bushels. The London delegates obviously have a hard job before them. Few people seriously believe that any international agreement can bring about a limitation of production, and neither Great Britain nor Russia looks with favor upon any kind of quota scheme that would restrict exportation. There is left the alternative of an international marketing organization with its hope of price stabilization, but that again seems hardly practical unless both the United States and Russia join and the great impediment of tariff barriers is removed. On the whole, the world seems likely to continue to see for some time yet the anomaly of vast surpluses of wheat while millions of men and women go hungry.

WHAT'S this? A branch of the American Legion in New York City declaring that > . . . our fallen comrades who threw to us the torch did not intend it to be a perpetual pillar of hate to be transmitted to children even to the third and fourth generations . . . therefore be it

> Resolved, By the Lexington Post that we urge either new treaties or the revision of old treaties so that love and friendship may supplant envy and hate in the minds of generations in Europe yet unborn and insure that our children's children may never be drawn into the horrors of another war.

This actually happened, and at a dinner given to former German and Austrian soldiers (ex-Huns) who are now either American citizens or about to become such, on which occasion a former German officer was an honored guest. Nothing that has come from the Legion seems to us finer and wiser than this. It was precisely the position taken by The Nation in its first issue after the publication of the Versailles treaty in May, 1919—for which it was, of course, roundly abused and denounced by almost everybody.

WHY IS AMERICA the most lawless of countries? The more we ask ourselves this question, the more we are compelled to answer that it is because of the persistent and consistent violation of the laws and the Constitution of the United States by the officials sworn to uphold them. We are moved to this comment just now because of a disgraceful occurrence in New York City on May 15. Shortly before noon a perfectly orderly meeting was held in Battery Park to protest against the deportation of a Chinese student by the United States government. What happened is thus laconically described by the New York Times:

> A police emergency truck rolled into the lower end of Battery Park shortly before noon yesterday. Two minutes later the park was filled with screaming women and men fleeing from the night sticks of fifteen policemen, and the "demonstration" . . . was over.

A dozen or more Communists, the Times adds, left the park with bruised and bleeding heads, and so did a newspaper photographer who did not have time to place his police card in his hat and had his camera smashed, besides being arrested on a charge of disorderly conduct. In this case the lawbreakers were plainly the police. The use of night sticks on this occasion was inexcusable. Any decent responsible policeman would have shooed away the crowd—if he had the right to shoo it—without having to lift a finger. There was not the slightest jeopardizing of order. It was simply an unqualifiedly brutal and lawless attack by men in uniform. This is the best way that we know of to make anarchists and Communists, and to inculcate disloyalty to the United States and its institutions.

IT IS WELCOME NEWS that the faculties of Cornell and Ohio State universities have recommended to their respective boards of trustees that compulsory military training among their students be abolished. Ohio State, with 3,380 men undergoing compulsory training, was last fall credited with having the largest R. O. T. C. unit in the country, while Cornell's unit was fifth in size. During the fiscal year 1929-30 the War Department spent $208,326.66 to train the Ohio State students, of which amount $141,733.04 went to pay the fifty-two army instructors detailed to the school by the department. Cornell's military bill in the same period amounted to $157,838.12. In both cases the action of the faculties followed strong protests against compulsory training by the students themselves. Public opinion also is credited with having forced the War Department to abandon its plans for the night air maneuvers over New York City which had been scheduled for May 22. The daytime maneuvers over various cities are being held as planned, but even these are being subjected to vigorous criticism from many organizations that do not ordinarily concern themselves with pacifism or militarism. It would be well for the War Policies Commission sitting in Washington to consider this increasing sentiment against militarism before it reaches any final decision on the war program it is fashioning.

FAIR WARNING that there may be trouble in Haiti if the United States delays much longer fulfilment of its promise to Haitianize the domestic government services is sounded in a letter to President Hoover signed by seven members of the national board of the American Civil Liberties Union. The letter also strongly urges that the withdrawal of the marines be expedited. According to the signers, the recommendation of the Hoover Commission that there be a gradual withdrawal of all Americans, including both civil and military members of the occupationary force, is not being carried out. They declare that unless this program is pressed, they fear "there may again be outbursts of violent protests against the American occupation. Advices from Haiti are none too reassuring that the Haitian people will indefinitely tolerate an unchanged situation." Mr. Hoover won sincere applause from his countrymen when he accepted the recommendations of his Haitian commission. His action was interpreted by many as a definite turning-point in the imperialistic policy Washington had been pursuing in the Caribbean area. The applause may have been premature, however. Unless Mr. Hoover acts at once, his delay may lead to further serious difficulties in Haiti.

THE QUESTION OF SILVER, increasingly discussed in a number of countries during the past few months, seems likely to be taken up in the near future by an international conference, if the countries particularly interested can agree upon how the conference shall be called. China, which has a silver instead of a gold basis for its currency, appears to be the logical country to ask for a conference, since the fall in the price of silver from over sixty cents per ounce to less than thirty cents has reduced by more than 50 per cent the ability of China to buy goods abroad. The effect upon the United States is seen in an abrupt falling off of trade with China by about one-half in the past eighteen months; in March the decline was 18 per cent compared with February. The fall in the price of silver has been ascribed largely to the dumping of silver bullion by the government of India in pursuit of its policy of putting Indian currency on a gold basis, but overproduction in this country and Mexico compared with world demand, the lowering of production costs, and the general slump in world business have been contributing causes. Financial opinion would almost certainly oppose any attempt by a conference to bring about bimetallism anywhere, but something might be done to secure agreements limiting production, restraining dumping, and providing for the gradual disposition of accumulated stocks of bullion and coin.

LUIS CABRERA, one of the leading lawyers of Mexico and formerly minister of finance in the Carranza Government, was arrested on the street in Mexico City by the military authorities on May 9, was held incomunicado during the night, and in the early morning was deported by airplane to Guatemala, despite legal proceedings instituted by his family immediately on receiving news of his arrest. Two days after the arrest the government gave out word that Señor Cabrera was the leader of a plot to overthrow the government of Ortiz Rubio and attempt the life of the President himself, and that he had been allowed to leave for Guatemala at his own request. Both statements are flatly denied by the friends of Señor Cabrera, and no evidence of the charges has been adduced. A far more plausible explanation of the action of the government (apparently wholly illegal) may be found in its profound irritation at the outspoken criticism of the present regime made by Señor Cabrera in an article published in Excelsior on November 10 last and reprinted in The Nation of December 31 under the title The Balance Sheet of the Revolution. In a lecture delivered on January 30 at the National Library Señor Cabrera, who during recent years has withdrawn entirely from active participation in politics, amplified his charge that the present government and its immediate predecessors have almost wholly failed to live up to the principles of the revolution in its three chief points, namely, political reform, redistribution of lands, and emancipation of labor. No government can make satisfactory answer to such criticism by illegal deportation of a leading citizen on unproved charges, and every friend of liberty in Mexico will be on the alert to learn the outcome of this case.

THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT'S decision to abandon further airship construction is altogether commendable. A nation as hard up as England has no excuse for wasting millions in experimenting with this type of aircraft, and Mr. MacDonald is the more ready to suspend operations because England will benefit by the experiments that will be carried on in the United States and Germany. In the latter country the Zeppelins have been more successful than elsewhere, but the question remains whether that is not largely due to the genius of certain of the men connected with the enterprise from the beginning, and latterly to Dr. Eckener, who has, however, himself had some extraordinarily fortunate escapes. Mr. MacDonald's further reason is that almost all his experts were killed in the disaster to the R-101. With due regard to their gallantry it cannot be affirmed that the English dirigible experts have ever ranked with those on the Continent. We frankly wish that our own government would cease to squander large sums upon these air monsters, whose value in war time is even more disputable than in peace time, which cannot be used in winter storms, and which may be put out of the reckoning at any time by further developments of the heavier-than-air machine. Of the latter an example is the recent introduction by the Junkers of the first Diesel airplane motor and its adoption for experimental purposes by the German Lufthansa.

DAVID BELASCO, who died on May 14, was described in the fulsome praise of the dead which is always voiced by newspapers as one who marked the end of an era. For more than fifty years he lived, breathed, and had his being in the life of the stage. When he began to interest himself in all aspects of the production of plays, the theater in the United States was at a distressingly low ebb. Painted back drops that varied little from scene to scene and pasteboard leaves gummed on to a foundation of gauze constituted the "scenery." The properties were acceptable as they were durable and not too heavy to lift easily. Mr. Belasco descended upon this make-believe in a veritable storm of realism. Where the set called for a stairway, he built one that the actors could walk up and down; where furnishings of a certain period were prescribed, the audience could be sure that that period and only that was represented before their eyes. Not only was every article on the stage of the most relentless authenticity, but off stage the same care and truthfulness prevailed. Did the actors exit into a garden? Then into a garden they exited, with box trees and potted plants to heighten the illusion. It remains only to say that once Mr. Belasco had firmly established his genius at realism, the stage began deserting realism as rapidly as possible. Not to revert to pasteboard leaves, but to renounce leaves altogether. The modern idea of stagecraft, which believes that the illusion is created in the mind of the spectator and not in his eye, was foreign to David Belasco. His era was useful and instructive; but its passing was inevitable.

PUBLIC DINNERS are frequently a bore. Public testimonial dinners at which some luckless individual hears himself the recipient of flowery encomiums and then makes a feeble effort to reply are more often a bore than not. But on May 14 in New York City there was held a testimonial dinner that from start to finish was nothing less than a memorable, exciting, and altogether moving occasion. This was the dinner given in honor of James Weldon Johnson on his retirement from his work as secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. It was a far cry from a welfare dinner attended by both races about thirty years ago, when the white participants were bitterly lampooned in the press for having publicly dined with Negroes, to the dinner given for Mr. Johnson. At the latter there were hundreds of guests, both white and colored; the dinner was held at one of the largest of the New York hotels; the most obvious spirit of good-will prevailed. More than that, the program, made up of agreeably short speeches by various associates and admirers of Mr. Johnson through his long life as song-writer, poet, diplomat, and public man, was varied and interesting throughout. And the reply of the guest of honor was long, composed, free of false modesty, admirably phrased, and evidenced sufficient emotional strain without reducing its author to speechless embarrassment. There are few men in the country of whatever color who could have called forth such whole-hearted tributes from persons so enlightened; there are few who could have responded to these tributes with such distinction.

An Army of Four Million Men

THE head of the army, General Douglas MacArthur, Chief of Staff, appeared on May 13 before the War Policies Commission and revealed the War Department's plan for drafting the man power and material resources of the nation on the outbreak of war. It calls for the immediate mobilization of 4,000,000 men, and for the seizure of all federal, State, county, and municipal buildings to house and shelter troops in place of the huge cantonments of the last war. Purchases of the 4,000 essential items (there are 700,000 on the War Department's shopping list) are to be allocated in advance—now—and not to be regulated by competitive bidding, but the contract is to be so drawn as to limit profiteering and "to deal effectively with the over-acquisitive [!] contractor." None the less, there is to be set up "an agency to determine prices for general government buying," so that "the government will not necessarily upset economic and industrial conditions." "Price-control efforts," we further learn, "will be directed gradually, and in general recognition of their necessity and reasonableness."

In other words, the whole pretense that there will be conscription of wealth as well as of men is frankly abandoned. We are again to tear the conscripted man, willing or unwilling, from his home and deprive him as ruthlessly as we please of his right to life, but we are again to treat our great capitalists with courtesy and all consideration. So much for the American Legion's demand since 1922 that "dollars as well as men be drafted" in the event of war. General MacArthur thus not only scorned the Legion, but he went out of his way to oppose Bernard M. Baruch's plan for "price-freezing" at the outset of war, under which prices would be stabilized by federal law at a level existing on a designated "normal date." There is nothing in General MacArthur's suggestions which really offers sound opposition to the profiteering that disgraced our last war. Who would run his "agency to determine prices for general government buying"? The army? Who will be in the army then? The day after war is declared the leading industrialists will be in it. For at previous hearings it has been openly admitted that the War Department has already commissioned no less than 14,000 industrialists throughout the country as "contact men." This is fully half, if not more than half, of the entire number of reserve officers in the German army at the outbreak of the war in 1914. Is there the slightest prospect that these men will not dominate any general purchasing agency? Or that they will even be satisfied with the opinion of the present National Commander of the American Legion that a return of 7 per cent on property during the next war will be "about right"?

As for the rest of the plan, never, so far as we are aware, even in Germany in the palmiest days of its militarism, did any generals advocate the immediate military seizure of all public buildings to house troops. It is quite characteristic of the extreme militarist mind that it brushes aside all consideration of the civil government when war begins—it was this contempt of the Ludendorffs and Tirpitzes for the German civil authority and their defiance of it which as much as anything else brought about the German disaster. What would become of all our federal, State, county, and municipal governments if the military should occupy their buildings on the outbreak of war and throw them into the street? And how in heaven's name could one drill and equip four millions of men in the corridors of our federal courts or post offices or customs houses? If for no other reason, the whole MacArthur plan ought to be thrown out because of this very stupidity.

But the militarists' self-revelation does not stop there. General MacArthur and the War Department have now placed themselves squarely in the position occupied by the worst of the European militarists of 1914—they would refuse exemption from military service to anybody. No Quakers, no clergymen, no men who have given their lives to pacifism, nobody is to be exempted; all are to be dragooned into the ranks to kill or be killed. The conscience of the individual is now entirely to be violated by the Moloch of the state. What punishments our militarists will now decree for those who next dare to keep their souls stainless does not appear—death, we suppose, as was the original proposal of the officers of the Judge Advocate General's department in 1917.

As for the problems of the mobilization of civilian labor, there General MacArthur walks as lightly as he does in treating of capital. "Conscription of labor would be so resented by the workers affected that they would not lend their best efforts to the production of needed supplies." How cowardly! How unworthy of a true patriotic militarist! If conscripted men in the ranks are to have their wishes disregarded, if they are to be compelled to serve by use of torture, the rifle-butt, the solitary cell, as in 1917-19, why regard the wishes of the munition-maker? Let force be applied to him as well. Let him, too, be spread-eagled to cell doors, manacled and chained, hurled into lightless dungeons. Why permit the all-conquering state to be defied by threats of factory slacking, of unpatriotic "soldiering on the job"?

As to demobilization, General MacArthur urges a commission to deal with that problem from the start so as to be ready when the war ends. Ready for what? Victory or defeat? Ready when? Who can say? The General is careful to declare that "this plan does not envisage any particular enemy." No, indeed. How could it? There is not a country in the world today that would contemplate suicide by attacking the United States. There is not one which will ever have reason to war upon us unless we war upon it—not a single one of our foreign wars was other than of our own seeking. As for the waste of war, the General is not interested. So far as reported, he makes no provision for adequate pay or for the bonuses, insurance, or pensions that invariably cost more than the war itself.

And what hypocrites General MacArthur makes of his Commander-in-Chief, the President of the United States, and of each and every one of us! For we are the ones who declare that we won the war to end war; that we originated, signed, and ratified the pact to outlaw war, and pledged our holy word, our sacred honor, to abide by the Kellogg Pact and never again to war.

Credit or Planning

THE address which Dr. Oliver M. W. Sprague, professor of banking at Harvard and economic adviser to the Bank of England, delivered before the English-speaking Union at London on May 12 offered cold comfort for those who imagine that the business depression has reached its lowest point and that a change for the better is close at hand. In the United States, which he had just been visiting, Dr. Sprague found the depression "more acute, if not chronic," while in the world at large two schools of doctors were seen prescribing remedies for the disease. One school insists that price declines would cease, investment revive, and workers find work if the central banks, such as the Federal Reserve, the Bank of England, and the Bank of France, would unite in flooding the world markets with credit and currency. The other school sees recovery only through the establishment of "a better equilibrium of prices and a better distribution of labor and capital."

It is surprising to find Dr. Sprague declaring that the authorities of the central banks are practically agreed in espousing the theory of economic equilibrium rather than that of cheap money, when the latter theory has for a long time been the one which the Federal Reserve Bank of New York has applied on an unprecedented scale. Long before the stock-market crash of October, 1929, the New York bank began pouring out credit and currency through heavy purchases of government bonds, and since the crash it has continued to swell the stream by lowering its discount rate and its rates on acceptances. A climax appeared to have been reached when, on May 7, it cut the discount rate from 2 to 1½ per cent, the lowest rate of any central bank in the world, and on May 13, for the fourth time in three weeks, reduced the acceptance rate, the rate for fifteen-day bills being fixed at 1 per cent and for five and six months' bills at 1¼ per cent. Meantime the volume of Federal Reserve notes outstanding increased from $1,441,715,000 on March 25 to $1,540,783,000 on May 6, notwithstanding a decline n brokers' loans in the same period from $1,908,000,000 to $1,699,000,000.

The Bank of England, too, seems to have gone over o the cheap-money theory. In October, 1929, its discount rate stood at 6½ per cent. Since that time the rate has been reduced eight times, the latest cut from 3 to 2½ per cent on May 14 bringing the rate to within ½ of 1 per cent of the lowest point ever reached in the history of the bank.

If ever cheap money could bring about an economic evival, it should have done so during the past eighteen months. The admitted object of the Federal Reserve Bank as been to encourage investment in bonds, stimulate commercial borrowing, force money out of New York into parts f the country where rates were higher, and stop the influx f gold from abroad. On no important scale have these xpectations been realized. The response of the bond market, utside of government bonds, has been slight. Domestic bond nancing has been confined mainly to State or municipal overnments and public utilities, the latter less affected than ther businesses by the depression; foreign financing has been hecked by depression abroad, by political instability in arious countries, and by sharp declines here in foreign-bond prices. Total capital flotations fell off more than $1,000,000,000 in the first four months of the present year compared with the corresponding period of 1930, and business failures have remained at a high level.

Is economic equilibrium, then, hovering in the offing? Dr. Sprague was not very encouraging on that point. "There seems to be," he told his hearers, "a growing unwillingness or incapacity in an individualist society to adjust itself to a changing economic condition, whereas we need to be more elastic than ever before." Something might be accomplished, he remarked, through a dictatorship, and there was also "the old-fashioned way of free play for economic forces, which will bring pressure upon everybody and enforce adjustments despite all the suffering involved." Unless, however, there is "sufficient foresight, imagination, and give-and-take" to plan and carry through the changes that must take place if economic forces are to be left to themselves, there is nothing in store for the Western world, Dr. Sprague bluntly declared, except "a slow decline" before the competition of the Russian economic regime.

Rational planning or inescapable decay, in other words, are the alternatives between which world capitalism must choose. A vast deal has been said about the superior wisdom of captains of industry and the conserving and stabilizing power wielded by the great banks, but unless the princes of the ancient house of capital show more intelligence and energy than they have displayed thus far in the business crisis, they and their system may before long be wiped out. The Western world awaits the leaders who can show whether economic planning without dictatorship can be managed, and to what ends the planning shall be directed.

Briand's Defeat

ARISTIDE BRIAND deserves better treatment at the hands of his countrymen than that accorded him by the National Assembly of France. His foreign policy, though by no means perfect, has none the less been a distinct contribution to the cause of peace in Europe. But France owes even more to this wisest of its post-war statesmen; without him in the Foreign Office the country might upon more than one occasion in the past few years have been pushed dangerously close to war by its headstrong and irresponsible jingoists. Yet the National Assembly refused to honor him by elevating him to the presidency. There he might still have guided French foreign policy, for the power of the French President in this respect has grown of late years; there he could still have worked for peace. Instead, the Parliament turned to a conservative, to Paul Doumer, president of the Senate, when it sought a successor to Gaston Doumergue.

Briand's defeat may not affect France alone; it may hold the gravest portent for all of Europe. In electing M. Doumer the Parliament did more than turn to the right; by its action it cast a shadow upon the foreign policy of Briand. Perhaps the National Assembly did not intend to have its rejection of Briand accepted as notice that France had done with his policy of moderation and reconciliation. Indeed, only five days earlier the Chamber of Deputies, by a vote of nearly nine to one, had upheld the Foreign Minister against the critics of his pan-European program. Perhaps Parliament's ancient fear of the strong man, or the rumored personal animosity entertained toward him by many individual senators and deputies, was responsible for his defeat, to which the support of him by the Socialists also contributed. Yet, whatever its motive, the Parliament has by its vote undeniably hurt Briand's prestige. The extravagant but ill-timed tribute paid him a day or two later at Geneva by Foreign Minister Henderson cannot disguise this fact.

It is to be hoped that Briand will carry on in his present position, and that he will still be able to speak with that convincing authority which has carried him—and France—through many difficult situations in the past decade. He has played an important part in the diplomatic exchanges and maneuvers connected with the coming disarmament conference, the naval and other questions between France and Italy, the task of effecting a genuine reconciliation between France and Germany, the Austro-German customs union, the plan for a United States of Europe. Some of these depend upon his finesse for their success—the reference of the Austro-German customs union to the Council of the League and to The Hague is largely his work. It would be highly regrettable if France, growing more menacingly nationalistic with the passing of each year, should no longer heed the counsel of this man who has been so largely instrumental in keeping French chauvinism in check, and who made possible the admirable Locarno agreement. It is no wonder that Europe, and particularly Berlin and Geneva, should receive the news of Briand's defeat with unconcealed consternation. The Berlin press even hastily declared that the action of the French Parliament "must be accepted as a plain renunciation of peace." Among the European diplomats gathered in Geneva the reaction to the news was much the same. We sincerely trust that this is a premature and erroneous judgment. If, however, Europe thus correctly interprets the vote of the French Parliament, the outlook for peace on the Continent is black indeed.

Briand is remaining in office, at least for the time being. Since the vote at Versailles he has proposed to the European Union Commission that an all-European economic treaty be negotiated with a view to solving some of the Continent's major problems. His plan provides for a preferential-tariff system which would facilitate the exchange of surplus farm products from Central and Eastern Europe for the industrial products of Western Europe, the natural flow of which is now impeded by rigid tariff walls. Financial assistance would also be extended to needy European countries through some central credit system, such as the World Bank at Basel or a committee of the League of Nations. Special attention in this connection would be paid to Austria, which is now experiencing another very serious financial crisis. Obviously, the new Briand proposal is aimed at the projected Austro-German customs union, but it has the virtue of attempting to meet the issue raised by the Curtius-Schober arrangement by offering a substitute wholly economic in character instead of seeking to destroy that arrangement by means of a political attack. Moreover, the new Briand plan would get more quickly to the heart of Europe's problems than could the more cumbersome and ambitious project for a United States of Europe. It may be that in this proposal Briand has found a formula that will help Europe not only economically, but also politically.

Small Latin, Less Greek

THE decision of Yale University to drop Latin and Greek from the list of subjects required for an undergraduate degree is neither surprising nor a new departure in modern education. It merely points to the trend which university education is taking; it is another step in the direction of education—of the most practical and "worth-while" sort—for everybody. The modern young business man, we are told, who has taken four extra years out of his life to get himself educated desires to study subjects that will be useful to him in the cement business, in the manufacture of washing machines, in personnel management or building subways. Latin and Greek, either by a knowledge of the languages themselves or a complete familiarity with classical culture, are of no more use to him as working tools in the pursuit of any of these occupations than are Sanskrit, the differential calculus, or a good course in röntgenology.

It is idle, therefore, to lament the passing of the classics for the great majority of university students. They are not scholars; they are not even to enter one of the more recondite professions. They are practical men in a practical world, and the less their minds are cluttered with tags of unnecessary information the better off they will be. For the students who are interested in pursuits more purely intellectual, the classics will still be available. They may still learn as much of the languages as they can; they may still delight in the golden age of Pericles, in the grandeur of Aeschylus, in the wit of Horace. That is, they may if they have the good fortune to know a Greek or Latin teacher who is able to impart some of these delights, and if in the preparatory schools there will be those to tell the pupils of the riches these languages contain. For it cannot be denied that a good part of the popular revolt against the classics is due to the ineptitude with which they are taught. For centuries school children have struggled with Caesar's account of his campaign in Gaul without either being able to tell a coherent story of what was happening or being in the least aware that what they read was one of the finest and most stirring reports of a soldier on his military activities that has ever been written. Surely there is something wrong here. Surely Vergil is a finer writer than any high-school student suspects him of being. Surely the "Anabasis" is not the be-all and end-all of young persons desirous of acquiring a little Greek. The acquisition of a language, even one's native tongue, is no doubt a painful process at best. But the poor lads and lasses who have bent in despair over their Greek and Latin have suffered boredom as well, and have had nothing at the end to show for their pains.

It has been said in defense of the Yale action that now the classics will "stand on their own feet." It might have been added that first they must find feet to stand on. There was indeed a glory in Greece and a grandeur in Rome. But this glory and this grandeur have been hidden under a dead weight of Greek and Latin grammar. If we may suppose that some day a method will be found of imparting an agility in the use of these languages, with at the same time a just and unsentimental appreciation of the cultures they represent, there will be rejoicing among a certain small class of university students.

Making the Country Safe for War

By MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

Washington, May 15

SO we are going to war again. Hardly any other interpretation can be put upon the activities of the War Policies Commission now meeting in Washington. Dozens of expert witnesses—industrialists, bankers, army officers, veterans—were heard by this body last March; many others have been heard thus far in the present session. These witnesses, with one or two exceptions, have mentioned peace only in passing, as though world peace were desirable but certainly not to be had, and therefore not worth wasting one's breath in discussing. Instead, the dominant talk has been of war, and of the need of preparing for war. We must be prepared to fight if we would avoid fighting—so has run the time-honored argument of most of the witnesses, although a few, like Daniel Willard, the railroad president, and Newton D. Baker, the former Secretary of War, have spoken bravely of "the next war." Others have used such qualifying phrases as "in the event of war" or "if war comes," but these persons also were certain that we ought to have a comprehensive military and industrial plan to put into operation the moment we were attacked; and some of the latter witnesses were in a hurry to have the thing done as soon as possible. For example, Paul V. McNutt, dean of the Indiana University Law School and former National Commander of the American Legion, urged that the preparedness program be expedited. "I am against waiting," he said, with the air of one who is convinced that war is just around the corner.

It may appear strange that the Congressional mandate under which the War Policies Commission is functioning is entitled "a joint resolution to promote peace and to equalize the burdens and to minimize the profits of war." But the resolution itself says nothing about promoting peace, though it has plenty to say concerning a "study of policies to be pursued in event of war." Hence it is perhaps natural that the commission should have forgotten the title of the resolution. By the same token it is perhaps logical that the commission should have elected to ignore the Kellogg-Briand treaty. In this convention the United States specifically undertook to "condemn war for the solution of international controversies, and renounce it as an instrument of national policy." Yet here we have a body of men, created by express will of Congress, at work on the task of fashioning a war policy for the United States. That their mission, if not technically illegal, at least compromises the Kellogg Pact has not even occurred to the war-policy makers. Indeed, they have not seen fit to mention the treaty at all. One witness, Benjamin Marsh, of the People's Lobby, tried it, and he was rewarded in fitting measure for his ignorant belief that the Kellogg Pact means what it says. Secretary of War Hurley, chairman of the commission, was promptly upon him, demanding to know whether Marsh had ever worn an American uniform, whether he was a Socialist, a Bolshevist, or if he thought "the government of the United States was worthy of being maintained and perpetuated."

Few pacifists have ever been as vehement in their advocacy of peace as have the militarists, industrialists, and others in their testimony before the commission. But the peace that they visualize would not be based upon mutual self-trust and understanding; rather would it have its foundation in a strong military organization and in a war policy that would, in the words of Bernard M. Baruch, head of the War Industries Board of 1918, "increase the respect of the people of the world" for the United States. National Commander Ralph T. O'Neil said the American Legion favored a universal-draft law because with such a law "there will be no people in this country who can profit because we went into the war, there will be no one in this country who will seek to draw this country into war in order that he may personally profit thereby. This is primarily a peace measure. On the other hand, no nation in the world would care to lock horns with America if it were known ahead of time that America, if forced into war, would go into it with every dollar, with every machine, and with every man, woman, and child." Then he added, perhaps as an afterthought, that "the American Legion is not a militaristic organization. It is a militant peace organization and is truly working for the peace of the world." General Douglas MacArthur, Chief of Staff, frankly held "to the belief, so often reiterated by our first President, that a reasonable preparation for defense is one of the best guaranties of peace." Brigadier General John Ross Delafield carried this point a step farther when he contended that "two unarmed men much more easily come to blows than two armed men; one armed man may do just as much harm as the other, but the mere fact that the other is armed prevents their coming to blows and making a conflict and it goes far to prevent stealing, plundering, and trespassing." Therefore, our plan to create an elaborate defense machine "can never make us a military bully; on the other hand, it is a plan, if we actually live up to it, which will cause all nations to respect us and give us that protection which military strength always gives to the nation or to the man."

Up to this writing—the hearings are not yet ended—all witnesses except Mr. Marsh have agreed that we must have a war-mobilization plan, and a war policy of some sort that would take the profit out of war and thereby make it less attractive. Beyond that their agreement has not extended. The veterans have insisted, to quote a resolution of the Veterans of Foreign Wars read at the hearings, that a policy be adopted embracing a "universal draft both of man power and of industry in all future wars in which this country may be engaged." The American Legion representative urged "the mobilization of men, money, materials, and food." Several plans were presented under which the government would take over everything in the country at the outbreak of war and the President would automatically be clothed with absolute dictatorial powers. Unfortunately for this dream of a "profitless" war, the American Federation of Labor had been active before the War Policies Commission was organized. Through its political influence it had caused to be inserted in the Congressional resolution setting up the commission a proviso that "said commission shall not consider and shall not report upon the conscription of labor." Organized labor, speaking through Arthur J. Lovell, vice-president of the Brotherhood of Enginemen and Firemen, did not seek to conceal its purpose in opposing the conscription of labor. According to Mr. Lovell, the projected universal-draft legislation was designed to "conscript capital as well as labor." Were it possible to do this, he continued, "we would have been for such legislation; but we did not believe that could be done, having regard to the Constitution of the United States, which provides, among other things, that property may not be taken without due process of law."

Representatives of property and capital felt very much the same way. Newton D. Baker answered in the affirmative when Senator Swanson of Virginia, a member of the commission, asked him: "Do not you think it would dislocate all business to have all of the property of the United States, the laboring man's home and everything else, put in a general pot, like the Soviet Government is endeavoring to do now? Would you not have a cessation of business, and a great cessation of business?" For the sake of the record, it may be noted that none of the proponents of the universal-draft legislation has suggested that the government take over "the laboring man's home." By discreet questioning Secretary Hurley brought from Bernard Baruch the statement that in the World War the government had all the power it needed to commandeer property and fix prices, and in that way make war unprofitable. Testimony of like character was presented by other witnesses, all quite obviously with a view to preserving the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution. The industrialists and financiers were quite obviously willing to lend their property to the government upon reasonable terms in the event of war, but they were most emphatically not willing to surrender it as the soldier must surrender his body, that is, unconditionally, which they probably would be forced to do were the Fifth Amendment to be modified or repealed. So long as the due-process clause of this amendment remains valid the government cannot take their property, even in time of war, without "just compensation."

Hence it appears that no plan will be worked out looking toward the conscription of either capital or labor. This leaves only the potential soldier to be drafted. But he really has nothing to worry about. Organized labor, in the plan eventually adopted, will be guaranteed a fair rate of wages; at least it will be assured that there will be no reduction in wages. Industry and commerce will be guaranteed a fair and perhaps fixed level of prices; virtually all the tentative plans submitted provide for a price-fixing scheme of one kind or another, the prices to be determined by representatives of industry and commerce. The soldier will be guaranteed a full share of glory for his readiness to risk death for his country. He should ask no more, in the opinion of former Legion Commander McNutt, who contended that "military service is one of the obligations that rest upon every able-bodied man in this country. That is one of the prices he pays for the benefits of his citizenship." With this in mind the War Department is going ahead with its general mobilization plan, which, according to General MacArthur, calls for the mobilization or conscription of 4,000,000 men at the outbreak of war.

There is every likelihood that the War Policies Commission will recommend legislation legalizing the War Department's mobilization plan. It will also put on paper some sort of skeleton organization to be charged with the supervision of the country's industries, commerce, transportation, and agriculture in time of war, though it will, of course, stop short of recommending that this organization or the government itself be empowered to conscript or confiscate property and capital. It may further suggest that final and complete authority be placed in the hands of the President, which would be done in any event. One question that the commission will probably sidestep, however, is that involving the administration of the emergency war organization. Shall the army control this organization and through it the economic activity of the country, or shall the emergency organization control the army? Shall we have a military or an industrial dictatorship in time of war? That the War Department is working toward the former goal was brought out by Representative Collins, the only anti-militarist member of the commission. He showed that the department has already commissioned 14,000 industrialists in the reserve officers' corps, men who will form part of the military machine and who will submit to military orders if war should come. Secretary Hurley sought to deny that the department had any such purpose in mind, but Representative McSwain of South Carolina, another member of the commission, inconveniently recalled a speech by the commandant of the Army War College wherein the scheme for military domination of the country in time of war was explained and warmly defended. Bernard Baruch, Newton Baker, and others testified that they would oppose a military dictatorship, preferring instead civilian boards with the President as dictator.

Despite all the war talk heard at the meetings of the commission, not one of the witnesses or members as much as even suggested that we were threatened with war from any quarter. The potential enemy, from whom our preparedness is to protect us, simply went unnamed, although General Delafield hinted that what he called the "fanaticism" of Russia might lead to war there. Newton Baker guarded the secret with his usual caution; he called the enemy "Nation A," explaining that "we won't name anyone for politeness' sake." Richard H. Aishton, president of the American Railway Association, at one place in his testimony referred to a hypothetical "war with Canada," but he used this merely as an example to emphasize a point he wished to make. Otherwise there was nothing in the statements of the witnesses or in the questions of the members of the commission to indicate that there was any logical or pressing necessity for adopting a comprehensive war program at this time.

There is another side to the question of war and peace, but either by accident or design only one or two representatives of peace societies or similar organizations have so far been heard by the commission. These organizations were not invited to be represented, but upon request arrangements were made to hear them during the last week of the hearings. On May 14, however, and without notice, the commission decided to terminate its sessions a week earlier than originally planned. The peace organizations have been informed that their representatives must appear before May 22 if they would be heard. Very few of them are in a position to take advantage of this new arrangement. The commission will probably close its hearings after having listened almost exclusively to the stock arguments of those who think of peace in terms of war.

I Work for Russia

III. The Worker at Work*

By WALTER ARNOLD RUKEYSER

IN my two previous articles I have discussed the structure and departmental functioning of the Soviet state trust. I now turn to the worker—how he works and lives. The misconceptions which apparently exist here in America concerning the everyday life of the Russian worker were nothing short of appalling to me upon my return to this country. Such misconceptions exist even among intelligent professional and business men who read intensively upon the subject. The reason lies perhaps in the fact that so much of what is written about Russia today attempts to generalize rather than to describe particular conditions, and that it is tinged with the personal bias of the writer or the policy bias of the publication, as the case may be.

Everything in life is comparative. To understand conditions among Russian workers today we really should have as a background for comparison a knowledge of the conditions existing under the old regime. I am frank to say that I have absolutely no first-hand knowledge or experience of Russia prior to the year 1929; but since my connection with the Soviets I have made an earnest attempt to study, through carefully selected reading, the life of the worker in the last days of the Czars. Information obtained by reading has been supplemented by contacts with people who really knew industrial conditions in the country prior to 1917. In setting down here what they have told me I make no pretense to be presenting anything general or typical or even accurate. I can, however, vouch for the accuracy of my own observations as to the condition of the workers at Asbest both before and after 1929.

I have seen the workers' former quarters in the large industrial centers in Moscow and Leningrad. These were characterized by the filth, squalor, and unsanitary conditions which we in this country always associate with the worst of our industrial centers as they existed toward the close of the last century. I have had pointed out to me in Leningrad, by an engineer who has been connected with Russian industry for over thirty years, houses in which more than twenty workers of both sexes and of all ages existed in a single room having less than 300 square feet of floor space. The windows were incapable of being opened. As fast as one bed (?) became free, as its occupant went on shift, the next occupant was waiting to use it. The shifts seldom consisted of less than ten hours' work—usually eleven, twelve, or fourteen. The ten-to-eleven-hour shift, I may say in passing, still exists in the asbestos mines in the Canadian province of Quebec, where I have had personal experience. The average wage of the Russian worker was pitiably low, as may be proved by reference to official reports of the period. One bourgeois engineer in Moscow, a non-party man, told me that in the factory at which he was employed before the war the body of a living woman was hoisted up and down through a chimney flue for the purpose of cleaning it! This anecdote strains all credulity; I state it for whatever it is worth.

At Asbest, upon my first arrival there in 1929, I saw the workers living for the greater part under the conditions that existed when the mines were under private ownership. Most of them were quartered in large log houses consisting usually of one huge room, either unpartitioned or divided by flimsy curtains. An entire family—man, wife, and children—would have a space possibly six feet by twelve in which to live, sleep, and cook. The beds were composed of boards covered by a heap of rags. The workers seldom if ever undressed. There was no attempt at providing latrines or other like facilities. Some families which we observed were living in a sort of earth hovel; others in huts half of which were hardly more than excavations in the ground, rudely roofed over. Today these shelters, where they have not been entirely removed, are being used for cattle.

In 1929 the trust embarked upon an ambitious program to provide new housing in the form of communal apartments and individual houses to take care of between 13,000 and 15,000 workers and their families—probably some 40,000 persons in all. A new town site was planned and laid out at some distance from the mines and to the windward of any dust arising from the milling operations. This town site borders an almost circular lake approximately five-eighths of a mile in diameter, the town being laid out around three-quarters of this body of water in radiating streets lined by blocks of one-, two-, four-, and eight-family houses. In the next article, describing the daily life of the worker, I shall go into these matters more fully.

Let us turn now to the work itself. The shifts have been shortened so that the worker in the open-cut mines or on the surface puts in a seven-hour day, of which one hour is allowed him for dinner and rest. This makes six working hours net. The underground miner has a gross shift of six hours, as does also the mill worker. The working "week" consists of four days, the fifth day being free. In some industries I understand that there may soon be installed a "week" of three working days, with the shift lengthened by half an hour.

The office and technical workers formerly worked from eight in the morning till three in the afternoon with a half-hour's recess at eleven o'clock. The hours were changed last fall to extend from nine till four. In Moscow the offices are usually open from nine or nine-thirty till five.

The average wage for a worker at Asbest closely approximates 100 rubles a month. For his quarters he is charged a very small rental, which is on a sliding scale depending upon his earnings. Thus a man earning 100 rubles a month may pay 5 for a certain apartment; whereas a man earning 200 rubles would pay possibly 10 or 12 for the same quarters. This is more commonly true in the cities than in the newly developed industrial centers, for in the latter the type of quarters furnished varies according to the class of work done. A mine worker, for example, will live in a multiple-family house, whereas an engineer, who may earn up to 800 or 1,000 rubles a month, will have a single or two-family bungalow. The layout of the two-family houses resembles that of similar dwellings here in America. The houses are all lighted with electricity, for which a purely nominal charge is made; all have bathrooms and kitchens and outbuildings for live stock; all are surrounded by ample ground for gardens. Water and sewerage systems are being installed as rapidly as possible. Pure drinking water is now furnished from the underground workings, and the purity of that supply is constantly tested and maintained.

* The third of a series of six articles. The fourth, on the Worker at Home and at Play, will appear in the issue of June 3.—EDITOR THE NATION.

The number of square meters of floor space per person, as well as a constantly rising wage scale, is predetermined for each period of the Five-Year Plan; the percentage of accomplishment of the housing and wage program accompanies all figures on production and costs in the progress reports. In addition to his actual wages and his low-rent advantages, the worker receives a host of other indirect benefits. These consist partly in insurance, pensions, vacations—a month each year on pay at some resort, with all expenses paid—and free medical and hospital services. Primary and secondary educational facilities are provided, and every incentive is offered to workers as a preferred class to attend institutions of higher learning. Women about to become mothers get full clinical attention and are granted six weeks' leave on pay before and after confinement. Workers' clubs offer inexpensive entertainment and cultural facilities. Lastly, commodities such as foodstuffs are provided, as available, at the state cooperative stores at prices in keeping with earning power.

The workers, in general, belong to their respective trade unions, which make contracts with the trust setting forth the conditions of work. These contracts must be strictly adhered to by the trust. The unions also concern themselves with the safety of actual operations as well as with living and other social conditions. The safety of the men at work is guarded by inspectors, and no mining methods may be installed without their approval. This situation is completely analogous to conditions here in America.

Since our arrival at Asbest the mining and milling plants, old and new, have been equipped with safety devices and sanitary and hygienic facilities such as are found in this country. At the shaft heads are excellent "change-houses" following the best American design, wherein the men must shower, hanging their working clothes in specially provided drying-rooms. Cafeterias are rapidly being installed in all plants.

In designing new plants or layouts the American consultant has impressed upon him at every turn that the safety and health of the worker are of primary importance. The plants must be so designed as to give a prescribed minimum of light and air. The machines must be so spaced in any layout that no crowding will result, a minimum of one meter being requisite between machines. All moving parts must be covered over, all dust creators must be equipped with aspirators, and so on. The reader can see that to accomplish all this takes time. It is not done in a day. But when I compare conditions as I found them in 1929 with those existing today, the improvement is impressive.

The workers are paid fortnightly, as is the usual practice in similar work in this country. They are paid in cash. If the bank for any reason should not be able to supply the cash on time, as was sometimes the case during the money-hoarding period last year, the workers are supplied partly with cash, partly with company scrip and credit cards. The inability to pay in cash, which was merely temporary, resulted in a severe manifesto from Moscow that if all workers were not paid promptly, the executives of the trusts, whether party or non-party men, would be held strictly accountable. Shortly thereafter the condition was alleviated.

I mention such incidents to point out some of the enormous difficulties encountered by the men at the helm of the plan. Yet it seems to me that as these unforeseen difficulties arise they are being faced and overcome. It is true that at times one hears a muttered growl from the Russian bear, that one sees a tendency among a small minority toward passive resistance; but in my observation the master-minds in this great experiment have their finger so closely on the pulse of the people, they know so well the psychology with which they have to deal—so many of them being of the people—that they are able to cope successfully with these emergencies as they arise. The advantage of a dictatorship is its capacity for quick action. When prohibition was tried in Russia, for example, and found to be a failure, immediately, without lost motion or political bickering, prohibition was discarded and governmental control of manufacture and sale instituted. At the same time an intensive educational campaign against drinking was inaugurated. The same quickness of action was evidenced last spring when the peasants showed signs of passively resisting further collectivization of their live stock. It is in this way that the fearful tempo of industrialization and mechanization is maintained at just that top speed which will not break down the people's morale—and no faster.

It has been my experience that the Russian worker can be trained to a job as well as any other person of similar mentality. To be sure, the word nichevo is heard often, too often; but, after all, the corresponding expression, "What the hell," is to be heard everywhere by those who are actively in charge of labor. Contrary to the common supposition in this country, the present system in Russia does not completely dull initiative. A higher wage scale, with attendant increase of "power" and better living conditions, is always a lure for the ambitious individual there as elsewhere, but with modifications. To be sure, the system is designed to raise the minimum standards; and those who are satisfied with the minimum will have no incentive to improve their work. Recently piece-work and bonuses, though taboo as capitalistic devices, have been reinstated—another surrender to the requirements of the speeded-up tempo of the plan. Further, I have found the Russian worker to be at his best when assigned to a piece of work alone. The entire responsibility is then his. He cannot "pass the buck." Everyone can see the results for which he and he alone is responsible. Put twenty workmen on a job, and I grant that Russian love of sociability—the desire to talk, to sing, to smoke—will militate against maximum efficiency. To change the temperament of an entire people in a short period of time is necessarily extremely difficult if not impossible. But it seems to me that in many respects they are accomplishing the impossible in Russia today. The adoption of American methods, the frequent use of such words as Amerikansky tempo and fordismus, which have become bywords throughout Russia, show that the psychology of a people can be changed. Personally, I found the Russians, all of them, eager and quick to learn, eternally asking about how things are done in America, and apparently "on their toes" to show us foreigners that they can emulate their American brothers in efficiency and ability to learn. I leave the problem for debate by the respective exponents of the theories of heredity and environment.

In the next of these articles I shall discuss the daily life of the worker—how he eats, travels, and amuses himself—the human side of this remarkable experiment.

"Married Love" and Censorship

By MARY WARE DENNETT

THE arresting words—"700,000 sold in England"—recently appeared in a bookshop window which was entirely filled with copies of Dr. Marie Stopes's "Married Love." The books made a striking background for quotations from the decision of Judge John M. Woolsey by which this famous book became a legally permissible publication in the United States, after thirteen years of exile as "obscene and immoral." April 6, 1931, will stand as a very significant date in the long history of the struggle to throw off the shackles of sex censorship. Judge Woolsey's decision has established another precedent by which the absurd obscenity statutes of this country may be slowly but surely broken down.

If we who are living now could come back to this earth a hundred years hence we should probably view with amused incredulity the records of the preposterous doings of our century in the field of censorship. Without official proof no one would believe, for instance, that in two branches of Anglo-Saxon civilization, similar in language, traditions, and experience, could be found such a contrast as that between England's acclaim of "Married Love" as an epoch-making contribution to sex education—a book full of scientific truth, practical instruction, beauty, ideality—and the attitude of the United States, for thirteen years supine under the ruling of a few officials whose unclean concepts of sex made them declare this same book "obscene and immoral" and bar it from importation and the mails. In England "Married Love" has been published in nineteen editions by one of the oldest, most respectable, and most honorable firms; in the United States that same firm—G. P. Putnam Sons—would, until now, have been held criminal if its New York office had issued an American edition of this book.

But so it has always been during the whole history of the effort to capture that dangerous animal called obscenity and keep it behind the bars of statutes and official dictums. No one has ever yet caught the beast itself, though many suspected creatures have been trapped in its stead, only to be released when cases of mistaken identity have been established. It will always be an elusive, unidentifiable creature, until we realize that there "ain't no such animal" anyhow, but only an infected state of mind. Some people are susceptible to this infection, others are not. However, immunity is growing fast in these encouraging days. Psychological sunlight is doing an immense amount of purifying, and many dark corners in mental and emotional closets are being cleaned out. A reflex of this educational reformation is found in the recent succession of court decisions culminating in the "Married Love" case. From the bench and even from juries some fine clean decisions have come of late. While in them all there has been the usual necessary dependence upon legal precedent, there has also been a noticeable new note of independence, based upon recognition of the fact that obscenity is in the mind, not in any particular words; and that the government has no moral right to bar books from the people in general just because certain minds are capable of seeing dirt in them.

Judge Woolsey's decision in the "Married Love" case, by which he dismissed the libel as not presenting sufficient ground for submission to a jury, is a striking document. He quotes the dictionary definitions of "obscene" and "immoral," and then states unqualifiedly: "The book 'Married Love' does not in my opinion fall within these definitions in any respect." He quotes "The Sex Side of Life" case as precedent, and then goes on to say:

> "Married Love" is a considered attempt to explain to married people how their mutual sex life may be made happier. To one who has read Havelock Ellis, as I have, the subject matter of Dr. Stopes's book is not wholly new, but it emphasizes the woman's side of sex questions. It makes also some apparently justified criticisms of the inopportune exercise by the man, in the marriage relation, of what are often referred to as his conjugal or marital rights, and it pleads with seriousness, and not without eloquence, for a better understanding by husbands of the physical and emotional side of the sex life of their wives.
> I do not find anything exceptionable anywhere in the book, and I cannot imagine a normal mind to which this book would seem to be obscene or immoral within the proper definition of those words. . . .

Another recent court victory for decency and common sense is the decision in favor of "The Sexual Life in Its Biological Significance," by Dr. Joannes Rutgers of Holland, printed by a Viennese publisher after the author's death. One hundred and twenty copies of the book were imported by C. E. Midgard of Seattle and held by the customs officials as "indecent" and "obscene." The case was taken to the federal court as the first test of the new law, initiated by Senator Bronson Cutting, providing that no customs official could single-handed ban a book, as had previously been the case, but that any question as to importability should be settled by the federal courts. Mr. Midgard protested the forfeiture decision of the customs officials, and his case was backed by the American Civil Liberties Union and by Dr. G. Shearman Peterkin of Seattle. As in the "Married Love" case and "The Sex Side of Life" case, there was not the slightest reasonable excuse for the suppression of the book. No atmosphere of obscenity was anywhere to be found, either in the book itself or in the mind of the author, publisher, or importer. Dr. Rutgers was a distinguished physician in Holland. He was one of the pioneer leaders of the birth-control movement and an internationally known authority on contraception. His book was the result of a lifetime of scientific observation and loving service to mankind. The publisher put out the book in the sober form suitable to its serious contents. Mr. Midgard, who imported it, is a man of obvious ideality in his social interests and educational activities.

Judge George M. Bourquin in his charge to the jury insisted that the book must be judged as a whole and not by any isolated passages apart from the context. He said: "I can see no reason why an intelligent person who should read it should not note the serious intent of its author." Mr. Midgard writes that the judge's charge should be "printed word for word and published throughout the country." Here again we see judicial insistence upon two important factors in the reformation of legal precedent—namely, appraising a publication by its whole atmosphere and intent rather than by excerpts capable of salacious interpretation by obscene minds, and deciding upon the admissibility of a publication on the basis of the intelligence of normal rather than subnormal or abnormal readers.

The criterion in many if not most obscenity cases until recent years was not one of quality of idea but of "how far" the publication went. Anything that went "too far" was suppressible. By "too far" was meant a description of sex functioning; sex physiology was considered tolerable if it was not too explicit, but sex functioning was beyond the pale. It was at just that point that the fear and shame ingrained in our false traditions stepped in, revealing the miserable old concept that sex itself is dirty. It is surely reason for encouragement that the opposition to this old concept, which is more and more being developed among intelligent people, should begin to make itself felt in our courts. What made Dr. Stopes's "Married Love" an epoch-making publication years ago was chiefly the fact that it discussed sex functioning and sex emotion with the same clarity and scientific spirit as sex physiology, and with precisely the same purpose, that is, the greater knowledge and happiness of human beings; and it is that very same thing which makes the book a practical help to blundering, troubled people today.

In this connection one of the most significant of recent legal decisions is one about which there has been no noticeable publicity. The little book "The Sex Factor in Marriage," by Helena Wright, M.B., B.S., an English publication, was held up by the customs officials as "obscene." It has a notably fine introduction by the Reverend A. Herbert Gray, and it discusses in simple, direct, well-chosen language the technique of the art of sex relationship. The official action was protested by Morris Ernst, the attorney who has won so many of these recent victories in obscenity cases; and the decision was reversed without court action on the strength of the precedents established by the other cases. So now the old notion that publications which describe sex union are for that reason indecent and obscene seems, for the present at least, effectively checked. This constitutes a great step ahead, but it is one which must be vigilantly safeguarded, for progress in this field is by no means steadily onward. Periods of revision and reaction seem inevitable.

Excellent as all these decisions are, they are not enough either in number or nature to satisfy the rightful demands for common sense in law and stabilized security for decency and freedom. They do establish precedent, which is all to the good so far as it goes, but there is also a vast amount of contradictory precedent on the court records, and judges and juries can be influenced by the bad precedents if they so choose. An individual writer, publisher, bookseller, or importer must still take the gamble that any book dealing seriously with sex may be made the target for preposterous prosecution, if some complainant or official wants to induce it. Many individuals or firms, when faced with these prosecutions, either cannot or will not fight them out. Questions of expense, inconvenience, or distasteful publicity often make the payment of a fine the easiest or the only practicable way out. And so the supply of bad precedents is kept up, not because those concerned want it to be so, but because of the often overwhelming difficulty in shouldering a legal struggle.

Even when a case is won, the victor is still the victim of a governmental injustice for which there is no redress. Neither Dr. Stopes nor her publisher can recover the losses of the thirteen years during which her book was barred from this country. And on top of that loss comes the necessity of paying the legal costs of getting the ban removed. The pamphlet "The Sex Side of Life" was under ban for eight years, and the court case dragged along for a year and a half, requiring thirteen separate appearances of the author in court, which meant the interruption of all other work during that period. But one cannot sue the government for loss of business, time, health, and strength, or for the nervous strain of a false accusation and unwanted notoriety. Nor can the public be recompensed for being deprived of a suppressed publication.

There is here a cumulative injustice which no mere bettering of precedent is alone sufficient to correct. Various minor or temporary remedial measures have been suggested, such as that requiring the Post Office to go to court when it bans a publication from the mails, just as must any individual citizen when he brings action against another; and that requiring customs officials to publish a list of all publications which are barred from importation, so that the public may be informed and so that cases may be discovered and defended by group action when defense is too heavy a burden for the individual concerned.

These are good suggestions, but they are not basic. The real trouble lies in the nature of the obscenity statutes. Obscenity has never been specifically defined by law. It can be anything which a given judge or jury or prosecutor chooses to make it. It varies ridiculously from time to time and from place to place. The very same book is legally obscene one day and pure the next. There can be no real dependence on court decisions when the crime is undefined. Moreover, there is no use trying to define it or to frame laws which penalize it, for obscenity is a feeling, an attitude of mind, not words or acts. No laws can make a feeling or an attitude of mind a crime. In the course of time it will become clear to all normal citizens that the dirt-seeing faculty can be educated but not legislated out of people. As that discovery is made by larger and larger sections of the public, the demand will grow for dumping the obscenity laws into the legal scrap-basket as just so much useless clutter. And along with that demand will come an increased sense of responsibility for the type of education that will gradually eliminate the obscene mind from the world.

The Wheat Chaos—Pool or Ruin?

By BARROW LYONS

THE inconsistency of official America in crying out against European "dumping," and then announcing that the Federal Farm Board would sell its huge accumulation of more than 200,000,000 bushels of wheat in European markets as rapidly as it could, has caused many bitter smiles in Russia and Germany. But our European customers have done no laughing hitherto compared to what they are doing now when the United States stands in the very uncomfortable position of facing squarely the international situation, as it does at the London conference convened on May 18 to endeavor to reach a world marketing agreement that will control the movement and price of wheat in international trade.

Unless the Farm Board delegation, headed by Samuel R. McKelvie, is prepared to enter a trade agreement with the Soviets and other great wheat-exporting nations, it will stand definitely accused of being willing to ruin not only the farmers of the United States, but of the world, and of thereby doing its utmost to perpetuate the world-wide economic depression. For unless constructive action is taken immediately to raise the price of wheat, the growers of the largest land crop will face utter ruin.

There are three courses the Farm Board might pursue. It could lock up its wheat holdings, as some of the Western Senators have demanded, but it has refused to accept this suggestion and has decided to unload as rapidly as it can. It could sell in an open market in competition with the huge carry-over stores of the Argentine, Canada, and Australia and with the splendid crops that in a few months will be ready to flood world markets with even more unwanted grain; but to do that would inevitably depress prices still further. Finally, the Farm Board could cooperate with the rest of the world on the problem of wheat.

Laying aside political considerations, clearly the only economically sound course is to make a sincere and intelligent effort to bring about an international agreement which will tend to control the movement of grain to the principal markets and eventually regulate production and prices. All the other great wheat-exporting countries are ready for some degree of cooperation. If the United States remains aloof at this point, its attitude can be interpreted only as a challenge to economic combat on an enormous scale.

Whichever way the Farm Board acts, however, it must inevitably give satisfaction of a sort to the Communists, and therein lies the greatest political difficulty. Nothing could afford the Soviets greater mirth than a surrender by capitalism on a major issue of this sort. On the other hand, if the United States wishes to remain in "splendid isolation" and bid its wheat against the surpluses of the rest of the world, it will be aiding the Communists politically more than it could in any other way, for in bringing widespread suffering to wheat farmers everywhere it would be perpetuating and intensifying the conditions upon which revolution thrives most readily.

A few figures make the picture clearer. In Kansas farmers are receiving 48 cents a bushel for wheat on the farm. In some parts of western Canada the farm price is 36 cents a bushel. In the United States the very large farms employing modern machinery grew this wheat for around 60 cents a bushel, according to a conservative estimate. On many farms it cost more than $1 a bushel. The world carry-over of exportable wheat is close to a billion bushels. The Canadian Bureau of Statistics estimated that at the end of February the carry-over in four countries alone amounted to 819,000,000 bushels—325,000,000 bushels in the United States, 232,000,000 bushels in Canada, 141,000,000 bushels in Argentina, and 126,000,000 bushels in Australia. Russia also is known to have a carry-over from the last crop, but the quantity is not known. And now a new crop is piling up additional stores of unconsumable grain. Australia has just harvested a record crop, and has some 140,000,000 exportable bushels to add to the carry-over. Reports from the Argentine indicate a total crop of some 271,404,000 bushels, an increase over last year's harvest of 66 per cent. Reports of the United States Department of Agriculture indicate an exportable surplus from the 1931 crop in this country of some 133,000,000 bushels. Reports from Canada also indicate a large exportable surplus to be added to existing supplies. Russia exported some 90,000,000 bushels of her last crop, but the progress of the Five-Year Plan will permit her to export between 150,000,000 and 250,000,000 bushels from the coming crop, unless weather conditions are unusually severe.

Fortunately for the wheat farmers of the rest of the world, the foreign-trade policy of Russia is being conducted on strictly economic lines. In order to meet obligations incurred for the importation of machinery and technical assistance, Russia is anxious to obtain the best possible prices for what she ships abroad. In fact, the depression of world prices has made it necessary for the Soviets greatly to increase their export program and to stint home consumers more than was anticipated; so there is no question about Russia's willingness to enter a world marketing agreement that would improve the price of grain.

Russia's need has not been overlooked by the foes of communism in this country, and it is reasonable to suppose that they have brought pressure upon federal authorities not to enter into a marketing agreement that would enhance greatly the economic position of the Soviets. Grain dealers, moreover, have seen their business gradually drying up through the organization of farmers' pools, and it cannot be even remotely imagined that they will favor what amounts to a world wheat pool. From "responsible" quarters an international embargo against Russian grain has been suggested.

In spite of the Tory element in Great Britain which would sacrifice almost anyone for the obstruction of Russian progress, the U. S. S. R. has powerful friends in England. Last year when the grain agents of the Soviets found it almost impossible to get commercial credits from other banks, the bank of the Cooperative Wholesale Society put large funds at the disposal of the Russians, and enabled them to move wheat into the United Kingdom, by far the largest wheat-importing country. During the 1929-30 crop year Great Britain took from all sources 206,100,000 bushels of wheat. The Russian strength in this market is further disclosed by more recent figures. During the first quarter of 1931 the imports of Russian wheat into Great Britain amounted to 5,788,974 hundredweight, valued at $7,320,000, while in the first quarter last year Britain took only 321,912 hundredweight of Russian wheat, valued at $778,500. The change is reflected in the decline of United States wheat imports into England, which in the first three months of last year totaled $10,833,930 in value, but this year slumped to $2,192,185. Less of the cheap Argentine wheat also was imported.

Last year Germany was the second-largest wheat-importing country, having bought abroad 47,500,000 bushels, despite a high tariff to protect home agriculture; but there is little likelihood of a serious barrier being put up in Germany against Russian wheat at present. The Soviets recently have placed orders for $75,000,000 worth of goods in Germany on long-term credits, which they will be forced to take up largely through the exportation of raw materials. Wheat stocks in Germany are now at a low ebb. On March 15 they were 350,000 metric tons less than at the same time last year. With Russia anxious to market cheaply some of the best grain in the world, the logic of the situation calls for substantial wheat exports into Germany from the Ukraine.

Belgium was the next largest importer of Russian wheat, and there the government has just been forced to lift an embargo against the Soviet grain. There were special reasons for this. Fifty-one years ago Eduarde Anseele began the establishment of cooperative bakeries in Belgium under the auspices of the Socialist Party. These bakeries formed the basis for a strong consumers' cooperative movement, and as a result in Belgium today bread is selling at half the price it commands in France. The cooperative bakeries want cheap wheat from the Russian cooperative commonwealth, and they wield a powerful political influence.

Italy followed Belgium as a wheat-importing country in the 1929-30 season, with imports of 42,000,000 bushels. Opposed as he is to communism, Mussolini has his reasons for favoring the importation of cheap Russian wheat. While he is protecting Italian agriculture with a high tariff and urging Italians to plant more wheat, he is at the same time building battleships with the import duties he has levied upon Russian grain. The cheaper the grain, the higher the duty can be—and the more battleships for Mussolini.

If anyone is inclined to doubt the force with which Russia is able to inject her products into world markets, let him examine the cases of Austria and Poland. Austria recently placed an embargo upon Russian eggs and poultry. By threatening to cancel $1,500,000 worth of orders placed with Austrian machinery manufacturers, the Soviets quickly compelled a lifting of the embargo. Last summer the Russian grain agent purchased a seat on the Vienna exchange and startled Central Europe by offering Russian wheat at 5 per cent less than any competitor. In some cases Danubian grain, which was by no means the dearest on the market, was being offered at 25 cents a bushel more than Russian.

Still more amazing than this is the development in the trade relations between Poland and Russia. Walter Duranty, Moscow correspondent for the New York Times, reports that a delegation of Polish industrial magnates is visiting Moscow on business bent. They want orders for about $20,000,000 worth of Polish goods. This seems utterly astounding in view of the bitter political animosities that have existed between Poland and Russia, and indicates, Mr. Duranty says, that "trade is sometimes thicker than blood."

Nothing illustrates Duranty's aphorism more clearly than the Canadian attitude. Presiding over the London conference will be George Howard Ferguson, avowed foe of the Soviet system. Canada has set its face against Russia more sternly than almost any other country. Last February the government passed an order-in-council prohibiting the importation into Canada from the Soviet Union of coal, pulpwood and lumber, asbestos, and furs. The order based its objections to these products on the fact that the Russian standard of living was below anything conceived of in Canada.

> Broadly speaking [this order asserted], all employment [in Russia] is in control of the Communist Government, which regulates all conditions of work and seeks to impose its will upon the whole world. This is communism, its creed and its fruits, which we as a country oppose and must refuse to support by interchange of trade.

Russia retaliated with an embargo upon Canadian products; and now Canada above all others, because its economic system depends to so great an extent upon the export of wheat, must come to terms with the Soviets or face agricultural and industrial ruin for years to come. Mr. Ferguson has his orders from Premier Bennett to support an international pool, and do his very best to raise the price of wheat in world markets—which is what the Five-Year Plan requires more than almost any other one thing at present.

It is, of course, the pressure brought upon the government by the radical farmers of western Canada that has changed its attitude. The farmers themselves have put forward a plan for control of world markets suggested by Aaron Sapiro, who organized the Canadian wheat pools and most of those in the United States. The Sapiro plan calls first for organization within the wheat-exporting countries for control of a major portion of the crops, and then for organization of an international pool. The world pool, under this plan, would set up a base line for normal consumption, upon which a primary pool would be organized. Then a secondary pool for the world surplus would be carried over from year to year, with each country bearing its part of the loss. If the countries increased their acreage, the increased delivery would be put into the secondary pool. Arrangements would be made with a central banking group to finance the international pool, provided the pool secured actual, exclusive selling control of what would be equivalent to 75 per cent of the world's surplus, both the carry-over surplus and the exportable surplus from coming crops. This is a big program, which proposes to bring the agricultural population of the world into working agreement on a purely economic basis. It waives political prejudices and convictions, and substitutes a picture of immediate realities. Ultimately world peace will be brought about on some such basis—through economic ties rather than through any general agreement on political policies.

It is extremely questionable, however, whether this will appeal to Washington. If it were not for the failure of American farmers to reduce wheat acreage to any appreciable extent, and the enormous carry-over in the hands of the Wheat Stabilization Corporation, it might be possible for the Farm Board to pursue the Administration policy of making the United States a non-exporting country so far as wheat is concerned. But words and gestures do not seem to dispose of that embarrassing carry-over, and a huge exportable surplus is in sight from the coming crop. A high tariff may keep out cheaper Canadian grain, and still cheaper Russian grain, but it will help not at all in bidding against those supplies in foreign markets.

How much pressure financial interests connected with established grain-brokerage houses can exert to prevent an agreement at London is problematical; but one thing seems certain—if the present Washington Administration makes a false step in connection with the London conference by obviously allowing its prejudice against communism to influence its attitude toward the parley, it must face the accusation of failing to represent the interests of American farmers engaged in wheat-growing. It must also risk condemnation as an enemy of farm interests in all parts of the world. It will be less expensive for Mr. Hoover to be slightly inconsistent and come to an agreement with the Russians than for him to obstruct a world marketing agreement under which the Farm Board grain surplus gradually might be disposed of at a fair price. He can afford to do nothing more toward ruining the farmer.

In the Driftway

CHARLIE CHAPLIN is returning home from Europe leaving a trail of laugh-laden legends behind him. It is impressive evidence of his power as an actor, though it must be tiresome personally at times, that to the world he is real only in his stage make-up—as a tramp with a pathetic mustache and humorous big feet. Is it possible that even Chaplin, if he were asked suddenly to describe the image that he has of himself, would find himself involuntarily describing the tramp?

* * * * *

ONE of the first things that happened to Chaplin on his visit to England and the Continent might have been taken from one of his pictures. He was being followed along a London street by a crowd of curious people, one of whom had recognized him and spread the news. With the two friends who accompanied him, Chaplin ducked into a candy shop to avoid the crowd, and shut the door behind him. But the lady proprietor, summoned from a bit of tea in the back of her shop, not recognizing the tramp and seeing him close the door, immediately surmised a hold-up. She rushed to reopen the door, and when "the little man" asked for some candy she wrapped it up in fear and trembling while she awaited the terrible denouement. Here is a situation which in a film could be made to yield both the pathos and the humor for which Chaplin is justly famous. The idea of the tramp as we know him being followed as a celebrity is humorous and pathetic enough. The idea of that same ineffectual, unlucky tramp being mistaken for a hard-boiled hold-up man is even more humorous and even more pathetic.

MOST of the "situations" in which Charlie has figured during his triumphant visit to Europe have had, however, only the barest basis in any actual occurrence. Apparently, so far as it was possible, he has gone about his business even more circumspectly than any other traveler would do, for the very reason that he wished to avoid attention. But his public—and who is not his public?—has used its imagination and made of every Chaplin move a Chaplin movie. This account from the London correspondent of the Manchester Guardian is typical of the sort of tale Chaplin has given rise to all over Europe.

> . . . This droll has impressed himself so emphatically upon people's minds that they cannot think of him without his "business."
> That must be the explanation of the story I heard from a staid man who was dining at Simpson's in the Strand on Monday night. Two men came in and sat near him at a central table, and he paid no attention to them till he noticed that one of them, who was eating stewed eel, had got the eel somehow entangled round his neck. Then he saw it was Charlie. The staff of the place from the other rooms and the cloakroom attendants crowded in to have a glimpse of Charlie carrying on his lonely fight with the eel, and even Simpson's waiters could not help telling the other diners that that was Charlie over there with the eel. But the elderly diners sitting in the old pews only said "Hey?" and "What?" and "Oh, the cinema fellow" and things like that; then "Bring me the Stilton, waiter," or "I'll have Cheddar tonight," and went on with their meal.
> It couldn't, of course, have been quite like that, but Charlie was at Simpson's and had stewed eel, and Simpson's at night in the men's dining-room when the old English diners are at work is a quiet place.

* * * * *

ONLY once did the Chaplin tales, as reported in the press, depart from their Chaplinesque quality of wistful inadequacy. This was when Charlie was requested—by royal command—to appear in a charity variety performance in London and refused, sending a check instead. He explained that he had not appeared on the stage in person since he had begun to act in the movies; pressed still further, he declared the invitation had not been from royalty but was merely a "request from a music-hall manager named Black to appear in a charity show"; but when the questioners pushed him once more, he showed bitterness that the little man of the films has never shown in all his adversities. "They say I have a duty to England, but I wonder," he said. "Nobody ever cared for me or wanted me in England seventeen years ago. I had to go to America for my chance and I got it there." One is somehow a little sorry that this bit of chagrin slipped out after seventeen years. It is entirely possible that the Chaplin of the London music halls was an altogether different fellow from the clown that millions of movie-goers love. But even if he were the same, it is out of character for Charlie to complain at the turns of fortune. The Charlie who is thrown out of a restaurant, who waits in vain for guests that never come, who is always and invariably the under-dog wins hearts because he will not be other than gallant. He is as irresistibly gallant as Don Quixote. One would like him to remain so.

Correspondence

A School for Peace Workers

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: An Institute of International Relations will be held by the American Friends' Service Committee from June 8 to 20, 1931, at Haverford College, Haverford, Pennsylvania. There will be three basic courses offered on the economic, political, and spiritual aspects of the struggle for world peace, under the leadership of Herbert F. Fraser, professor of economics at Swarthmore College; Edward W. Evans, instructor in international law at the University of Pennsylvania; Leyton Richards, pastor of the Carr's Lane Church, Birmingham, England, and Henry J. Cadbury, professor of Biblical literature at Bryn Mawr College. There will also be courses on the technique of creating attitudes of good-will in local groups, on international issues of the day, and on the effects of military training on world peace, under the direction of Tucker Smith, secretary of the Committee on Militarism in Education, and Dr. A. C. Goddard, executive secretary of the World Peace Commission of the Methodist Episcopal church.

Classes will be held in the morning; the afternoons are reserved for recreation and fellowship, and lectures will be given in the evening. Among the evening speakers will be James G. MacDonald, chairman of the Foreign Policy Association; Frederick J. Libby, executive secretary of the National Council for the Prevention of War; Norman Thomas, executive director of the League for Industrial Democracy; William I. Hull, professor of history in Swarthmore College; and Rabbi Fineshriber.

Complete information with regard to rates may be obtained from the American Friends' Service Committee, 20 South Twelfth Street, Philadelphia.

Townley the Crusader

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: A. C. Townley, former head of the Nonpartisan League, is leading a new crusade through the medium of numerous speeches which he is making in farming communities. He begins usually by presenting a picture of present conditions. On the one hand millions are unable to find work to secure wages and buy food; on the other hand is a surplus of farm products which cannot be sold, with the farmer receiving scarcely enough to pay interest and taxes, let alone enough to purchase manufactured goods of which he is in need. Mr. Townley goes back to the time when flour was ground by the miller for one-eighth of the product; that is, out of eight bushels of wheat ground the miller received one bushel and the farmer took home seven. Today that stipulation is almost reversed and the farmer gets the equivalent of about one bushel. The rest goes mostly to the milling interests and in transportation costs. Similarly in regard to machinery. At one time about seven-eighths of the price paid for a binder, say, went for labor costs. Today those workers get around one-eighth with which to buy the farmer's food products. As a result, the purchasing power of the farmer and of labor has been crippled almost beyond repair. The farmer has been able to keep his purchasing power up only by borrowing huge sums of money on his land. Until recently, when things became too bad, he could always move on to cheaper land and again mortgage it. Today he has no more security to offer, and unless there is a readjustment of economic conditions, serious consequences are likely to follow.

Mr. Townley's program consists of two planks. First, let Congress declare a moratorium on the payment of interest for five years. Second, prevent the payment of dividends or interest on watered stocks or bonds. A fair return would be permitted on the actual investment. For this program the financial structure of the country would need to be entirely recast. The government would loan out needed money and charge only necessary operating costs. International finance would also be affected. The immediate benefits would consist in relieving the burden of interest charges not only against the individual but also on all public debts, which would have its effect in reduced taxes. Elimination of the payment of returns on the watered stock of our big corporations would also result in reducing the costs of manufactured products.

Mr. Townley is now holding meetings in North and South Dakota and Minnesota. His program has a great popular appeal to the farmers of the Northwest. Out of a hundred farmers attending a meeting near here, only one was not paying interest in one way or another. Its appeal to the industrial population is more doubtful.

The local papers do not publish any reports of these meetings, but I thought the readers of The Nation might be interested in this new movement.

The Wrong Name

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Would you be so kind as to note that my name is Howard Baker—not Howard Baxter, as Mr. Cantwell has it throughout his review of my novel "Orange Valley" in your issue of April 15. The review is intelligent, and I do not want to reproach Mr. Cantwell. Still, you will realize that such a mistake is very damaging to me.

Suddenly in the Desert

By IRWIN EDMAN

Suddenly in the desert rose a thought
Of solitude more anguished and profound
Than any silences the soul is taught
By seas of this companionable ground.
Here is not hermitage, only delight
Of space and peace and undiminished seeing,
Nor any darkness but the gleaming night
Peopled with starry plenitude of being.
But there is a loneliness that cities breed,
A hunger only felt in human places,
The young, though locked in love, have known this need,
Old friends divined it in familiar faces.
I thought thus in the desert, and I cried,
Grateful because the sands were still and wide.

There Is No Road Back

The Road Back. By Erich Maria Remarque. Translated from the German by A. W. Wheen. Little, Brown and Company. $2.50.

THOUGH so ticketed, "The Road Back" is not a record of post-war adjustment. It is both more and less than that. Ernst Birkholz, Remarque's mouthpiece, does not genuinely attempt to reconstruct himself in accordance with civilian conventions. Nor do most of his companions. It is too late. The war did not take place in Flanders. It was staged in their blood and bones and there it remains. "That hell of horrors has usurped our hearts." In the trenches a certain civilization was laboriously, agonizingly built up. It was a civilization founded upon the necessity of cooperation in the face of imminent death. It was a culture with its own morals, hierarchy, art, language, history. In four years a soldier became more than a fighting man in a uniform. He became a citizen of Trenchland. He struck roots, roots compact of blood and terror and despair, but roots none the less. That is why Remarque's characters are haunted by a desire to return to the shell holes, to go back to the only native land they know. That is what one of them means when he asks, with simple pathos: "Are we fit now for anything but soldiering?" That is why Albert, when his woman betrays him, shoots to kill—without an arrière-pensée. That is why Ernst has nothing to say to the little children intrusted to his care after the war. There is no bridge between these Trenchlanders and the non-Trenchlanders. To "adjust" themselves is to destroy themselves.

But their dilemma is even more terrible than this. Could they merely ignore these strange civilians, they might perhaps hack out some kind of half-life for themselves. But they cannot ignore them because, for the first time in their lives, they understand them. When the war began they were schoolboys. When it ended they were men. They had had a vision, and it was this vision that was to destroy them utterly. In the face of the last extremity of horror, the eternal rationalizer had been at work. Out of blood and muck they had cemented an ideal. "We went through with it," says one of them, "because there was something deeper that held us together, something that only showed up out there, a responsibility perhaps, but at any rate something of which you know nothing and about which there can be no speeches." Call this something foolishness, sentimentality, if you will—but it was something noble snatched from the jaws of baseness. And it is these men who are asked to accept a post-war world—a world of "patriots," profiteers, and paltry souls. The real, the heartrending tragedy of the returned soldier was that he came back a man into a world which consisted mainly of small-hearted children. How "adjust" yourself to something you have outgrown, something you see through? How swallow a civilization which is nothing but one enormous lie?

Upon the rock of that terrible question Remarque's book bases itself. It is a question stated in terms of the most moving and pathetic drama. The book's verity, its indignation are inescapable. One does not read it. One cowers under it. You cannot tell from it whether Remarque is a great writer or, indeed, whether he is a writer at all. The story jets forth like thick blood from a wound. Is it a work of "art"? Perhaps not. One gets no sense from it that Remarque is larger than his book—one criterion by which to judge great writing. But "The Road Back" does not traffic with the conventional critical canons. The reader's judgment is in abeyance because it wishes to be, because it desires passionately to surrender to this cry, this sob of rage and fury which is denominated a novel. What good the subtle by-play of art? Here is a terrible tale to be told, directly, frontally, quickly. And it is told.

Upon finishing this book I said to myself, as millions will soon be saying: "Who can read this and still believe that there can ever be the slightest justification for any war at any time?" It is, of course, a naive query. That is the keystone of the arch of horror—the fact that such books as "All Quiet" and "The Road Back" are read by millions—and nothing happens. There are honest men in Germany raging at Remarque, cursing him for a poltroon—and they are not subsidized either. I noted a German cartoon the other day which showed Remarque quivering terror-stricken on the floor of his library. A gigantic shadowy German soldier looms up above him. "What do you want?" cries Remarque. "What you have stolen from me," is the reply. "My honor." It is an instructive picture. It makes one realize that the Remarques are not fighting merely a malevolent capitalism; they are fighting a human stupidity, a human grossness so deeply ingrained that four years of blood and sweat have made no impression on it. This stupidity, this grossness, is not the peculiar property of the military mind. The military mind is cruel but it knows what war means. It is the civilian mind which is bestial, blind, hopeless. There is an anecdote told about "All Quiet" which is quite transferable to its sequel. A mild and charming old lady was returning her copy to the lending library from which she had borrowed it. The clerk asked her how she had enjoyed it. "Oh, I thought it was just wonderful," replied the old lady, "but isn't it a shame it couldn't have been written by one of our own boys?" Who was ultimately responsible for the war? Messrs. Krupp, Schwab, Zaharoff and Company? Or the little old lady?

So the capitalistic Times will devote full-page reviews to "The Road Back," and respectables of all kinds will praise it, and half a million people will read it, and ten years from now, when the Senate solemnly meets to save democracy once more, it will be quite, quite forgotten. And I believe that Remarque knows it. It is that knowledge which thickens his pages with despair and which renders abortive his gallant attempt to end his book on a note of poetic stoicism. "Something will always be there to sustain me, be it merely my own hands, or a tree, or the breathing earth." But that is not enough, not nearly enough. One thing more, at least, is needed if he is to live at all—and that is the knowledge that he is accepted as a human being by his fellow human beings. And he is not accepted. Even now as they read his book, they are sneering at him. He has no place. There is no place for a real soldier in a world of Boy Scouts. There is no place for an adult in a world of small-hearted children. There is no road back.

CLIFTON P. FADIMAN

Eighty Years After

James Fenimore Cooper. By Henry Walcott Boynton. The Century Company. $5.

BECAUSE of his strict injunction upon his family there has been no authorized biography of James Fenimore Cooper, the first, the most prolific, and the most widely known novelist in our literature. And the critics and biographers of this age, who have so sedulously undertaken the revaluation of our nineteenth-century men of letters, have either neglected him or dismissed him slightingly. It is time, one agrees with Mr. Boynton, that Cooper be taken back into the fold, a subject for serious consideration.

The present volume takes on the dignity, two generations removed, of an authorized biography. Mr. James Fenimore Cooper, grandson of the novelist, published two volumes of "Correspondence" in 1922. Now he has given Mr. Boynton "full access to a great body of family letters and books and documents, many of which have never been seen by anyone outside the Fenimore Cooper family" and has shown a "sustaining interest" in this book. We are confronted then with a work of first importance, one which should be weighed and criticized as such—a volume which must, from the standpoint of relative history, take precedence over Professor T. R. Lounsbury's "Life" (1885), to be found in the American Men of Letters series, the best biography we have had, but one which is, as its author admits, short on first-hand evidence. And so if no unexpected disclosures vitally affecting the story emerge from Mr. Boynton's study, if the picture that he gives us, though colored of course by the mind and temper of the biographer, differs little from that which Lounsbury and the "Correspondence" have together portrayed, this volume has the negative merit of settling once and for all—so far as the family material can do so—the facts. Whatever there is is here. There is no more—though much, as Mr. Boynton intimates, may have been destroyed.

I think Mr. Boynton has made a good piece of work out of his material in spite of a few irritating slips—poor proofreading, a number of ambiguous, cloudy, or evasive sentences and paragraphs, a gratuitous fling at Poe, a postcript in which sound opinion mingles with a good deal of sweet nonsense, and the like. And with the best intentions in the world, I have no doubt, he has committed the universal sin of authorized biographers—he has lost his sense of perspective. It is a natural result of prolonged concentration on a great man when one has access to source material that one comes to see one's hero in an exaggerated light. In his generalizations Mr. Boynton admits Cooper's failings; but in specific instances he is never able to catch him in any serious fault.

It is apparent, however, that Cooper was a man of substance, character, and quality. He had a fine courage—even though that was warped by prejudice, acerbity, and often bad judgment. He had a splendid gift for friendship and held most of his friends through the thick and thin of his battles with his townsfolk, the press, and in the courts; but he did turn a few into bitter enemies. He loved and was both devoted and just to his wife and children, even though he was a stern believer in the authority of the head of the house, and even though he did resent the desertion of two of his daughters when they married. He was a friend of artists and in a small way a sponsor of art in America, even if he was quite ignorant of its essential values. And he was an honest writer (as witness his account of the Battle of Lake Erie in his Navy History, where he took the unpopular point of view and stirred up a hornets' nest), but often an illogical thinker.

Cooper wrote books to make money as did Scott and Dumas. He was never in the strictest sense a literary man at all. But his work was done in a serious professional spirit, and as an honest craftsman he grew to love it. He did each job as well as he could. The result is a splendid body of work, a permanent contribution to his country's literature. In spite of much bad writing (although I can't say I am sure what that means), and in spite of his many stiff, wooden characters (and we tend to exaggerate here unless we consider also the novels of his contemporaries, the spirit and conventions of the times), he did, as Mr. Boynton points out, write many glorious passages, whole chapters of great beauty. He created unforgettable characters and he recreated pages of history. He did not, as Mr. Boynton claims for him, "invent, for purposes of fiction, the sea and the sailor." Surely Smollett, for one, had preceded him. And the sea and the sailor have been subjects for the tale-teller from time immemorial. But he was the direct forerunner of the more recent romancers of the sea, from Marryat to Conrad. His books live today in a score of languages. Those able to read books that lie outside the spirit of their age—even among educated people, the number would seem to be surprisingly small—will find, I venture to say, if they have not looked into Cooper since youth, a surprise in store for them if they pick up one of the "Leatherstocking" series, or "The Spy," "The Pilot," "Red Rover," or "Wing and Wing." Recently there has been a revival of interest in Dumas. Undoubtedly there will soon be one in Cooper.

In a five-dollar, authorized life of a great American writer a full chronology and a complete bibliography should have been included in addition to the excellent index.

FRED T. MARSH

Jobs—for Gentiles

Christians Only. By Heywood Broun and George Britt. The Vanguard Press. $2.50.

MR. BROUN and Mr. Britt have shown a characteristic courage in thus boldly attacking a problem which they were advised to leave alone. Many Jews expressed the view that discrimination might be strengthened if attention were called to it, but the authors of "Christians Only" hold that truth comes best out of full and free discussion and that the under-cover activity of anti-Semitism should be brought into the open.

We have heard, all of us, that discrimination exists in this country against the Jew, and here we have spread out before us many of the details of this discrimination. That the details are often so trivial constitutes but another commentary on the fantastic capacity of human beings to make life difficult for one another. After a survey of current attitudes from Peter Stuyvesant to Henry Ford, present-day exhibits are offered to the reader under the subjects of liberal education, professional education, employment agencies, employers, clubs, hotels, etc. A great many names are named—more power to the authors—and conclusions regarding the employment situation in New York City are set down specifically: Jews encounter more handicaps downtown than uptown; Jewish women seem to have a slightly harder time than men (that point must be ruled out, since the same is true of Gentile women); highly distinctive names are at a disadvantage; Jews have more difficulty in obtaining secretarial and stenographic work, dictaphone operation, positions with public utilities, railroads, banks, insurance companies, lawyers' offices, brokerage houses, and in department-store salesmanship; lines easier to enter are garment and fur trades, textiles, markets, certified public accounting, manufacturing, moving pictures and theaters, retail stores dealing in drugs, jewelry, and the like, specialty shops, and restaurants. It is stated categorically that "the employment field in New York reeks with bitterness . . . The Jew out of work who is looking for a job in New York faces odds of about ten to one against him." With the first statement I agree, but the second I do not believe. I seriously question whether in normal times unemployment is any more marked among Jewish than among other groups.

Mr. Broun and Mr. Britt have largely been content to present their facts, expecting those facts to speak for themselves. The difficulty with this is that the Jews already know the facts and the Gentiles—by and large—don't care. In the last chapter, The Way Out, it is suggested that intermarriage, a decline in orthodox observances on both sides, exploration of the unconscious, ridicule, and the cultivation of laziness ("after all, only active and energetic people can maintain prejudice"—a sentence which one inevitably ascribes to Mr. Broun) will assist in a solution of the problem. To which I should like to add the resolute suppression by the Jews of the "persecution complex," and the protection of their children, on the ground of mental hygiene, against moving recitals of those old, sad tales of evils in other lands. Jews and Gentiles need together to accept our joint responsibility for making the future better than the past. "Christians Only" is a valiant beginning in the necessary stock-taking. LORINE PRUETTE

Humanity Under Bolshevism

Red Bread. By Maurice Hindus. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $3.50.

MAURICE HINDUS has a simple mind. He understands with his eyes and ears. He cares and knows more about the personal reaction than about politics and problems of national economy. Such a bent, together with a fine gift for dramatization, makes him a master of narrative and description. Under his pen, a scene or a conversation becomes exciting. But he is weak in analyzing a policy and in presenting an abstract idea—in exposition generally. All these characteristics explain his great appeal to an American audience. And for all these reasons "Red Bread" is much better than "Humanity Uprooted." "Humanity Uprooted" answers the need for an elementary account of what might happen to religion, the family, love, and human relations in Bolshevik Russia. But the thinking is often loose; the goal sometimes becomes an accomplished fact; there is too obvious dissociation on the author's part from what he believes or from what, writing as he does, he ought to believe; and analyses suffer from superficiality. "Red Bread," on the other hand, is almost faultless—except, here and there, for some water in the style. And its success is due to the fact that in it Hindus does just what he can do best—tell what he has observed and recount vividly what others have told him.

In "Broken Earth," the best of his books, Hindus described what happened to his native Russian village from the time he left it as a boy until 1925. He showed the first impact of the revolution on the peasantry. Last year he returned to that same village. He found it in the throes of collectivization. Collectivization, Hindus writes, is the "most colossal revolution that mankind has ever witnessed." In the event of even partial achievement, according to Hindus, "it will transfigure Russia as nothing else that the Bolsheviks have launched or have planned to launch." And it is this stupendous process—as important to the rest of the world as to the U. S. S. R.—that Hindus traces. He does it extremely well.

If you think human nature cannot change, read Hindus's story of the peasant youngster who intended to give his added wealth to his father's collective. "We have deposited the word riches in the archives," the boy told Hindus as they both walked barefooted over the dusty country road. Or read the tale of the former landlord who decided with his family that "we must start life over again as though we were newly born," and then joined the kolkhoz, or collective. Normally, human nature undergoes such slight modification that the people with poor mental eyesight claim it does not vary at all. In Russia today, however, and especially under collectivization, the mutations are so marked, so vital, and so far-reaching that no one can miss them. Hindus paints the types and social characteristics which are beginning to emerge. How does the backward "dark" mujik without culture or education fit into a collectivist society? The answer will be found in "Red Bread."

If you think there is no freedom of expression in Russia, read how the peasants poured out their complaints and counter-revolutionary thoughts to Hindus as they fed him milk, black bread, and cucumbers. They do it to anybody who comes along, whether they know him or not. You find the same thing in William C. White's "These Russians" and in the writings of every man who travels up and down the Soviet Union. Hindus has given the black side of collectivization together with the bright side. He has not tampered with or embellished his material. It is fascinating enough without that. The book smells of the soil and the sweat of the Russian village—so loyal has the author been to the original, and so well does he know the original.

I know of no book which excels "Red Bread" in indicating how the Russian peasant's soul and thought are reacting to recent revolutionary developments—his new outlook on religion, on family life, on work, and his new relationship to the Soviets and society. If you doubt that the Bolshevik regime is stable and safe or that collectivization has immediate advantages over mujik farming, read Hindus. Whether he wished it or not, he has done a great service to the revolution and to the cause of spreading the truth about Russia.

Lascelles Abercrombie

The Poems of Lascelles Abercrombie. Oxford University Press. $2.50.

TO avoid tormenting his patience, the reader should turn first to Mr. Abercrombie at his best, which is to be found in the Four Short Plays toward the end of this volume. Then, in order, he should read the plays Judith and Deborah, the Twelve Idyls, three of the shorter dramatic poems—Blind, Mary, and Katrina—and, finally, the light and not very important play Phoenix. The remaining two hundred pages may well be left uncut, for except in occasional lines they are not worth reading.

For the critic, however, Mr. Abercrombie's early work is not without interest, because his final triumph is the triumph of poetry over the "poetic." Obsessed at the beginning by conventional ideas about the content and diction of verse, he presented us with much inflated eloquence on such capitalized abstractions as Memory, Spirit, Awe, Consciousness, Wisdom, Motherhood, Destiny, and "Thirst and his grisly band Of plagues." His pages were filled also with poetic words and phrases: plashy marge, starry gear, high-birtht, bad horde, catcht cold; sware, spake, unware, ken, bewrayed, drave, enow, ware, yare, inly, trow; splitten, loaden; alligartha (for alligator); and the following version of a stubborn but strictly iambic number: "A hundred seven and twenty languages." That the poet should finally have extricated himself from such practices and concluded by writing direct and powerful dramatic verse is a pleasing marvel.

Mr. Abercrombie's mature work is still flawed by the fact that his motive is too obviously symbolic. Neither in the dramatic poems nor in the poetic dramas is he interested in character or situation; it is the moral that juggles the wires. Even in Judith, a reworking of the Biblical tale with skilful emphasis on the effect of her voluntary rape upon her desire for purity, the final speech of Ozias is used to show Judith as a model of "Virginity and Perfection." This limitation is transcended, however, when Mr. Abercrombie, in the Short Plays—The Adder, for example—contrives situations that fuse drama and symbol.

In his own genre Mr. Abercrombie is a good poet and an effective dramatist. Contemporary English poetry is enriched by the personal bouquet of his contribution.

Books in Brief

Contemporary Social Movements. By Jerome Davis. The Century Company. $5.

This is a mammoth reference book of very great utility. We may not know where we are going, but we are certainly on our way to some other social order than the present irresponsible capitalism. Hence, it is highly desirable to become acquainted with the alternatives which are currently proposed. Professor Davis has been a conscientious student of social-reform programs and in this book has brought together a vast body of descriptive and analytical material. He deals with Utopian socialism, Marxian socialism, communism, fascism, the cooperative movement, the British Labor Party, the backwardness of the American labor movement, and the efforts to bring about world peace. The latter he correctly regards as a prerequisite of any sound program of domestic reconstruction. In addition to the textual content there are many relevant quotations from leaders in all the reform movements. The volume thus combines the usefulness of the textbook and the source book. Professor Davis's attitude toward social radicalism is one of discriminating tolerance and fairness. A few criticisms may be leveled against this excellent work. The continuity of Marxian socialism and communism is not quite adequately emphasized. One might well continue with the popular illusion that they are different and independent movements. Syndicalism is given only four or five pages, though it may prove far more important in the future history of man than socialism. Guild and revisionist socialism are also given rather scant notice. Anarchism is overlooked. Doubtless Professor Davis was guided by the criterion of present interest and immediate practicality in making his selection of topics and material. All in all, it is a book which is indispensable to the college student and the citizen who aspires to a civilized view of the world about us.

The Physical Basis of Personality. By Charles R. Stockard. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.50.

Dr. Stockard, an eminent anatomist and embryologist, has in this book attempted to summarize some of the data of experimental embryology. The effort is important in that it is one of the first popularizations of a fascinating field of biological research. More than two-thirds of the book is concerned with animal experimentation. Human analogies are drawn with commendable conservatism. Dr. Stockard is at his best in dealing with the experimental modification of embryonal development. Here he very clearly describes the phenomena of normal growth and the factors producing abnormality. Monstrosities are described, not to amaze the reader, but to illustrate principles the disturbance of which has prevented the formation of a coordinated being with organs in proper functional relationship. Most praiseworthy is Dr. Stockard's constant emphasis of the cooperative action of heredity and environment, which he always considers as two factors working together in the development of any characteristic of an organism. The term "personality" is used very broadly to indicate the structural and chemical make-up of an organism, be it a single cell or a human being. Except for a brief unfortunate passage, discussion of personality in the usual psychological sense is wisely avoided. Too much emphasis is placed on the endocrine glands, and statements are made for which there is no experimental support. It would have been better to have omitted such speculative and controversial material from a popular treatise. Dr. Stockard's designation of human beings as of two types, "linear and lateral," and his description of the characteristic behavior of each type seem too dogmatic for the subject in its present state. The reader will be left with more certain opinions than perhaps the author has.

Benedict Arnold, the Proud Warrior. By Charles Coleman Sellers. Minton, Balch and Company. $3.50.

Mr. Sellers writes in such a lively manner that the serious-minded reader's first impression of his book is likely to be disparaging. As a matter of fact, a good deal of careful and up-to-date research appears to have gone into the preparation of the book, and while little that is positively new about Arnold is presented, Mr. Sellers so manages the details of events as to make them emphasize the salient features of Arnold's character—his self-consciousness and self-seeking, his lack of scruple about means, his quarrelsomeness in his relations with his superiors, and, of course, his extraordinary daring and persistence. The best parts of the book are those dealing with Arnold's early life, his Canadian expedition, and his years in England and elsewhere after American independence had been won. Mr. Sellers wisely avoids searching for remote or novel explanations of Arnold's treason, but contents himself with building his narrative at this point upon the explanations which lie open on the surface of events or are consonant with Arnold's character—namely, his overweening personal ambition, his irritation over the shabby treatment accorded him by Congress, his conclusion that the American cause was on its last legs, and his desire for higher rank and sounder money than America had to offer. The result, while in no sense a whitewashing of Arnold, is a picture which is the better for not being framed in reflections on the morals of the case.

Lord Melbourne. By Bertram Newman. The Macmillan Company. $4.50.

There was need of a new life of Melbourne, and while Mr. Newman does not pretend to have added much to what was already known of Melbourne's career, he has made good use of some recent sources and elaborates effectively the portrait which Strachey paints in his "Queen Victoria." It was as Prime Minister from 1835 to 1841 that Melbourne served England best, for the first years of Victoria's reign fall into that period, and but for the influence which Melbourne acquired over the Queen by his skill and good sense the beginning of the reign might have been disastrous. Mr. Newman is at his best in this part of the story, but he also gives an interesting and readable sketch of Melbourne's early life, his short official service in Ireland while Catholic emancipation was being prepared, and his troubled career as Home Secretary in the period of serious labor outbreaks and the first Reform Bill. The dramatic opportunity, on the contrary, afforded by the passion of Melbourne's wife, Caroline, for Byron has not been adequately seized.

American Negro Poetry. Edited by James Weldon Johnson. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

This is a revised edition of the anthology of Negro poetry first published ten years ago. At that time the book helped to confirm the fact that the Negro had made his very valuable contribution to American poetry. The preface to the first edition gave a complete history of the development of Negro poetry and a critical estimate of the various Negro poets. Such a preface would not be necessary today, for within these past ten years much has been written concerning the Negro and his art. The revised edition is important in that it includes contributions from all the younger Negro poets: Countee Cullen, Langston Hughes, Gwendolyn Bennett, Sterling A. Brown, Arna Bontemps, Frank Horne, Helene Johnson, Waring Cuney. This younger generation is, as Mr. Johnson says, "freer of the approbation or deprecation of their white environment."

Architecture

A Temple of Jehu

"Time is the what with which some dolls are stuffed"

WHEN they built the Chrysler Building they put on a lot of shiny work just for fun; but not so when they built the Empire State. On top there is a "mooring mast," to be sure, but that was just the publicity man's addition of sex appeal. The shiny metal below is the important thing, the strips of chrome-nickel steel that shinny up the frame like streaks of Jehu. They were not meant to be just "ornamental"—they meant business. Allow me by explaining those metal strips to illustrate a certain fundamental change in the old art of architecture. We used to think of it as associated with "eternity," by which we meant only permanence; but now architecture has become completely the child of time. The dance is hardly more so.

This is how it went. When they figured the economics of the Empire State Building, they decided on eighty-five floors. Yet considering the carrying charges on land worth $16,000,000, they could not afford to wait for all those floors to be built. Being Americans they then decided to build all eighty-five in the time usually required for thirty; and that's where the vertical metal strips come in, as one of the refinements for the sake of speed.

These vertical strips were fastened at intervals directly to the frame, and what they did was to carry forward the principle of articulation. They served to divide the window from the wall. To one side of any strip there could go up a column of stone, to the other side a stack of windows with aluminum panels between. No longer did the window have to be fitted to the stone, or the stone cut to an accurate arris at the window opening, since the metal strip covered the edge. See what that meant: if the stone gang was held up by delay, the window gang nevertheless could proceed. Again: the stones could come from the quarry ready-cut, since there was no further fitting to be done on the job. In short, there was almost such a thing at the Empire State as a factory assembly of standard units. It would have been complete, I believe, except for a few obstacles such as pernicious labor habits and the Building Code.

MEN AND FORCES OF OUR TIME
by VALERIU MARCU

Eden and Cedar Paul, distinguished translators of this volume, say of the author "Though Marcu is unique, there is in his writing a curious mingling of the flavors of Montaigne and Strachey—which means that Marcu is a great writer, and not just a man of the fleeting moment." In this book of ideas, knitted together by a red thread of present day personalities, Marcu uses Kemel Pasha, Mussolini, Lenin, Chesterton, Clemenceau and other contemporary giants as springboards for his agile mind. $2.50.

TROTT AND HIS LITTLE SISTER
by ANDRÉ LICHTENBERGER
Introduction by Dorothy Canfield Fisher

Thousands of readers in every country in Europe have taken Trott to their hearts, critics have hailed it as a classic of childhood, psychologists have recognized it as one of the most useful guides to parents in child training and understanding. It is published now for the first time in English. "An exceedingly valuable piece of work done with the charm of the French writer and the insight of the psychologist."—H. A. Overstreet. "The priceless feeling of childhood is there in great depth of charm and amusement."—Laurence Stallings, The Sun. $2.50.

18 East 48th St. THE VIKING PRESS New York City

The Empire State has sixty-seven elevators, traveling 1,000 feet a minute and timed so that in each bank a car leaves every twenty seconds. This enormous core of swift transportation occupying nearly a third of the "cubage" embodies another story, telling how the building got its shape; time entered once more in the choice of a location, and in the guise of "obsolescence" it will cause the building's death. Time is the important fourth dimension of our new buildings, and it is just as integral as the materials are.

Yet I have chosen just the illustration of the metal strips because they worked over so beautifully into the design. While serving their humble use, they flash wonderfully in the sun; they make the character of the enterprise manifest; in their swift upward streak they tell the story—Organization! Speed! When at the top and bottom and in the lobby the designers tried allegory and decoration, they seemed to be merely fumbling around. This despite the fact that Shreve, Lamb, and Harmon are among our keenest planners of buildings—or because of it.

The Shrinking of Personality

IT has been my experience this week to see, one after another, a number of films in which the principal part was played by a famous actor. The actors included George Arliss, John Barrymore, and, among the lesser lights, Constance Bennett and Jack Holt. As I now try to recall my main impressions I am struck by a rather puzzling fact. None of the popular actors I saw stands out before me as a personality with whom I had a direct and all but physical contact. I know that on the stage some of these actors and others of equal gifts were and are able to escape the shell of the characters they represent and to fill the entire theater with their own beings, so that one feels as if one almost touched them. More phantom-like, but no less expansive and penetrating, were the personalities of the famous stars that radiated from the silent screen. Although the constant stressing of personal appeal was motivated by commercial aims and helped to cramp the progress of the silent film, there can be no question of the success of the producers in establishing their screen stars not merely as favorites with the public, but as personalities that somehow (sometimes, no doubt, through mere inflation) transcended their screen characters and came into a direct contact with the audience. The appeal of Chaplin, Fairbanks, Mary Pickford, Pola Negri, or Jannings in the old days of silent films had that quality of expansion.

The situation with the talking pictures seems to be paradoxically different. The personal magnetism of the actor has lost its force. His entire personality has shrunk to something that is only a little more than the character he represents. This does not necessarily mean that his personality is completely submerged in the character. More often than not the reverse is actually the case, and the same George Arliss, for instance, will be seen in a number of characters that differ but little from one another, being merely variations of Mr. Arliss's acting personality. This may be set against Mr. Arliss as an actor, for resourceful and accomplished as he is, emotionally he is always the same ("The Millionaire" at the Winter Garden is a case in point). But I doubt that his failure to loom as large from the speaking screen as he does from the stage, and as he probably would from the silent screen, is due to any lack of magnetism in his acting personality. The reason, I am inclined to think, lies rather in the curious effect that the addition of mechanical speech has had on the relationship between the screen actor and the audience. The change in the actor's position has been made in two diametrically opposed directions. On the one hand, he has returned to the stage methods of acting and story-telling. On the other hand, he has stepped beyond the conventional stage settings into the world of natural surroundings. The same world existed in the silent picture. Yet only the addition of speech has taken it right out of the theater building, away from immediate contact with the audience, and placed it in a space of its own. Bound to his surroundings the actor, too, has become more remote, with the consequent loss in intimacy, in direct contact, and in the unobstructed flow of the magnetic force that conveys to the spectator the actor's power and stature.

The same shrinking of personality that was noticed in Mr. Arliss is also seen in John Barrymore. Excellent as he is in his flamboyant theatricalism in "Svengali" (Hollywood), he never succeeds in coming off the screen. And here, as an actor, he also suffers in another sense. Mr. Barrymore's acting has an unmistakable rhythmic quality, although not always quite precise and certain in its pattern. Gordon Craig, writing of Henry Irving, described this quality as "the dancing and singing of one's role." But it is obvious that a rhythmic pattern built on the stage cannot be transferred bodily to the screen. In fact, it must be completely rebuilt in obedience to the entirely different principle of screen rhythm. No such attempt was made in the case of Mr. Barrymore in "Svengali," and what emerges from the screen, striking as it is in individual scenes, lacks the swing and rhythmic unity of histrionic display that belong to this type of acting on the ordinary stage.

One cannot apply the same standard of acting to Miss Constance Bennett, but able actress that she is, she seems to be constantly miscast. In "Born to Love" (Mayfair) she is seen again in one of those maudlin parts of a helpless, suffering beauty, suffering largely because of the stupidities of the plot. A little more character and strength would make Miss Bennett into a more believable and interesting woman. But, then, Hollywood has its own standards of interest and credibility.

"Subway Express" (Globe) is not remarkable for any individual acting, but deserves praise for excellent comedy and flowing direction.

Drama

The Pulitzer Prize Play

THE Civic Repertory Theater, which had announced that at the end of the present season it would take a year's recess, closed recently with tears and triumph. There were real tears, I am told, shed not only by certain members of the permanent cast who found it painful to be doing for the last time what had been done so often and so well, but by many spectators whose devotion, coming now to a climax, had to express itself thus. The regret of anyone over the absence of Miss Le Gallienne and her company for two summers and a winter must be real enough. Yet that regret may be tempered for the moment by the circumstance that the closing hour has not quite arrived after all. The old theater on Fourteenth Street is as dark as any tomb, but light still flickers on eleven members of the cast who have taken "Alison's House" uptown to the Ritz Theater for a few weeks—or as long as there are people left with curiosity as to the merits of the Pulitzer prize play for 1930-31.

Those merits seem to be mighty few. Susan Glaspell's pen never moved more languidly than it moved through the composition of this false, sentimental piece about the life-after-death of Emily Dickinson. Miss Glaspell has written before, and written better, about the influence of a dead woman upon her family and friends. It is an interesting theme, if a somewhat artificial one, and much might be done with it. But very little has been done in the present instance, and the little that has been done is offensively false. For two intelligent and dreary acts we sit watching the family of Alison Stanhope (Emily Dickinson) get ready to move out of the house in Iowa (Massachusetts) where she once wrote all her poetry. Her brother, her sister, and several nieces and nephews let us know in turn, and at great length, how they feel about the moving. That is about all that happens until the third act, when a sudden excitement is generated by the discovery of an old wallet full of poems which have never been published. The poems have remained all along in the possession of Agatha, Alison's surviving sister, who years ago received them from their author with the injunction to burn them. She has never been able to give them to the flames, however, and now at the moment of her death the most she can do is thrust them into the hands of Elsa, a niece of Alison's who—the point is very clearly labored—has "faced life," unlike her aunt, who only evaded it and wrote poetry about it. Elsa, in other words, has not refused the lover who offered himself. Well, it is Elsa who breaks the wallet open and reads—and finds in two minutes the "secret" of Alison. In these wonderful poems—they are the most wonderful, of course, she ever wrote—the "story" is told, and told so clearly that Elsa can only gasp and weep as the sheets flutter one by one to the carpeted floor.

Emily Dickinson has suffered many indignities from her biographers, but none so heavy-handed as this. The falseness of the play consists in its saying so simply that a great poet—whether it is Emily or Alison does not matter—is personal in this fashion. No known poet has ever been dissected by a literary surgeon so skilful that he could pause and say: "This part, gentlemen, is the person and this part the poet." Artists do not reveal themselves, or use themselves, or perhaps know themselves, that well; and usually we shall find that they have had other things to bother about in their art than their strictly private affairs. So in special degree with Emily Dickinson, who to be sure gave up a lover and left her manuscript to be burned by an unmarried sister, but whose recently published "love poems" are more of a mystery than biography will ever solve. The more we know about her, the less we know about the significance of her poems to herself—except that we do know their immense significance to her as poetry.

Miss Glaspell has written, of course, intelligently, and Miss Le Gallienne, who takes the part of Elsa, has both acted and directed with her accustomed competence. But "Alison's House" has none of that vitality and truth which we have a right to expect of a Pulitzer prize play, and which as a matter of fact might have been detected in half a dozen plays passed over by the committee of judges. To say more would be contempt of court; and useless. MARK VAN DOREN

"Devil in the Mind," a play by Andreyev which subscribed to no current fashion, was recently taken off the boards after a week of poor houses. It deserved better treatment, for it was much more interesting and clear than Andreyev usually is, and Leo Bulgakov, playing the mad part of Dr. Kerjen, offered a specimen of acting such as we seldom have a chance to see. His only defect was that he muted the end of perhaps one sentence in every three. This seemed real enough, since one could be convinced that the doctor as Mr. Bulgakov played him must have talked thus; but it was often important that the audience hear what was being said. The fact that it could not do so must have had something to do with the failure of an otherwise valuable piece. M. V. D.

SNOWDEN'S BUDGET

Are the ideas of an American Philosopher and Economist to rule Great Britain? Maybe! Chancellor Philip Snowden, making plain his adherence to the ideas of HENRY GEORGE, has united Laborites and Liberals in Parliament behind his proposals for a valuation, for taxation purposes, of the land of Great Britain. His purpose is a gradual transfer to land monopoly of taxes now levied upon thrift, business and industry. This program will be espoused as well as opposed passionately. A great fight has started. People here and elsewhere should keep track of it. To do so intelligently, you should read the books of HENRY GEORGE, especially "PROGRESS AND POVERTY", of which millions of copies have been sold throughout the world.

A New South Africa

By R. S. ALEXANDER

Cape Town, April 15

WITH the current session of Parliament the history of South Africa enters a new phase. The old Cape franchise, the retention of which was specially fought for at the time of union twenty years ago, will within the next few weeks have disappeared as an effective political instrument. Hitherto, white males over twenty-one have been admitted to the franchise in the three other provinces of the Union, while the Cape retained its small property or wage qualification and the ability to read and write as the basis for a franchise which included all males, whether white, Indian, Malay, Chinese, colored, or native, who conformed to these requirements. This franchise did actually give the non-white elements the deciding majority in certain constituencies. Accordingly, while the Nationalists always railed against it, the South African Party, having managed to secure for itself the support of Dr. Abdurahman, himself a Malay and an adroit and skilful leader of the Cape colored people, was careful to dissociate itself from any open attempt to restrict or remove this franchise. The 1930 session of Parliament, however, found the party in a dilemma. A bill for the enfranchisement throughout the Union of all white women over the age of twenty-one was brought forward as a non-party measure by the Prime Minister. The South African Party was pledged as a party to support votes for women, but as the Government had announced previously that in the event that women received the vote the colored women would be included, the measure as it appeared took it unaware. As a change in the constitution the bill required a two-thirds' majority of both assembly and senate, sitting together. This was easily obtained, the few dissentients being those who represented constituencies with a determining colored vote. By this change, of course, the strength of the colored vote was definitely lessened in all constituencies.

The full implications of the measure did not, however, dawn on the country as a whole until it became clear that this was a short cut, and an extremely clever one, to the extension of the same franchise to all the white males of the Cape over the age of twenty-one. A bill to this effect is now before Parliament, and there is no doubt whatever that it will become the law of the land. When it is so, all white men and women in the Cape over twenty-one except criminals and lunatics will have a vote, whereas no colored women will have a vote, and only such colored men as possess the old Cape qualifications. These, as regards the literacy test, have up to now been more or less nominal, but hints are forthcoming that in future the test will be far more meticulously applied. This policy, in a country where elementary education is compulsory for whites only, and where thousands of colored and native children are unprovided with any form of schooling, is grimly significant of the new attitude of frank cynicism toward the rights of the non-whites that is the distinguishing feature of public policy in South Africa today.

The native bills are at present before a select committee and will not be considered this session. But of their main provisions there is no doubt, or that these will be passed by a majority of both houses sitting together. Their net result will be to disfranchise the natives of the Cape, giving them as their sole link with Parliament six senators elected by themselves from among the whites of the country. Even the subjects on which these representatives may speak and vote are, however, to be specifically laid down and restricted. A measure at present in committee stage, indicative of the definitely repressive policy now entered upon, is the Native Service Contract Bill. Under this bill, which applies especially to natives living on farm lands, "the native guardian of any native male who is or appears to be not more than eighteen years of age," or of any native female to whom the same applies, may bind this minor native over by verbal or written contract without any supervision or investigation. If the control of any land on which natives have been allowed to live passes into other hands, the new employer takes over these so-called labor tenants as of right. The labor tenant, it is true, "may, within three months after having ascertained that the control of such land has passed to another employer, terminate such contract." But it is not laid down that it is the duty of the new employer, or of the old one, to notify the labor tenant of the change. There are many other fairly severe regulations in the act, contravention of any one of which is by a special section made punishable by a whipping not exceeding five strokes. A farmer is unlikely to invoke the aid of the nearest police station, perhaps many miles away, in such a case. The section is commonly taken as legalizing floggings by farmers of native servants, which have hitherto been controlled by the natives' right of appeal to the law.

The temper behind legislation such as this, a temper twenty years ago utterly impossible to the Cape, is now widespread. In the matter of public health, for example, the lack of medical attention in the country districts and the terrific infantile mortality among the natives are matters of perpetual comment on the part of doctors and missionaries. "We are spending more on cattle diseases than on the relief of sickness among native people," is a statement made recently by a well-known missionary. During the years 1927-28 there were in the Orange Free State no cases of plague among Europeans; among non-Europeans there were thirty-four cases with twenty-seven deaths. There were in the same district in the same year 52 cases of typhus among Europeans with no deaths; among non-Europeans there were 1,279 cases with 208 deaths. Again, the present depression has led to an increase in the number of applicants for old-age pensions. From this benefit all natives and Asiatics are excluded. But even the colored people, not a large number, who do benefit, receive only £9 a year if their income is under £27 a year, and no pension at all if their income is £33 a year or more. Whites, however, receive a pension of £30 a year with an income of £24 a year

The Pure in Heart

The Pure in Heart, a novel as honest and moving as its title, tells the story of a spiritual man in a non-spiritual universe. The locale is Vienna. It might be New York or Detroit. Ferdinand, the protagonist, might be your brother, son—or he might be you.

In Europe, hundreds of thousands of people this past year have lived for days and weeks with The Pure in Heart. It has been acclaimed by the press from Lithuania to Portugal.

Now it is available in English.

or less, while the income above which they receive no pension is £51.

Against the tacit assumption behind legislation, neglect and repression that the natives are a negligible part of the South African nation, except in so far as they are economically useful, the courts themselves are not proof. A native snatched a girl's bag from her and received a six months sentence of hard labor. A farmer discharged a loaded rifle at a native laborer on his farm because the native refused to obey an order to plow his land, saying, "It is the day for plowing our own lands." The farmer shot the native in both feet, inflicting injuries which deprived the native of the use of his feet for more than six months and which may leave him a cripple. The magistrate, in sentencing the farmer, fined him fifteen pounds or six weeks' imprisonment with hard labor. A native who was one of a gang that robbed and assaulted a storekeeper was sentenced to five years' hard labor and six strokes. A farm manager, not yet sentenced, has been committed for trial for shooting through the knee a native who had a stick in his hand which the accused ordered him to throw away. The native refused, as he was merely resting the stick on the ground, and the farm manager then proceeded to fetch his gun and shoot the native. But the most outstanding case of injustice recently is perhaps that in which a white man and a native woman were brought before the same circuit court on consecutive days, charged with cohabitation, which between white and native is an indictable offense. The native woman pleaded guilty and was given a severe sentence; the white man pleaded not guilty and was acquitted.

DISAPPOINTING and disheartening is the five to four decision of the Supreme Court in barring Dr. Douglas C. Macintosh, a former Canadian war chaplain, and Miss M. A. Bland, a former nurse with the American army in France, from citizenship because of their refusal to swear that they would bear arms in defense of the country. Dr. Macintosh declared that he did not wish to put his conscience in the keeping of a Congress; he might go to war again, but he wished to reserve the decision for himself. Particularly disappointing is the fact that the new justice, Owen J. Roberts, sided with the reactionaries of the court, especially as Chief Justice Hughes joined Justices Stone, Brandeis, and Holmes in dissenting. Had Justice Roberts voted with them, the United States would have taken a memorable step forward in exalting the right of conscience in checking the steady infringement of the modern state upon the liberties of its citizenship. At least we must express our unreserved gratitude to Mr. Hughes; we should be delighted, indeed, if history should have the privilege of recording him as a great liberal Chief Justice. Meanwhile, we do not give up hope that this decision will be reversed. Others as important have been. Moreover, there are increasing numbers of Americans within the citizenry of this country who will refuse in the event of another war to put their consciences in pawn and will prefer jail to taking part in any mass murder under whatever sanction or however unctuously justified by those who wish to prove America's supremacy by force.

THE REFUSAL of the Board of Trustees of Ohio State University to renew its annual contract with Professor Herbert Adolphus Miller, of the department of sociology, raises a straight issue of academic freedom. Not in years has the question whether a professor shall have the right to call his soul his own been so clearly presented. It is therefore of the utmost importance to every teacher in the United States. The grounds of Professor Miller's offense are two: that he made a speech in India to the followers of Gandhi in which he said that public opinion in the United States was eagerly watching the Gandhi experiment; and that he was one of the leaders in the recent agitation to abolish compulsory military training at the university. It is the latter offense which bulks largest. On Thursday, May 14, as we reported in The Nation of May 27, the faculty of Ohio State voted by 83 to 79 to ask the Board of Trustees to make military drill optional. Five days later President Rightmire called another meeting for consideration of the vote. By 141 to 64 the faculty then reversed its position, but only after a resolution had been introduced in the House of Representatives calling for a legislative investigation of "those faculty members supporting the optional-drill movement," and after Colonel Grosvenor Townsend, head of the force of fifty-two regular army officers and non-commissioned officers detailed to the university, had made an address in which he denounced as Communist the undergraduate opposition to compulsory drill.

THE STUDENTS' PETITION against compulsory drill, signed by 700 undergraduates, having been forwarded to the trustees, the board promptly rejected it and declared that since the university "was established for the purpose of enlarging and enriching the lives of those who might avail themselves of the opportunities it offers," therefore the board saw no reason to change this requirement of compulsion to military drill. It further opined that

> The board feels that the university should not be subjected to emotional criticism because of the unripe vociferations of a small group of students and a very few members of the faculty, who are under no compulsion to come here and under none to remain unless they can subscribe to the fundamental purposes of this university.

This was followed by a statement from the president blaming certain members of the teaching staff for failing "to exert the sane and wholesome influence on the students which members of the faculty have the opportunity to exercise." He then evidenced his complete unfitness for the position he holds by writing in conclusion: "A great university is here within our grasp if we will attend only to the big worth-while projects, and put first things first." In any other country, we believe, a university head who failed to see that academic freedom is the most precious thing in the life of any university could not hold his place a week.

PRESIDENT HOOVER has again refused to call an emergency session of Congress to work out an adequate program for unemployment relief. In his statement to the press he admitted that the public demand for such a session has been growing, but he contended that "we cannot legislate ourselves out of a world economic depression." Mr. Hoover misstates the issue. The question has nothing to do with a possible solution of the world's economic problems; it concerns itself solely with the responsibility of the American government to the American people. Six million persons and their dependents are in distress because of unemployment. Other millions are faced with increasing difficulties because of their sharply reduced incomes. Private charity, Mr. Hoover's pet method of relief, has not done enough; the greater part of the burden has been thrown upon municipal and county governments. The municipalities themselves may not be able to carry the load much longer; they are finding it difficult to collect taxes; their deficits are growing. Congress can help by getting to work immediately. It would then have time to put a comprehensive and adequate program into operation before cold weather comes. A program of this sort, as Senator La Follette has pointed out, could and should provide for financial assistance to cities and States in extending direct relief, for an extensive public-works program, for workable farm-relief legislation, reduction of the tariff, increases in the income- and inheritance-tax rates to finance public construction and direct relief, and legislation to create a national economic council to assist in stabilizing industry and agriculture. If this is not done, and we pass through another hard winter which may be marked by hunger riots and other disturbances, the blame will be almost exclusively with Mr. Hoover.

PLAIN TALK ON BUSINESS becomes commoner as the depression drags its length along. At the recent meeting of the American Iron and Steel Institute Charles M. Schwab, optimist-in-chief to the American people, exuded his usual bright hopes for the future, only to be followed by James A. Farrell, president of the United States Steel Corporation, who, speaking extemporaneously, after agreeing with Mr. Schwab, delivered himself of these homely remarks:

> I am not going to mention the names of all of the companies in this room that have cut wages; I do not want to embarrass them; but I think it is a pretty cheap sort of business [to cut wages 10 per cent on a three-day week].
> There is not a single line in the steel business today, in my opinion, where there is an adequate cost return on finished materials.
> I said a year ago . . . that if this thing kept on I doubted if any steel manufacturers in the United States could earn a dividend on common stock. I say now at present prices they are not earning dividends on preferred stock.

So it went throughout Mr. Farrell's denunciations of his business associates for cutting prices under stress of depression. But the next day, speaking over the radio on behalf of the National Foreign Trade Council, Mr. Farrell cooed as softly as any sucking dove: "I am convinced that our worst experiences are behind us and that we are gradually entering upon a period of increasing trade activity." What happened overnight?

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY raised an issue of first-class importance in his radio address on May 23, when he hinted at a broader base for the income tax, and looked in the fiscally sound but socially doubtful direction of increased taxes on lower incomes, and of taxes ultimately paid by people on the basis of their consumption, not of their wealth. If it ever comes to pass that Mr. Mellon makes specific proposals, they will need the most careful scrutiny in the light not alone of their revenue results, but of their economic consequences. Too many of Mr. Mellon's tax ideas have presented weird features in the past and, despite his reputation among business men, too many of his suggestions have been disproved or falsified to make it possible to give him a free hand. In his address Mr. Mellon admitted that there will be a deficit in 1932 as well as the terrific one this year. Instead of asking directly for higher taxes, however, he demanded a "better-balanced" system of revenue. He suggests that the wide variations in federal revenue are due to our too great reliance on the individual income tax in its present form, under which 97 per cent of income-tax receipts come from the 380,000 persons having incomes above $10,000. He rightly criticizes our treatment of capital gains and losses in the income tax as greatly increasing the fluctuation of receipts with the rise and fall of the stock market. But he offers no specific proposals of tax change whatsoever; perhaps he will let us have them later.

STATEMENTS THAT FILIPINO political leaders have abandoned their demand for immediate independence should be received with something more than caution, in view of the variety and complexity of the economic interests involved in the question. American beet-sugar growers in recent years have had a sudden access of enthusiasm for human liberty in the Philippines, in view of the marked progress made in the American market by Philippine sugar under the free admission that it now enjoys, and their sentiments are shared by producers of dairy products and cotton, who have also felt the breath of Philippine competition. On the other hand, Americans with capital invested in the sugar fields and the other industries of the islands naturally feel keenly the dangers to the Filipinos involved in turning them loose in a world filled with wicked Japanese and other people eager to gobble up rich and "unprotected" tropical islands, to say nothing of the unreadiness of the Filipinos to manage their own affairs. In view of the renewed anti-independence propaganda, welcome to an Administration that regards independence as "an injustice to the people," there is special interest in the new Philippine nationalist movement launched some months ago by Manuel Roxas, speaker of the Philippine legislature, which proposes "to take the course that we should take were we independent." It intends, in a word, to develop a self-sufficient national economic life as far as possible, evidently with a view to lessening the dependence on the United States fostered by the growth of industries that depend on the free-trade American market. This is answer enough, perhaps, to the statement that the Filipinos do not want independence.

POLAND HAS BEEN severely censured by Foreign Minister Henderson of England, sitting as president of the League of Nations Council, for its attitude toward the dispute over the German minority in Upper Silesia. Last January the Council instructed Poland to answer the complaint of Germany concerning the treatment of German citizens during the November elections. Warsaw delayed filing its report until four days before the Council's session was to end, and then demanded that it be accepted as it stood. For this Poland was rebuked by Mr. Henderson speaking "in the name of the League." He took the Polish representative to task for delaying the report, declared he did not know whether the report satisfied all the Council's demands, and added that Poland could not be absolved of responsibility for future developments in Upper Silesia if the Council refused to accept the report without further examination. Consideration of the report was put over until September. The Council submitted to the World Court a dispute between Danzig and Poland over the treatment accorded Polish residents of the free city. Rumors had arisen that Poland planned to send a police force into Danzig to protect its citizens, and this alarmed both Danzig and Germany, the latter because it hopes some day to see Danzig restored as a German city and therefore looks with undisguised disfavor upon any attempt of Poland to encroach upon its independence. Instead of sending policemen to Danzig, however, Poland sent a strong protest to Geneva, and the Council at once referred the dispute to The Hague.

THREE ALIEN RADICALS have been ordered deported to their native lands, where they face certain punishment and perhaps death, not wholly because they hold political views incompatible with the philosophy of a capitalist society, but because the Department of Labor insists on putting a strict interpretation of the law above principles and human rights. With Guido Serio, whose case has already been discussed in these columns, Tao Hsuan Li, Chinese student, and Sadaichi Kenmatsu, Japanese laborer, make up the trio of unfortunate aliens. Li was attending New York University when he was arrested by two Department of Labor agents and taken to Ellis Island to await deportation as a Communist. Kenmatsu was employed as a berry-picker in California when a like fate befell him. All three men have asked that they be allowed to depart peacefully and at their own expense for Russia, instead of being sent to their home countries, Italy, China, and Japan, where Communists are today being openly persecuted. But the United States government refuses to take such a humane stand. The courts have been asked to overrule the Labor Department (the Serio case has been pending for several months; the others were lately taken to court); but so far decisions in the lower courts have upheld the Department of Labor.

DESPITE THE DECISION of the United States Supreme Court in the Yetta Stromberg case, it is still illegal to display a red flag in California for propaganda or similar purposes. In setting aside the conviction in this case the court merely held that the conviction was invalid because it had been obtained under a State law, one of the essential clauses of which is unconstitutional. This clause, making it a felony to display the traditional revolutionary banner as a symbol of opposition to organized government, was considered by the court to be "repugnant to the guaranty of liberty contained in the Fourteenth Amendment." By inference, however, the court ruled that the other two major clauses of the statute are still valid, so that convictions can still be had under the notorious "red-flag" law if in bringing charges against accused radicals the authorities disregard the first clause. The still valid clauses make it a felonious offense to display a red flag as a means of inviting or stimulating anarchistic action, or for the purpose of promoting propaganda of seditious character.

THE LATEST ENCYCLICAL to be issued from the Vatican, known as "Quadragesimo Anno," has caused furious comment from the Socialists. The Pope has reiterated the Catholic position that one may not be a good Catholic and a good Socialist at the same time. This in spite of the fact that the church has many points in common with Socialist doctrine. This strongly asseverated incompatibility is certain to raise some interesting questions in political parties throughout the world. To be specific, if Alfred E. Smith had been elected president of the United States, could he have named a member of the Socialist Party to one of the federal commissions requiring the services of an expert of whatever political faith? Can a professing Catholic, who would not feel finally bound by the mere suggestion of his priest that he might be expected to vote for Mayor Walker, continue to maintain his preference at the polls for Norman Thomas or Heywood Broun? Communism the Pope calls the "enemy of the church and of God himself." When one recalls the early Christians who were said to have held all their modest goods in common one is reminded anew that the Catholic church is a law unto itself. It rules that men should earn enough to support their families because women ought to confine their major energies to the home; it declares that "unemployment is a dreadful scourge"; it urges that employer and employed "join in their plans and efforts to overcome all difficulties." These are counsels of perfection, but the difference with the Socialists is a matter of hard fact and definite counsel. Will it be obeyed?

DOROTHY DIX, not so well known as Mrs. Elizabeth Meriwether Gilmer, who writes advice to the lovelorn and unhappily wed, has just been awarded an honorary degree of Doctor of Letters by Oglethorpe University. This reminds us that the last word on honorary degrees was said a short while ago by that astute commentator on public affairs and national nonsense, Mr. Will Rogers, the lariat-thrower. Mr. Rogers, it appears, was offered the degree of L.H.D., Doctor of Humanities, by Oklahoma City University. Explaining that the highest degree he would accept would be A.D.—Doctor of Applesauce—from the Oolagah (Oklahoma) Kindergarten, Mr. Rogers, in a wire to the Daily Oklahoman, declined in this wise:

> What are you trying to do? Make a joke out of college degrees? They are in bad enough repute as it is, without handing 'em around to comedians. The whole honorary-degree thing is the "hooey." I saw some college giving Mellon one, and he is a billion bucks short. I got too much respect for people that work and earn 'em to see 'em handed around to every notorious character.

This about covers the subject from every possible angle. But the season is soon to be upon us again, and we shall see a new crop of Congressmen, best-seller writers, famous movie stars, and newspaper columnists stepping up to get their sheepskins and the right to wear a fancy colored hood to the academic gown that, in many cases, they never earned. We accordingly propose another degree for Mr. Rogers: C.S.D.—Doctor of Common Sense—and the universities ought to fall over one another in their rush to bestow it.

Down with the Tariffs!

At last great and inspiring news of progress toward sanity and sanitation has come out of Europe! The session of the European Union Commission, brought into being by Aristide Briand just one year ago amid much scoffing and positive assurances that nothing worth while could come out of it, was adjourned on May 21 with an ovation for M. Briand and, what is more important, with a remarkable record of achievement which the British Foreign Minister, Mr. Henderson, declared proved "the immense value of M. Briand's idea," and rendered enthusiastic this representative of a government which was entirely cool when the union was formed a year ago. Still more, as a result of the sympathetic hearing and treatment given to the Russian representative, M. Litvinov, the New York Times correspondent was able to quote a conservative League of Nations official as declaring that now "for all practical purposes Russia has become a full member of the League's economic organization."

This in itself would have been a most satisfactory result. But let us look at what the meeting actually did. It adopted "a vast program of intensive economic action." This includes a serious and friendly study of the Russian proposals to end economic aggression and enmity between Russia and the capitalist nations, with the goal of putting an end to the dumping excitement. Next came the creation of a subcommittee on economic coordination to meet in Geneva on July 6; the calling of a general meeting on June 10 to act on the disposal of the pending European wheat surpluses; the approval of the continuance of the tariff-reduction negotiations between Great Britain and other countries; the appointment of a special subcommittee to deal with the plight of Austria and to alleviate its distress; the appointment of a special committee to aid the League of Nations Financial Committee to obtain effective financial cooperation among the European nations; the indorsement of an agricultural preferential-tariff plan to insure better prices for Central and Eastern European grain, and also—even this does not exhaust the list of constructive steps—the creation of a committee of six to study with six members of the governing body of the International Labor Office the problems of unemployment and international distribution of labor.

Equally striking was the action of the Council of the League of Nations on May 19 in electing Mr. Henderson president of the World Disarmament Conference which meets in February next. Of all the delegates who will attend that conference we venture to assert that no one will come to Geneva more determined to produce a real result than Mr. Henderson. In his speech at Queen's Hall in London in February last, Mr. Henderson made the most explicit promises that the British government would leave no stone unturned to achieve success for its disarmament desires at the conference, and rightly stressed the success of that conference as being the most vital need of the world today in the field of international relations.

Finally, Mr. Henderson made the week ending May 23 a most notable one by his magnificent denunciation of the tariffs which are strangling Europe and doing more to continue the existing world depression than any of the other six causes which are the major reasons for the world's economic suffering at this time. The press reports that his speech "was the most eloquent ever delivered at Geneva, and the most forceful appeal for action on behalf of suffering humanity ever heard in a League meeting." At last it would appear as if statesmen's feet were beginning to be set in the right direction! Mr. Henderson rightly referred in his speech to the existing tariff conditions as "a state of economic war" and branded the policy of nations which try by every means to keep out foreign goods as a "policy of madness." "I repeat," he said, "that among the different causes contributing to the world depression the magnitude and the high level of protective tariffs rank first and foremost." He then went on to denounce the principal creditor countries of the world, which refuse to accept goods which the debtor countries have to offer, shut their eyes to the fact that international trade must take the form of barter, and at the same time have "insisted on payment not in goods, but in gold," and thereby "largely contributed to the recent catastrophic fall in prices." Finally, he said, "this sequence of tariffs, payment of debts, and the scramble for gold is sapping the very foundations of our economic system."

These are noble words, noble truths, bravely spoken. They come as a breath of sweet, fresh air in the fetid atmosphere of hatred, ill-will, and deadly economic nationalism which has been poisoning all Europe, and everywhere endangering the very existence of the nations of the earth. But there is nothing in these words to make an American proud. Mr. Henderson went out of his way to say that the world owed "an undying debt of gratitude to the great leaders of the French and German peoples" for such progress as has been made toward the beginning of the reestablishment of mutual understanding, peace, and good-will in the world. The United States he could not mention, for it is the United States which is the worst offender in both the matter of tariffs and the economic insanity of refusing to accept goods from its debtor countries when it is the foremost of the creditor countries. Let the United States take this as a most solemn warning. If it continues in its folly it will not only be recognized the world over, as indeed it already is in considerable measure, as the worst enemy of reconstruction and the reestablishment of prosperity and international good-will. It will find that this new European Union will be more and more forced into an anti-American attitude, not of its will and desire, but because it will be in duty bound to rescue Europe before it is too late from a situation to which the United States holds the key, and the golden key at that. Down with the tariffs! Mr. Henderson has, if anything, understated the mischief they are doing to the world. Down with the American tariffs! They are at the root of our own evils; they are chaining the American people to the chariot wheels of the protected and privileged interests. They must be leveled, in order to save Europe, in order to save the United States and to restore to it not only the opportunity for economic well-being and progress at home but the good-will of the world.

The Crisis in Wheat

THE failure of the London wheat conference was complete. The delegates from the eleven principal wheat-exporting nations of the world, recognizing this, made an effort even feebler than is usual in such cases to disguise the failure by talking vaguely about another conference and by arranging to set up a permanent organization to collect world wheat statistics already rather adequately collected by other organizations. The conference was doomed from the start. Before it opened the American delegates declared flatly that the United States would under no circumstances participate in an international wheat pool. The Russian representatives accepted the principle of an international export pool as proposed by Poland, but demanded a quota basis which no other large wheat-exporting country would accept. "The U. S. S. R.," said the official Soviet statement, "has naturally a right to occupy in the world's grain markets the same place as was occupied by pre-war Russia."

It is not difficult to see what this would have meant. When Russia's internal disorganization made it impossible for her to supply wheat for the export market, the other wheat-raising countries of the world, principally Canada, the Argentine, Australia, and the United States, greatly increased their crops to make up the deficiency. Outside of Russia the average wheat production of the world from 1909 to 1913 was 1,807,000,000 bushels; in the years from 1926 to 1930 it was 2,433,000,000 bushels, an increase of 626,000,000. Russia's average crop in the years just preceding the war was 757,000,000 bushels, or nearly 30 per cent of the total world crop. The Russian crop fell in 1921 as low as 205,000,000 bushels; since then there has been a rapid rise, and the crop in 1930 was 1,032,000,000 bushels, even larger than that which would be called for by the pre-war proportions. Further, the Russians expect a very much larger crop this year than last—36,500,000 tons, to be precise, compared with 29,500,000 tons in 1930.

With wheat already selling at the lowest price in thirty-six years, such figures are not very palatable to the other wheat-raising countries. Yet one hesitates to say that the Russian demand was unreasonable. The Russians point out that they have one of the lowest costs of wheat production in the world. Why then should they restrict their crops, cut off a source of profit and one of the chief of their few means of paying for imports, in order to keep foreign high-cost wheat producers in business?

It is worth inquiring what the probable result would have been if one of the London plans for stabilizing the wheat markets of the world had been put into effect. What would have happened, for example, if the principal wheat-exporting countries had agreed to restrict their exports within definite allotted quotas? If such an export restriction had been unaccompanied by any plan to reduce wheat acreage within the individual countries, it could easily have made the plight of the wheat-growers worse even than it is. For if each country were permitted to offer only a certain percentage of its wheat in the world markets, what would become of the wheat that would otherwise be shipped out for export? Obviously it would merely be stored in the country of its origin and depress the domestic price there below the world price. Any gain that wheat-growers received, therefore, for their export wheat might have been more than offset by their losses on wheat sold in the home market, and the further complication would have been introduced of deciding whose wheat should be exported and whose sold at home, unless there were an extremely complex system of export allotment for individual growers. Such a system would be practically impossible to administer.

On the other hand, what would have been the result if each country had agreed to reduce its wheat acreage by the same percentage? This is a plan that could only have been worked out by a virtual dictatorship within each country; and with privately owned farms it would again have involved enormously complicated administrative difficulties. Further, such a plan, even if successful in its first object, would in all likelihood merely have postponed an inevitable readjustment and stored up trouble for the future. For it would have been an obvious encouragement to wasteful production. If it costs American wheat farmers from sixty cents to more than a dollar a bushel to raise wheat, why should the Russian co-operatives, with costs, say, of thirty-five to fifty cents a bushel, be expected to restrict their production by the same amount as the American dollar producer to keep the latter in wheat-raising? Why, for that matter, should the American producer with sixty-cent costs reduce his acreage for the benefit of the producer with dollar costs? Soon or late the high-cost producer of wheat, wherever he exists in the world, must abandon production and turn, if he can, to some other crop. No wheat plan that did not recognize that fact could in the long run be anything but futile, and it might be calamitous.

Our Railroads' Plight

AN Interstate Commerce Commissioner out for complete government control of our railways? It seems incredible, but it is true. In an address at New York on May 20, Joseph B. Eastman, for twelve years a member of the commission, declared it to be his "abiding conviction" that the government "should assume complete responsibility for such business as is now under an elaborate system of public regulation, under which it divides responsibility and control at present with private enterprise." The idea of "government in business," he said, did not alarm him "if the business is of such a nature that it cannot be carried on by private enterprise without the protection to all concerned which is afforded by an elaborate system of public regulation." His proposal was that the transportation services of the country should be carried on by "a corporation or public trust controlled by the government and designed to be self-supporting," with directors or trustees "selected in part by non-political agencies." If, he told his hearers, "the same amount of ingenuity were devoted to the subject as has been devoted, for example, to the creation of intricate and largely vicious mazes of holding companies and interlaced subsidiaries, it would be quite possible to evolve a plan of complete governmental responsibility for the transportation services which would retain most of the merits of private initiative."

Revolutionary this utterance of Mr. Eastman's certainly was, since it came from a high government official. But the heads of the railroads? On the very next day after Mr. Eastman's speech, the Eastern Railroad Presidents' Conference had no other suggestion to make in the sore straits in which the roads find themselves than to demand an increase in freight rates to produce $400,000,000 of additional revenue. That is a counsel of folly, if not despair. The country in its present distressed state will not easily hand over such a vast sum in increased freight rates to enable the railways to do business at a profit. Moreover, if the Interstate Commerce Commission did authorize the higher rates, there is no guaranty whatsoever that the mere increase would not drastically check the volume of freight business and drive more of it to motor trucks. Not that we are without sympathy for the railroad executives. Theirs is an extremely difficult position, and it is getting worse instead of better.

Neither operating nor fixed charges can be materially reduced. The interest on the funded debt, approximately $4,000,000,000 of which is held by life-insurance companies, savings banks, or trusts as investments, must of course be paid if bond values are not to collapse; taxes tend to go up rather than down; outlay for supplies has been "cut to the bone"; an average wage of 66 cents an hour for labor is "considerably below the average for other industries"; and the number of employees has been cut from a normal of 1,800,000 to 1,200,000. Theoretically, the government allows the railways to earn 5¾ per cent on their valuation before recapture begins to be talked of; actually, earnings averaged only 3½ per cent last year. Only a few of the strongest or best located lines are able to earn their dividends; many are barely able to make both ends meet; a formidable number seem headed for bankruptcy. The fault is not wholly due to the business depression. The Interstate Commerce Commission has dallied with consolidation plans which it is its duty to work out, and its method of valuing the railway properties has encountered dissent in the courts. Congress, never very friendly, has done its best to force reduced rates on agricultural products. Add to these governmental impediments the new competition of buses, air transport, and inland and coastwise water traffic, and we have a chaotic condition which is pressing the railways to the wall.

Mr. Eastman's plan, on the other hand, looks like a device for securing some of the advantages of government ownership without assuming all of the responsibility. It is becoming increasingly clear that the transportation problem has changed fundamentally since 1887, when the Interstate Commerce Commission was created, and that railways, buses, and air and water lines need now to be brought under a unified administration. Mr. Eastman would like to see this done, although without transferring the ownership of the properties to the government, and it is quite possible that the method of control which he suggests might be made to work. But why make two bites of a cherry? If private administration of transportation plus government control without responsibility has broken down, why not take over the transportation services and be done with it? We should at least know then whom to blame if the railways were not self-supporting.

We venture to prophesy that if the present crisis continues two years, many railway executives will be found to be advocates of both government ownership and operation.

Book Troubles

THE American Booksellers' Association, in convention assembled during the week of May 11, indicated that the book business was in a very bad way. The booksellers are inclined to lay most of their troubles to the nefarious practices of the hard-hearted publishers. Dollar books, direct selling to libraries, private mailing lists, book clubs, and mail-order campaigns are some of the evils persisted in, according to President Jacobs of the Booksellers' Association, by the unfeeling publishing gentry.

To remedy these difficulties the booksellers had one or two bright ideas. One was that booksellers vary their advertising and not confine it to the literary pages of the newspapers. This was a suggestion made by Major Carson of N. W. Ayer and Son, who said: "Your advertising should appeal to the girl who works in the five-and-ten-cent store as well as to the intellectual. If you will disguise your copy more, a larger body of readers will notice it. Now they pass it by, recognizing it as typical book advertisements." In this we see the germ of a great advertising thought. All that need be done is to ascertain what commodities appeal most to the buying public, be it automobiles, underwear, golf clubs, or sweets. Then, "You have always wanted a Rolls Royce," the caption in bold-face type might declare; "but you can probably better afford our newest novel at $1.75." Or, "Greta Garbo wears a pale-blue satin negligee. You would look charming in one while you read our latest book of poems. Only $1.50."

One other point was raised by the booksellers that should have considerable influence on the future of advertising. Blurbs on book jackets were denounced as often misleading and untruthful; it was recommended that the publishers be made to guarantee the truth of their blurbs. Guy Holt, of the McGraw-Hill Company, was thereupon quoted as replying that such a guaranty was not feasible, and that "purchasers of books must face the same risk they take in paying admission to a theater." This extraordinary statement is, of course, possible of extended application. A book that is labeled the "greatest novel of all time," or "a definitive and unsurpassable biography of one of the world's greatest figures by another," need be, without stretching Mr. Holt's point too far, no such thing. The public must take its chances. If it buys a package labeled "raspberries" it may not complain if it contains cyanide of potassium; and if, as so often happens in book buying, it is in search of cyanide, strong stuff to beguile away the world's ineptitude, it cannot object to finding raspberries saccharinely resting therein.

All this proves beyond a doubt that something is wrong in the book trade. In addition it indicates that, judging by their quoted remarks, the booksellers are not going to do much about it in the near future. To persuade the public to buy a book requires the most astute wiles of the salesman, a mixture of honesty, guile, and prophetic insight. For some reason buying books is a much more momentous affair than buying a ticket to the movies. Books last. They encumber the parlor table. It is almost impossible to destroy them. It is important, therefore, that their contents justify the space they occupy. Good books do this better than bad. But the booksellers did not get around to this point.

RED TRADE PLOT

"You're a Menace!"

Red Menace and Yellow Journalism

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

IT is always the open season for attacks upon Russia. It would be hard, however, to find a more striking attempt to stir up ill-will against Russia and to coin money out of that effort than is now being indulged in by the New York Evening Post, once the high-minded, ethically conducted, and respected newspaper of Horace White and Edwin L. Godkin. What makes this particular instance so flagrant is the deliberate sensationalizing, which frequently nearly crosses the line of misrepresentation, in the headlines written by the editors over the articles by H. R. Knickerbocker on Russia and Russian trade.

Mr. Knickerbocker is the Berlin correspondent of the Evening Post. Last fall he went to Russia and after traveling there for six weeks did a series of articles—not, the Russians think, without some bias, but none the less a straightforward and honest piece of reporting—for which he was awarded the Pulitzer prize for 1930. But even this series was exploited by the headline writers in the office of his newspaper in a way that must have made Mr. Knickerbocker redden with shame. The very title put upon the book into which these articles were made, "The Red Trade Menace," showed a bias which Mr. Knickerbocker certainly did not have when he went to Russia or when I talked with him on his return to Berlin. He is not the kind of journalist who takes orders to color his stuff. Where his articles were anti-Soviet, they were so written because he felt that way. If he erred at points, it was owing to faultiness of vision and background, and not because he deviated from the standards of ethical reporting because somebody else told him to do so. What he was bent on was portraying Russia in the fall of 1930. He was not there to play up the Russian trade menace.

And how were those articles treated by the Post? The first article carried the caption "Soviet, on Iron Rations, Wars for Trade Primacy, Post Survey Reveals." The next day the headline reader learned: "Famished Moscow Short All Food Except Bread." Once more: "Reds Use Forced Labor in Forest, Post Finds." The reader, however, found that while the kulaks, in uncertain numbers, were compelled to work in the lumber camps, the writer could discover practically no convict labor, and so far from finding that all Soviet labor was forced labor, he discovered a labor turnover in all industries so extreme as to cause severe financial losses. Some days later the reader even learned that of the forced laborers "178,000 Men Quit Torturous Soviet Coal Pits in Year," which looked pretty bad till he read below that conditions in the mines were so difficult that the men preferred to go and work elsewhere, so that the Soviets had to depend on the enthusiasm of their shock brigades of young Communists to get out the coal they wanted. Rarely has an honest reporter, trying hard to present a true picture of what he saw, been worse served by headline writers. If Mr. Knickerbocker was not outraged, he was entitled to be.

The success of this series, which is said in newspaper circles to have added 20,000 readers to the Evening Post during their continuance, emboldened the paper to try it again. This time Mr. Knickerbocker traveled about Europe. When his copy began to appear, the headline writers repeated with this result: "Red Trade Raids Europe, Survey by Post Reveals. H. R. Knickerbocker Finds Soviet Goods Flooding Twelve Nations. U. S. Markets Are Heavily Affected. Continent Feels Menace, Wonders if Economic Cordon Can Be Set Up." The reliability of this introduction may be gleaned from the fact that Soviet exports constitute 2 per cent of world trade, and as this 2 per cent is distributed over the entire world, it is obvious that it must take very little to flood a nation. But let us return to the headlines. Here are some more: "Italy Backs Soviet Trade and Bars European Bloc. Two Dictatorships Stand United Against Economic Cordon." "Soviet Oil Floods Italy, Supplies Fascist Fleet. Great Plant at Savona Undersells America 20 Per Cent. France Sees Peril if War Develops. Italian State Corporation Distributes Products. Monopoly for Reds Looms." "Soviet Cuts Grain Price to Outstrip U. S. in Italy. Regularly Shades Grain Rate to Keep Below Competitors. Passes U. S. This Year in Anthracite Sales." Precisely as in the earlier series, the headlines are deliberately calculated to excite alarm in the mind of the reader, and to cause hostility. We are accustomed to gross misunderstanding and misrepresentation of our capitalist society in Communist writing and especially in the Moscow dailies, but it may be doubted whether we shall find there any statements better calculated to arouse fear and hatred than the treatment of Mr. Knickerbocker's facts by his editors.

Now as to some of the facts. In Italy, for example, the reader will discover that 16 per cent of the wheat imported is drawn from Russia, whereas, as Mr. Knickerbocker himself points out, before the war as high as 60 per cent sometimes came from the Czar's dominions—plainly a dreadful case of "flooding." As for the ruinous flooding of Italy with Russian coal, Mr. Knickerbocker reports that in 1930 Soviet anthracite constituted about 2½ per cent of Italy's imports of 12,000,000 tons, and that the Italians expressed themselves ready to take all the anthracite they could get from these wicked Russians. Why? Because it was cheap and of good quality. There you have the abominable conduct of the Soviets clearly revealed. As a matter of fact, Russia exports in large amounts, just as capitalist countries do, precisely those goods for which she has natural advantages or other special facilities—lumber, oil, furs, wheat, textile piece goods, and flax, to mention them in order of importance during 1930. She imports industrial equipment, tractors, cotton, iron and steel manufactures, and other products for which other countries at this time have relative advantages.

As for unfair competition, Mr. Knickerbocker finds that "Soviet prices are, as a rule, just low enough—but always low enough—to get the business, and not, if the Soviets can help it, any lower." Heaven help us, but we had thought that that was exactly the way that everybody got foreign business! These Soviet trade practices are precisely those of any big American industrial concern under similar circumstances. Indeed, under the compulsion of the reparations and debts payments, the Germans are doing precisely that same thing. For example, the Belgians and Poles and other neighbors of Germany were able last year to buy a ton of German rye for seventy marks less than any German consumer himself paid within the boundaries of the German Reich. It would be just as fair to attribute deliberate political motives to the German exporters as it is to attribute them to the Russian. But the whole slant given to Mr. Knickerbocker's articles is that this is all part of a deliberate effort to break down the capitalist governments of Europe. That the leaders of the Soviets would be glad to see the capitalist governments fall everybody knows, because they have said so from the outset of their experiment. But what every honest student of Russian conditions also knows is that they are compelled to send out everything that they can possibly deprive the Russian people of in order to get foreign currency, or credits, with which to buy machinery from England, Germany, and the United States, and all the rest of the materials that they need to industrialize Russia.

If they were such devilish schemers as the Evening Post headlines are calculated to portray them, would they, as Mr. Knickerbocker says, reduce their prices only just low enough to capture other markets, or would they not be selling at half- or quarter-price? Mr. Knickerbocker adduces no facts to suggest, and does not himself suggest, anything other than the ordinary commercial motives behind Russian-Italian trade, or anything but the usual commercial practices on the part of Russia in trying to sell its goods in Italy. If the story concerned any other country on earth except Russia, indeed, it would be looked on merely as a striking example of hustling for trade, of trade recovery and development, but not as a "menace" to anyone except rival producers in other countries now forced to face a vigorous new competition. Naturally, the appearance of any new competitor gives serious concern to business men, but it should never be occasion for terror, or for wild charges of dumping and unfair competition. Moreover, the simple fact remains that even when nations like Germany, Russia, France, and Great Britain dump goods in another country, they are paid for what they deliver by the goods of the country to which they deliver. A cash transaction practically never takes place. It is, of course, hard luck for the Evening Post that its yellow headlines came in a week which saw the warm and friendly reception of the Soviet statesmen at Geneva and London on terms of full equality.

Why then all the sensational headlines and advertising? First and foremost this atmosphere is created to sell papers. Let us breed hatred and fear and thoroughly confuse readers, if only thereby the circulation figures can be swelled in a year when every newsstand notices the shrinkage of its sales. Secondly, it may be an attempt deliberately to create hostility toward Russia for ulterior political purposes. No greater disservice could be done to the United States than to create a feeling of unreasoning terror about what the Russians are doing and going to do, if only because we need their trade badly in this crisis. There is, finally, still such a thing as responsibility of the press. We are entitled to expect of it not only enterprise in the learning of facts about the experiment carried on by the Soviet Government, but a decent sincerity and sobriety, not to say honesty, in the presentation and weighing of those facts.

What I Believe*

By BEATRICE WEBB

OUT of the social environment and mental climate in which I was born and bred there seemed to arise two outstanding questions, questions perpetually recurring in my own consciousness from girlhood to old age. Can there be a science of social organization, in the sense in which we have a science of mechanics or a science of chemistry, enabling us to forecast what will happen, and perhaps to alter the event by taking appropriate action or persuading others to take it? Secondly, assuming that there can be, or will be, such a science of society, is man's capacity for scientific discovery the only faculty required for the reorganization of society according to an ideal? Or do we need religion as well as science, emotional faith as well as intellectual curiosity? In the following pages will be found my tentative answer to these two questions—that is, my philosophy of work or life.

The first of these questions, Can there be an applied science of society? led me early in life to choose a particular vocation—the study of social institutions by the methods of personal observation, actual participation in the organization concerned, the taking of evidence, statistical inquiry, and the examination of historical records. My reaction from this long-continued practice of the art of the social investigator has been an ever-deepening conviction of the supreme value in all social activity of the scientific method.

Let me give one or two examples of an applied science of society taken from the public administration of Great Britain during the past hundred years. In the early part of the nineteenth century the business of government, whether national or local government, was honeycombed with favoritism, corruption, and barefaced peculation. This wholesale dishonesty on the part of representatives and officials has been largely swept away by the adoption of a social invention of definitely scientific character, namely, the audit—a device which is scarcely a century old.

Another instance is the discovery, during the past three-quarters of a century, of what has been aptly called the device of the common rule. You see this exemplified in the advantage we all gain through the existence of fixed rules of the road. Because of the rule, whatever its terms, we all get greater safety and even greater speed of locomotion. Imagine the blocking of the traffic in the great cities—not to mention the accidents—if there were no rule of the road at all, if motor buses and lorries, taxis, cyclists, and pedestrians were left to scramble through as best they could.

It is this device of the common rule—a genuine social discovery—which has given us the factory acts and the public-health legislation about the pollution of rivers, the purity of food, and the prevention of the worst forms of overcrowding. One of the most recent of these common rules—summer or daylight-saving time—has astonished the world by the sudden and complete way in which it has borne out the prediction of its inventor, William Willett. By the simple expedient of insisting that all public clocks should, on a particular night, skip one hour, and that all transport undertakings and public bodies should accept this fiction, the whole population has been led to rise from bed one hour earlier every day during the hot months of the year. By this means each person enjoys some 200 additional hours of life-giving sunlight, while the community as a whole saves millions of pounds annually in the cost of artificial lighting.

* The second of a series of articles on this subject by well-known men and women. The third will appear in an early issue.—EDITOR THE NATION.

Let me give one more instance of the advantage of the scientific study of facts in the way that I have described. A hundred years ago the accepted way of dealing with extreme poverty—what was called destitution—was poor-law relief. This relief took one of two forms—maintenance in the general mixed workhouse or a niggardly dole of unconditional outdoor relief. A century of experience has discredited both. As a result of extensive observation and experiment by all sorts of persons, officials and philanthropists, recorded in innumerable bluebooks and scientific treatises, there has been gradually created a whole series of new social institutions vitally affecting human behavior—a veritable framework of prevention. Instead of threatening the sick person with the workhouse if he applies for relief, the public-health authority has come more and more to seek him out, in order to cure him and to prevent any spread of disease. The local education authority now welcomes every child to school, insists that the parents send the child to school reasonably clean, even feeds the child if it is found to require it, and prosecutes the parents who are guilty of wilful neglect. The infant-welfare center endeavors to look after every birth, instructs the mother how to rear the baby, and offers periodically to examine and weigh the growing infant so that the mother may know how it is progressing. This may seem a small matter. But the statistician proves to us that during the past thirty years, since these things have been done, only half as many babies die as in the previous generation. What is even more striking is the vast alteration for the better that has been effected by these preventive services in the behavior of the parents and the children in the way of healthy living, of cleanliness, and even of manners.

There are some of us who believe that it will yet be found practicable, through observation and experiment, to invent an analogous framework of prevention applicable to that terrible disease of modern industry, mass unemployment. And looking forward to a more distant future there is the science of the better breeding of the human race—eugenics is the name given to this department of social biology by its founder, Francis Galton—knowledge which, when we are wise enough and virtuous enough to apply it, may immeasurably improve the body and mind of man.

Have I succeeded by these few illustrations in making the reader realize why I believe that we have already a science of society—a young and very incomplete science, but one that is steadily growing and that is capable of indefinite extension? But it is a science with limitations. Unlike iron and stone and machinery, human beings and social institutions are always changing, and such social changes are sometimes so catastrophic and far-reaching as completely to baffle our generalizations and nullify our predictions. No student of social facts, however competent, could have forecast the Russian Revolution or the nature of the Soviet Government. No one could have foreseen the sudden development of the Fascist state in Italy. No one could have predicted the rapid rise to prosperity and power of the Czecho-Slovak republic, the very name of which we can barely pronounce and the exact position of which is unknown to most of us. Here and there, from time to time, there emerges from the mass a man or a group of men whose uncommon qualities are exceptionally influential with the particular race of human beings with whom they come in contact. It may be a captivating personality, it may be religious exaltation, it may be superlative efficiency in the organization of war or in the administration of the state. William James called such great men "ferments," influences which change the course of life of a whole nation. We may recognize such a ferment in the great leader of the Czecho-Slovak race, Masaryk. Sometimes these potent individuals appear more like volcanic eruptions—as with Lenin in Russia and Mussolini in Italy and Gandhi in India. These are as unpredictable by science as is an earthquake. But woe betide the great man, be he prophet or warrior or statesman, who forgets not only that the common man exists, but also that it is with the common man that he has to deal. If a Lenin, a Mussolini, or a Gandhi wants to reduce the infant death-rate or to adopt summer time, to create a universal system of public education or to build up a stable democratic state out of millions of men of different races and antagonistic creeds, in Russia, Italy, or India, he must, for all his volcanic power, learn from the knowledge of past and present social institutions the particular devices by which one or other of these things can be created. Before he died Lenin had to admit that in ignoring one common characteristic of the tens of millions of Russian peasant-cultivators—the desire to better their own circumstances—he had made a big mistake. He had, indeed, to reverse his policy of complete communism, and to permit, at least temporarily, a measure of individual accumulation and private trade. Mussolini may yet find that in suppressing all independence of speech and freedom of the press he has alienated an indispensable factor in a stable and progressive state.

To sum up: The generalizations and predictions of the science of society relate to that strange abstraction, the average human being. Here we recognize what might be termed the mystical element in the work of the statistician. What he tells us is the truth, even truth of a high order. But he does not deal with our individual peculiarities. He predicts what will be found true of what is common to all the individuals who make up the group or race of men with which he is dealing. The uncommon, the exceptional, the peculiar characteristics of the individual man, and the manner of his influence, are at present, and possibly always will be, outside the scope of a science of society.

I pass to the second question which has continuously confronted me in my passage through life. Is man's capacity for scientific discovery the only faculty required for the reorganization of society according to an ideal?

Or do we need religion as well as science, emotional faith as well as intellectual curiosity?

Very early in my career as a social investigator I realized that science deals only with the processes of life; it has little to say of the purpose of life. We can learn through science how best to kill a man or slaughter a multitude of men; we can discover how to cure a human being of specific diseases and thus raise indefinitely the standard of health. But no amount of personal observation or statistical inquiry will tell us whether we ought to kill or to cure. Our behavior, as parent or child, as colleague or rival, as employer or employed, as private citizen or public official, is largely dictated to us by law or public opinion. But whenever we settle it for ourselves, it seems to depend on intuition or impulse, on likes or dislikes, or, to put it in another way, on our emotional outlook on life. Historically, codes of conduct, scales of value, patterns of behavior—to use the term of my friend, Graham Wallas—are intimately related to contemporary conceptions of man's relation to the universe, whether these notions are woven into magic rites, wrought into religious creeds, or expressed in systems of philosophy incapable of objective verification. My own experience is that in the nobler type of men these guides to conduct appear to rise out of emotive thought, connecting the purpose of individual man with the purpose of the universe, the visible with the invisible world. "Man lives in two worlds," Professor Haldane tells us in his brilliant exposition of What I Believe, "the visible world which changes with time, and an invisible world whose constituents do not change." "I have not very much use for people who are not in touch with the invisible world," he adds somewhat scornfully. The trouble is that when we ask to be put in touch with this invisible world we are given, by this eminent scientist, not the bread of spiritual guidance but the hard stone of pure intellect, and a short measure of that! "Among the components of the invisible world are the realities corresponding to mathematical statements like $16 + 9 = 25$." This, literally, is all that he vouchsafes us! Memory recalls my friend Bertrand Russell arguing that the arithmetical proposition that two and two make four cannot be proved by pure logic, and is merely an empirical truth derived from experience, thus belonging to the visible and not to the invisible world. However that may be, to an undeveloped mind like mine Professor Haldane's exposition of the invisible world is meaningless. It arouses no response from my intellect or my emotions.

But why should we expect to describe the invisible world? All we can do is to explain our own state of mind, so that we may enter into communion with those of like temperament, and thus encourage and strengthen each other in our common pilgrimage through life. For my own part, I believe that the mind of man, as distinguished from the appetites and instincts which he shares with other animals, is divided into two parts—the intellectual and the emotional, each having its own methods and sanctions. What is called the scientific method is the highest expression of the intellect; by observation, verification, and reasoning we can discover how things happen and predict how they will happen under like circumstances, and, in many instances, by applying this knowledge we can alter this happening in the direction we desire.

The highest expression of the emotional side of human nature is the attainment of the beautiful and the good; the one represented by art in all its manifestations, the other by varieties of religious experience, leading to what is felt to be the right conduct of life. I have not the artistic temperament and I know not in what state of consciousness this may be embodied; what may be its discipline and its sanctions. But like the majority of the human race I have an incipient religious temperament—a yearning for the mental security of a spiritual home. Professor Whitehead says:

> Religion is the vision of something which stands beyond, behind, and within the passing flux of immediate things; something which is real, and yet waiting to be realized; something which is a remote possibility, and yet the greatest of present facts; something that gives meaning to all that passes, and yet eludes apprehension; something whose possession is the final good, and yet is beyond all reach; something which is the ultimate ideal, and the hopeless quest.

This vision of something which is real and yet waiting to be realized is associated in my experience with an intuitive use of prayer. A secularist friend once cross-examined me as to what exactly I meant by prayer; he challenged me to define the process of prayer, to describe its happening. I answered I would gladly do so if I could find the words. The trouble is, as Tagore observes about poetry, that words have meanings, or, as I prefer to say, predominantly intellectual meanings; and in prayer it is emotion, not reason, that seeks an outlet. It is by prayer, by communion with an all-pervading spiritual force, that the soul of man discovers the purpose or goal of human endeavor. That is why down all the ages of human development prayer has been intimately associated, whether as cause or effect, with the nobler and more enduring forms of architecture and music; associated, too, with poetry and painting, with the awe-inspiring aspects of nature, with the great emotional mysteries of maternity, mating, and death.

To Professor Haldane my longer string of words may seem as meaningless as his curt arithmetical formula does to me. Perhaps we can find common ground in "The Will to Believe," eloquently expounded by William James, or in "The Philosophy of 'As If,'" logically developed by Vaihinger. So far as I understand the conclusion of these eminent metaphysicians—a conclusion which I understand is also held by Einstein—it can be summed up in the proposition that wherever no hypothesis can be scientifically proved or disproved, and yet some hypothesis must be accepted as a starting-point for thought or as a basis for conduct, the individual is justified in selecting the hypothesis which yields the richest results in the discovery of truth or in the leading of a good life. Such a justifiable hypothesis seems to me the faith I hold: that man is related to the universe by an emotional as well as by a rational tie, that there is a spirit of love at work in the universe, and that the emotion of prayer or aspiration reveals to man the ends he should pursue if he desires to harmonize his own purpose with that of the universe; exactly as the working of his intellect discovers the means by which these ends may be best achieved. "Did I ever tell you," writes one of the greatest of British scientific thinkers, Francis Galton, "that I have always made it a habit to pray before writing anything for publication, that there may be no self-seeking in it, and perfect candor, together with respect for the feelings of others?"

But I realize that in the world of today science is in the ascendant, while the religious impulse is in eclipse. This decay of religious faith is, I think, a reaction from what is false in the current religious creeds. Throughout the ages, prophets and priests, saints and Sadducees, have dictated to the faithful mythical accounts of how things happen, how they have happened, and how they will happen—whether concerning the beginnings of life on this earth, or the course of the stars, or the diagnosis and cure of disease, or the better organization of society. This unwarranted intrusion of religion into the realm of science, this illegitimate attempt to supersede reason by emotion in respect to the processes of nature, has always led and will always lead, at best, to failure to attain the desired ends; at worst, to superstitious practices and degrading magic. Few believers in the scientific method accept as evidence of fact the Biblical narrative of the creation of the world in six days or that of the miracles of the Immaculate Conception and the resurrection from the dead of the physical body of Jesus of Nazareth. I am aware that these "dogmas" are deemed by some practicing Christians to be not statements of fact at all, but merely symbols of some invisible truth—appeals to the emotion and not to the intellect. This gloss on the creed of Christendom seems somewhat lacking in candor.

Thus, like many of my contemporaries, I am a religious outcast; I cannot enjoy, without sacrificing intellectual integrity, the immeasurable benefit of spiritual comradeship, the inner peace arising out of traditional forms of worship, the inspiration of noble motive—all of which I recognize as embodied in the discipline of the great religions of the world, such as Christianity and Buddhism. And while I rejoice in the advance of science, I deplore the desuetude of regular religious services, with their encouragement of worship and prayer, for the good reason that personal experience and the study of history convince me that this absence of the religious habit leads to an ugly chaos in private and public morals and to a subtle lowering of the sense of beauty—witness the idol of the subhuman, the prevalence of crude animalism, in much of the music, art, and literature of the twentieth century.

But to my mind there is one hopeful portent. Men of science endowed with the religious temperament are today reinterpreting the mystical meaning of the universe; and it is they who may bring about a new synthesis between our discovery of the true and our self-dedication to the beautiful and the good.

I Work for Russia

IV. How the Worker Lives*

By WALTER ARNOLD RUKEYSER

THERE seems to be a commonly accepted idea in this country that the Russian workman is kept in virtual bondage—that he cannot change his employment or move from place to place. I have been asked over here if it were true that "squads of workers were watched by the military equipped with guns to prevent them from quitting their jobs." Nothing could be farther from the truth. I am not attempting to describe the conditions under which the former kulaks are employed. I know nothing at first hand about these conditions. But as for our workers at Asbest—and there are some 13,000 of them—I can vouch for the fact that there exists nothing even approximating forced labor. As nearly as I could dig out from our employment records, I should say that we have at least a 100 per cent labor turnover yearly.

It is this huge turnover of workers which constitutes one of the major problems facing the administrative heads of the trusts today. At one period last fall we were running only between 50 and 60 per cent of the number of hands prescribed for that quarter of the plan. There are several reasons for this condition of affairs. First of all, there is the inherent nature of the Russian people, who by temperament love to travel. Next, there has existed until recently a shortage of commodities, and the worker has therefore had few other uses for his accumulated earnings. Lastly, there has been such a shortage of labor available for the tremendous efforts required by the speeded-up plan that competition between trusts for workers has resulted. One need only pick up the daily papers, particularly in such a place as Sverdlovsk, which is the industrial center for a large region, to see columns of advertisements wherein this or that trust is bidding for labor. This holding out of special inducements, such as higher wages and better living conditions, finally forced Moscow to prohibit such methods of drawing workers away from their present employment.

The same condition exists among engineers and skilled labor. It is true that technicians are supposed to sign an employment contract, usually for two years. However, there is a large turnover with this class of labor as well as with the actual hands. An engineer's wife may find it preferable to live in Moscow or Leningrad rather than out in the Urals at the mines, or the engineer himself may receive a call from some comrade in another trust offering better terms of employment, and so on. Whereupon he will arrange for his release or transfer. Recently, however, this condition became so acute that all technicians and office workers have been asked to sign a pledge that they will remain at their present jobs until the completion of the plan.

Now let us follow the daily life of the worker. As explained in the previous article, he works under conditions of safety and hygiene laid down strictly by the national code, enforced and modified to meet local conditions by the contracts between the individual trade unions and the respective trusts. These conditions are further controlled by frequent visits of delegates of the Workers' and Peasants' Inspection.

At Asbest the earlier large, non-private barracks have almost entirely given way to new multi-family apartments. These are for the most part two-story houses, built of wood, semi-fireproofed by stuccoing inside and out with asbestos plaster, and then whitewashed. The rooms are light and airy and of sufficient size to accommodate two, possibly three, persons, allowing four square meters per person. Ample latrine, bath, and lavatory facilities are provided. There is usually a communal kitchen on each floor, accommodating, I should say, up to four families. Large built-in brick stoves for baking are provided. However, the Russian worker seems wedded to his "primus," a spirit stove with a special burner and air pump which provides a quick hot flame.

* The fourth of a series of six articles. The fifth, on the American Engineer at Work, will appear in the issue of June 10.—EDITOR THE NATION.

I have heard it said that in the past the Russian peasant and worker, especially the latter, tasted meat probably not more than twenty times a year, on saints' days or other festive occasions. His main diet consisted of a thin barley soup, cucumbers, potatoes, cabbage, and bread. Butter, sugar, coffee were unknown luxuries. Today, although it is true that in the cooperative stores the quantities of commodities which he can buy are strictly rationed, this rationing has been so adjusted as to give him a fairly well-balanced diet. The heavy worker is, for example, allowed a greater quantity of meat, butter, and sugar per month than the one engaged in light manual labor or office work. Generally speaking, our workers at Asbest are rationed on meat, butter, eggs, sugar, coffee, cocoa, milk, and white flour. They can obtain cucumbers, cabbages, potatoes, black bread or meal in practically unlimited quantities. In cold weather, when transportation of perishables is possible, the diet is further varied by freshly frozen fish, which is supplied in large quantities. Smoked fish is nearly always available, as is cereal coffee; mokko, a caffeine-bearing drinkable, being imported, is to be had only in limited quantities. In 1929 the cooperative stores had their shelves loaded with all sorts of edibles. Roast goose, chicken, and duck, fresh and salted caviar, pickled meats, conserves (our canned goods), cocoa, and chocolates were to be had. In 1930 these commodities were rarely or never seen. Their disappearance was due to the breakdown of commodity prices on the world markets accompanying the world-wide depression, which was not accompanied by a corresponding reduction in the prices of such manufactured articles as machinery and the like. Since the Soviet Union had under the Five-Year Plan to import a specified quantity of the latter, for which they must pay by exporting in the main raw commodities, it followed that with falling prices for their exports the amount which they had to ship out in 1930 far surpassed the figures laid down when the plan was originally established and the world depression not anticipated. A temporary shortage of many commodities ensued, and this in turn resulted in an accumulation of money by the peasants and workers and its consequent withdrawal from circulation. This produced inflation, since the flood of rubles paid to the peasant and worker did not return to the state bank through the ordinary trade channels. Now that commodities are again plentiful, owing to the increased production in other nations and a relatively smaller purchasing power, there has again been established the so-called open market. It has recently been decreed by Moscow that rationing of all commodities is to be done away with immediately, except in the case of certain foodstuffs, and it is anticipated that even these will be on the open list within six months. To stimulate sales of such manufactured goods as radios, electrical appliances, clothing, and sporting goods, the salespeople are to be stimulated to greater efforts through commissions on sales. In this way money will revert to the state bank, and slowly but surely the present inflated condition of the internal currency should rectify itself.

So, although the worker is subject to some food rationing, he is by no means kept at the starvation-point. Far from it. Furthermore, everything is being done to encourage the worker and his family to eat at the state-operated stolovarias (restaurants or cafeterias). Here he gets an ample meal for very little money. For example, at Asbest or Sverdlovsk a typical meal would consist of a fish or meat soup, always served with hunks of fish or meat in it, a fish or meat stew with rice, potatoes, carrots, and some green vegetable, black or perhaps "gray" bread, a sliatky (sweet) such as pudding or gelatine with conserves, and finally tea. Butter and sugar were "deficit" commodities and not served, but in January they again made their appearance. Such a meal would cost sixty to seventy-five kopeks (about thirty cents on a gold basis). In addition to the cafeterias, restaurants, and hotels, all of which are run by the state, there are mechanized bread and cake bakeries of the most modern type, where food is also served. Finally, nearly all the workers at Asbest may augment their food supply by produce from their own gardens and by purchases from the peasants who come into the "bazaar" daily to sell their surplus at open-market prices.

Very interesting to me were the special restaurants for children only. Milk, eggs, cocoa, cereals, and the like are always available in these special eating places for children. I was also interested in the apparent lack of certain vitamin-producing foods and, following the shortage of live stock which resulted from the resistance of the peasants to too rapid collectivization last spring, the shortage of fats. Nevertheless, one thing which impressed itself strongly upon my mind was the healthy appearance of the children, whether in the cities or in the country. The enforced educational system which affects every person in Russia under the new literacy laws stresses child welfare and hygiene. The children certainly are not being neglected in the Soviet Union.

The illiterate workers as well as the children are compelled to attend school. Practically all the mills and factories are equipped with classrooms, and it is a fascinating sight to see the workers after their shift is finished—some of them with beards to their chests—poring over their ABC's and three R's. The health and hygiene clinics also present an interesting aspect of life in Russia today. At Asbest three hospitals have just been completed, the largest with 120 beds, equipped with the most modern surgical and medical facilities. In the cities the hospitals rank with those to be found in any other country. An American engineer acquaintance of ours who had just come up from Georgia had his wife and child ill with typhoid in the hospital in Moscow. Though they were critically ill when they reached the hospital, the attention they received there was of such high order that they both fully recovered. My friend was loud in his praises of the facilities and the treatment. Even in small places medical attention and hygiene are excellent.

Drinking was still prevalent everywhere I went in Russia. The government, through its state-trust distilleries, wineries, and breweries, now controls the manufacture and sale of all spirits. The beer is of low alcoholic content, probably not over 3½ to 4 per cent. The wines are extremely palatable, and are labeled according to well-known foreign vintages. The worker, however, contents himself mainly with beer and vodka. Kvass, a mildly fermented cereal beverage, is widely consumed and corresponds roughly to our near-beers. Vodka is a generic term. It may be distilled from wheat or other cereals, from apples or other fruit, from plain sugar, and so on. It is practically the same as grain alcohol, was formerly sold at 100 proof or higher, and now averages about 40 to 45 per cent alcohol by volume. The better grades are not bad, to our taste, zubrovka, for example, having a delicate taste of the sweet or buffalo grass from which it derives its name. The ordinary types, however, such as are supplied to the workmen (but never on pay days!), are quite as unpalatable as our grain alcohol and are usually drunk with a bit of citrus rind or apple therein. Tremendous educational efforts are being made to eliminate drinking from the life of the peasant and worker. Everywhere, in every station, every hotel, every factory, one sees forceful posters depicting some phase of the drink evil. Most of the younger generation won't touch alcohol in any form, and I have seen the Young Pioneers (the Communist Boy Scouts of Russia) many times attempting to restrain some grown-up from over-indulgence.

As Asbest there are three movie houses, or kinos, as they are called. When these are not being used for the frequent "meetings," or for G. P. U. trials, or "spectacles" (in which the worker shows off his histrionic talents), one can see movies and sometimes good ones. They are of the silent type, usually on a revolutionary or propaganda theme, and occasionally outstanding in technique. The acting is invariably of a high order.

Eight Who Must Not Die

By DOROTHY VAN DOREN

ON March 24 last seven young white men and two girls dressed in men's overalls hopped a slow freight moving south along the Memphis and Charlotte Railroad in northern Alabama. Already on the freight were a crowd of young Negro boys—some stories say as many as nineteen or twenty, not riding together but distributed along the various cars of the train. A couple of men along the way as the train passed saw that a fight was going on between Negroes and whites. Since they were some distance away they could not distinguish the faces of the boys and were not able, of course, to identify them later. But in the course of the fight the white men were thrown off the train, all but one who landed between two cars and was dragged back to safety by one of the Negroes. The men who were thrown off were not too much injured to rush to the nearest station at Steventon, tell their story to the telegraph operator, and have a wire sent to the train a station or two up ahead. By the time the train reached Paint Rock, Alabama, it was met by the sheriff and his deputies, all the Negroes who were on board—twelve by now—were taken off, the two girls in overalls were likewise removed, and the whole party was taken to the Scottsboro jail.

At this point the stories of the affair begin to differ. One account declares that the girls were in a fainting condition, sobbing, speechless, having evidently been subjected to some horrible experience. Another describes them as quite calm and not disposed to make any charges against the Negro boys until after they had conferred with the white officials and learned that young ladies who ride unchaperoned with Negro youths in freight cars must of necessity consider themselves raped, and raped they thereupon decided they had been. Whatever the truth, the girls were examined shortly after they left the train by two physicians in Scottsboro, who found them in good physical condition, not bruised, not fainting, not, apparently, seriously affected by whatever experience they had passed through. There were evidences of sexual intercourse but indications that it had taken place some hours before. They were mill girls, one a little over twenty, one a little under; the older one had been divorced. The fact that they had been bumming a ride in men's clothes would perhaps indicate, even without the subsequent information about them that came to light, that they were at least somewhat casual in their dealings with young men. But by the time the newspapers got around to reporting the story, it had taken on considerable local color. The Chattanooga Times for March 26 declared:

> And as her story [that of Victoria Price, the older of the two] was being unfolded, the Negroes were telling jokes in another part of the bastile. Nasty jokes, unafraid, denying to outsiders they were guilty, laughing, laughing, joking, joking, unafraid of the consequences, beasts unfit to be called human.

At this point it had been established to the satisfaction of local officials and the populace that the girls had been subjected to a fiendish series of assaults by nine of the young Negroes, three of the twelve taken from the train having somehow escaped. Again, according to the Chattanooga Times, "the crime was one of the most horrible ever perpetrated in the United States, and both Jackson and Madison counties are aroused to an extent that justice will be demanded when the fiends are put to trial." The girls declared that their clothes had been torn from their bodies, that they had been attacked each by six Negroes, that all of them were armed with knives except two who had guns, that the assaults were actually perpetrated while their assailants had weapons in their hands. It was evident that feeling against the Negroes, never deeply sleeping, was thoroughly and dangerously aroused.

On March 30 a grand jury returned indictments for rape against the nine boys. Rape in Alabama is punishable with death, although the extreme penalty is invoked rarely, and then against Negroes charged with rape of white women. A week later, April 6, was the date set for the trial, it being also the day for horse-swapping in the community, when large crowds would naturally assemble at Scottsboro courthouse. It was evident that the whole matter would be soon over. Meanwhile two things happened: the Governor sent down a detachment of the National Guard to protect the prisoners—the soldiers with fixed bayonets were able to keep an interested mob from taking matters into its own hands; and a Chattanooga lawyer, Stephen Roddy by name, was asked by the Interdenominational Ministers' Alliance, at the instigation of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, to undertake the defense. When the trial opened, the judge designated the seven available members of the Scottsboro bar to defend the prisoners. Six of them made excuses; the seventh, Milo Moody, accepted the case. Mr. Roddy was also present, but declared he was only assisting the lawyer for the defense. This was because he was unfamiliar with the particularities of Alabama legal procedure, wished to be associated with a local attorney, and knew that if he were announced as officially engaged for the defense Moody would quit the case, being no longer obligated to engage in it. Two of the boys were tried separately ahead of the rest. They were the oldest of the lot, one of them having actually attained to the ripe age of twenty. The trial took a day, the jury was out an hour and a half. A crowd of 10,000 persons—which in a little town of something over a thousand inhabitants is quite a crowd—was milling around the courthouse, waiting to hear the verdict. When the jury returned, a great hush descended over the mass of waiting people—mostly men, for women and children had by order of the judge been excluded from the courtroom. The Chattanooga Times is once more eloquent:

> Thunderous applause late this afternoon greeted a Jackson County grand [sic] jury's verdict of guilty for Charlie Weems and Clarence Norris, Negro hobos, who were convicted of attacking a white girl. . . . Hardly had the echoes of the trial died away until the trial of Haywood Patterson, Chattanooga Negro, charged with the same offense, was resumed.

The Times might have added that a brass band, mysteriously evoked from nowhere, entertained the uproarious multitude with the "Star Spangled Banner" and "Dixie" immediately after the verdict was announced. The jury which was trying to reach a decision on seventeen-year-old Haywood Patterson at the moment must have been considerably aided in its deliberation. Although it is probable that a local jury, chosen under such circumstances, needed little outside aid.

The rest of the trial proceeded in due course. Eight of the boys were found guilty and sentenced to die in the electric chair. The ninth, a lad of fourteen, was too young for the death sentence. The State asked for life imprisonment. But seven of the jurors held out for death anyway, and the judge declared a mistrial. Only Victoria Price was willing to identify the defendants. Ruby Bates, the other girl, confessed that she could not do so. No other identification was made. Mrs. Price's testimony was conflicting throughout. Yet she was positive that the nine very black youths whom, presumably, she had never set eyes on before, were the ones out of the crowd on the train who had attacked her and her companion, although of course she was almost beside herself while she was trying vainly to defend her person from them.

On the whole the boys told a straightforward story. They had been on the train. Some of them had not even been in the freight car in which the fracas took place. Some of them had taken part in it—one of them, the youngest, Roy Wright, was the one who had reached out a hand and kept the white youth from falling beneath the cars. They had done nothing to the girls. Because they had not, they had not thought it necessary to leave the train as half a dozen Negroes did, though they, too, had ample opportunity to do so before it was stopped. The fact that they did not leave the train affords, on the whole, the strongest presumption of their innocence. For why a Negro, even a Negro of low intelligence as these boys evidently are, who has committed an attack on a white woman should remain at the scene of his crime when he has opportunity to leave it is a question that no rational person can answer.

The execution of the eight boys convicted was set for July 10. Hearing on a motion for a new trial, postponed to June 5, automatically sets aside this date. The boys are in Kilby Prison near Montgomery. They are too ignorant and bewildered to be aware of the legal steps that are being taken to save them. But steps are being taken: Competent lawyers have been hired for the defense by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and by the International Labor Defense. Application for appeal to a higher court will be made in due form and when proper. It is altogether possible that the Alabama Supreme Court will reverse the verdict and order a new trial. The basis for this assumption is the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Arkansas cases that a trial in a court dominated by mob influence is not due process of law. Mr. Roddy was astute enough to put on the stand a commander of the National Guard and a local court official who testified that the demonstration after the first verdict in the courtroom and outside the courthouse was of such a nature as to have been overheard by the jurors who served in the seven subsequent cases. This testimony is part of the record.

The case has a number of complicated features, most of them the result of the dual defense. Both the Negro and the Communist organizations were early in the field; it is a matter of dispute, although it makes no difference, which was first. But efforts by both have been made to induce all the boys to allow their defense to be conducted by one of the groups and not the other, which has only confused the issue. It would be far simpler to combine forces, and probably far better from the standpoint of the boys' safety. Moreover, the tactics of the International Labor Defense, in line with its conduct of any part of the class struggle, are not calculated to appease Southern officials, from the governor down, or to predispose them in favor of Negro defendants. Categorical demands to free the boys at once, sent in droves of telegrams to various public officers, while undoubtedly good class-war tactics, are more likely to be irritating than otherwise effective. The point that should be at issue is that eight boys, black or white, seven of them under twenty years of age, should not die for a crime that they did not commit, and if they did not commit a crime, should receive the benefit of every legal safeguard to protect their rights and their lives. Unseemly squabbles among persons trying to defend them help them not at all. The sincerity of the defenders may be tested by their willingness to drop all their private disgruntlement, for whatever reason, and bend every effort unswervingly to the task of seeing that justice is done.

Finally, what of the persons immediately concerned in the case? The two girls were casuals, young women whose reputation is, to put it mildly, not of the best. Efforts of the defense attorney to discredit them at the trial were mostly circumvented, but enough was read into the record to make their testimony dubious. They are locally well known as prostitutes, supplementing their miserable wages as mill workers by the only other occupation they know. The nine Negro boys are likewise casuals. None of them can read or write. All have unsavory reputations. They have been accused of various petty crimes—gambling, thieving, more or less harmful mischief in general. They are not noble characters; it is a safe guess that not one of them will ever amount to much. They are the products of ignorance, of the most wretched and extreme poverty, of dirt, disorder, and race oppression. Yet there is no reason in the world why they should not have every legal right accorded to the finest and most cultivated person in the land. They are poor and ignorant and irresponsible. All the more should the state protect them, all the more should every device of the courts and every safeguard of the law be invoked to the end that justice be served. No picture in recent annals of lawbreaking is more touching than that of these eight very black boys in the death cells in Alabama. They are kept two in a cell; they gratefully receive gifts of candy and cigarettes. With the irrepressible gaiety of their race, they can laugh and joke in the shadow of the electric chair. Yet they are in essence bewildered. "We don't know the rights of it all, Boss, or who ought to help us; we just want to get out of here." This is about all they can say, about as far as they can think.

It is worth while, as a last word, to consider for a moment to what sort of world they will get out, if they do get out. Earnest persons who want to help somewhere and do not quite know how might ponder this point. They will reenter a world of poverty, ignorance, and race repression. Their chances of being in it a credit either to themselves or to their country are not large. Their chances even of living out their lives peaceably and dying in their beds are not large. They are the children of violence, and it is altogether likely that violence will overtake them in the end.

In the Driftway

AN "old newspaperman himself" objected at length to the Drifter's interpretation of the popularity of the circus as a satisfying sublimation of human desires and frailties. The letter, while it came long ago, is still good. In fact, it is better than it was, since at this moment summer is leading out the painted caravans along the dusty roads, and the mind of many a small boy is preoccupied with the caverns of thirst known as elephants.

> I am not doing this because of an itch to write [the letter goes]. When a fellow has finished eight years of tough breaks on a Republican daily the glamor of type fades to a gray blur on an uncertain horizon. But I do object to your interpretation of the Lillian Leitzel number. As one who trooped with a modern tent aggregation—sixty acts, count 'em, sixty—I was privileged to get a sore back, a twisted shoulder, several broken teeth, and a damaged conscience. (Yes, even the "reserved seat" circuses must resort to chiseling to send something home to mother and little Abie two or three times a month.) What I am trying to say is that the circus is the reason why in olden times actors and jugglers were a proscribed caste, to be driven, like their brethren the gipsies, out of town at sundown.
> The day's routine of an average circus even in our day is a routine of beastliness, ugliness, hatefulness, with a type of cynicism that says in effect: Here, public, is what you really pay to see—hard guys, tough babies who can take it on the chin and pretend it doesn't hurt. The circus is never beautiful. My first reaction to a circus (at the unbelievable age of four and a fraction) was one of fear instead of delight. But that may have been due to a natural trait common to all Semites. The performers were unreal persons whose strength was something to avoid, and the wire-walkers a species of serpent with legs. As to the lower mammals and lesser carnivora, I shut my eyes more than once while my parents tugged at my new velvet coat in the mistaken belief that sleep and not fear accounted for the seeming indifference.
> Early in the Gamaliel dynasty when the doughty Mr. Hays was ordering the brave marines to shoot train-hoppers on sight, I trooped with one of America's biggest shows on earth. The twenty dollars a month and rations looked like a fortune at a time when, as during the present "recession," jobs were prized like heirlooms in New England. The first day out I confirmed the impression I had had on the occasion of my first circus treat. Everything was beastly, cruel, hateful. Trainers were harsh, the tighted ladies tough and juiceless, the property bosses, like a Boston judge, believed all hired help to be ex-convicts and gunmen joining up to dodge detectives until trails grew cold.
> The "management" never once took the word of the cashiers; the latter never once relaxed vigilance over the "choppers." Short-changing, dipping, petty nickel-snatching, as well as major theft, were everyday business. The "artistes," possibly in self-defense, formed their own little band of saboteurs, racketeers, agents-provocateurs to get their three square meals daily from the bosses.
> As for the canaille that came in thousands to pay double price for something that was inferior in quality to any second-rate drama, I concluded they came only to see something they could not find anywhere else, namely, the organized cruelty of men beating animals and men beating one another. The mob, I felt sure, knew that the "artistes" on their lofty and perilous perches were driven to their jobs as surely as any cat is driven to its little shelf in the cage. The circus, I said (to myself, of course), was man's last exhibition of unrestrained jungle play. That's what made it good pay. Men are still savage and will pay to be reminded of that fact.

* * * * *

THE Drifter has neither the argument nor the inclination to deny anything his correspondent has said about the circus, though he feels secure—and happy too—in maintaining that most children see the circus as a beautiful and delightful rather than as a fearful spectacle. If the Drifter were a cynic he might go so far as to say that the circus is in its reality no more gross or unsavory than most of the glamorous toys the world admires and covets. But that is an ancient comment, and, besides, the Drifter is not a cynic. He cannot agree with the last paragraph of the letter, however. He admits that men have a strong hangover of savagery buried not so deeply within them, but he thinks it can find very little satisfaction in a circus. The cruelty in a circus is not apparent enough. It finds much more obvious and much more satisfying expression in murder and in the general run of gangster activities. The columns of a newspaper, just between one old newspaperman and another, have more appeal to the savage in all of us than any circus could possibly have.

THE DRIFTER

The Millennium—Why Not?

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: For ten years big business has been the government. For half a century before that it was the larger part of the government. Today the enormously complicated administrative vehicle it has been building up ever since the Civil War is out of gear and threatening an absolute collapse. Will big business ever bring "glad, confident morning" again in these United States? Has it not been utterly discredited and exposed? Is it not today bankrupt of leadership and naked to its enemies? Can even the greatest of engineers and the second greatest Secretary of the Treasury restore its prestige?

What is the alternative to its restoration, to another cycle of factitious and arthritic prosperity followed by another breakdown with its bread lines and its suicides? Must Americans turn their backs on the individualism of their forefathers and call agrarianism, socialism, or communism to the rescue? Before resorting to such means, why not get away from the doctrines and methods of big business by adopting an opposite philosophy—one founded not on pelf and power, but on freedom, justice, and humanity, and on the recognition that the world is now so small that all prosperity, if it is to endure, must have an international basis? Why not adopt the following platform for a libertarian and cosmopolitan party?

1. Absolute free trade.
2. Unrestricted immigration.
3. Cancelation of war debts.
4. Relegation of liquor control to the States.
5. Minority representation.
6. Protection of Negroes in their constitutional rights.
7. Immediate independence for the Philippines and noninterference with Latin American or any other nations.
8. Enactment of a constitutional amendment providing for the immediate induction into office of the newly elected President and Congressmen.
9. Continuous prosecution of public works on an adjustable scale, capable of vast enlargement during emergencies.
10. Taxation of the unearned increment of land.

This may be a program for the millennium, but why not think it over?

In Defense of Surveys

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Gustavus Adolphus Steward exhibits rather more spleen than understanding in his article Among Those Surveyed in The Nation of May 6. I cannot leave it unnoticed since I was implicated in three of his references: first, by my connection with Ohio State University, the reference to which, so far as I know, was inaccurate; second, as the letterhead chairman of the Interracial Seminar, which I was unable to accompany; and, third, as a contributor to the book published last year by Charles Johnson.

"Exploratory visits" are the beginning of a change of attitude and a stimulus to fact-finding. If one accepts the prevailing attitude in the South, a visit to Tuskegee is a revelation which cannot fail to have enlarging emotional possibilities. A visit to Negro business concerns may be a constructive shock to those who have seen only Negro janitors. Today I am taking a large class to have tea at the house of a Negro physician. For those who think tea will be tasteless if drunk co-racially, it is a genuine education to try it. The Interracial Seminar was for the same purpose.

The survey method is immature, but human relations are very complicated and intangible, so that the trial-and-error method must be used before the right technique is discovered. The book of Charles Johnson gathered facts. They may be uninteresting, but they are at least facts and available. Mr. Steward asks two questions: What has become of the facts so far gathered, and what good do they do? A vast store of information has been collected. Undoubtedly money and time have been wasted in the search for valid and important material. This is true in every research, but one discovered fact may justify the whole cost. Correlations between living conditions of Negroes and morbidity and crime have been the starting-points of new community policies. This race material is still in process of being understood.

Criticism is valuable, but such a sweeping indictment as Mr. Steward's is merely misleading.

Books for Trotzky

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I have a letter from Leon Trotzky stating that in the fire which burned down the house he was living in all his books were lost. Among them were many which had been sent to him by American authors. He is making a special study of American economic and social life and of American thought, and is greatly hindered by the absence in Constantinople of any library. Now that his own books are destroyed, the case is rather desperate.

It has occurred to me that a letter in The Nation would serve to notify most of the authors who have sent him books that another copy would be a timely gift. Those who have written something that they think Trotzky really ought to read have now a unique opportunity!

The Tariff Commission Again

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Much has been said for and against the creation and operation of the Tariff Commission, but the one event that has significance in the operations of that body has been little discussed publicly. On the ground that the commission had not paid enough attention to the effects of last year's drought President Hoover rejected its recommendations for a decrease in duty on three agricultural products. The comparison of the original recommendation for a 50 per cent reduction in duty with the accepted final decrease, if any, when the commission again submits its report, may be interesting.

The creation of the commission was widely spoken of as a forward step. It took the tariff out of politics, provided a fact-finding body. True, the President reserves the right to veto the commission's recommendations. In that we sense a slight discrepancy in reasoning, since the commission with its well-organized staff of experts would hardly overlook any important factor that might cause a rejection of its findings. We may, however, for purposes of control, consider the power of veto well vested. Anyone dealing with the Tariff Commission gets usually the impression that its staff is interested in tackling the problems on hand with an open mind and a fact-finding spirit.

It is hardly new to state that the Tariff Commission is compelled to work upon an uneconomic basis—that of trying to sell but not to buy abroad. Equalization of costs of production along American standards does not lessen the demand for a product. It does serve to increase often the cost to the consumer, thereby benefiting only the middleman rather than the original producer for whom the tariff was apparently devised. We find, however, that in spite of varying ideas and points of view, foreign governments have willingly cooperated with the Tariff Commission to help it accomplish its tasks fairly for all concerned. They have accepted, also, its findings with fine sportsmanship.

In every investigation by the Tariff Commission one thought is paramount when establishing a comparison of costs of production. This is that weighted representative figures for a period of years must be taken into consideration. This was probably done when reductions on the three products were being considered. Yet the reductions were rejected on the ground that insufficient attention had been paid to conditions prevailing in one single year. It therefore leaves these alternatives: the commission must either bargain in considering the new percentage of reduction, or admit that as a fact-finding body it failed to note a factor important enough in itself to throw out any conclusions arrived at by the study of conditions over a period of years. The implications of the question are self-evident, when we consider that everyone here and abroad has pinned his hope on the ability of the commission to act as a capable, thorough, scientific, and independent fact-finding body. The immediate reaction to these recent developments among the people who have dealings with that body has been a sense of futility and hopelessness. But a lack of confidence in the independence of the Tariff Commission will not help matters.

At the present time the United States may act on the theory that countries abroad feel the economic pinch acutely, that their complaints may go unheeded, and that economic pressure may yet be used. It will do well to keep in mind, however, that silence does not necessarily mean a lack of opinion, and that every country has statutes that can be brought forward when necessary for its existence. It is good business policy not to irk our friends overmuch.

Winter's End

By DAVID MORTON

From some old need of seeing things in bloom,
I watch the young girls strolling down the spring,
Where green earth and blue sky have built a room
That holds not anywhere a lovelier thing
Than these slow forms of languor and delight,
Who laugh or sigh, not knowing what they do,
And sway and bend and turn or left or right
For no more cause than that the sky is blue.

And I might travel far and find much less
Of spring's ambiguous gesturing over the earth,
Than these cool shapes that light airs color and press,
So tentative and vague I count their worth
In tinted mists that are the first spring flowers
On dim horizons that we watch for hours.

Another Book About Himself

)awn. By Theodore Dreiser. Horace Liveright. $5.

SURELY since the beginning of time no writer has been more impervious to criticism, for good or for ill, than this Theodore Dreiser. In spite of his final popularity is work has never lost any of the merits with which it began, or, in spite of mountains of adverse and friendly criticism, ny of the faults. His style, the despair of all right-thinking eople, grows, if anything, worse with each book. In all the 89 pages that make up this autobiography of his early youth, here is not one that will not irritate a reader who has any espect for the common decencies of prose. What an array of erbless, battered, broken-backed sentences! He writes hardly paragraph that is not stuffed with such amateurish asides to he reader as "you may be sure," or "if you please," or "as ou may well guess." He is vague where he ought to be preise and pedantically precise where precision is pointless. He eems to have only the haziest ideas about the meanings of vords. He tells us that he was "literally blazing physically." He describes masturbation as "this exotic practice." His hrases are sometimes downright illiterate: "His work was lainly like he was." Often what ought to be simple narrative entences are so equivocal that one actually cannot tell what e means. Apologists for Dreiser's writing have told us that he man is too passionately in earnest to be bothered with the nere embroidery of style, too concerned with his message to are whether or not he delivers it gracefully. But such an exlanation will hardly do. For Dreiser frequently strains for he purple passage—usually of the Ingersoll school (see the aragraph on page 49, for example, beginning: "Come now, et us erect to youth an altar, and against the sapphire sea of ime set the scarlet flame of memory!"). He is continually rapped by the pretentious cliché, lured by the falsely elegant. A writer merely unconscious of style does not describe a man s being "frizzled as to his gray hair" or write that a family 'laughed and talked and jested betimes with whomsoever would ave to do with them." Closely allied to all this is his constant seudo-scientific jargon. As a child he is afraid to go into the lark woods. "Tell me, oh, physicists and chemists," he aposrophizes, "why so great a fear, so roiling a sensitivity, in a hysical chemism four or five years of age?" As a youth, in the presence of a prostitute he finds himself "ecstasized sensorially." And this is what happens when he returns after his first few months at college:

> Approaching Chicago and my own home, I experienced, for the first time in my life, I think, a sense of change in myself—something more toward individuality—the intense centripetal integrality of the same—as opposed to what hitherto might have been looked upon as a merged or group feeling—integrality with the other members of my family and home—my mother, of course, the central centripetal star of the same and one not to be affected, let alone reduced or modified in any way.

One can explain why such a sentence is appalling, but surely not by saying that Dreiser is too unpretentious, too concerned with bald simplicity or common straightforwardness, to trouble about anything so fancy or unimportant as style.

Nearly all critics have regretted Dreiser's prolixity. In the present book the prolixity grows almost fabulous. There are nearly 300,000 words, the equivalent of four or five novels of ordinary size, and they carry his projected autobiography only up to his nineteenth or twentieth year. But Dreiser has carried this vice to so great a length that it becomes one of his outstanding merits. Say what you will, our experiences impress us and remain with us, other things being equal, in proportion to their duration, and no one who has read this book through is likely soon to forget it. In its mere prolixity lies much of its remarkably convincing quality. It is crowded with pointless and irrelevant details and episodes; but so is life. It is enormously repetitious; but so is life. It makes a hundred false starts; again and again we are told of an experience, or of the expectation of an experience, that seems about to lead somewhere, but that in fact leads nowhere—as in life. In his recital Dreiser seems to use no principle of selection whatever. And neither does life. Seeing everything on all sides, and again and again, as the author saw it, the reader comes to feel that he has almost lived through this career himself.

But with this Dreiser has other and less dubious virtues which have always given his work its real distinction—an astonishing memory, amazing eyes for details, for character, and for physical scenes, an immense curiosity and awareness regarding all things of common interest, a profound sense of the wonder and mystery of life. As a boy he seemed to have a "life-hunger" that swallowed everything with indiscriminate greediness. "Would that I were able to suggest in prose," he writes at one point, "the throb and urge and sting of my first days in Chicago." But he does just that. He leaves us a memorable picture of the Chicago of those days, with its streets and sidewalks built up from four to six feet above the land level, the dirty, narrow, and traffic-laden Chicago River, the rats overrunning the city, the slums worthy of the art of a Hogarth, and everything, apparently, "a source of wonder and delight" to him.

To crown all, there is Dreiser's intense sincerity and unparalleled candor, surely the greatest single merit that any autobiographer can have. And in that merit he is comparable to Pepys, Rousseau, and Boswell; certainly his confessions ring truer than Rousseau's. I do not believe he ever attributes any motives to himself loftier than those he actually had, or attempts to make any situation more glamorous than it really was. What we see is a moony boy, not over-fond of work, full of vague day dreams, with no practical or definite aim in life, brought up in depressing poverty, given a hopelessly inadequate formal education, first at various Catholic schools whenever his parents could afford to pay for it, then at public school; later drifting from job to job—newsboy, dish-washer in a filthy Greek restaurant, stove polisher, helper in a large hardware establishment; finally taken out of all this for a year by a Miss Simpson, one of his former public-school teachers who seemed to detect possibilities in him and paid his expenses to the State university; then drifting through various jobs again—real-estate helper, laundry-wagon driver, and instalment collector, a job from which he was dismissed for holding back $25. And always, even as a boy, his great preoccupation, his great obsession, was sex. "The hot fire nature had lighted in my body . . . harried me from hell to hell." For his passion was constantly thwarted—by poverty, by a conviction that his appearance was shabby and unimpressive, by a fixed belief that he had made himself impotent by self-abuse, and by an almost incredible awkwardness, bashfulness, and mental and lingual paralysis in the presence of women and girls.

If Dreiser does not spare himself, neither does he spare anyone else. Few autobiographers, surely, have treated their immediate family as he has. He pictures it as "peculiarly nebulous, emotional, unorganized, and traditionless." His father is everywhere made to appear as a pietistic and conventionally moral Catholic bigot. He tells how his brother Paul, the song-writer, forged a check in his father's name, was suspected of robbing a store, was thrown into jail twice, and later lived with a woman who kept a house of prostitution. He tells of his brother Rome's constant drunkenness, disappearances, and vandalism. To be sure, he changes the names of his sisters, but he tells of the promiscuity of one or two of them, and of how Amy brought disgrace on the family when it lived in a small town by becoming pregnant. Only his mother comes out consistently well by the ordinary moral standards. When he mentions his own sexual adventures or those of others, he almost invariably mentions the real name (so far as the reader can make out) of the girl involved, together with her town, her neighborhood, or the business firm for which she worked. Many of these women are now presumably the mothers of grown families: let us sincerely hope that none of their husbands, children, friends, or enemies chance to read this book. The conventional morality which Dreiser so much despises calls the man who does this sort of thing a cad or a bounder; but we must remember that in autobiography or reminiscence the vices of the man are the virtues of the writer. It is this unparalleled candor, perhaps more than anything else, that will keep this book alive.

Dreiser's curiously crude and naive philosophy remains as unmodified as his style. He cannot help stopping every once in a while for a bitter denunciation of the Catholic church. He is constantly deriding "morality," but his own notions on the subject are in the highest degree vague and superficial. Ethics he describes as "purely minor group arrangements having no relationship to the larger movements and positive and dominating forces of the universe." If by the "larger movements" he is alluding to such things as the orbit of Halley's comet, he is, one can only suppose, correct; but ethics might still have some slight importance for mankind. At another point his condemnations become more sweeping, involving, indeed, the whole "visible scheme of things." "What," he shouts, "cooking, eating, coition, job holding, growing, aging, losing, winning, in so changeful and passing a scene as this, important? Bunk!" But he does not seem to have troubled to ask himself, Important to whom? Not to that distant cloud of suns called the Milky Way, perhaps; but reasonably so to ourselves. One is tempted to inquire exactly what Dreiser's definition of importance is. What determines importance? Who confers importance? But we need not enter upon these metaphysical subtleties, for Dreiser's own huge works of fiction and autobiography are sufficient evidence that he himself regards even the pettiest details of life as of immense importance, else he could not have gone to such pains to record them. By "morality," moreover, one soon discovers, Dreiser means exactly what the man in the street means—conventional (usually Victorian) sexual morality. He excuses all sex lapses, no matter what their results, and many shortcomings of other kinds, on the ground that men and women are poor, irresponsible "chemisms." But he is hardly more consistent here than elsewhere, for on his last page he admits that in the individual's conduct the interests of "organized society" may sometimes have to be considered, and he speaks of the 50 per cent profit of his instalment-company boss, and of a "petty little beast" of a Catholic priest, in terms that sound to me strangely like those of moral indignation.

Yet the final marvel, of course, is not that there is still so much that is crude and callow in Dreiser, but that, in the teeth of the early environment he pictures here, he managed to survive with the astonishing qualities he has. "I must have been a very deceptive person," he writes at one point, "seemingly mild, aimless, indifferent, dreamy—particularly in regard to trivial things and matters—whereas in reality, in regard to my own deepest currents and interests, at least, I could be adamant." And in this Gibraltar-like quality lies the main secret of the stature that Dreiser has attained among American writers.

HENRY HAZLITT

Soviet Recognition

Why Recognize Russia? By Louis Fischer. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.

MR. FISCHER has here condensed and popularized the story of Soviet-American relations—or lack of relations. He draws heavily for his material upon the present reviewer's "American Policy Toward Russia Since 1917," which he cites occasionally, and upon his own recently published work, "The Soviets in World Affairs," which he cites frequently. His new book, however, supplements rather than reiterates the content of the other volumes mentioned. It can only be described as a very large two dollars' worth and a necessary and useful piece of excellent journalism which deserves wide distribution.

Mr. Fischer might be described either as a journalist with scholarly inclinations or as a scholar with journalistic leanings. But the gods of the academic chairs are jealous gods and they will probably not admit Mr. Fischer as yet to the inner shrine, for all his footnotes and pretenses to erudition. His style is newspaper style. His history is a bit feeble, and his international law totters dangerously in places. The first sentence depicts the Soviet Union as one of the "six" great Powers, though by all reasonable standards of reckoning there are seven. The Fourteenth Amendment does not declare financial obligations of the kind involved in Russian-American relations "illegal and void." The "U. S. Privateer Alabama" was neither a privateer nor did it belong to the United States. Other errors of fact and reasoning are more numerous than they would have been if the author had given more time and care to the preparation of his work. But these are peccadillos and Mr. Fischer is not writing for historians nor for international jurists.

The real value of the book lies not in its summary of Soviet-American diplomacy nor in its treatment of the legal aspects of recognition, upon which others have written more fully and more illuminatingly, but in its admirable compilation of the lunacies of the anti-Bolshevik wowsers from Father Walsh and Matthew Woll to Ralph Easley and Hamilton Fish. These worthies are hoisted by their own petards and allowed to make themselves ridiculous by their own quoted statements, which are amusingly contrasted with those of Senator Borah, Ivy Lee, John Bassett Moore, and other advocates of Soviet recognition. It is untrue, however, as the cover blurb declares, that "the author makes no plea for recognition." He cries to the heavens for recognition—and rightly so, since all the arguments against it are nonsense. But Mr. Fischer would do well to recognize that all arguments are irrelevant and that the State Department remains in what he aptly calls "the rut of ancient stubbornness" not because of law or logic but because of the hysteria of bureaucrats and politicians, who require red herrings to distract public attention from their own ineptitude, and because of the inflexible determination of official Washington to make the world safe for capitalism. If logic and common sense play any part in the State Dpartment's Russian policy, evidence thereof has not as yet been forthcoming. Washington is moved only by considerations of cupidity and political expediency. Such considerations may be furnished by an enlightened public opinion, demanding that the Administration remove its head from the sand pile and take official cognizance of the largest country on earth and one of the best customers of the United States. Mr. Fischer has made a notable contribution toward creating such an opinion. He therefore deserves the thanks of all who may still have faith in the efficacy of organized intelligence in international relations.

FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN

Our Superstitious Sex Morals

Sin and Sex. By Robert Briffault. The Macaulay Company. $3.

IT is an odd and ironic fact that in a country in which sin and sex have been made so synonymous sin should be so popular and sex so taboo. The Puritans did not make it so. They made sin unpopular but not sex. They objected to certain violations of the sexual game, as they thought it ought to be played, but not to sex as a physical fact. Cotton Mather and Thomas Shepard wrote about sex with all the candor of Elizabethans. It was the Victorians who put sin into sex—and made what was so natural so abhorrent. The Puritan candor about sex became a vulgar recollection to the Victorians, who were kind enough to favor sex in private but denounced it in public. The effect of those denunciations is living with us yet. Despite the agitated antics of the flapper, the rise of nudity groups, and the passionate popularity of Sigmund Freud and Havelock Ellis, we have not yet escaped the sexophobic philosophy of our Victorian ancestors. We still insist, like the Englishmen and Americans of the last century, that sex is something to be experienced but not discussed—except by way of ribald joke or smutty allusion. Our universities touch the subject gingerly, or not at all. We remain subservient to church and politics on the vital question of birth control.

Robert Briffault's book "Sin and Sex" attacks all these sexophobic attitudes and the type of civilization that has created and continued them. It is far-and-away superior to the many volumes which have been written on this theme in recent years. While its approach is fundamentally sociological, it does not avoid the psychological implications of the problem. Briffault begins his analysis by tracing the origins of sexophobia to Christianity, and holds that it is only in Christian countries that morality has become primarily associated with sex. Attacking the "Adam-and-Eve anthropologists," especially Westermarck and Malinowski, he maintains that chastity did not exist as a concept among primitive and ancient peoples but was the invention of Christianity. Christianity, following in the path of Judaism, founded its moral code upon the authority of tradition instead of upon the authority of reason. The Greeks were the one people in ancient times, Briffault contends, who considered righteousness as relative instead of absolute. The Jews and Christians based their logic upon a categorical moral imperative which made it impossible for them to discuss sex in the same manner that one would discuss science. As a result of this religious absoluteness, Christian cultists, in their defense of righteousness, have become "the most pestilently unrighteous people in the world." With the advent of capitalism, Briffault observes, the vicious one-sidedness of Christian morality, with its overpowering sexophobia, has at last been clearly revealed. "Quick at suppressing literature," Briffault writes, Western morality is "slow at suppressing war; zealous in the abolition of obscene post cards, [it is] lukewarm in the abolition of obscene slums; active in putting down white slavery, [it is] but apathetic in putting down wage slavery; alert in preventing vice, [it is] but slothful in putting down starvation; shocked at clothing insufficient for purposes of modesty, [it is] but indifferent to clothing for purposes of warmth."

Briffault's whole argument in "Sin and Sex" is that we should base our morality upon reason instead of superstition. He indicates how impossible this has been in the past, because the very nature of our moral superstitions has thwarted the approach of reason. Our anthropolgists, our psychologists, and our social scientists in general have been so intimidated by the ethical taboos of our culture that they have been more interested in moral fictions than in amoral facts. As a consequence, nine-tenths of the theories which we commonly hold about the sexual life of man are false. The realization of the fact that the natural propensities of homo sapiens are promiscuous instead of monogamous means that we must understand at the very beginning that our present marital organization, with its economic motivation and legal coercions, is in conflict with biological impulses and not in harmony with them. "Monogamic patriarchal societies," the author states, "are particularly abnormal and monstrous in a biological sense." While this does not mean that we should live as primitives in order to be in harmony with our natural urges, it does mean that we must appreciate the conflict that exists between biological impulse and cultural ethic, and apply ourselves to the complicated and delicate task of resolving that contradiction.

V. F. CALVERTON

Who Was Jane Austen?

Jane Austen. By R. Brimley Johnson. E. P. Dutton and Company. $5.

MR. JOHNSON subtitles his book "Her Life, Her Work, Her Family, and Her Critics." This is, of course, a very large order and one that in less than 300 pages should hardly be attempted without considerable intrepidity. But it is true that many things are already known about Jane Austen, and Mr. Johnson would hardly claim that he had done much more than bring them together in outline. He is, of course, an ardent admirer of his subject. He has faithfully studied all the records, he has assiduously read every word she ever wrote, he has consulted her descendants and their opinions of their great aunt. And in general it seems safe to say that he has completely failed to grasp the character of the woman he so deeply admires.

Jane Austen was above all else a wit. She is, indeed, one of the few wits among her sex whose works have endured. Except for that grace of wit she would have differed little from many women who had, with her, acuteness of observation and elegance of language to set it down. This is not to disparage her but to exalt her above other women novelists and most men. But it is a fact that her uncritical admirers often lose sight of in their obeisance to her undoubted genius. They, and Mr. Johnson is one of them, are at great pains to prove that Miss Austen as a person was all that was gentle, tender, good-tempered, kind-hearted, democratic—Mr. Johnson takes pains to show that she "was not a snob"—that she was, in short, unfailingly noble. It is true that her letters, sharp, stinging, full of the most pointed of criticism, can be offered as evidence of some quality in her other than sweetness. But Mr. Johnson explains, after quoting the famous phrase about the unfortunate lady, Mrs. Blount, who looked "exactly as she did in September, with the same broad face, diamond bandeau, white shoes, pink husband, and fat neck," from one of Jane's letters to Cassandra Austen, that it "was the author of 'Northanger Abbey,' not Jane Austen" who wrote those unkind if witty lines. This seems to be denying Jane Austen a quality that she possessed, if her letters are any proof, all her life, namely, malice. And so great was her skill that she could employ the weapon of malice delicately, delightfully, but without doubt to inflict a mortal wound. Mr. Johnson says incomprehensively of the letters: "They have not the sparkle of the novels . . . and make less attractive reading than those of many a less delightful author." I am willing to guess that they seem less attractive to him and to many of Jane Austen's admirers because they make her more the human being and less the saint without fault and without reproach that she has been described to be.

Aside from this worshipful attitude, which so tediously colors much of his book, Mr. Johnson has done some very careful work on the time of composition of the novels. He shows convincingly that "Sense and Sensibility" and "Pride and Prejudice" were not actually written when their author was twenty-one and twenty-three years old, but were probably drafted then, carefully revised, and only completed in the form in which we have them a good ten years later. There are other matters which will be of interest to Jane-Austenites. There is much useful information about the Austen family circle, there are careful descriptions of the locale of the novels and of Miss Austen's occupations, as far as they are known, while she was writing them. In some ways, therefore, this is a valuable book; only as a portrait of a very rare woman and unique genius does it woefully fail of its purpose.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Books in Brief

Ambrose Holt and Family. By Susan Glaspell. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $2.50.

This novel about a poet who built up around himself a shell of persecution so that he could, by transcending it, feel noble, and his wife who, although her father and husband thought her a fool, was in reality "beauty" and "truth," suffers from the fault of much contemporary American fiction. It is too clear. Having involved her characters in a series of fairly complicated situations, and having endowed them with another series of conflicting ideas, emotions, and characteristics, Miss Glaspell steps forward calmly and with a steady hand sets them all straight, points out what sort of person each one "really" is, and leaves everything as right and tight as it can possibly be. Ambrose Holt is an easy-going, inspired ne'er-do-well who walked out on his wife and small son some twenty-five years before the story opens; he walks back as casually on his son, his daughter-in-law, and his two grandchildren. The son is a poet but is obliged by the exigencies of love, marriage, and a rich and prosaic father-in-law to be a success in the cement business; the daughter-in-law ought to be satisfied by her charming home, her two splendid children, her handsome and successful husband, her agreeable social life. But somehow she is not. She is not being herself. The advent of her father-in-law enables her, for the first time, to be herself, to quarrel in the most salutary manner with her husband, to resolve all their lives into a steady and presumably lasting relationship. Even the careless Ambrose, dead after his impetuous life, will persist in watching over her, so that she can still be the Harriette she wants to be, not the silly Blossom that everyone thinks her. If this flippancy seems unjust, Miss Glaspell has brought it on her own head. Her touch is light when she is not being didactic; her characters have many ingratiating qualities, her mise en scène is bright and attractive, she is in many ways a skilful writer. But she tells too much.

A Second Elizabethan Journal. By G. B. Harrison. Richard R. Smith. $6.

Mr. Harrison continues in this volume the work he began in "An Elizabethan Journal (1591-1594)." His scheme is, writing more or less in the first person, to construct such a record as any intelligent and informed Elizabethan might have left of the things most talked about in his world. The present volume goes from 1595 to 1598, and more will presumably follow. The documentation—literary, political, criminal, social—is careful, as the notes will prove, and the result is an exceedingly valuable picture of the England which Shakespeare, for instance, heard and beheld around him.

Unrest: The Rebel Poets' Anthology for 1930. Edited by Ralph Cheyney and Jack Conroy. Columbus, Ohio: Studies Publications. $1.

"Unrest" for 1930 resembles the unrest pictured in a number of other anthologies; the poems included are not any better or any worse than most poems attempting to bring about social and economic reform. The two editors inform us on the cover of the book that this particular collection is dangerous and should be suppressed. We cannot agree with them; there is too little good poetry here, too much sentimentalism for the book to arouse anyone to action. Although, generally speaking, poetry and propaganda do not merge, there have been, and yet may be, great poets moved to set down their reactions to an unjust world and to try to bring that world nearer to some perfection. The trouble is not with the amount of social unrest, but with the poets. Let there be better poets and an anthology of this kind will become "dangerous" and significant.

Easier Motherhood. By Constance Todd. The John Day Company. $2.

Mrs. Todd is rightly exercised over the unnecessary suffering of childbirth. She has been at great trouble to discover how generally this suffering is still permitted in the United States; she has made herself familiar, with scientific precision unusual in a layman, with the details of one of the methods of reducing the pains of labor; and she has made the most careful inquiry as to the extent to which this method has been adopted. The so-called Gwathmey technique, by which the most severe pains during childbirth are alleviated although there is no interference with the necessary muscular control, was first tried in the New York Lying-in Hospital some eight years ago. It has since spread to a number of hospitals and is used by many obstetricians throughout the country. Mrs. Todd's contention is that it is the simplest and most effective of all methods of alleviating labor pains, that it can be used by any general practitioner or midwife, that it is not expensive, and that hence it should be in universal use. The matter is perhaps not quite so simple as this; there are more obstacles in the way of using the method than her enthusiasm for it will admit, nor is it usable in as many cases. But there is no denying the necessity for a far wider acceptance of the general principle that some lessening of the agony of child-bearing is not only desirable but possible and safe. If her book will serve to attract the attention of prospective mothers to the subject, to give them confidence that something may be done for them and that some doctors are willing and able to do it, their demand on the medical profession will result in a changed attitude. Doctors—even some of the best of them—have been too long prone to regard the sufferings of labor as "natural," "inevitable," and "right." This point of view is changing more slowly than it should, and Mrs. Todd's book may very well be a long push in the right direction.

Plays of the Restoration and Eighteenth Century. Edited by Dougald MacMillan and Howard Mumford Jones. Henry Holt and Company. $4.

A well-printed and intelligently edited collection of twenty-four English plays from Davenant's "Siege of Rhodes" to Kotzebue's "The Stranger" (in Benjamin Thompson's translation). No available collection better illustrates the history of the London stage during the period covered.

The Industrial Revolution in the South. By Broadus Mitchell and George S. Mitchell. The Johns Hopkins Press. $2.75.

This book is an admirable answer to the complacency and cruelty of those Southern chambers of commerce which advertise the South as the paradise of contented workers. It is written not by Northern agitators but by Southern economists who love and hate their homeland with the ambivalence of disillusioned native sons. The Mitchell brothers in a series of essays trace the rise of the cotton-manufacturing industry in the South, the birth of the labor movement, the great strikes at Elizabethton, Marion, and Gastonia, and the reaction of the new economic life upon culture and religion. They rejoice in the passing of the old South because it meant "luxury for a tiny minority" and "social starvation for a subjected majority," but they insist that the new South can never gain economic maturity while its workers get $11 a week and its manufacturers base their industrial policies upon egoism and sugar-coated philanthropy. In between the sections of solid economic analysis the authors have sandwiched some brilliant portraits of Southern types and a caustic comment upon the church.

Art

Caricature and Peggy Bacon

CARICATURE at its purest, "characature," is a very civilized sort of portraiture. Despite its ironism and exaggeration, it remains "a pictorial representation, through the emphasis of selected traits, of physical or mental characteristics; a representation of character through form." As such, it prerequires character in the subject and the capacity for the divination of character in the artist. Now, character and consciousness are both effects of high civilization. The ethical traits distinguishing individuals can scarcely fix themselves and grow dominant in a world without order, stability, values. As for the capacity to divine personality, to infer from traits of visage and conduct the virtues, vices, and passions in concordance with them, it certainly cannot be conceived unaccompanied by experience of life, and insight, sensitivity, sophistication. High civilization, in other words, is the very condition of "characature"; almost its creator.

Hence the scarcity of excellent work of this sort in America, where a civilization has not yet taken form. The grand American scene is curiously peopled with masks concealing fluid, uncertain, unknown beings. At times, to pass through your typically energetic, healthy, bright American crowd is to go among innumerable borrowed, second-hand, ill-fitting faces; wax imprints taken from heads that were parts and indicators of personalities, heroic personalities; now attached to organisms with which they have no relation, and upon which they lead a strangely abstract and parasitic existence. The blond flashing mask of Siegfried advances through the throng, clapped upon a sort of life and idea quite incongruous with it: perhaps the habits and ambitions of an automobile salesman. Cleopatra's and Lucrezia Borgia's dark, glamorous, fatal visages appear on gentle, timid girls; Gretchen's sweet flaxen countenance upon a person made of the finest bathroom porcelain. All the immensely characteristic archetypes present themselves, Byron's face, and Mephisto's, and the boy David's, and Mona Lisa's, and the Countess Potocka's; indeed, the entire historic, literary, and operatic repertory's: and yet we know that these expressions of passion and villainy, elfishness, inscrutability, devotion have a lesser kinship to the illustrious bundles of nerves and impulses after which we call them than a poor copy of a masterpiece has to the original painting, or the degenerate descendant of a great family to his puissant forebears. The new character has not yet developed; nature would appear to be marking time, waiting upon a new force or direction, a new organization of psychological traits, emptily repeating past expressions. Bare or almost bare of the sense of whatever it is they are, these perfectly amiable people exaggerate their superficial resemblances to past types, seizing upon the glass of a borrowed effect because the brilliance of an individuality, a character, is not theirs.

Of course, what commonly passes for caricature among us is not "characatural" at all. It is a mere amassing of objects of ridicule and distaste without artistic penetration, an overloading of portraits in the manner of Sinclair Lewis, an extreme exaggeration of peculiarities and defects. Each month the New Masses regales us with a banquet of pretexts for resentments; and even so diverting an art as Peter Arno's is not free of the effects of the tendency to "throw off" on people. The refreshment flowing from a show such as Peggy Bacon's recent one at the Downtown Gallery, with its sense of civilization, of advancing order and illumination, is therefore readily comprehensible.

For Peggy Bacon is that urbane thing, a witty portraitist, a natural "characaturist." One is obliged to return to the "material, relative, and absolute" caricatures of the brilliant and bitter Marius de Zayas to find examples of her sort of art more daring and distinguished than her own. And in the time that has elapsed since the appearances of these sparse masterpieces, no one has brought a greater wit and penetration to caricature than she, or expressed Aristophanic comedy through a happier artistic medium. Her spirit is ironical, but without malice. Her passionless vision finds neither grandeur nor exquisiteness in things, but chiefly a lavish clumsiness, a grand ineptitude. Her stage is full of uncouth, shaggy males charging at typewriters and drawing-boards with all the daintiness of stampeding elephants; of great masculine boots that manage to plant themselves fatally, irrevocably in the middle of white picnic cloths; of noses that are somehow too long and eyes and jawbones somehow too wide. She sees shortsighted critics innocently sticking their burning cigar ends into the paintings they are examining; she spies unfortunate masculine nostrils of a width and fierceness unable to produce anything but fright in the feminine observer, and beside them terrified eyeballs like panicky horses', communicating their own fright and intensifying the unfortunate effects of the grosser organs. Friendly visages come before her retina set upon bodies that grotesquely, platitudinously protrude; many kindly, attractive spirits compromised by some demon that will let nothing be quite successful, and makes all things quite pleasantly, pardonably, risibly, to fall short. Yet there is no ugliness in Miss Bacon's conceptions, but much good nature, patience, humor, a little weariness, and something which in unguarded moments verges dangerously closely upon tenderness. It is said that many of her well-known virile sitters have been disaffected by her portraits of themselves, accusing her of an overmastering desire to be funny. But that in itself is but another American subject for "characature."

All this sense of the personality and significance of people reaches her quite wittily, stenographically, in concentrated form. The color of an eye or a complexion, the play of fingers in a gesture, the knot of a horrid little butterfly necktie, have summarized a quality of life sharply and humorously for her. One of her most consummate portraits is built around a gilt chain hooking eyeglasses to an ear; and in that transit from glass to ear and back again, short as the trajectory of a Toonerville trolley, a whole dry academism, prissiness, impossibility has lain exposed before her. And all this quintessence of things is reproduced, recorded, expressed by her in the manipulations of her medium. Her feeling of things is directly communicated through it, reaching us like a physical presence, an object, in the play of line and hue. Miss Bacon is an able draftsman, a charming, often extremely gifted colorist. It is possible to regard the best of her pastels as paintings, and to be satisfied by their paint quality. Some of her portraits, such as the Charles Sheeler, the Murdock Pemberton, the Heywood Broun, the Kenneth Hayes Miller, and the Mrs. Halpert, are completed little works of art. And it is significant that she is most the artist where she is most true to the spirit of "characature." Her less interesting color effects usually are found in combination with her less subtle realizations of character, themselves in turn due to the interference of some antipathy, some personal feeling. Here, her gravest faults, such as a tendency to monotony in the handling of flesh, become obtrusive. Nor is it always the inferior subject which eludes her. Fortunately, she has a steady fund of sympathy, playful, mocking, wonderfully keen, whatever her critical sitters may say; large enough in any case to have given us distinguished examples of her rare and desirable form.

PAUL ROSENFELD

Music

The Bach Festival

IF the contending factions of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation stockholders would like to make a settlement out of court, I can recommend an excellent piece of institutional advertising to which a small fraction of the bonus money might well be devoted. Although the Bethlehem Bach Choir boasts the names of Schwab and Grace on its committees, they are really not getting their money's worth. For it is perfectly clear that whatever distinction the annual Bach festival possesses is to be credited to Dr. J. Fred Wolle, its conductor, and just as clear that its faults and lacks are due, chiefly, to the stinginess of its guarantors.

Just what these guarantors pay for is something of a mystery. Neither Dr. Wolle's salary nor his bonus, I take it, is an immense burden. The rent is free. The copies of the B-minor Mass can be used over and over again, since it is done every year. Eight or ten cantatas cannot be very expensive. Obviously not an extra cent is wasted on the orchestra, which reads nine-tenths of the music at sight, and manages to efface every memory of how it sounded last year. Obviously, too, the soloists are inexpensive; or, if they are not, the guarantors are being cheated. The church, moreover, is not small, and good money is charged for the seats, every one of which is always taken.

Mr. Schwab may be, as Will Rogers told him, "the greatest sucker on earth"; but in the case of the Bach festival he could be less of a sucker by being more of one. Of the million a year he has been putting into Bethlehem, very little, apparently, has crept up the hill to the festival.

The Bach Choir itself is in no way a disappointment. It is as good a chorus as I have ever heard, and this is the more remarkable when you remember that it is recruited locally and that its members are not even in contact with musical experience except by radio and through Dr. Wolle. For his part in the festival praise must be unqualified. Out of what is surely not exceptionally promising material, either vocally or musically, he has created a chorus of immense tonal resource and sensitive musicianship. His conducting is a compound of everything admirable: authority, imagination, fire, restraint, architectural sense, virtuosity in choral manipulation—he combines them all in proportions that leave little to be desired. Moments like the opening of the Kyrie and of the Sanctus, in the Bethlehem performance of the Mass, are all too rare. He can produce a stirring allegro that marches, as well as an immensely sonorous, leisurely, and alive adagio. The quality of his choir's tone is excellent, and its quantity great. It is accurate as to pitch and rhythm, precise in its diction, sensitive in its response to Dr. Wolle's suggestion.

Dr. Wolle, by the way, is the perfect example of the conductor whose work has been done almost completely in rehearsal, so that hardly anything more than his mere presence is needed to remind the chorus of what it is to do. This was particularly fortunate this year, as illness had weakened him to such an extent that he probably could not otherwise have gone through with it. It was, at the same time, particularly unfortunate as regards the orchestra and the soloists. Dr. Wolle, whose work is exclusively with one chorus, with which he is therefore intimately acquainted, has naturally some eccentricities of beat and the like which are well understood by the chorus, but which are at times not entirely clear to an unrehearsed orchestra. His tempi, too, sometimes diverge widely from habitual ones. Consequently orchestra musicians who are not forewarned must not be blamed for starting an alla breve movement twice as fast as is intended, as happened once, or for mixing things up generally, as happened very often. Why the local organist should get as much as two beats behind or ahead of the rest of the performance at times remains unexplained, and the lethargy of the first oboist should bar him from future festival appearances.

Not even rehearsals would save most of the soloists: some were worse than others, so perhaps there is no need to mention names. They were handicapped at the cantata program on Friday by having to sing English words to music that is intimately tied, both by sense and by rhythm, to German. But the original Latin of the Mass did not seem to help them much on Saturday. Why the Mass should be sung in Latin and the German cantatas in English, when some of the most expressive music of the latter is fitted to recitatives whose inflection determines its whole contour, perhaps Dr. Wolle can say. Translation of song texts is always and everywhere an unsatisfactory and an unmusical process; and it is nowhere more so than in Bach.

If the cantatas could be sung in the original, if the orchestra could agree on the tempo and the pitch, if the soloists could agree with the orchestra on both these matters and—if they must sing English—decide whether to sing "tern," "töhn," "tarn," or "torn" for "turn," and if everyone could go through all the music once or twice, say, before the performance, the festival would be even better than it is. That, even with its serious faults, it is so rich and deep an experience is due to the work of Dr. Wolle, alone and apparently almost unassisted.

ARTHUR MENDEL

Drama

Old Irish

THIS is the season when farces abound, for however dolorous and damp the spring may be there is always a summer coming during which loud, easy laughter will be in order. Not that such a demand is easy to meet. Now also is the time when the public decides just which farces out of so many will be allowed to live on into the hot months. Judging by the reception it got as early as its second night, Patrick Kearney's "Old Man Murphy" (Royale Theater) is already assured of life until cold weather comes again. But I should not be surprised if it ran a year or two. It is hard to imagine, short of plague or fire or the sinking of Manhattan, what would stop it. I have rarely heard such a volume of laughter as greeted this piece, and I have rarely been so much amused myself.

Not that "Old Man Murphy" is without defect, and not that it isn't forced in places. But Mr. Kearney, assisted in the writing by Harry Wagstaff Gribble, who also directs, has found a comic region lying halfway between Lady Gregory and Ann Nichols, and this appears to be a region of great promise. The influence of Lady Gregory is felt in the healthiness of the observation and in the flavor of the Irish dialogue. The author of "Abie's Irish Rose," on the other hand, has inspired a removal of the scene to America and an emphasis throughout upon the particular brand of patriotism which we find in Irishmen whenever they compare themselves with other races, the other races in this case being the English and the Jewish, with a third and more important one added, the renegade Irish. For the story is chiefly about an Irish-American family who have tried to conceal their origin in order to get on in the society of a Middle Western city, and the fun is extracted from situations which expose them to both the ridicule and scorn of those of their countrymen who have remained faithful. Charles Murphy, unable to conquer his wife's ambition, has changed his name to Murfree and has pretended to come from Tennessee. Now, however, on the eve of his election as mayor, comes his father, Old Man Murphy, from Ireland to manage the campaign. Old Man Murphy does more than that. He brings confusion to Mrs. Murfree (born Mary Mulligan), and, what with much brogue and Irish whiskey and going to wakes, he brings occasion for constant laughter to the audience.

The part is played by Arthur Sinclair, who was Mr. Gilhooley in the play by that name which failed last fall. Two roles could scarcely be farther apart, yet Mr. Sinclair has brought them somehow into the single circle of his excellence; the season for him, therefore, is distinctly a success. His acting, with that of Maire O'Neill as the Widow Donovan and that of Lawrence O'Sullivan as Larry Heffernan, has doubtless a great deal to do with the triumph of "Old Man Murphy." But it would be a triumph anyway, considering the story it tells and the prejudice it so warmly and cleverly exploits.

The Civic Light Opera Company was so well received in "The Mikado" that it has decided to give during the next few months not only "The Gondoliers" and "Patience," as originally announced, but "The Pirates of Penzance," "Iolanthe," and "Ruddigore." At present the bill is "H.M.S. Pinafore" (Erlanger's Theater), with Frank Moulan as Sir Joseph, William Danforth as Dick Deadeye, William C. Gordon as Bill Bobstay, and Fay Templeton as Little Buttercup. These veterans disport themselves magnificently, of course, and the evenings on Forty-fourth Street continue happily to pass. The summer promises well indeed.

BY THE NARROW MARGIN of only one vote the Supreme Court has upheld freedom of press in the United States. Had Justice Roberts voted with the four reactionary members of the court, that portion of the Constitution which guarantees a free press would have been nullified. The issue was presented by the Minnesota newspaper "gag" law which provided that a publication might be suppressed whenever a district judge, without even a jury's advice, found that there had been regular publishing of "malicious, scandalous, and defamatory" articles. The Chief Justice, for the majority of the Supreme Court, while denouncing heedless assaults upon public men (he has himself felt the lash of violent press criticism on more than one occasion), rightly held that "the fact that liberty of the press may be abused by miscreant purveyors of scandal does not make any less necessary the immunity of the press from previous restraint in dealing with official misconduct." For redress there remain the libel laws. Had the decision gone the other way, the ways would also have been further opened toward breaching the Constitution in the matter of free speech and free assembly. It is now being nullified by countless mayors, sheriffs, public officials, and others who, by the simple device of declaring that a given meeting might endanger the public order, forbid the assemblage of all groups they dislike. The present decision preserves the press against one dangerous form of attack, and is a welcome indication of the liberal temper of the "new majority."

UNHAPPILY, CENSORSHIP of the press through the government's power over the mails has again been upheld in the courts. The Post Office order revoking the second-class mailing privileges of Revolutionary Age, a communistic journal, has been sustained by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals. Judge Woolsey of the Southern New York District Court had previously ruled that he could not reverse a departmental order of this sort unless it were clearly wrong, and in the case of Revolutionary Age he could not find it wrong. Following close upon this decision another order was issued canceling the second-class privileges of the Class Struggle, a Communist minority organ edited by Albert Weisbord. Thus there are now five radical journals under the ban of the Post Office. The significance of this kind of censorship was discussed at length by Lawrence Rogin in The Nation for April 8. That the withdrawal of second-class privileges from these publications is not the work of an overzealous post-office official in New York, but appears rather to be part of a predetermined government campaign to hamper or suppress all radical publications is indicated by a statement from Frederick G. Mulker, superintendent of the classification section of the New York Post Office, that the order for cancelation of mailing privileges in each case has come from Washington. Attorneys for the American Civil Liberties Union, which has been aiding the publishers in their fight for a free press, are now considering taking the Revolutionary Age case to the United States Supreme Court.

THE HAPPINESS BOYS are irrepressible. Here is Dr. Julius Klein insisting, in the face of a week of widespread protests against the tariffs which are doing so much to intensify world-wide disaster, that our new tariff has had nothing whatever to do with the shrinkage of our exports. That shrinkage, he finds, is exactly the same, to within a fraction of 1 per cent, as the decline in exports during the depression of 1921. That is, of course, extremely encouraging to the exporter whose business is dropping out from under him. But never mind; Dr. Klein will find the silver lining even if the export figures should get steadily worse. And so will Herbert Hoover. His press bureau solemnly gave out after the Cabinet meeting on May 26 an announcement by the President that the Cabinet session, which was "devoted almost entirely to a study of the economic situation," had found "many favorable factors." When asked, however, what they were, we hasten to announce that "none of the Cabinet officers would say what 'favorable factors' had been found in the study of business conditions." That is certainly highly convincing; it must have heartened every one of our unemployed to read this—provided they have the pennies to spend on daily newspapers.

EVEN THE SPIRITS of the Happiness Boys must, however, have been a bit dampened by the attacks upon the sacred tariff made at the meeting of the National Foreign Trade Council which heard Mr. Hoover's own Julius in its defense. There was Thomas W. Lamont. Being a conservative banker he did not quite dare to say what he really thought, so he concealed the dread word tariff under the euphemism "artificial barriers against foreign trade." Perhaps, being a Harvard graduate, he remembered hearing Professor Barrett Wendell say to his class that a euphemism is to literature what the fig leaf is to art. Other speakers, braver than Mr. Lamont, tore the fig leaf away and went after the tariff hammer and tongs. Thus Peter Fletcher, president of the National Council of Importers and Traders, was impious enough to demand that a special session of Congress should be called at once to effect a 25 per cent horizontal cut in all ad valorem rates and a 50 per cent reduction of all specific duties, even stating that the United States had been guilty of initiating "the greatest world-wide tariff war in history." All of which is bad enough, but how the Happiness Boys must have writhed to read that that irrepressible bad boy, David Lloyd George, in making an impassioned appeal for free trade, had declared that "if Britain abandons free trade now she will have betrayed a great trust. She will have bartered away a great inheritance for a mess of pottage. And what a mess!" On top of which he cited the United States several times as a horrible example of what protection can do to a country, finally concluding: "There are no bread lines, no penny lines, in this country [as in the United States]. There is more employment to the square mile in this country that in any other country in the world." As if this were not enough comes the news that Canada has again retaliated by raising its tariffs against the United States on 200 items, notably automobiles, steel, and foods.

"RUGGED INDIVIDUALISM" came in for another knock the other day at the opening session of the fifteenth International Labor Conference at Geneva. Speaking particularly of the European economic crisis, the British trade-union delegate, Edward Poulton, remarked that conditions in the United States had until recently been cited as "an example of what can be done by unfettered private enterprise in the absence of checks and safeguards," thereby casting doubt upon "the practicability of social progress by means of labor legislation." Mr. Poulton's conclusion, on the other hand, was that without the "legislative measures of social reform" that Europe has already adopted, the effects of the crisis there "would be infinitely more severe than in fact they are." The inference to be drawn, apparently, is that Europe might well have more labor legislation rather than less, and that private enterprise, in the form in which it has been allowed to dominate the business life of America, is looked upon by Europe as a grave warning. Even international cooperation in inquiry and debate, however, seems to frighten Washington, as witness the abrupt withdrawal of a duly appointed observer from the Geneva conference lest her presence should in some way constitute official recognition of the League. Unofficial observation, it would seem, has suddenly become a hazardous occupation.

PUBLIC DEMONSTRATIONS against the Vatican coupled with street fighting between groups of Fascist and Catholic youths have finally resulted in an order from Mussolini dissolving the organization known as the Catholic Action, and the many Catholic youth societies as well. Under the terms of the Lateran treaty of 1929 the Vatican expressly agreed to keep the Catholic Action out of Italian politics. Lately, however, the Fascist press has accused members of this organization of becoming increasingly active in the political field, the suggestion being that the Catholics were working to undermine the Fascist regime. Underlying this situation is the long-standing rivalry between the church and the state, to which the Lateran treaty did not put an end. Mussolini wants the state to reign supreme in all affairs touching the lives of its citizens; the Vatican, though forced to accept political inferiority, still considers itself entitled to guide the spiritual welfare of the people. Restive under the restraints placed upon the church, and probably inspired in part by the Vatican, the organized followers of the Holy See doubtless have sought to give expression politically or otherwise to their resentment at this domination by the state. The immediate question is whether the Catholic Action has by its recent activities violated the Lateran treaty. If this can be proved, Mussolini was perhaps legally justified in ordering the dissolution of the organization. But in taking this stand he has succeeded in further antagonizing the church, and that may have its repercussions not alone in Italy, but also in other countries in which Catholicism is strong and upon whose continued good-will Italy so largely depends.

FREEDOM FOR HAITI is to come sooner than was expected if the plans of the State Department, as reported by the Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Sun, meet with the necessary cooperation in Haiti. According to this authority, the American marines are to be withdrawn within two years instead of waiting until 1936, the date recommended by the Forbes Commission, provided the Haitian government gives its approval and the replacement of American officials by Haitians goes on with satisfactory speed and efficiency. The customs service will still be administered by an American receiver, however, in order to guarantee the interest payments on the balance of a loan of $16,000,000 made by the National City Bank of New York, some $11,000,000 of which remains to be discharged by 1952, and it is expected that American sanitary officials will remain. With the withdrawal of the last of the American marines from Nicaragua set for January 1, 1933, it is possible that the close of Mr. Hoover's term two months later may see American forces out of all Caribbean countries. It is certainly to be hoped that Haiti may do its part in the matter, and that American domination, hateful to the Haitian people and discreditable to the United States, may soon end.

THE BOARD OF TRUSTEES of Ohio State University might possibly run a factory successfully, but they certainly make a bad fist of it when they try to run a university. In a formal statement signed jointly by the trustees and President Rightmire, they declare that the dismissal of Professor Herbert A. Miller (reported in The Nation of last week) was decided on a year ago and that he was informed of that decision, with the reasons for it, last fall. Those reasons, it appears, are the complaints of trembling Ohioans regarding his teachings on race and marriage, and some innocuous remarks made by him at a Nationalist meeting in Bombay a year ago—which speech, it seems, had "international aspects," though the British government raised no objection. Professor Miller declares that he was given the impression, following conferences last autumn, that the whole matter of his dismissal had been dropped. In any case, it is a disgrace to higher education in the United States. Three thousand students have signed a petition asking Professor Miller's reinstatement. Not only the Miller case but the whole situation evidently ought to be investigated by the American Association of University Professors. We are happy to report that a memorial signed by some sixty of the leading members of the faculty is being presented to the trustees protesting against the extraordinary statement issued by the trustees in connection with the controversy over compulsory military training, criticizing the "unripe vociferations" of a "very few members of the faculty who were under no compulsion to come here and are under none to remain unless they can subscribe to the fundamental purposes of this university." We congratulate the faculty on accepting this brutal challenge, and we hope that they will wage war without quarter on the forces of ignorance and reaction intrenched in a backward board of trustees. Without question this is one of the most important of recent battles in the long struggle for academic freedom.

THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY of the Presbyterian Church, in session at Pittsburgh in the week following the decision of the Supreme Court in the Macintosh and Bland cases, took strong ground in opposition to the opinion of the majority of the court. It adopted a report in which "the assembly declares its belief that the right and duty of citizenship should not be conditioned upon the test of ability or willingness, contrary to conscience, to bear arms or to take part as a combatant in war." The battle for liberty of conscience must go on, and we are entitled to look to churches for a strong lead in that fight. The Presbyterians have led off well.

WHAT HAVE MEN to gain by rising to the height of nearly ten miles above the earth beyond the ability to say that they have gone higher than any other human beings? That question is yet to be answered by Professor Auguste Piccard and his assistant, Dr. Charles Kipfer, who have so happily completed their daring ascent in an air-tight aluminum gondola. If it was a genuine search for scientific truth instead of a mere stunt, the work of the two men will certainly be acclaimed, but there seems to be some considerable skepticism about the scientific value of anything that Professor Piccard may have observed on his trip into the stratosphere. He declares that they risked their lives "because we wished to be assured that cosmic rays at that height were ten times as powerful as after reaching the earth after passing through the atmosphere." Undoubtedly the answer as to whether the whole undertaking was worth while will be found when we get the detailed analyses of the Professor's findings. That he and his assistant are courageous enough is perfectly obvious. We confess, however, to getting very tired of aerial stunts. Why should Ruth Nichols seek to be the first woman to make a solo flight across the Atlantic, and why, oh, why, should Walter Lees and Frederick Brossy have remained aloft over eighty-four and one-half hours in order to break a record? An achievement of that kind is of no earthly value save in creating momentary notoriety for those who accomplished it.

Barbarus Americanus

THE American mayors who, as guests of the city of Paris and the French Colonial Exposition, are making a tour through France have succeeded in surpassing all records for gaucheness and bad manners so far held by Americans in a foreign land. Beginning with the reception at Le Havre, at which Mayor John C. Porter, of Los Angeles, and his wife left the table in high dudgeon because a toast of champagne was offered to the Presidents of the United States and of France, the mayors proceeded to quarrel wherever they went, usually noisily, and finally distinguished themselves when Mayor George S. Baker of Portland made a fifteen-minute oration before the tomb of the Unknown Soldier in Paris, thus breaking the rule of silence there which has so far been invariably observed.

It is the old story over again of the American marine in China who, shown a shrine on which a taper had not been extinguished for 700 years, pinched it between thumb and forefinger, saying: "It's out now." Too many Americans in foreign lands, from the American Legionnaires up and down, have not troubled to acquaint themselves with the most dearly held customs of the countries they visited, have lugged out their American provincialisms, have been loud-mouthed, quarrelsome, vulgar, insistent on their "rights" as citizens of the greatest little old country on God's green earth. What the urbane French, with a tradition of politeness and suave manners, think of the present exhibition one can only imagine. It is reported that the affair of Mayor Porter was regarded as an "amusing incident." That gentleman declared indignantly, when questioned:

> Yes, we are dry. We believe in following the American Constitution when on foreign soil. We have not taken one drink since we left the United States and we don't intend to touch alcoholic stimulants while in France.

And the saddest feature of the matter is that there will be plenty of persons in this country who will, in their fanatical advocacy of the cause of prohibition, be found to applaud this bit of bad manners.

There must be something about foreign travel which breaks down the native good sense of people in general. For while Americans are probably the worst behaved when they appear en masse somewhere away from home, the Germans are notoriously noisy and vulgar as tourists, the English are as notoriously narrow and provincial, and the French lose much of their urbanity when they leave their native land. The answer probably is that when one is away from one's own fireside and customs and language one becomes afraid and insecure. What is strange is still damned. It is different, it is frightening, it needs to be attacked. The behavior of visiting American Legionnaires in Paris, so opposite to that of Mayor and Mrs. Porter, is but another aspect of the same fear.

Keeping this in mind, the tour of the American mayors seems to merit pity more than anger. Possibly if they ever visit Paris again, they will have learned to be less frightened by it. Meanwhile one can only hope that they are not seized with the notion of flooding Napoleon's tomb to make a swimming pool or painting the Arc de Triomphe red, white, and blue.

Mr. Hoover Denies Europe

YES, Mr. Hoover denies Europe—denies it sympathy, good-will, cooperation, a helping hand, any cogent and worth-while expression of fellowship in its present misery. One touch of such suffering ought to make the whole world kin. But Mr. Hoover neither feels, nor sees, nor moves. He is apparently blind to the fact that Europe stretches out its hands to us in despair as it sinks steadily into the quicksands of unemployment, economic disorganization, financial distress. He is content to blame Europe for our ills on the one hand, and to say on the other that we can none the less work ourselves out by ourselves, without regard for the authors of our misery.

It was in Cleveland on October 2 last that he declared that "this depression is world-wide. Its causes and effects lie only partly in the United States," adding that "a perhaps even larger immediate cause of our depression has been the effect upon us from the collapse in prices following overproduction of important raw materials, mostly in foreign countries." This was a sound and correct, if strangely phrased, statement as far as it went. It surely was intended to make it clear to his countrymen that they were caught in the meshes of a world-wide depression. Since then every development here and abroad has enforced the truth that this industrial crisis is affecting more countries more acutely than any other recorded in the modern industrial age. It has brought home the stale truism that the world is now a small entity which cannot be well if a single part of it is ill.

But what has Mr. Hoover done to grapple with the disease as a world-wide infection which in largest measure came to us from abroad? Frankly, nothing, from the international point of view, beyond giving the excellent advice that Europe should disarm—perhaps even a hint to Europe that without disarmament there can be no question of a revision of debts and reparations. His lack of initiative is no doubt in part due to his having said, with his habitual lack of intellectual clearness, in the very speech from which we have quoted, that it was not necessary for us to "wait upon the recovery of the rest of the world. We can make a very large degree of recovery independently of what may happen elsewhere." Eight months have come and gone since these words were spoken, and each month has shown the error of Mr. Hoover's assumption. We have not only not made a "large degree of recovery independently" of events elsewhere, we are worse off than ever. Our export trade continues to fall off; sixty-four of our railways have just reported that their net income for April of this year was 37.2 per cent less than in April, 1930, and no less than 57.6 per cent less than their net revenues in April, 1929. Our national deficit is officially admitted to be beyond one billion dollars, and on the stock market the values of the very best securities continue to sink. If this constitutes working ourselves out of the depression without waiting for the recovery of Europe, we do not understand the meaning of words.

If it does not indicate the need of international action, what could? The attempts of the sugar-growers of the world to combine under Mr. Chadbourne's guidance, the frantic calls for an international agreement on silver, the suggestion that there should be a world dictator to deal with the wheat situation, the efforts of the Russians at Geneva to bring about an economic understanding in order to end dumping and needless economic rivalries, the demands from all quarters for the lowering of the tariff barriers that hem international trade—all these prove not only the need of international action, but the growing intensity of the demand for it. But Mr. Hoover does not move. True, he sent a delegate to the International Wheat Conference in London, but his representative took so stubborn and unyielding a position against any international agreement to limit production that debate was rendered useless—"torp doed at the start," the dispatches from the conference read.

But what, we hear the question raised, could Mr. Hoover do in this emergency, limited as he is by Congress in dealing with our international relations? Primarily, the mere announcement that he had begun to busy himself with international affairs, with a view to cooperation and aid, would send a thrill of hope and encouragement all around the world, and would in itself be a tremendous blow to the utter discouragement of the peoples of Europe. Next, Mr. Hoover could take advantage of the meeting the week of June 1 at Chequers between Chancellor Brüning and his Foreign Minister and Prime Minister MacDonald and his Foreign Secretary to urge the coming together of a small group of the rulers of Europe, together with the best possible American representative, to see what could be done in the way of removing the several hindrances to world trade and world recovery. He would have to be ready at least to talk about the general reduction of the protective tariffs. He would have to permit at such a conference a full and free discussion of the debts and reparations, whether he felt in sympathy with such a discussion or not, because if Europe goes on as it is much longer, the first steps toward asking for a moratorium will have to be taken by Germany, in which case the United States cannot avoid facing the debts and reparations situation. Such a conference could, moreover, discuss the disarmament which lies so close to Mr. Hoover's heart; it is not impossible that if he himself took the lead in a concrete proposal, the parties to such a conference might present a united front at Geneva next winter.

But the great thing is that such a conference, especially if it met on the invitation of Mr. Hoover and he kept in direct telephonic communication with it, would be able to reach some definite conclusions such as can never be arrived at by foreign ministers or finance ministers. At least it would establish once for all whether there can be cooperation or not, whether Europe must go down merely because of the inability of the heads of the several nations, including our own, to deal with the extraordinary emergency which confronts us. No greater opportunity has ever come to an American President, save only Mr. Wilson, to lead the world and to render it incalculable service. Of this every enlightened person in Europe, whatever his country or his political faith, is absolutely certain. But that marvelous opportunity knocks in vain at Mr. Hoover's door.

The Business Innocents

ARE American business leaders innocent of all knowledge of the facts of our industrial history and of the elementary principles of international trade? We are almost inclined to answer yes after reading the address of James A. Farrell, president of the United States Steel Corporation, before the National Foreign Trade Council.

"While it is vital to our prosperity as a nation," Mr. Farrell tells us, "to find a market overseas for at least 10 per cent of our total production, we should not forget the rock from whence successful foreign trade is hewn, the foundations that have been so well and deeply laid in our home market." Does Mr. Farrell really mean, as he seems to, that we are in fact making a 10 per cent "surplus" of goods in general that we do not need here and so must somehow sell abroad? Can it be that he does not know that in the last analysis we exchange goods for goods?

"Seeing that the unfavorable conditions apply indiscriminately to all countries, low-tariff, high-tariff, and free-trade alike," Mr. Farrell thinks it "must be obvious that tariff discussions . . . are of academic interest only." Can it be possible that Mr. Farrell does not see the entirely obvious fact that when one country cuts down its imports by raising its tariff walls it must correspondingly cut down the exports of the countries that sell to it, damaging their prosperity as much as its own, whether they are themselves high-tariff or low-tariff countries? The high tariff walls everywhere, more than any other single cause, have been responsible for choking the channels of world trade.

But worse is to come. Because 13,000,000 immigrants landed in the United States between 1901 and 1914, "we should not overlook the part our country is now playing in carrying a large share of Europe's burden of unemployment." Was ever more pernicious nonsense spoken by a responsible man? No industry, probably, has done more than that of which Mr. Farrell is a leader to bring in and exploit the immigrants whose presence he deplores. None has been more completely irresponsible in creating unemployment through irregular operation. And now Mr. Farrell has the monumental assurance to attribute American unemployment to pre-war immigration.

A single further example of the intellectual quality of this pronouncement: "An essential requirement of the present economic situation is an advance in commodity prices. . . . It is rising prices that stimulate buying and consumption, and a return of prosperity." Here is an amazing example of Christian Science economics. Rising prices in the past have often resulted in greater buying, because buyers assume that they indicate the possibility of a real shortage. Mr. Farrell seems to believe that we can all conspire together to deceive one another into the belief that our huge surpluses of raw materials are really shortages. His proposal is on all fours with the suggestion that we should blow our thermometers to seventy in winter instead of installing furnaces. Not until our industrial leaders have stopped talking such nonsense and have turned to a genuine analysis of the international and domestic factors that stand in the way of a sound readjustment are we likely to see any real and prolonged turn for the better.

Spain and Rome

JUDGED by the trend of history as shown in Italy in 1860-61, in France in 1905, and in Portugal in 1913, the Vatican appears destined to defeat again in its struggle to retain what it once deemed its inalienable rights and privileges. Republican Spain is making it clear that it wishes to divorce the church from the state. It is not seeking to do this by burning convents and church buildings, for by now it has been fairly well established that the mob action of a few weeks ago was the handiwork of monarchists and extremists who wished to set the overwhelmingly Catholic population against the new government. Rather would it proceed by more peaceful means to deprive Catholicism of its present standing as the state religion. Under the monarchy the constitution recognized but one religion; the state maintained the church property and paid the clergy; the higher clergy enjoyed special political and civil privileges; government employees were required to be Catholics; religious teaching was compulsory in the schools; the church completely controlled secondary education; other religions were permitted but under such restrictions as to make it almost impossible for them to exist. The Republican Government has indicated that it wants to change all this, placing all religions on the same footing. When it decreed freedom of religion, however, the Holy See retaliated by calling the Papal Nuncio to Rome and by declining to receive the new Spanish ambassador.

In fairness it must be stated that the Vatican was at first inclined to accept the Spanish republic as an established fact, and to yield gracefully on the question of the separation of church and state. But the Spanish hierarchy, jealous of its privileged position, refused to surrender, thereby making a peaceful solution of the church problem in Spain extremely difficult, if not impossible. As a result of the stand taken by the Spanish clergy the Vatican's opposition to the republic has stiffened. Some observers believe that the Pope's recent denunciation of socialism was directed against the Spanish Cabinet, half of whose members are Socialist. Whether this is true or not, the Papal encyclical has hurt rather than helped the position of the church. The remaining members of the Cabinet, all of whom are devout Catholics, appreciate full well that no moderate government can be had in Spain without the cooperation of the Socialists. Were the Socialists to leave the government, either because of the antagonism displayed toward their party by the Holy See or because of opposition to their anti-church stand from the Catholic members of the Cabinet, the resulting crisis would probably bring a radical government into power, and such a government would not be likely to stand upon ceremony in abolishing the established church.

It is probable that the controversy will be allowed to hang fire pending the outcome of the Cortes elections this month. Only the Cortes can under the present constitution denounce the concordat governing the official relations between the Vatican and Madrid which has been in force since 1851. Should the elections go as heavily Republican as did the municipal elections which immediately preceded the abdication of King Alfonso, there is every likelihood that the new assembly will vote to abrogate the concordat.

I Work for Russia

V. The American Engineer at Work[*]

By WALTER ARNOLD RUKEYSER

An American engineer working in a foreign country is in one sense a member of our diplomatic corps. The opinion of all the various persons he meets concerning America and Americans is directly molded by their reaction to his individual personality. This is particularly true of the American working in Russia, where we have no professional diplomats to help us. We must get out of our own scrapes, always bearing in mind that the attitude of Russians toward America depends almost wholly upon our own personal actions.

American mining engineers hitherto have for the most part gained foreign experience in Latin American countries, and because of the well-known mining opportunities in these lands our profession has in the main prepared itself for such work by a study of Spanish. In my experience it is very rare for an American engineer to have a speaking knowledge of German, which was the language used by at least one out of every three of the Russian executives I met, and certainly there is not one American engineer in ten thousand who has any knowledge of the Russian language, at least among those who have not worked in Russia. The great difficulties of that language for a foreigner are too well known to need mention.

On the other hand, while many educated Russians speak German, comparatively few know English. Further, even though the Russian interpreter speaks and understands everyday English, he cannot be expected to know technical engineering English, made up of words that not one American in a thousand would himself understand if he were not trained for the engineering profession. The first great difficulty of the average American engineer working in Russia, evidently enough, is the barrier of language.

But there are other difficulties encountered in working for the Soviet Union, particularly by the American who is working out in the "sticks" alone and not as a member of a comparatively large colony of his countrymen. To an even greater extent than elsewhere he represents all of America and all Americans to those with whom he comes in contact. His job requires infinite tact, diplomacy, understanding, and patience—not because the Russian people are difficult to get along with, quite the contrary, but rather because conditions of working and living are so utterly different from his past experience. First, he is working not for private interests with highly centralized authority and responsibility, but for the government itself. Second, he is working in a country whose psychology is that of a nation at war. Third, he is in the midst of a brand-new and gigantic experiment in sociology and political economy. Fourth, he finds himself cut off from his usual recreations and the other features of the bourgeois existence he leads in other parts of the world. Finally, he encounters the suspicions harbored by many Russians, more or less naturally under the present circumstances, of any "representative" of a capitalistic country, the people's conscious or subconscious fear of intercourse with foreign specialists, the possibility of professional and economic jealousies, and the red tape and inertia existing wherever government controls industry. His relations with his associates are further complicated by the fact that often the life or liberty of a Russian coworker hangs on the report of the foreign specialist.

Yet all these difficulties are today being more or less successfully met by hundreds of foreign engineers working in Russia. Some men magnify these handicaps in their mind to the point where they can no longer work efficiently; they develop a very bad state of "nerves." But for the most part—and this is particularly true of the mining engineer who has perforce "batted around" most of the world under all sorts of conditions—the American soon adjusts himself to his environment and finds that most of the supposed obstacles may be easily overcome or are non-existent in his own individual case. Now let me describe my own experience in getting things done in present-day Russia.

On our first trip into the Soviet Union, after most courteous treatment at the border at the hands of English-speaking officials, my wife and I were met at the railway station in Moscow by the interpreter-representative of our trust. But although he was pleasant and accommodating to the *n*th degree, his interpreting was confined to German! In retrospect I can see that this was largely my fault. I had told them at Amtorg in New York that I knew a bit of university German. This in Europe means something, and that, coupled with the Teutonic sound of my surname, led them to expect far more than my course in German 101-02 and my reading of Heine warranted. However, I had to speak German, and therefore I threw aside all inhibitions and did. Words and phrases learned in my college days, sounds that had been tucked away since childhood, when, thank heaven, I had had a German governess, seemed to pop out from the nowhere of my subconscious mind—and after a little, of a sudden, I could at least make myself understood.

All our travel needs were smoothly and efficiently taken care of by our interpreter. Luggage was disposed of, taxis were provided, and a suite of two rooms and bath at the hotel was in order for us. For the American entering Russia much depends upon the individual interpreter assigned to him. One will be found efficient, the next not. The Trans-Siberian express, which at that time of trouble with China ran only three times weekly, was crowded with people trying to reach the Far East before the anticipated serious trouble broke out. We therefore had to wait several days in Moscow for accommodations, and when finally we were told that everything was "set" we found ourselves in a compartment with two Englishmen in what was formerly a wagon-lit car. This was what is known as second class. I pointed out to our guide that my contract specifically stated we were to have first-class compartments throughout, consisting of two berths with lavatory facilities, and that a two-day trip for my wife under other circumstances unfortunately could not be thought of. Were I alone, nichevo. I fully understood the difficulty of obtaining accommodations and realized that my presence at the mines was earnestly required. Yet, although that was Friday and the next train did not leave until Tuesday, the representative of our trust very courteously and pleasantly acquiesced, and we were allowed to spend the week-end in Moscow amusing ourselves at our own discretion, until the stipulated type of accommodation was available.

[*] The fifth of a series of six articles. The sixth, on the Outside Life of the American Engineer, will appear in the issue of June 17.—EDITOR THE NATION.

Let me go on to our experiences during the past year, when we were no longer strangers in Russia, when our German had become more or less fluent, and a smattering of Russian was at our command. We traveled, upon arrival, from Moscow to Leningrad on the business of the trust. In the latter city are located many if not most of the scientific and technical bodies which control practically all the work going on in the Soviet Union. Here is the great N. T. S., the supreme engineering control of all plans and methods, composed of the leading Russian engineers, scientists, technicians, professors, and academicians. Here also are located the Mining Institute and the extremely modern and advanced "Mechanobra" and "Mechanobra Proyect." These last are respectively the experimental laboratories and plants where processes are worked out and proved on a commercial scale, and the design bureau where the detailed working drawings may be completed after a successful process has been developed. This service is of a consulting nature and is purchased by the various trusts which do not have facilities for such work at their own plants. The laboratories are among the most finely equipped and organized to be seen anywhere in the world. The technicians are among the best in Russia, practically all of them having been sent abroad by the Soviet to acquire the last word in practical as well as technical advance in all industries and sciences. The American consultant to a Russian trust usually, or at least in my own case, must work with Mechanobra. Many of the engineers speak a good technical English. Practically all with whom I came in contact spoke at least German. They have apparently a deep respect for the American specialist and are a splendid set of men with whom to work. They extend every courtesy and convenience to the foreign engineer.

Any plans drawn either at the offices of the trusts or by Mechanobra Proyect must be passed upon by the N. T. S. before being put into effect. (These are the initials of the Nauchnii Tekhnicheskii Soviet, or, in plain English, Scientific Technical Council.) This supreme engineering council, composed of some thirty or forty members, reviews every detail of the project in question. I personally appeared before them during one entire four-day sitting, beginning at nine-thirty or ten in the morning and lasting with recesses until possibly one the following morning. I had made rather radical recommendations concerning the entire work at Asbest, mining, milling, and general. Many of these men knew English well, some had worked in America for many years, all were of the highest order of scientific and engineering ability. Each point was threshed out in its entirety. Each reason and explanation of what I wished done was thoroughly examined, discussed, debated. I drank tea to the saturation point; I smoked until Vesuvius shook with envy. It was much like being a candidate for a doctor's degree in an American university. It was nerve-racking, especially since each sentence must be translated for the benefit of those who did not know English. But I could see the necessity for it all, I did not get impatient—and the plans and methods were approved.

The approval of what I had suggested meant discontinuance of certain methods which had already been inaugurated. It also meant the probable imprisonment of those responsible for the former plans. A great deal of premeditated sabotage is going on in Russia (today probably much less than formerly) on the part of those still antagonistic to the present regime. This is the opinion of most of the American specialists with whom I have discussed the matter. By no means all the mistakes or slowing down of tempo can be attributed simply to ignorance or lack of practical experience. Moreover, while the Russian engineers, at least those of the old school, are possibly the finest theoretically trained technicians in the world, they have not, in the main, had an opportunity since 1914 to study at first hand the tremendous mass of new technique which has been developed abroad since that time.

I have attended the trials of several engineers accused of malfeasance. Contrary to the general opinion and to accounts published in this country, I have found them to be entirely open and conducted along strictly legal lines. In most cases which have come under my personal observation sentences have been commuted to a return to former employment with fines. That seems to be the trend in punishment for inefficiency, premeditated or otherwise, today. It is for the American engineer to hold himself strictly aloof and non-partisan, and, above all, completely non-political. And that is why the Soviet officials seem to have such great faith in the American technicians. They know that we are interested only in our work, and want to do it to the best of our knowledge, experience, and ability. Whatever mistakes we make will be honest ones, due for the most part to lack of knowledge of men and materials in Russia.

At the mines I enjoyed a comfortable office, and whatever facilities were available were extended to me in my work. The younger men assigned me were respectful, competent, and mentally alert. Any recommendations which I wished put into effect I discussed with the technical director, and if they were of sufficient importance, they were considered at a specially called meeting of the entire technical staff, after which the technical director issued the necessary executive instructions. I found always an open mind and readiness to cooperate. In one case, in order to prove my ideas, I was placed in direct operating charge of a group of mines until the recommendations which I had made could be proved or disproved.

Often, when it was believed that the efficiency of any unit was lagging, I was asked to step into the gap, take charge, and try to remedy the trouble. I always found the director, engineer, and subalterns of such a particular unit more than anxious to work with me. The friendliest of relations, with no apparent jealousy or antagonism, always existed, once a sympathetic understanding was set up.

Frequently commissions of various sorts came out from Moscow or Leningrad. They might constitute the "control," or might be studying the question whether or not the American engineer was being "exploited" to the fullest. Sometimes these commissions handicapped our work by the introduction of red tape, but for the most part they came to me for suggestions and conference, with extremely constructive results.

In concluding my discussion of this phase of the subject, I must touch on the Russians' love for voluminous and detailed reports. The experienced American engineer, by training and instinct as well as by his previous experience, knows quickly and surely what is to be done. The Russian wants everything set down in writing and calculations. Then follows interminable debate. But there is a way to overcome even this lost motion. Many of us have found out how much can be accomplished with a sense of humor.

Organized Charity Turns Censor

By ELMER RICE

FOR the past seventeen years I have been a practicing playwright, and in the course of my professional life I have spent a good deal of time and energy fighting, in the interests of a free theater and free speech, the would-be censors and purifiers of the stage, from John S. Sumner to John Haynes Holmes. There is no medium of public utterance, whether it be the press, the stage, the lecture platform, the screen, or the radio, which is exempt from close scrutiny and unremitting pressure by sectarian, racial, professional, civic, and patriotic organizations. This unofficial censorship is remarkably active and remarkably efficient in its control of the several forms of popular entertainment. The easy successes of the self-appointed censors in this field are due, in the main, to the fact that the entrepreneurs of stage, screen, and radio are, for the most part, persons whose unblinking gaze is concentrated upon the box office and to whom a diminution of professional integrity and dignity means much less than the loss of revenue which might conceivably ensue as the result of the withdrawal of patronage of a few over-zealous Methodists, dentists, Zionists, Italians, delicatessen dealers, or American Legionnaires.

To give a random example of how this group pressure operates, I shall summarize three separate items clipped from a single issue of Variety (May 6, 1931). The first is a dispatch from Chicago which states that Edgar Wallace's play "On the Spot" had to be "toned down" before it could be presented upon the stage in that metropolis. Variety's correspondent declared:

> Citizens' committee and Mayor Cermak "advised" the Shuberts to cut all references to Chicago, on the grounds that the cracks might give people a bad impression about Chicago. Shuberts quickly agreed. They have too much money invested in Loop theatrical property to take a chance on antagonizing City Hall. If these big boys are crossed, they are apt to suddenly find official complaints to make against these properties. . . . Legally, it's understood that the city fathers have no right to declare a play censorable because it chooses Chicago, or any other city, as its locale.

The second item bears a Hollywood date line and reads as follows:

> In making a film version of the stage play "Alexander Hamilton," Warners' will go even farther than the play in whitewashing the lives of several historical characters. Due to the insistence of the Daughters of the Revolution, Hamilton, Thomas Jefferson, and James Monroe will be presented as schoolbook histories paint them. Story the film will unfold was explained to representatives of the D. A. R., and its soft-pedaled condition okayed by them.

The third story is even more fantastic. It deals with the difficulties of radio entertainers in finding material which will offend no one. Says Variety:

> Dial fans take quick offense at what they believe to be slights to their religion, nationality, city, school, make of auto, political party, or the way they comb their hair. . . . It was thought that the limit had been reached when a local station drew more than 8,000 protesting letters when one of its entertainers cracked that he couldn't become a druggist because he didn't know how to make sandwiches. . . . As for the stations themselves, the censorship thing becomes more and more stringent. Performers are sweating to find proper comedy material because of the must notes. It seems that no matter what they say, they're bound to step on somebody's toes.

It is only recently that I have had personally to combat the efforts of an influential and well-organized group to censor one of my own plays. Remarkable as it may seem, my determined antagonists have been none other than those professional doers of good, the administrators of organized charity. It is a story which should interest the dispassionate observer of the American scene.

On January 10, 1929, there was presented at the Playhouse in New York a play of mine entitled "Street Scene." The play is an attempt to portray objectively certain aspects of life in a mean quarter of New York. It depends for its effect upon the introduction of a great variety of metropolitan types and the accumulation of innumerable incidents which are designed to produce a totality of effect in the same manner in which a painter achieves his effects by piling up innumerable minute brush strokes. The play contains about seventy-five characters, approximately fifty of whom have speaking parts. One of these characters happens to be a social worker. She appears early in the first act, is on the stage for perhaps five minutes, and is not seen or mentioned again (except for one passing reference) throughout the remainder of the play. But despite her insignificant role, this Miss Simpson has apparently set the organized charities of the country by the ears. The fact that I have portrayed her as not wholly lovable is apparently more than the professional performers of works of misericordia have been able to endure, and for nearly two and a half years they have been unceasing in their efforts to make me glorify the American charity worker.

The opening gun was fired by Mr. William Hodson, who on January 25, 1929, wrote me in his capacity of executive director of the Welfare Council of New York City. "It may be," said Mr. Hodson in part, "that among the thousands of social workers in this city, there is one who would act as you have made a social worker act in your play, but the words that you have put into her mouth and the attitude that you have had her take are in no sense characteristic." After several more paragraphs of protest Mr. Hodson concluded by saying that he was sure that his letter voiced "the sentiments of the 700 social agencies constituting the Welfare Council." I did not mind having Mr. Hodson express his personal dissatisfaction, but the official tone of the letter and its suggestion of group pressure galled me a little, and I replied with considerable asperity. I said:

> In the course of many years' work among the settlement houses of New York I have encountered not one but many representatives of social agencies who . . . strikingly resemble the woman portrayed in "Street Scene." Whether or not her attitude is characteristic of social workers seems to me to be beside the point. "Street Scene" is not a sociological treatise and there is no intention to generalize about anything or anybody. . . . Whether or not you voice the sentiments of 700 social agencies I do not know. . . . Only politicians allow their conduct to be determined by the probable effect upon the German vote, or the Baptist vote, or the social workers' vote. No artist who is worth his salt is deterred from portraying life as he sees it by any such consideration.

I heard no more from Mr. Hodson, but on February 1 Miss Frances Taussig of the Jewish Social Service Association wrote me upbraiding me for my lack of familiarity with social work and social workers and offering the services of a former acquaintance of mine (a young lady whom I had not seen in fifteen years) to reveal to me the whole truth about social workers. I declined this offer with thanks, describing in detail my intimate acquaintance with dozens of social workers. Miss Taussig, however, returned to the attack and argued that "the effectiveness of social work is surely harmed by the plausible portrait which you draw of the social worker you may have come across in days past."

I pass over numerous letters (some of them anonymous) received from individual social workers and come to Miss Elizabeth Dutcher of the Brooklyn Bureau of Charities. Miss Dutcher charges me with being "emotionally prejudiced against social workers." She says, "We have difficulty enough to get the public to give us the money we need." She suggests that I "modify the offending lines" and invites me to a staff meeting "in possible preparation for such modification." I wrote to Miss Dutcher that I felt myself to be already sufficiently acquainted with social workers and added, "I am glad of the realistic note which you sound in your last paragraph. . . . Nothing must be done or said to interfere with contributions, for when the contributions cease what will happen to all the jobs?"

About this time a friend informed me that he had seen a story in the Survey to the effect that an indignation meeting of social workers had been held over the part in my play, but that the "cooler heads" had prevailed and it had been decided to take no action. I was curious to know just what action might have been taken, but subsequent experience with the dispensers of charity has instructed me. The next move was to try to get at me through a man prominent in welfare work, whom I have known and respected for many years. (I withhold his name to spare him any possible embarrassment.) This plan did not work either, for the chosen envoy happened to be a man of integrity first and a welfare worker second. On April 25 he wrote me as follows:

> Two or three of my social-work friends who knew that I had met you some years ago told me they thought I ought to protest against your picture of the social worker. Of course, we both know that there are many social workers of an entirely different type and it would have been gratifying to my professional self-respect to have had another one come in to show this other side. But I regret to have to agree that your picture of a certain kind is not overdrawn.

The next protestant to be heard from was Mr. Lindsay Bradford, vice-president of the City Bank Farmers Trust Company. Mr. Bradford wrote me on October 22, 1929 (after the play had been running nearly a year), in his capacity as a member of the Council of the Charity Organization Society. Mr. Bradford assured me that social workers "carry on their work with kindness and sympathy" and explained, in some detail, how the play could be altered to meet the requirements of organized charity. He added that in his judgment "the possibility certainly exists that the efforts on the part of charities to obtain contributions for their work will be hindered by such a disagreeable portrayal of a charity worker." By this time I was getting pretty tired of being badgered by the charity workers and in the course of a lengthy reply to Mr. Bradford I said:

> I think it is rather remarkable that an author should be asked to alter his play in order to make it easier for organized charity to obtain contributions. If the incidental portrayal of a charity worker in a play can actually impair the work of the charity organizations, then it seems to me that there must be something basically wrong with these organizations. It is a curious fact that all the protests which I have received have come from persons actively interested in the administration of organized charity. A psychologist might say that the reason that the charity workers protested so strongly against the falsity of the portrayal in "Street Scene" is that they recognize the truth of it.

The scene now shifts to Minneapolis, where the Western company of "Street Scene" was scheduled to play during the week of March 10, 1930. On March 6 Mr. Paul C. Salsberry, general secretary of the Family Welfare Association of Minneapolis, wrote to Mr. A. E. Zonne, chairman of the Civic Theater Committee, protesting against the characterization of the charity worker. Says Mr. Salsberry:

> We had some unpleasant experiences particularly with clients after the presentation of the film "It" several years ago, and also after "Undercurrent," which ran at the Orpheum last summer. But the characterizations in these were much less extreme than in "Street Scene" and I fear the results will be bad in proportion. It would seem a relatively simple matter to drop that particular portion of the play. . . . It seems ungracious to write in this critical way to a committee which is doing as much as yours is doing to revive good plays for Minneapolis, but it seems fair to try to anticipate the effect this particular section of "Street Scene" may have on social work in this community.

This letter was forwarded to the business manager of "Street Scene," which was then playing in Chicago, with a covering letter from Mr. Zonne in which he suggested that something be done in order "to meet the views of a host of the best people of Minneapolis, whom we must count on for your patrons." The next day the business manager of the play received the following telegram from the executive committee of the Twin-City Chapter American Association of Social Workers:

> Executive committee representing social work profession in Minneapolis and St. Paul agitated by caricature of social worker role Miss Simpson in Street Scene Stop Social work is young profession frequently misunderstood Stop Every misunderstanding costs community money Stop Lines in Street Scene give false impression of social worker Stop Would appreciate attempt to modify

This had its desired effect. The producer of the play, envisaging the loss of a few dollars at the box office, violated his contractual obligations to me, and without my knowledge altered the scenes in which the charity worker appears. Unfortunately, I did not learn of it until after the play had left Minneapolis, when I received letters from several members of my cast telling me that the scenes had been so garbled as to be unintelligible.

The next scene is laid in Hollywood, whence I have just returned. In the course of my preparation of the screen version of "Street Scene" I was given, for my guidance, a letter which Mr. Samuel Goldwyn, the purchaser of the motion-picture rights, had received from Colonel Jason S. Joy of the Association of Motion Picture Producers (the Will Hays organization). Colonel Joy's letter, after suggesting a number of deletions to meet the requirements of various censorship bodies—such as the omission of all "hell's" and "damn's" and of passing references to the Prince of Wales and Mussolini—said:

> As a matter of public policy we believe that it is quite important not to characterize Miss Simpson as a charity worker unless she is shown as a kindly and tolerant person. The public groups, as well as the many prominent and wealthy philanthropists interested in the development of charity work, will be very quick to resent any slighting reference to charitable organizations and to the workers devoting their time to that cause. For this reason we suggest that, unless some radical change be made in the characterization of Miss Simpson, it be definitely indicated that she is an agent for the party who is dispossessing the unfortunate family.

I protested vigorously against making this change and succeeded in winning over to my point of view the executives of the Goldwyn organization and the director of the picture. Colonel Joy was then called into consultation. He stated that while he himself saw nothing objectionable in the characterization and while it did not violate the so-called "Hays code" or the requirements of any local censorship body, the influence of prominent citizens, interested in community chests and local charity organizations, was so great that the exploitation and exhibition of the picture could be seriously hampered as a result of pressure which could be brought to bear upon local exhibitors and municipal censorship bodies. Colonel Joy has given me permission to quote him as saying that even before the picture rights had been sold, the Association of Motion Picture Producers had received numerous letters from charity organizations demanding that the offending characterization be changed upon the screen. No motion-picture company can withstand organized boycott and organized blackmail. The investment is too large to be jeopardized for anything so insubstantial as the principle of freedom of expression. It begins to look as though America is going to be safe for organized charity after all.

In the Driftway

ACCORDING to private advices from New Haven, it has become the fashion among Yale undergraduates to sneer at the Harkness grandeur in general and the overstuffed Gothic magnificence of the new library in particular—just as it became the fashion some years ago to wear raccoon coats and condescend to William Lyon Phelps. The criticism of Yale's architecture has become so widespread and so bitter that there is even a rumor of an about-face to colonial when the next billion clinks down the Yale chute. (By the way, is there a single medieval treasure room in those piles of Harkness stone? The Drifter hopes so—a treasure room with filing cabinets full of canceled checks.)

* * * * *

NOW the Drifter has always had a healthy respect for the sneers of the young. He thinks they should be encouraged and acted upon rather than dismissed. Moreover, he has been from the first one of Yale's severest critics in the matter of its architecture. Quite aside from any considerations of religious or aesthetic consistency, it has always seemed to him absurd to house a modern American university in walls three feet thick when there is no danger of attack from any enemy more medieval than an idea. As for two Harkness offenses against intelligence and morality—first, the application to the stone of corrosive acid to make it look old before its time, and, second, the elaborate faking of a broken-but-later-mended look in hundreds of the small panes of the leaded casement windows which doubtless afford little enough light at best—as for those twin idiocies, the Drifter need not waste words in an attempt to express himself. And yet, though he would agree with all their strictures, the Drifter is inclined to think that he would be more amused than impressed by most of the undergraduates who utter them as they sit in the luxurious quarters Harkness affords. For he suspects that there is at least as much affectation in the attitude of the young men as there was among the high ones who decided that a New England factory city, twentieth century, furnished the proper setting in place and time for an attempt to revive that medieval hymn to God, the Gothic cathedral, whose massive stones are its least important part, are merely the instrument on which the hymn was played at Chartres, at Burgos, at Milan. In any case, the contempt of the students is not sufficient reason for a change in style, which at this late date could have only unfortunate results. At least let the planners resist such an impulse until the carping undergraduates refuse to bow their heads under the luxurious showers that flow in Harkness dormitories or scorn to do their stint of study in the comfortable chairs and divans of the new library. Let Yale, in other words, make the best of its grandeur.

* * * * *

MEANWHILE, the Drifter, while he still feels that Gothic and New Haven were never meant for each other, must at this time withdraw one of his objections, namely, that the Yale slant is un-American. Consider the tale of Yale in the past decade or so. First, the desire to do something bigger and better than anyone had ever thought of doing before; then the importation of a medieval European product and the adaptation—some call it bastardization—of that product on such a scale that its shadow has completely obscured its former self; and finally the irreverent and complete contempt of the pampered young sons to whose benefit it was all directed. What could be more American? Come to think of it, what could possibly be more hilariously American than the transformation of a green-curtained confessional into that now-famous telephone booth in the Sterling Memorial Library?

False Art

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: There have been many admirable articles in the issues of your paper which have done much to keep me in contact with America—and contemporary thought generally—during a sojourn in Europe. I remember with especial pleasure Mr. Haldane's credo of last summer.

But I am writing to congratulate you especially on Yale's Cathedral Orgy, by William Harlan Hale. A friend (himself an architect, and an admirable artist and critic) had written me some time ago about an article by Mr. Hale in the Harkness Hoot as one of the signs of life in our country. Now your publication of this brilliant paper comes—to prove his contention up to the hilt. Defenders of the "orgy" might say that I should do better to see the building before agreeing with an attack on it. But the article makes one see it, especially as there are other such doleful things; and there are matters of architecture for which description is about 99 per cent sufficient. This is doubtless one—unless (as I think) the description is 100 per cent sufficient.

"Pure" Races

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: One of your correspondents in the issue of April 8 speaks of "the Turk, the Armenian, and the Jew, all of the Semitic race." What becomes of the hitherto accepted view that the Turks are of the Mongolian race and the Armenians of the Indo-European?

If your correspondent had been content with saying that a race whose history includes the practice of slavery, with much legitimization of slave women's children by their masters, cannot claim to be a pure race, the point would have been indisputable. For that matter, what race is pure? The late Professor Labberton, author of the Labberton's "Historical Atlas" of our school days, held that high musical genius never exists in a man who has not some admixture (commonly, of course, untraced) of Negro blood. Certainly nobody who springs from a nation through whose territory Hannibal's army passed, or from a nation whose warriors brought home servants or camp followers from the crusades, or from a nation whose people have intermarried with a nation of which either of these things is true, can claim a certainty that there was no Negro in his ancestry.

A Wasteful System

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Judging by various reports, if we do not recognize the Soviet Republics soon, we shall not be able to recognize them at all; they will be so different. While we try to make things work under the traditional and unconscious anarchist principle, and have neither a capitalist system nor a private-property system, they show definite indications of establishing a capitalistic private-property system, with all the people in the firm as a matter of course, all of them naturally and normally interested in getting their work well done, and as normally interested in seeing that every citizen is doing something useful and getting the net profit from his work to which he is entitled. Russia is getting ready to set up business as a nation.

I am a work veteran of fifty years' active service, plus the many weeks that your remarkable "system" excused me from being useful to the country in my best years. You will understand immediately that I was never permitted to acquire property in any substantial volume. I have to keep on working indefinitely, and there may be something for the eventual funeral. Multiply this case by the fifty millions now dragging out an existence, and you get the idea.

It is not that we are objects of charity to be helped on our own account—that is where so many of our best minds fall down. We are the working capital of the nation, inadequately used and tended or wholly wasted, at a cost to the nation of ten to fifty dollars a day each in production capacity. Add to the unemployed of our number two or three times as many who are employed wastefully or detrimentally, plus their incomes, and you get another idea.

Student Strikes

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The strike "against all extra-curricular activities" at St. Lawrence University is, in spite of its being a rather silly gesture, not without some significance. It implies that the faculty, the administration, and the alumni think more of extra-curricular activities than do the students. In this day of drum-beating and whoop-la education this is not far from right, for it is by this means that a college becomes and remains known. It is all very well to smile at the childishness of such actions, but it seems to me that these students have inadvertently pronounced an anathema upon American universities.

Cornell War Memorial

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: May I call attention to a slight omission in your brief paragraph on the Cornell war memorial—Hans Wagner episode. No mention whatever was made of the unenthusiastic reception of the plan by the Cornell Daily Sun and a goodly percentage of the less dormant student body. President Farrand, in all fairness to him, found it necessary to apologize for the blunder, and the students themselves are raising a fund of their own for Hans Wagner as a gentle reminder of the folly of 1914-18. There is yet hope within these college walls.

Ezra Pound's Golden Ass[*]

By ALLEN TATE

I

and as for text we have taken it from that of Messire Laurentius and from a codex once of the Lords Malatesta . . .

ONE is not certain who Messire Laurentius was; one is not very certain that it makes no difference. Yet one takes comfort in the vast range of Mr. Pound's obscure learning, which no one man could be expected to know much about. In this great work one is continually uncertain, as to space, time, history. The codex of the Lords Malatesta would be less disconcerting than Laurentius—if we were sure it existed—for more than half of the thirty cantos contain long paraphrases or garbled quotations from the correspondence, public and private, of the Renaissance Italians, chiefly Florentine and Venetian. About a third of the lines are versified documents. Another third are classical allusions, esoteric quotations from the ancients, fragments of the Greek poets with bits of the Romans thrown in; all magnificently written into Mr. Pound's own text. The rest is contemporary—anecdotes, satirical pictures of vulgar Americans, obscene stories, evenings in low Mediterranean dives, and gossip about amazing rogues behind the scenes of European power. The three kinds of material in the cantos are antiquity, the Renaissance, and the modern world. They are combined on no principle that seems in the least consistent to a first glance. They appear to be mixed in an incoherent jumble, or to stand up in puzzling contrasts.

This is the poetry which, in early and incomplete editions, has had more influence on us than any other of our time; it has had an immense underground reputation. And deservedly. For even the early reader of Mr. Pound could not fail to detect the presence of a new poetic form in the individual cantos; though the full value and intention of this form appears for the first time in the complete work. It is not that there is any explicit feature of the whole design that is not contained in each canto; it is simply that Mr. Pound must be read in bulk; it is only then that the great variety of his style and the apparent incoherence turn into order and form. There is no other poetry like the "Cantos" in English. And there is none quite so simple in form. The form is, in fact, so simple that almost no one has guessed it, and I suppose it will continue to puzzle, perhaps to enrage, our more academic critics for a generation to come. But this form by virtue of its simplicity remains inviolable to critical terms: even now it cannot be technically described.

I begin to talk like Mr. Pound, or rather like the way in which most readers think Mr. Pound writes. The secret of his form is this: conversation. The cantos are talk, talk, talk; not by any one in particular to any one else in particular; they are just rambling talk. At least each canto is a cunningly devised imitation of a polite conversation, in which no one presses any subject very far. The length of breath, the span of conversational energy, is the length of canto. The conversationalist pauses; there is just enough left hanging in the air to give him a new start; so that the transitions between the cantos are natural and easy.

Each canto has the broken flow and the somewhat elusive climax of a good monologue: because there is no single speaker, it is a many-voiced monologue. That is the method of the poems—though there is another quality of the form that I must postpone for a moment—and that is what the poems are about.

There are, as I have said, three subjects of conversation—ancient times, Renaissance Italy, and the present—but these are not what the cantos are about. They are not about Italy, nor about Greece, nor are they about us. They are not about anything. But they are distinguished poetry. Mr. Pound himself tells us:

And they want to know what we talked about?
"de litteris et de armis, praestantibus ingeniis,
Both of ancient times and our own; books, arms,
And men of unusual genius
Both of ancient times and our own, in short the usual subjects
Of conversation between intelligent men."

II

There is nothing in the cantos more difficult than that. There is nothing inherently obscure; nothing too profound for any reader who has enough information to get to the background of all the allusions in a learned conversation. But there is something that no reader, short of some years of hard textual study, will understand. This is the very heart of the cantos, the secret of Mr. Pound's poetic character, which will only gradually emerge from a detailed analysis of every passage. And this is no more than our friends are constantly demanding of us; we hear them talk, and we return to hear them talk, and we return to hear them again, but we never know what they talk about; we return for that mysterious quality of charm that has no rational meaning that we can define. It is only after a long time that the order, the direction, the rhythm of the talker's mind, the logic of his character as distinguished from anything logical he may say—it is a long time before this begins to take on form for us. So with Mr. Pound's cantos. It is doubtless easier for us (who are trained in the more historic brands of poetry) when the poems are about God, Freedom, and Immortality, but there is no reason why poetry should not be so perplexingly simple as Mr. Pound's, and be about nothing at all.

The ostensible subjects of the cantos—ancient, middle, and modern times—are only the materials round which Mr. Pound's mind plays constantly; they are the screen upon which he throws a beautiful, flowing quality of poetic thought. Now in conversation the memorable quality is a sheer accident of character, and is not designed; but in the cantos the effect is deliberate, and from the first canto to the thirtieth the set tone is maintained without a single lapse.

[*] "A Draft of XXX Cantos." By Ezra Pound. Paris: The Hours Press. Edition of 212 copies.

It is this tone, it is this quality quite simply, which is the meaning of the cantos, and although, as I have said, it is simple and direct, it is just as hard to pin down, it is as hidden in its shifting details, as a running, ever-changing conversation. It cannot be taken out of the text; and yet the special way that Mr. Pound has of weaving his three materials together, of emphasizing them, of comparing and contrasting them, gives us a clue to the leading intention of the poems. I come to that quality of the form which I postponed.

The easiest interpretation of all poetry is the symbolic method: there are few poems that cannot be paraphrased into a kind of symbolism, which is usually false, being by no means the chief intention of the poet. It is very probable, therefore, that I am about to falsify the true simplicity of the cantos into a simplicity that is merely convenient and spurious. The reader must bear this in mind, and view the slender symbolism that I am going to read into the cantos as a critical shorthand, useful perhaps, but which when used must be dropped.

One of the finest cantos is properly the first. It describes a voyage:

> And then went down to the ship,
> Set keel to breakers, forth on the godly sea, and
> We set up mast and sail on that swart ship,
> Bore sheep aboard her, and our bodies also
> Heavy with weeping, and winds from sternward
> Bore us out onward with bellying canvas,
> Circe's this craft, the trim-coifed goddess.

They land, having come "to the place aforesaid by Circe"—whatever place it may be—and Tiresias appears, who says:

> "Odysseus
> Shalt return through spiteful Neptune, over dark seas, > Lose all companions." And then Anticlea came.
> Lie quiet Divus. I mean, that is, Andreas Divus,
> In officina Wecheli, 1538, out of Homer.
> And he sailed, by Sirens and thence outward and away
> And unto Circe.

Mr. Pound's world is the scene of a great Odyssey, and everywhere he lands it is the shore of Circe, where men "lose all companions" and are turned into swine. It would not do at all to push this hint too far, but I will risk one further point: Mr. Pound is a typically modern, rootless, and internationalized intelligence. In the place of the traditional supernaturalism of the older and local cultures, he has a cosmopolitan curiosity which seeks out marvels, which are all equally marvelous, whether it be a Greek myth or the antics in Europe of a lady from Kansas. He has the bright, cosmopolitan savoir faire which refuses to be "taken in": he will not believe, being a traditionalist at bottom, that the "perverts, who have set money-lust before the pleasures of the senses," are better than swine. And ironically, being modern and a hater of modernity, he sees all history as deformed by the trim-coifed goddess.

The cantos are a book of marvels—marvels that he has read about, or heard of, or seen; there are Greek myths, tales of Italian feuds, meetings with strange people, rumors of intrigues of state, memories of remarkable dead friends like T. E. Hulme, comments on philosophical problems, harangues on abuses of the age; the "usual subjects of conversation between intelligent men."

It is all fragmentary. Now nearly every canto begins with a bit of heroic antiquity, some myth, or classical quotation, or a lovely piece of lyrical description in a grand style. It invariably breaks down. It trails off into a piece of contemporary satire, or a flat narrative of the rascality of some Italian prince. This is the special quality of Mr. Pound's form, the essence of his talk, the direction of these magnificent conversations.

For not once does Mr. Pound give himself up to any single story or myth. The thin symbolism from the Circe myth is hardly more than a leading tone, an unconscious prejudice about men which he is not willing to indicate beyond the barest outline. He cannot believe in any of them, not even in his own power of imagining them out to a conclusion. None of his myths is compelling enough to draw out his total intellectual resources; none goes far enough to become a belief or even a momentary faith. They remain marvels to be looked at, but they are meaningless, the wrecks of civilization. His powerful juxtapositions of the ancient, the Renaissance, and the modern worlds reduce all three elements to an unhistorical miscellany, timeless and without origin, and no longer a force in the lives of men.

III

And that is the peculiarly modern quality of Mr. Pound. There is a certain likeness in this to another book of marvels, those stories of late antiquity known to us as "The Golden Ass." The cantos are a sort of "Golden Ass." There is a likeness, but there is no parallel beyond the mere historical one: both books are the production of worlds without convictions and given over to a hard secular program. Here the similarity ends. For Mr. Pound is a powerful reactionary, a faithful mind devoted to those ages when the myths were not merely pretty, but true. And there is a cloud of melancholy irony hanging over the cantos. He is persuaded that the myths are only beautiful, and he drops them after a glimpse, but he is not reconciled to this aestheticism: he ironically puts the myths against the ugly specimens of modern life that have defeated them. But neither are the specimens of modernity worthy of the dignity of belief:

> She held that a sonnet was a sonnet
> And ought never to be destroyed
> And had taken a number of courses
> And continued with hope of degrees and > Ended in a Baptist learnery
> Somewhere near the Rio Grande.

I am not certain that Mr. Pound will agree with me that he is a traditionalist; nor am I convinced that Mr. Pound, for his part, is certain of anything under heaven but his genius for poetry. He is probably one of two or three living Americans who will be remembered as poets of the first order. Yet there is no reason to infer from that that Mr. Pound, outside his craft, or outside his conversation, knows in the least what he is doing or saying. He is and always has been in a muddle of revolution; and for some appalling reason he identifies his crusade with liberty—liberty of speech, liberty of press, liberty of conduct—in short, liberty. I do not mean to say that either Mr. Pound or his critic knows what liberty is. Nevertheless, Mr. Pound identifies it with civilization and intelligence, of the modern and scientific variety. And yet the ancient cultures, which he so much admires, were, from any modern viewpoint, hatched in barbarism and superstition. One is entitled to the suspicion that Mr. Pound prefers barbarism, and that by taking up the role of revolution against it he has bitten off his nose to spite his face. He is the confirmed enemy of provincialism, never suspecting that his favorite, Lorenzo the Magnificent, for example, was provincial to the roots of his hair.

This muddle runs through the cantos, and it makes the irony that I have spoken of to a certain extent unconscious. For as the apostle of humane culture, he constantly discredits it by crying up a rationalistic enlightenment. It would appear from this that his philosophical tact is somewhat feminine, and that, as intelligence, it does not exist. His poetic intelligence is of the finest: and if he doesn't know what liberty is, he understands poetry, and how to write it. This is enough for one man to know. And the thirty cantos are enough to occupy a loving and ceaseless study—say a canto a year for thirty years, all thirty to be read every few weeks just for the tone.

The Novel from James to Joyce

By JOSEPH WARREN BEACH

STUART GILBERT'S masterly program notes on "Ulysses" invite one to reconsider the place of this book in the evolution of novelistic technique. For purposes of orientation there is no work more helpful than that of Henry James, if we have in mind the wide prevalence of his ideal even yet, the radical divergence of Joyce, and, at the same time, their striking similarity in several important points. James represents the extreme limit of tendencies which, for brevity, we may call dramatic. The prime advantage of the play over the novel is that everything takes place before the spectator's eyes in the immediate present. The "dramatic" novel strives to capture the appeal of the play by eliminating so far as possible the elements of exposition and summary narrative, and exploiting the "scene," or, as James calls it, the "discriminated occasion." It is an effort to keep perpetually within the dramatic present. Few people realize—and least of all Henry James—how much of the power of Dostoevski derives from his approximation to this ideal. The action of his novels is concentrated within a few days' time; an extraordinary number of pages is devoted to each day's performance; transitional passages are reduced to a vanishing minimum. Dostoevski seems not to have consciously sighted James's ideal of the restricted viewpoint; but his instinct led him to confine himself practically to the view of a single character over, sometimes, hundreds of pages.

The restricted viewpoint is, as Mr. Lubbock has shown, the final means of "dramatizing" the action of the novel. The ideal of the dramatic novel is immediacy, and the restricted viewpoint subserves immediacy, for one thing, by getting rid of the intrusions of an officious author. Instead of the chronicle of an outsider, we follow the action in the spotlight of someone's consciousness within the story. It is true that what we have now is subjective drama, which may be thought a contradiction in terms, since the drama of the stage is confined to speech and action. In subjective drama speech and action come to us strained through the medium of someone's thoughts. And so the novel, pursuing its "dramatic" ideal, has reached in James a technique as far removed as possible from that of the stage. And the very cult of the "discriminated occasion" leads to an expansion of the moment-in-the-mind altogether untheatrical, which proves for most readers a monstrous and intolerable excrescence upon the story. So that, in point of fact, it is only in the disciples of James—in Edith Wharton, in Joseph Hergesheimer, in Anne Douglas Sedgwick—it is in the attenuated form of "The Age of Innocence" that most readers actually relish the method of Henry James.

Meantime the cognoscenti continue to taste in quiet the thick and heady vintage of the master, and new schools of esoteric fiction take their departure from him. What characterizes him most, in his later work, is this infinite expansion of the moment, and it is this, as much as any other feature, which characterizes Joyce in "Ulysses." For Joyce is concerned very little with action, and very much with what goes on in the consciousness of Stephen Dedalus and Leopold Bloom. And it is not to explain their action that he displays their souls; it is their souls themselves that interest him—or rather the flux of sensation and thought that constitutes the identity of each. A new psychology has intervened between James and Joyce, and it is no longer possible to talk of souls. The people of James are unitary beings, responsible for their choices and judged by the fineness of their perceptions. The plot of the story is the process of their enlightenment proceeding inevitably to their choice of the better alternative. For in James, even in his later work, there is still a plot. It is a plot greatly reduced and strictly confined to some narrow spiritual issue. But this issue, which limits the plot, defines it and makes it a plot. In Joyce there is no plot, but simply a series of everyday occurrences serving as a framework on which to hang the psychical fabric whose texture it is our pleasure to study. The subjective "close-ups" of James are meant to have their bearing on the issue and are limited, in the long run, by this intention. In Joyce there is nothing of this kind to limit the close-ups. So that what first sharply distinguishes him from James is simply his carrying so very much farther one of James's leading tendencies.

The same thing applies to the author's disposition to self-effacement. In the later novels of James he tries to identify himself as completely as possible with one or another of the characters. Only he feels that he should be there to render, to interpret, the character's view. And it is ever the style of Henry James—his manner of putting ideas together, his stately and finicking process of thought—which dominates the landscape. This is necessary, he thinks, to guarantee the coherence of his character's experience. But coherence is not what Joyce is concerned with. It is, on the contrary, what will seem to the hasty reader the very height of incoherence. The monologue intérieur, which occupies the bulk of this volume and is the feature most frequently imitated, seems devised to illustrate the freakishness and inconsequence of the subjective process when not strictly controlled by some practical objective. One idea leads to another by associations that shoot off at a tangent; one stream of thought is overlaid and undermined by any number of diverse streams, which are sure to seep through the roof or well up from beneath and distract its flow just at the point where it seems to be getting somewhere. The psyche which is defined by the continuity of this welter appears to be passive under the compulsion of eye and ear continually flooding it with new associations, and still more under that of memory and imagination. And what doubles the confusion is the unwillingness of the author to show us the way, even to indicate the point and plausibility of hiatus and ellipsis. The silent monologue is for the most part carried on in the very idiom of the character, with whatever there is of idiosyncracy in the way his thoughts follow one another. Once again, in applying James's idea, Joyce has developed the formula to the point where it is unrecognizable.

Plot having gone by the board, and with it the psychical coherence of the characters, what is left to hold together this great amorphous mass and give it form? It is here that the recent scholarly elucidations of Mr. Gilbert are indispensable. He has shown that Joyce has a principle of organization as formal as it is unique in fiction. "Ulysses" is nothing more nor less than a symphonic poem, characterized by a rigorous and insistent development of themes. Underneath the apparently freakish play of the surface runs the continuous rhythm of recurring motifs. First of all there is the close correspondence of each of the eighteen sections with one of the episodes of the "Odyssey." This correspondence is not merely a matter of the general outline of the episode, but is carried out in a thousand obscure allusions scattered through the narrative and lodged like ore in the most secret rifts and veins of rhetoric and reverie. Along with this is the thematic development in each episode of allusions to some bodily organ, to some one of the arts, some type-word or symbol, often to some color, together with the application in each case of a special narrative technique appropriate to the subject matter. For example, the scene in the newspaper office, corresponding, with humorous exactness, to the Homeric episode of Aeolus and his windbag, develops with infinite ingenuity the theme of the lungs, that windy organ of rhetoric; it offers examples of every trick known to the Greek rhetoricians (Mr. Gilbert cites ninety-five of them); and its special technique is the enthymeme, consisting of a syllogism with one premise omitted. Besides all this, there are other leit-motifs recurrent throughout the whole book, such as the mystic doctrine of metempsychosis; the theme of paternity, biological and spiritual; the preoccupations of theology and Aristotelian metaphysics; certain anthropological themes; and of course the psychological motifs of inferiority and compensation, with a dozen related notions from Zurich and Vienna.

Now what most needs saying, in reference to all these motifs and correspondences, is that they are not used for the development of plot, nor are they, for the most part, necessary to the motivation of character. So far as fiction goes, they are a pure luxury—the unbridled play of the poetic or musical faculty. It should also be noted that they are the element in "Ulysses" (and what I am now saying applies still more forcibly to "Work in Progress") which has least affected such novelists as have more or less come under Joyce's influence—Virginia Woolf, Conrad Aiken, John Dos Passos, Rex Stout, William Faulkner, Thomas Wolfe, Nathan Asch. (Dorothy Richardson and Waldo Frank should probably be regarded as autonomous, showing contemporaneously some of the same tendencies.) More than anything else it is his technique of the silent monologue which has influenced the "stream-of-consciousness" writers. The "polyphonic" method of Aldous Huxley does not deal appreciably in the kind of themes affected by Joyce, though I presume that both he and Dos Passos have been influenced by the episode of the Wandering Rocks. The character itself—or the character's philosophy—is the theme in Huxley. Dos Passos more nearly suggests Joyce's use of themes which are symbols, that is, something superadded to the realism of character portrayal. And in the introductory prose poems of "Manhattan Transfer," the "camera eye" and the "newsreels" of "The 42nd Parallel," he makes the most effective use, of any of the school, of that poetic symbolism which is the inimitable feature of "Ulysses." It is indeed highly significant that this aspect of Joyce is most nearly reflected in the compositions not of novelists but of poets, writers like T. S. Eliot and Hart Crane.

There has been a deal of talk about Joyce's realism. It is true that he is a realist if that means that he has no sentimental or moral ax to grind, or if realism signifies the formidable assemblage of lifelike detail. But what is much more to the point is that he is in the line of the symbolists, as Edmund Wilson has shown in his subtle and learned book entitled "Axel's Castle." Another way of placing him would be by the analogy of post-impressionist painting. The technique of James might be likened to that of painting before the advent of impressionism. His aim is truth in the representation of nature. Truth is the whole burden of his literary criticism. A very special truth he seeks, truth selected and set in a particular light. That is where the art comes in. But still he is the painter sitting down before a landscape to render it with faithfulness. Now this is the attitude of the impressionist as well as of his predecessors. Only the impressionist saw his landscape differently. He saw it less in terms of the outline which is known to be there and more in terms of the mass which strikes the eye, and his technique was to build up an impression of the mass by laying on spots of color. James is a pre-impressionist in the novel by virtue of the precision with which his issue is defined by the tight little line of his plot. D. H. Lawrence, in poetry and the novel, is an impressionist because he is not concerned with the dramatic shape of the thing but with the living "feel" of it. When Miriam in "Sons and Lovers" asks Paul why it is that she likes so much one of his sketches, he replies, "It's more shimmery, as if I'd painted the shimmering protoplasm in the leaves and everywhere, and not the stiffness of the shape. . . . Only this shimmeriness is the real living. The shape is a dead crust." Ford tells us that Conrad and he were called impressionists because they did not "narrate" their stories, but let them build themselves up bit by bit in the casual manner of life. "We saw that life did not narrate, but made impressions on our brains." The peculiarities of Conrad's technique—his curious chronology, his Captain Marlow, and the rest—were all in the interest of his impressionist ideal, "to make you see."

But the post-impressionist is not primarily concerned with the representation of nature. His aim is, out of elements derived from nature, to make an abstract composition for rendering some truth of his own conceiving. His truth may be of the utmost significance in the ideal world, but it is not necessarily a fact of nature. And he permits himself every license in the treatment of facts. It is clear that Joyce's "Ulysses"—not to mention the still more symbolistic "Work in Progress"—corresponds in fiction to post-impressionism in painting. His unrealistic freedom in handling facts is illustrated—to cite two instances—by the "gigantism" of the Cyclops episode and the Freudian mythology of the Circe episode. It shows itself everywhere in the transcendental play of his fancy around the manifold interwoven symbols. But this, as I have pointed out, is the note in Joyce which has had the fewest echoes among writers of fiction. And it raises the question whether he should properly be classified as a novelist. He has vastly influenced the technique of the novel. But he has perhaps more affinities with Aristophanes than with Thackeray, more with Dante than with Henry James.

Sic Semper

By LOUIS UNTERMEYER

Down—down he came,
Burning his soul with the exploring flame.

Kingship among the angels lost, honor in Heaven forsaking
For earth's awaking.

He, the Light-Bringer, Fire-Scatterer, plunging through death in the dark
With his one spark

Torn from the bright
Heart of Intelligence whose least universe is Light,

So that the clod
Might lift itself, light-shielded and light-shod,
And man grow like his God. . . .

A snare
Of winds tore the bare hands and throat, froze the fine hair,
Whipped him with knives of air.

But down—down he flew,
Nor rested till the burning seeds were planted and the dark mind knew
Wisdom defining one and two,
False from true.

Then man—aware too well
What truth would cost, what love and wisdom would compel—
Put Lucifer in hell.

Salvation for the Modern Soul

The Contemporary and His Soul. By Irwin Edman. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.50.

IN the foreword to that singularly acute and disturbing book "The Modern Temper," Mr. Joseph Wood Krutch confessed that the mood he was describing was perhaps no more than one of many modern tempers. His description, further, was surely not an unbiased one, for it was obvious that Mr. Krutch shared the mood he was describing, and that his description of it was, in effect, an argument for it. It has remained for Mr. Irwin Edman to present us with a comprehensive if less sympathetic description of nearly all of the leading modern tempers.

He begins with the mood described by Mr. Krutch, which he calls the Cult of Disillusion. I find the chapter devoted to this one of the least satisfactory sections of his book, for it seems neither adequate as an analysis nor fully convincing as an answer, though it does make one or two telling points. Mr. Krutch, Mr. Edman believes, is for one thing guilty of "the fallacy of origins"—in assuming, for example, that because poetic love still has lust as its source it therefore ceases to be poetry or love. Further, the Krutchian view of nature as something essentially alien, hostile, or absurd Mr. Edman dismisses as largely an echo of the sentimental view fashionable in the late nineteenth century. Nature is not alien to us, for we are a part of it; it is "the matrix and material of all our ideals and the locus of all possible destinies." The cult of disillusion, again, is in large part a reflection of the aimlessness and loose ends of the post-war generation, and to the extent that it is so it is unlikely to be permanent. Finally, the "failure of nerve" in our time, in so far as it is real and not merely verbal (for Mr. Edman hints that much of it is merely a pose by those who wish to appear smart and sophisticated), follows in part from the fact that we live in cities and among words; and though only an "unprecedented social transformation" may be able to cure this, Mr. Edman meanwhile offers some old-fashioned advice to disillusionists on animal satisfactions, shared domestic joys, and the delight in some activity for its own sake.

I have said that Mr. Edman is describing various modern tempers; perhaps I should rather have said that he is describing various modern proposals for the salvation of the soul. The terms have gone out of style, and much of their ancient meaning has faded, but what the contemporary is seeking today, Mr. Edman feels, is what man has always been seeking, peace and contentment for his spirit. The disillusionist tells him that these are not to be had, or rather that they can be secured only by an almost complete renunciation of hope; but meanwhile other faiths offer him something more positive. The most important of these, perhaps, is the Faith in Intelligence. Some rudimentary reliance on intelligence has, of course, existed since the dawn of consciousness, and at least as far back as Plato philosophers were convinced that intelligence could devise a radically better world, but with the Greeks mind was still primarily a faculty of vision, an end in itself; it was Francis Bacon who first popularized the conception of it as an instrument for bettering man's estate, and the conception of logic as primarily a technique of discovery. Such writers as H. G. Wells and John Dewey today are the modern heirs of Bacon; it is they who have aroused the hope that the methods which have succeeded so miraculously in the world of material things will succeed equally in the field of human nature and social institutions. But with all the parade of statistics and terminology, the progress in genuine social "science" has been negligible, and even the faith in the miracle of a new education has been dying. The naive assumption that mastery of things—resulting in comfort, luxuries, remarkable inventions, and quick communication—could produce individual and universal happiness, has been discredited. Further, to see the good is not to do it; mere intelligence will not save the soul. And "it is no use insisting to the disenchanted that the only avenues to progress are through science and the machine, if it is precisely the quality and character of an industrial and mechanical civilization that leaves the devotee cold."

Mr. Edman turns next to those who have retreated to a form of Platonism, of which Santayana, with his contemplation of the infinite realm of timeless essences, is the chief living representative. But while it may be well to withdraw and see things, however anguished, tempting, or exciting, as mere examples of eternity, that withdrawal, Mr. Edman points out, is a withdrawal and can be little more than a momentary soliloquy. A like fate must fall upon those who turn back nostalgically to some time in the past. This is merely another form of Platonism, for the past toward which such persons turn is a Platonic hypostasis. "It is myth using the language of history, the imagination trying to give its fantasies the glamor and authority of once having been." So the romantic neo-classicists of the eighteenth century discovered—or contrived—"the white serenity of Greece," and romantic classicists today sigh for the imagined rationality and urbanity of the eighteenth century, "a world composed exclusively of the mind of Voltaire, the music of Mozart, and the fêtes champêtres of Watteau." T. S. Eliot, yearning for a fixed authority, and with the courage to follow the logic of his own position, has seen that to be a classicist in literature involves being a conservative in politics and adopting an authoritative religion, which for him means Anglo-Catholicism. But any effort to return to the past, as, for example, by erecting a Gothic church on Fifth Avenue, results only in retrieving a faked shell, not the authentic substance of a vanished epoch. A faith in the past is not really a way out of the confusion of the present; for the present is always with us.

It is in his chapter on Flights to Action and to Ecstasy, it seems to me, that Mr. Edman makes his most brilliant criticism. Here he examines the cults of the sexualists, the aesthetes, and the "activists." The last group range all the way from those who make a fetish of high-pressure business to the Hemingway character, who only does and is, says nothing but the barely and bleakly necessary, and despises all subtleties of thought and emotion. Most of Mr. Edman's attention in this chapter, however, is devoted to the "phallic fanaticism" of D. H. Lawrence and his followers. He disposes effectively, to my mind, of the cult of sex as salvation, though not before pointing out that the chief leaders of that cult are not mere carnal priests, but mystics with a long tradition behind them, who see in the act of sex not merely physical satisfaction but mystical regeneration. Like other mystical poets "they are sustained by the rhetoric of their own eloquence rather than by the facts, as it is indeed their own eloquence and art that chiefly come to interest them." The new sex lyricist has the dual aim of wishing to be a sturdy, true child of nature and a poet appreciating the sturdy child of nature. He is the victim of an old and naive mistake—that of selecting one phase of life and identifying it with saving glory, of regarding only one of his many organs, impulses, interests, and enterprises as the instrument of salvation.

When Mr. Edman comes to his concluding chapter, Note Concerning Salvation for This World, he is much less convincing. For here he attempts to be constructive, almost to wish to repair the damage he has just done; so much so that he even appears to accept much that he has already rejected. The apparent inconsistency, on closer examination, is not as great as it at first seems, for while here Mr. Edman seems to be recommending intelligence, sexual love, contemplation, action, tradition, where he had previously seemed to reject them, he had rejected them merely as isolated panaceas, each selected at the expense of the rest, and not as elements that might be made part of a full, harmonious life. But if the inconsistency of doctrine is perhaps negligible, the inconsistency of tone is surely not. Mr. Edman begins his final chapter hesitantly, and seems to promise little enough: "One thing, at least, a centering of the quest for salvation upon this life and in terms of this world can accomplish: to avert the disappointment of romantic hopes unfulfilled." But before many pages we find him writing: "It is a challenge, not an elegy, that should be the theme of our discourse, not the violins on a dying fall, but the trumpet call." Here Mr. Edman seems to me to become a victim of the will-to-eloquence that he criticizes in others, for there is nothing in his previous analysis, at times so mordantly realistic, to lead us to feel that way. He has suggested, at best, that the chief sources of happiness—which imply also the chief sources of misery and hopelessness—are what they have always been. This may be consolatory to the victims of an illogical pessimism and despair, but it hardly seems anything to blow a trumpet about.

HENRY HAZLITT

Stalin

Stalin. By Isaac Don Levine. Cosmopolitan Book Corporation. $3.50.

HERE is a book that should be divided by five. In his reference to Stalin's struggle for power the author speaks of a "world that had been inured to mistruth but educated in sensation, a world that had lost its sense of indignation but gained a jazz and cinematographic perspective." Such a world he himself must have had in mind in the preparation of this volume. The work is highly jazzed from beginning to end.

The author's first difficulty seems to be mathematical in nature. He loves good round figures. In describing the land of the Soviets he says: "Here a million wooden villages have produced a score of brick and stone cities." According to the census of December, 1926, there were but 387,000 villages in the union. And wooden villages are entirely absent in the vast timberless regions of the south. In another passage he reports that at the close of 1930 "the gold ruble had depreciated so that on the 'black bourse' the dollar fetched forty rubles instead of the two paid by the state." Of course the gold ruble had not depreciated at all; it had merely been driven out of circulation. And the paper ruble certainly brought more than two and a half cents on the "black bourse." The most that émigrés, desiring to send money through subterranean channels to friends and relatives in Russia, can get for a dollar in the branches of this exchange in Paris and Berlin is eight or ten rubles. Again he refers to "the tens of thousands of closed churches that went with the Communist drive [in 1930]." According to the best information available there were not more than 50,000 churches in the entire union in February, 1930. Moreover, from 1917 up to that time only about 3,000 had been closed.

Mr. Levine's second difficulty is a language difficulty. He seems to be subject to a form of verbal intoxication. He is unable to resist the temptation of strong words. Thus he begins his first chapter with "The Land of Courage . . . The Land of Fear . . . The Caucasus"; and his second with "The Land of Faith . . . The Land of Despair . . . Eurasia." Then on the next page he gives the following characterization of Eurasia: "A land where the machine is a faith and faith is a machine; where politics is despair and despair is politics—this is the cradle of bolshevism." Now all of this sounds very good. But what does it mean? In describing the situation in 1927 he writes:

> Fear, the soul of dictatorship, now strode across the land. . . . Looking back upon the nightmarish utterances of Stalin and Trotzky and their followers in those days, it is impossible to escape the vision of a divided band of conspirators petrified at the sight of their own ghost—the ghost of bolshevism, the ghost of Leninism, the ghost of terror.

The book is well sprinkled with such phrases as "the vivisection of 160,000,000 people," "the bloodless guillotine," "the panic in the Kremlin," "a frenzied dumping." The Five-Year Plan he disposes of far more easily than do the chancelleries of Europe and the leaders of capitalistic economics:

> Conceived in distress, propelled by panic, fed on false promises, driven by emotional and not rational means, the Five-Year Plan in the hands of the Stalin dictatorship is like a rocket proceeding to the moon, with the aid of charts prepared by a group of astronomers.

This may have been intended for drama, but in reality it is melodrama. At least it bears no relationship to the social sciences.

The author also seems to be suffering from a Eurasia complex. He attributes everything associated with the revolution that he does not like to the strange and baleful influence of Eurasia—cruelty, terror, dictatorship. As if Western Europe had never known, and may not again know, these forms of behavior! With this formula he easily explains the short duration of the red regime in Finland: "But then Finland is a European nation. And bolshevism has never been able to maintain a foothold in the West." Yet the author of this formula says of Stalin:

> In a cosmic [sic!] world that does not conform to a single formula, Stalin is lost. He cannot find his bearings in a world developed beyond the perceptions of elementary Eurasia, a world bewildering in the variety of its living colors, a world in which the warm, deep currents of a flowering individualist culture are intertwined with the civilization of a machine age in a manner that defies rudimentary generalization.

That Stalin himself ever placed confidence in so simple a formula is highly doubtful.

The author's treatment of his subject, however, possesses many merits. He gives us a fairly sound picture of the career of Joseph Djugashvili. He also includes in the account many excellent quotations from the Soviet leader's speeches and writings. And the following estimate is admirable:

> Stalin's principles and prerequisites of leadership are: organizing and executive ability, an unostentatious and plebeian conduct, foresight, unflinching courage of one's convictions, a never-aging spirit of rebellion, faith in the masses, anticipating their moods and wishes, and learning from them as well as their enemies.

Such lucid statements, however, are marred by the author's love of colorful phrases and his constant appeal to the gallery. He says in a number of places that Stalin possesses no originality, no power to formulate policies. Yet as early as 1917, when Lenin was pinning his hopes on a world upheaval, Stalin argued that the revolution might succeed in one country, and even in a culturally and technically backward country like Russia. A man capable of taking such a position at such a time cannot be said to lack independence and creative power. Certainly Stalin's mind is not to be compared with that of Trotzky in fertility and agility. At the same time history may well prove that on the most fundamental issues he was a safer guide than his more talented opponent.

This book will probably be widely read: partly because it is interesting, partly because its explanations are simple, and partly because its main theses are in harmony with the prejudices which commonly prevail in the United States. It will serve to perpetuate that misunderstanding which is our heritage from the first years of the Russian Revolution, when American and European journalism descended, whether by intent or incompetence, to the level of gross and detailed misrepresentation. The well-informed mind can read the volume with profit, being capable of detecting the exaggerations and moderating the tone of the adjectives. But to the ordinary reader it is likely to bring but little illumination. Stalin and the Russian experiment will remain about as inexplicable as ever. This is unfortunate, because Mr. Levine is unusually well equipped to report what happens in the Soviet Union. In the present work he has not lived up to his possibilities.

George S. Counts

"Mother India's" Sequel

Volume Two. By Katherine Mayo. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

THE resolving note of Miss Mayo's "Mother India" (1926) was an essential depravity of the Indian people, especially the Hindus, that operated primarily in sex life and was the basis of all India's woes. Expressed with vehemence and passion, the thesis aroused in America and England spirited partisanship for or against India, and in India itself violent rebuttal and recrimination. In the years since the publication of that book the mass of evidence and opinion accumulated to discredit Miss Mayo's methods and conclusions has been so great as to subject her literary reputation to the severest doubt. The few defenders she has found have not succeeded in confirming her position, and they have lacked her fire. Now she comes to her own defense, using material fortuitously provided by the Indians themselves.

A little more than a year ago the Government of India's Age-of-Consent Committee published the report of its investigation into child marriage and the evidence on which that report was based. Following this report a Child-Marriage-Restraint Act was enacted by the Indian Legislative Assembly, fixing the marriage age for males at eighteen years and for females at fourteen. This was approved by the Governor General and became effective April 1, 1930. Out of the evidence collected by these Indians—evidence exploited by them to influence the Legislative Assembly—she has taken the bulk of the material for her book. Unwilling to concede the great achievement represented by this legislation, she somewhat speciously justifies the writing of this volume of self-defense on the ground that the punishment provided by the act for infringements is not sufficiently severe to be effective.

"Mother India"—prejudiced, ill-informed, and inaccurate as it was—nevertheless served a purpose in arousing public opinion in India on social questions. It gave an impetus to the labors of reformers that had already extended over many years, and aided their causes. But with that book Miss Mayo's contribution to India's progress ceased. She can do no more to stimulate public opinion there, and this new volume is of no importance.

To say that "Volume Two" has the same sort of faults as had "Mother India" is to surprise no one; but there is a difference in degree; for this new book is made up largely of Hindus' utterances. Yet the commentary she attaches to these quotations is often inaccurate and given a tone by prejudicial adjectives and interpretation, is animated by an obvious dislike of the Hindu religion and Hindus and a counter-leaning toward

W. NORMAN BROWN

The First Days of Pompeii

Bulwer: A Panorama. I. Edward and Rosina, 1803-1836. By Michael Sadleir. Little, Brown and Company. $4.

EVEN for so stagy a career as Bulwer-Lytton's, "panorama" is superficial. Mr. Sadleir's book is a deep and sharp analysis of the man, his associates, and his times. I know of no other single volume which gives so much information so clearly arranged about English literature, manners, customs, politics, in the first third of the nineteenth century. Mr. Sadleir makes legitimate use of the essential skill of the novelist—perception of character, narrative continuity, sense of the dramatic—yet he never comes within dangerous vicinity of that dreadful mongrel, fictionized biography. His substance is a scholar's examination of fact, evidence, document; his interpretation is imaginative in the right way, an illumination and vivification of the material, penetrating and subtle suggestion controlled by good sense and reason. A second volume is announced as in preparation, to deal with the thirties and forties; these dates imply a third and perhaps a fourth volume. No casual reader of Victorian biography and no special student can afford to miss the complete survey. And at least one reader waits eagerly for the whole work.

Bulwer-Lytton is himself a romantic hero more interesting than any hero whom he contrived in fiction, and even in his most objective novels his heroes were usually some form of himself at once diluted and strengthened. His life, brilliant in politics and blazingly successful in letters, was outwardly all that an ambitious man could hope for. Yet inwardly he was stricken with a sense of failure and defeat, he was unhappy, embittered, tormented. The external reason is his unbalanced wife, pitifully unsuited to him; the internal reason is his shy, proud, egotistic nature, self-conscious to the point of morbidity. Never did a man of genuine talent and apparent good fortune and opportunity come so near to starving spiritually in the midst of plenty. It is a pathetic, not quite laughable tragi-comedy, and Mr. Sadleir has made the most of it. One sentence, in Mr. Sadleir's italics, is the pass-key to the many chambers of Bulwer-Lytton's elaborate and fantastic house of life: "Bulwer throughout his life was an intellect betrayed by character."

Behind this character Mr. Sadleir has spread the scene in which it flourished and in which it suffered. Here are the bigwigs, including Thackeray, at this time young and, even later, not always so big as an admirer wishes he had been. And the smaller people, many of them almost forgotten except as footnotes to more important personages, are fitted into their places. Most instructive is the parallel, which Mr. Sadleir does not force too closely, between the years following the Napoleonic era and our present post-war period. Smartness, cynicism, idealism, economic confusion, frivolity, despair, extravagance, and sober anxiety—we can understand the mess of a hundred years ago by regarding our own bewilderment.

A writer's character and experiences cannot be divorced from his work, and it is the business of biography to examine and reveal the relations. Yet, after all, what remains is so many books. What now remains of Bulwer-Lytton's abundant production, the fruit of industry and fertility which continued for fifty years? Probably most readers who have browsed more or less widely among the novels of the world have read "The Last Days of Pompeii," and perhaps one or two others. Mr. Sadleir, who has a sound, fresh critical mind and is not misled into excess of enthusiasm by the biographer's zeal for his subject, thinks that Bulwer-Lytton is now undeservedly neglected, that there is much more in him than many of us realize. It is a fact of literary history that "more of Bulwer's books [were] published between 1830 and 1870, both in English and in translation, than those of any of his contemporaries." In his youthful triumph he succeeded Scott and preceded by a few years Dickens and Thackeray ("Eugene Aram," 1832; "The Last Days of Pompeii," 1834; "Pickwick Papers," 1836-37; "Vanity Fair," 1847). And he held his own in popularity against his greater rivals, to Thackeray's expressed and rather petty annoyance, but not, apparently, to the disturbance of the amiable and self-confident Dickens. At the start Bulwer-Lytton outdistanced his immediate competitors, who are in the handbooks of literature but are no longer read, and he was not supplanted by the younger men of genius who from our point of view throw him into a worthy second place. He was enterprising and experimental and he had an uncanny sense of what was about to be popular, what the people wanted. He tried everything and was practically successful in all modes—in the fashionable ("silver-spoon"), in the Gothic, in crime, mystery, and terror, in historical romance, in tales of classical antiquity, in stage plays (three successful), in political and literary essays. Though he was diffuse, digressive, grandiloquent, affected, he was a man of superior intellect, and he had high standards of good craftsmanship for himself and for others. Saintsbury to the contrary, he did "take pains," studied seriously in preparation for his historical novels, exerted to the utmost what powers he had. The great Victorian masters tower above him but they do not obliterate him from the landscape.

JOHN MACY

The Scorpion

Lockhart's Literary Criticism. Selected by M. Clive Hildyard. Oxford: Basil Blackwell. 6s.

IN some ways this is a disappointing book, but perhaps the fault is Lockhart's rather than Miss Hildyard's. The Scotch Reviewers have a terrific reputation, thanks to the common idea that they killed poor John Keats; and apart from this legend, anyone interested in the literature of the period cannot help being aware of the effectiveness of periodical criticism in those days. It was a literary dictatorship such as had never existed before, and such as we have never seen since. But curiously little of that criticism has become literature; we do not now read the essays and reviews of Jeffrey and Francis Horner, of "Christopher North" and Sydney Smith, of Croker and Lockhart, as we read the comparable writings (comparable in their origin and occasion) of Johnson and Hazlitt, of Walter Bagehot and Matthew Arnold. The suspicion lingers that we are doing such men an injustice, and therefore a book like Miss Hildyard's, which purports to redress this injustice in one case, arouses high expectations. It disappoints us simply because we do not find anything of great critical value.

It is just possible, to adopt the easiest explanation, that Miss Hildyard has not made the best of the available material. That she is thoroughly familiar with this material is evident from her bibliography, which in itself is a work of considerable research; it should be remembered that most of Lockhart's contributions to the magazines of the period are anonymous, and the difficulty of identifying them is further complicated by the common practice of collaboration. The famous article on the Cockney School of Poetry is a case in point. Moreover, the excavator is not much helped by stylistic criteria; these reviewers all wrote with the same Ciceronian roundnesses and impersonality. It is not suggested, therefore, that Miss Hildyard has in any sense failed in her researches; the possibility is rather that she has set out with a too narrow definition of criticism. Most of her selections (all but five) are in the nature of personal judgments; whereas one expected a fair proportion of definitions and generalizations, such, for example, as the passage on the limitations of biography in the last chapter of the "Life of Scott." But perhaps after all we are expecting too much. Perhaps Lockhart was not primarily a critic at all. He called himself a "reviewer," and there is a possibility that the functions of the critic and the reviewer are quite distinct. In that case, all that is wrong with Miss Hildyard's book is its title; the word "criticism" ought not to have entered into it.

How shall we distinguish reviewing and criticism? Is the one activity inductive, the other deductive? Hardly; for though criticism must be based on principles, those principles must in turn be based on practice. Even metaphysical criticism, of the indefinite type favored by Coleridge in his weaker moments, is not an attempt to subsume literature under metaphysical absolutes; it is rather an attempt to find metaphysical analogies for psychological events. Criticism, if it is to be a consistent activity, must be in the nature of an inductive science. What, then, is reviewing? "A humble and trivial function," Lockhart would have replied.

> For we adhere to our old-fashioned notion [he wrote on one occasion] that when a man of rich endowments makes his first appearance, or offers the first specimen of what seems destined to be the main monument of his literary energy . . . it is the primary duty of reviewers to think not of themselves but of their author; to put the rein on indulgence in any sort of display except the display of his qualities; to aim, in short, with a single heart at the encouragement of his zeal by awakening the curiosity and sympathy of his and their public.

Such a function excludes "all chance of formal, original, or would-be original, disquisition on the part of the journalist." It excludes, in effect, criticism.

There is much to be said for this old-fashioned notion of reviewing, and our literary periodicals today would be much brighter and busier if they could adopt it. It cuts out the cackle. It gets down to realities—of diction, plot, idea, morals, and so forth—and then to personalities. It means hard hitting, and the sensitive suffer; witness Keats. The trouble comes from the fact that the kind of intelligence needed in a good reviewer has decided limitations; and though the editor and the reviewer may be aware of these limitations and prepared to make allowances for them, as well as to take advantage of them, the public has no such discrimination, and accepts the arbitrary directions of a traffic-controller for the final judgment of posterity. A reviewer must have, if not a hard heart, at least a decisive manner. Such a mind is not likely to have much patience with originality—which at first sight looks like obscurity—or with mysticism. Walter Bagehot drew attention to the limitations of the type in his admirable essay on the First Edinburgh Reviewers.

> A clear, precise, discriminating intellect shrinks at once from the symbolic, the unbounded, the indefinite. The misfortune is that mysticism is true. There certainly are kinds of truth, borne in as it were instinctively on the human intellect, most influential on the character and the heart, yet hardly capable of stringent statement, difficult to limit by an elaborate definition.

Such was Wordsworth's philosophy of nature, and the misfortune was that Lord Jeffrey, about whom Bagehot is writing, "did not believe a word of it."

> His cool, sharp, collected mind revolted from its mysticism; his detective intelligence was absorbed in its apparent fallaciousness; his light humor made sport with the sublimities of the preacher.

Lockhart said much the same—he talked of the "heaviness and unharmony" of the "Prelude," and thought Wordsworth's philosophy "all an airy sham." But Lockhart was not consistent—a reviewer need not be—and spoke on another occasion of Wordsworth's essential manliness, and in one of his letters there is a sentence which is perhaps the best thing ever said in appreciation of that poet:

> He strikes me as having more about him of that sort of sober, mild, sunset kind of gentleness, which is so dear to me from the recollections of Euripides and the tender parts of the Odyssey, than any English poet ever possessed, save Shakespeare, the possessor of all.

His appreciation of Cobbett, too, was from the heart rather than the head. But when we think of Lockhart the stinging reviewer, the "scorpion" as he was called, need we do more, to temper our judgment, than remember Lockhart the author of the "Life of Scott," one of the greatest human documents in our language? HERBERT READ

Russian Soda Water

The Dogs. By Ivan Nazhivin. Translated from the Russian. J. B. Lippincott Company. $2.50.

THE impresario will tell you that it is not always best to be the first to bring out something new; in fact, it is better to let someone else make the experiment. Then, if it succeeds, you can "analyze" it and mix a small portion with the standard pap that you have been serving your public all along. In this way you will never have any failures, never pass a dividend, and when the time comes for you to die they will name an art theater after you. It must be a similar reasoning that leads our publishers to bring out books like "The Dogs" by Ivan Nazhivin. Anything Russian is still something of a novelty on the literary market. And since he was born and lived over forty years in that country, Mr. Nazhivin's story, in certain respects, is characteristically Russian. It is laid close to the soil. It is told with Tolstoyan simplicity. And occasionally it shows the world stripped of its conventions—something else that we have come to look for in Russian writers. But that is the extent to which it can be said to represent the Russian genius. For the rest, aside from these virtues, it is no different from the pap, whether Dutch, Scandinavian, French, English, German, Chinese, Balkan, or American, that is regularly consumed by our public—and about as representative of Russian literature—though this does not necessarily put the two authors on the same plane—as James Oliver Curwood, another dog-story writer, would be of our own.

One would let "The Dogs" go with a few words, for it is innocuous enough, were it not for the fact that one of our leading reviews has called it "wholly admirable" and another "possibly immortal." This reminds us that the canny impresario never depends solely upon his own efforts to put his diluted novelty across. No, he recognizes the function of criticism, for he knows that without the aid of a few watery reviewers his stockholders would be sadly betrayed. In view, therefore, of the remarkable praise that has been given "The Dogs," let us look at it more closely. Dogs are its principal characters—pointers, borzois, mongrels. The world is supposed to be seen through their eyes. They comment on their masters and make naive misobservations that very cutely reveal the truth of the situation. In reality, however, this is simply a device employed by the author, the same device of personification that we all employed in our schooldays when we wrote How It Feels to Be an Old Button. The fact is that there is almost no new observation of dogs in Mr. Nazhivin's book; practically nothing is added to our understanding of them. This was inevitable, of course, since to Mr. Nazhivin they were merely a device, a means to an end. What was this end? Why, of course! It was to register a belated protest on the Russian Revolution, which had the regrettable effect of forcing Mr. Nazhivin to flee from his native land and take up residence in Belgium. As a kind of retaliation, therefore, using the dogs for a foreground, he has painted a picture of the revolution which for luridness and naivete might be compared to a Hollywood director's conception of 1789. And to "balance" his anti-Sovietism he has inserted an uncomplimentary portrait of the Czar's uncle, the Grand Duke "Nikita" (who flicks out a dog's eyeball with his whip)—again with the touch of a von Stroheim. Finally it appears that his purpose is to show that certain members of the imperial family were, it is true, very bad; but the general run of the upper classes was good; therefore the revolution should never have taken place. In other words, he has written his novel to illustrate his political position. It is the yelp of a defeated sentimentalist, and, although its scene is Russia, it has so little to do with the Russian spirit that no customs officer would know the difference.

As we wrap up the book and mail it to a sentimental old aunt in the country who is fond of puppies, some dismaying questions occur to us. Why are these diluted importations invariably so well received? Is it possible that we have got so that we now prefer dilution? Can we no longer absorb reality straight? Has our digestion reached the point where it actually needs adulterants? Is there any relation between this and our national passion for soda water? Is it true that, to stomach a few drops of essential flavor, we must fill up with water and gas?

Summary

THIS column has been occupied by so many critics since October, and they have differed so much from one another, that it may appear presumptuous for the least professional of them all to attempt a summary of the season just closing. Yet by being last he incurs the duty of speaking last, and since duty must be done he can only hope that what he writes will not be read by his predecessors.

The first thing that strikes even an amateur observer of the season is the success of its best plays. Not every successful play has been a good one, and not every good play has been successful, but on the whole it would seem that the general judgment has been right. The theatrical business is having its bad days along with every other business, and a number of houses this winter must have been dark more nights than not. Yet it is substantially true that whenever a respectable performance has been offered to the public, the public has decently responded. The most profitable plays, I take it, have been "Once in a Lifetime," "Grand Hotel," "Tomorrow and Tomorrow," "The Vinegar Tree," "The Barretts of Wimpole Street," "Private Lives," "Camille," "Elizabeth the Queen," "Melo," "Five Star Final," "The Silent Witness," "As You Desire Me," "In the Best of Families," "The House Beautiful," "Mrs. Moonlight," "Tonight or Never," and the Gilbert and Sullivan revivals by the Civic Light Opera Company.

That, I also take it, is virtually a list of the best plays that have been produced. I have not seen "Mrs. Moonlight" or "Tonight or Never," and I am very well aware that there is much difference of opinion about several other pieces on the list—particularly "The House Beautiful." Nor do I like "As You Desire Me," the success of which I must confess is incredible to me, or "In the Best of Families," whose continued run argues a deeper vulgarity in mankind than the darkest cynic might have thought possible. With these comparatively few exceptions, however, the list stands. Add that most of the very bad things have failed immediately, and that within the limits imposed by its theater the Mooney play "Precedent" has actually flourished at the Provincetown, and the situation looks more hopeful still. In the case of only two failures—"Devil in the Mind" and "Rock Me, Julie"—is one forced to regret that an unfavorable decision was so swiftly made. Something similar might be said for William Bolitho's "Overture," though the note of uncertainty in this posthumous tragedy was very plainly to be heard.

There was no play by O'Neill (who will make up for it next year with the trilogy called "Mourning Becomes Electra"), none by Ibsen, very few by Shakespeare (though Jane Cowl's "Twelfth Night" and Eva Le Gallienne's "Romeo and Juliet" were good enough in compensation), and but one by Shaw. The Theater Guild was only moderately acclaimed for its production of "Getting Married," as indeed it was throughout the season, at least after "Elizabeth the Queen" left town. Its "Roar China" and "Green Grow the Lilacs" were well worth experimenting with, however, if "Miracle at Verdun" was not; but perhaps the essential thing about experiments is that their results are difficult to predict, and the Theater Guild deserves every praise for its willingness to keep experimenting. The Civic Repertory Theater likewise did well to bring Jean Giraudoux's "Siegfried" over from France, to give "Alison's House" a chance which it might not have had in any other theater, and to revive "Camille." It remains only to mention, as a third group enterprise which must be welcome to anyone not wholly confined in his interests to the contemporary and the commercial, the performance of Wycherley's "The Country Wife" at the New School for Social Research, now soon to be followed by Ben Jonson's "The Alchemist."

Fantasy All the Way

RENE CLAIR'S "Le Million" (Little Carnegie), like his earlier "Sous les Toits de Paris," is one of those rare pictures that make you their willing captive immersed in their mood and letting yourself be carried away on the wings of their fancy. In "Le Million" the fancy is much more exuberant than it was in the other picture, but it enforces submission upon you just as effectively, so that like everybody else around you, you inevitably exclaim: "What charm! What invention! What fun!" This spontaneous reaction, confirmed by the laudations you hear on all sides, is sufficient proof of the unique qualities of the film. It is the work of an artist who sees beyond the obvious and who can view the comedy of life with a good-natured cynicism that proclaims its authentic "sophistication." From under this gentle leg-pulling there gradually emerges a fantastic world inhabited by not quite normal human beings who now and again burst into dancing and singing that reveals their hidden kinship with puppets. It is René Clair's great achievement as an artist that though his characters' behavior is at times so grotesquely fantastic, it never appears incongruous with their surroundings or inconsistent with their more normal actions. But the achievement is a tour de force that only disguises its fundamental weakness.

The problem that René Clair sets himself to solve in "Le Million" is the old one of screen musical comedy. It has repeatedly been proved that the forms of singing and dancing seen in stage musical comedy are intolerably false and incongruous when transferred to the screen. The only successful treatment so far devised by Hollywood has been the use of plots in which singing and dancing are a natural part of the action. Stories of back-stage life have been particularly in vogue in this connection. The field, however, is a small one, and it has been explored so thoroughly that with the public grown indifferent to such stories Hollywood has practically stopped making musical pictures. Now René Clair attempts to justify musical comedy by means that are directly opposite to those of Hollywood. Instead of making singing and dancing more natural, more in accord with the daily life of his characters, he makes the daily life of his characters more unnatural, more in accord with stage singing and dancing. Thus the story of a lost lottery ticket becomes a series of madcap adventures in which the normal is hardly distinguishable from the eccentric. Clair's success in this daring experiment reveals the measure of his talent as an entirely convincing and vastly entertaining interpreter of human foibles. But his fantastic treatment is even more restricted in its application than the naturalistic one of Hollywood. Moreover, his approach to the problem of musical comedy is confined to the choice of subject, whereas the only way to solve the problem is to discover a cinematic form that would make dancing and singing spring as freely from the nature of the screen entertainment as they spring from the nature of the stage performance.

One hoped that Lubitsch's "The Smiling Lieutenant" (Criterion) might come more effectively to grips with this problem than did "The Love Parade" or "Monte Carlo." The hope has not been fulfilled. With his interest centered on the comic minutiae of the princely fairyland that he so loves to depict, Lubitsch shows his concern with the formal problem of musical comedy only in so far as he tries to disguise singing and dancing in the conventional unreality of his fairy tale. In this he is not unlike René Clair, except that his somewhat less fantastic subject matter follows more closely in the footsteps of the stage tradition. Even in its particular medium of gay and polished naughtiness, however, "The Smiling Lieutenant" seems to be not nearly so subtle as its predecessors. Highly amusing as it often is, its persistent erotic emphasis, addressed all too clearly to frustrated wives and young couples, rather smacks of vulgarity. Nor does it show any great inventiveness in those quaint and twisted comic effects that are usually associated with the name of Lubitsch. In short, one is inclined to regard "The Smiling Lieutenant" as a routine "Lubitsch picture" with very little of "Lubitsch" that is of importance.

Two German films, "Liebeswalzer" (Eighth Street Playhouse) and "The Beggar's Opera" (Warner), come within the same category of musical pictures, but neither of them contributes anything to the solution of the problem here discussed. "Liebeswalzer" is a conventional musical comedy with a Graustarkian story which will please those who can admire royalty even when it is caricatured. "The Beggar's Opera," though perhaps more artistically ambitious, also fails to produce a genuine thrill. The work of G. W. Pabst, the film is characteristic of this director's extraordinary preference for discordance and distortion. There is unrelieved morbidity in this picture, and it jars on one's mind through its gruesome theme, its mixture of styles, and its persistent effort to appear different by pictorial and psychological attitudinizing. One leaves the picture utterly puzzled by the artistic impulse that found expression in this shrill and somber fantasy.

SECRETARY STIMSON'S DECISION to go abroad and study European conditions at first hand is highly commendable, even though the European press is skeptical as to any direct result. The eagerness with which it has seized upon the news of Mr. Stimson's coming shows how great is the desire for some form of cooperation and some greater display of interest on the part of the United States in the grave crisis in which Europe finds itself. It is all very well to say that both Secretary Stimson and President Hoover have kept up to date through our official diplomatic representatives as to what is happening abroad. That is never the same as seeing for oneself and making the personal acquaintance of the men who are at the head of the various nations. Thus, the chief value of the conference between Chancellor Brüning and his Foreign Minister and Ramsay MacDonald and Arthur Henderson is that these several gentlemen have really had a chance to get to know one another. Their official relations can never be the same hereafter, but will be vastly improved and rendered more intelligent by the fact that they really understand the personalities to whom they are addressing their communications. Mr. Stimson has done such excellent work of late in the matter of clarifying and reaffirming our historic Caribbean policy on anti-imperialist lines that he merits the heartiest thanks of his countrymen. He has now the opportunity to win the regard of other nations as well, by coming to know personally and to understand thoroughly their grievous plight. It will be a test of his statesmanship the outcome of which will be eagerly awaited by the whole world.

RUMANIA APPEARS to have gone back to the days when Ion Bratianu could "make" elections by turning out overwhelming majorities for his Liberal Party almost at will. In the elections to the Chamber of Deputies on June 1 the government party, headed by Premier Jorga, won 299 of the 387 available seats. The National Peasant Party, headed by former Premier Maniu, obtained only 27 mandates. In the last general election, held December 12, 1928, the National Peasants won 322 seats, while Jorga's National Democratic Party was listed merely as one of the minor groups which between them won only 13 places. Why this pronounced reversal? Is it possible that Maniu's party could have so wantonly conducted itself in office as to have lost 90 per cent of its following? The answer is rather to be found in the peculiar electoral laws, which are a legacy of Bratianu's iron rule. These laws virtually guarantee a majority for the party in power. Added to this guaranty, the government has its police power, and, judging by dispatches from Bucharest, it did not hesitate to use this authority in the recent elections. More than 500 persons, including two former Cabinet members, were arrested in the province of Transylvania, the stronghold of the National Peasants. Police terrorism was also reported from other sections, and eight persons died in election fights, "most of them at the hands of gendarmes." Thus, to all appearances, King Carol has been provided with a parliament that will do his bidding, perhaps even to the extent of approving the dictatorship which most observers believe that he is planning.

OUR FOREIGN TRADE continues to decline despite all the every-day-in-every-way-better outpourings in Washington. Thus our exports for April were $20,993,223 below those of last March and no less than $117,844,458 below April, 1930. When it comes to imports, we find exactly the same story. Thus we purchased in April $23,859,421 less of goods from abroad than in March and $122,076,829 less than in the same month of 1930. Imports from all sources totaled only $185,747,102. The effect of our new tariffs upon our business with Canada is plainly shown by a cut from $64,000,274 in April of last year to $44,850,629 this year. These figures are certainly cruel to the Happiness Boys in Washington and especially to Julius H. Klein, who but a couple of weeks ago was unable to understand how anyone could be worried about our foreign trade. Especially pleasing to the New York Chamber of Commerce must be the fact that purchases by Soviet Russia showed a decline of $844,861 as contrasted with March and of $3,438,867 from April, 1930. The total remains at $6,786,831—still much too high for the chamber, which desires to cut off all trade with the Soviets. Incidentally, out of our total purchases of $185,747,102, we bought from Russia only to the extent of $926,292, as against $1,191,273 last year. Both figures reveal clearly in this magnitude how dreadfully Russia is dumping on our helpless shores. Had we worried less about Russian dumping and turned our attention instead to correcting some of the evils of the tariff, we might have avoided this costly trade shrinkage.

MR. HOOVER'S ECONOMY PROGRAM moves on apace, at least in promises. Week by week the members of the Cabinet and some of their principal advisers are being summoned to Rapidan Camp for the week-end to tell the President what they can do, or think they can do, about cutting down departmental expenses. The latest to submit to retrenchment is the Navy Department, which hopes to save $25,000,000 by June 30, 1932. Approximately $10,000,000 of this sum, Mr. Hoover was told, has already been covered for the present fiscal year through reorganization of the fleet, partly by reducing the number of vessels in operation and partly by cutting down the personnel. Similar retrenchments, it is understood, will be carried through the coming fiscal year. One item of the program contemplates the dropping of Guam as a naval base, and perhaps its conversion into a national park under the supervision of the Department of the Interior. All this, of course, is just so much to the good for the hard-pressed Treasury, and the lopping off of a hundred million or so of needless expenditures, which seems easily possible at the rate at which Mr. Hoover is going, will set an example which States and municipalities may well take to heart. It is a chastening reflection to recall that the great reduction in the national debt which has been effected since the World War has been substantially balanced by a portentous increase in State and municipal indebtedness. The United States, in other words, has not actually been getting out of debt, but only changing the form and incidence of its indebtedness.

DESPITE PROTESTATIONS from the White House and fulminations from the American Federation of Labor, the process of wage cutting goes grimly forward. The Labor Bureau reports 155 wage reductions in March, following 231 in February and 341 in January. Among official surveys, that of the Bureau of Women in Industry of the New York State Department of Labor shows sharp declines in rates paid women workers of all grades in January and February last as compared with the fall of 1929. President Green in a recent address charged a "conspiracy" to lower wages, blaming the bankers as head villains in the piece. No one need seek a deliberate purpose to lower living standards in order to understand the action of employers in cutting wages in a desperate effort at cost reduction under pressure of continued depression, however unwise their action may be in many cases, and however likely to bring strikes in its train. With production down, how can wages stay up? The latest Federation of Labor survey of current business estimates wage losses during the first quarter of 1931 due to unemployment, part time, and wage cutting at more than $2,500,000,000 as compared with 1929, a sum which is estimated at more than 20 per cent of the total value of retail sales for the period. Even if business should take a turn for the better in the fall, the situation next winter will be critical in the extreme, with an enormous total of unemployment certain, with charitable funds drying up and municipalities having increasing difficulty in collecting taxes that can be used for relief purposes. The Labor Bureau remarks pertinently: "The American dole system is apt to collapse next winter, with results that nobody can foresee." Will the President indefinitely continue to insist that the federal government shall take no positive steps to meet this menacing situation?

THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE announced on June 2 that it would not appeal to the Supreme Court the adverse decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals on its suit to prevent the merger of the Standard Oil Company of New York and the Vacuum Oil Company. Attorney General Mitchell has thus far been unbending in enforcement of the Anti-Trust Act, but the abandonment of this suit seems to indicate increased willingness on his part to extend to former Standard Oil subsidiaries the application of the "rule of reason" laid down by the Supreme Court. There is renewed talk of other mergers, and the New York Times reports that plans for the consolidation of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey and the Standard Oil Company of California into the largest oil company in the world will take definite shape within sixty days unless Washington objects. During recent years efforts to bring about joint action by producers to stop the enormous wastes due to competitive drilling for oil have been viewed with favor by the Department of the Interior, but have been frowned upon by the Department of Justice. If the latter now ceases to discourage the merger of the old Standard companies into yet larger and more powerful units, the result may well be a freezing out of the weaker independents and a strengthening of Standard control which can only be to its advantage in the competition with its great British rival, the Royal Dutch-Shell. Certain possibilities of monopoly in the Standard of New York-Vacuum merger were suggested by Lawrence M. Hughes in The Nation of February 18. The advantages of unified control and development of our oil resources from the standpoint of economy and the prevention of waste are undeniable, but the government's program, so far as any program is visible, offers no satisfactory assurance of protection against the ever-present dangers of monopoly.

HOW SINCERELY the War Policies Commission has striven to hear both sides of the war-program question may be judged from the manner in which the commission abruptly adjourned its final session with three representatives of peace organizations still waiting to be heard. The entire morning of this concluding session was given over to questioning Representative La Guardia of New York and an official of the Treasury Department. The commission adjourned after its examination of these two men, but vigorous protests from the three peace representatives—Nevin Sayre, Norman Thomas, and Dorothy Detzer—led the members to reconsider their decision. They permitted statements from Sayre, Thomas, and Miss Detzer to be read, but did not think it necessary to cross-examine any of the three. Now that it has taken what it believes to be sufficient testimony to enable it to complete its appointed task, the commission will presumably get down to the earnest business of fashioning a war program for the United States. It must be noted, however, that the testimony and suggestions upon which it will base this program have come from dozens of persons who believe in military preparedness and in the inevitability of war. Those opposed who were heard numbered only five.

MICHIGAN HAS JUST PASSED a vicious anti-alien law. "Undesirable aliens," as defined by the laws of the United States, are prohibited from becoming legal residents of Michigan, or from having employment or engaging in business there. Everyone is forbidden to employ them. They are to be denied admission at the borders of the State (whether by detaining and examining all passengers on incoming trains is not specified), and if detected after entering they are subject to deportation. Yet further, all unnaturalized aliens are required to obtain from the commissioner of public safety certificates of legal residence, in connection with the issuance of which photographs or fingerprints may be required. An employer may not employ an alien who has no such certificate, but must, on the other hand, report him to the police, whose duty then is to hold him till his right of residence is proved or he is deported. The whole law is an extraordinary farrago of provisions calculated to make life as difficult as possible for alien residents by subjecting them to constant annoyance and police surveillance. The law has been promptly attacked on constitutional grounds by the local branch of the American Civil Liberties Union, which has sought an injunction restraining its enforcement, and the issue should be promptly carried to the highest court. All questions of constitutionality aside, it is impossible to condemn too strongly the spirit of narrow and fearful nationalistic selfishness that lies back of such legislation.

FRANK SPECTOR, one of the six men sentenced to terms of from three to forty-two years under California's criminal-syndicalism law in connection with the organization of the Imperial Valley cantaloupe pickers, is soon to be freed, his sentence having been reversed by the State Court of Appeals. It found no evidence that he had ever been in the Imperial Valley at the time in question. The conviction of the other five defendants was voided on two of the three counts, namely, that their membership in the Communist Party violated the criminal-syndicalism law, and that they conspired to advocate doctrines prohibited by that law. Their conviction on the ground of advocacy of such doctrines stands, however. The defense will appeal the case at once to the State Supreme Court, in the hope of preventing this obnoxious war-born law from being used to prevent activity of radical labor organizations in California.

EVERYONE INTERESTED in progressive education will rejoice that Bennington College in Vermont is going to open its doors on schedule to a first class of eighty girls in September, 1932, despite all difficulties caused by the business depression. We have not yet had a four-year college definitely embodying the principles of the so-called progressive education, and the plans for Bennington, which proposes to concentrate attention upon the discovery and encouragement of individual capacities, have accordingly awakened wide interest among students of education all over the country. Robert Devore Leigh, president of Bennington, is a man at once familiar with the best of the older educational practice and keenly interested in the principles and technique of the modern school. In beginning work in a remodeled barn rather than waiting for the money to complete its building program, the college testifies to its belief that education is not primarily a matter of material resources. Dr. Leigh and his associates will have the best wishes of a multitude of fellow-workers, both in the older colleges and in the progressive schools of the country, for the success of their undertaking may mean much for both types of institution.

Leaders or Followers?

PRECEDENT will certainly have been shattered if any considerable number of this year's college graduates are not reminded at Commencement time that they are the hope of the nation, and that upon their attitude toward affairs as they "go out into the world" will depend, in large measure, the welfare of the country. It is the annual iteration, timed to coincide with one of the appealing moments of life, of the idea that the future rests with youth, and that what on the social surface seems to be ordered and accustomed is in fact being constantly changed by inflowing streams of human newness. One wonders how the thousands of the degree-bearing host will respond to a summons which, after all, is only a rephrasing of one which many of them have often heard. There is hardly a college in the land that does not have in its faculty at least one teacher of open mind and courageous spirit whose classroom has been an invitation to clear thinking and right conduct in public matters. At no time have books and magazines critical of the existing social order and expounding programs of change been so widely read and discussed by undergraduates as at the present time, and men and women outside the faculty circle who want something better than we now have are heard in increasing numbers from college platforms or in the informal meetings of student groups. If there be, outside the college, a "life" for which the student is expected to prepare, the June graduates have not been isolated from it.

Yet we know only too well what will happen if the graduates of this year are not different from those who have gone before. There will be a few thousand more lawyers or doctors content with the financial rewards of routine practice, but closing their eyes to glaring professional abuses; more preachers unctuously trying to keep up theological appearances or turning to pulpit stunts to attract an audience; more merchants, manufacturers, and bankers blaming the government or the radicals for business troubles and exerting themselves only to resist reform; more engineers who have sold their souls to corporate plunderers; more Republicans and Democrats who have drifted into the party without asking why and stayed in it no matter how useless or corrupt it may have become; more men and women of social prominence or intellectual pretensions who pronounce politics a dirty mess, turn their backs upon it, and call themselves independent when they are really ignorant and lazy.

What America needs today is a stalwart, aggressive, self-conscious youth movement, grounded in eagerness for opportunity and an intelligent willingness to take a chance. It needs a sense of solidarity among its young intellectuals, its novelists, poets, dramatists, critics, artists, and scientists, not merely for the advancement of learning or various forms of art but for the betterment of a dull, unthinking, and leaderless people. It needs the solid weight of youthful opinion, backed by the substantial force of youthful votes, against high tariffs, the grasping methods of public-utility corporations, the too frequent partisan and personal wranglings and maneuvers of Congress, and disarmament that does not disarm. The men and women who are leaving the colleges have been told that they must save the nation. They have an opportunity now to show that they can.

Roosevelt, Ritchie, and Pinchot

"THREE men and not mice," as Frank R. Kent put it in the Baltimore Sun, proved to be disturbers of traffic at the Governors' Conference at French Lick, Indiana, last week—disturbers of the traffic in platitudes and stupidities. Together Governors Roosevelt, Ritchie, and Pinchot wrecked the "shush-shush plan of timorous triteness" and ended the effort to have the governors avoid all controversial questions and say nothing that might hurt anybody's sensibilities or attract any attention whatever. They would not even have regard for the words of the program, or play the roles given to them. Thus, Governor Pinchot refused to be bound by the ridiculous subject assigned to him, "Timber Needs of the Future," and proceeded to talk about something very much less remote and far more vital, namely, the Power Trust. That was setting off explosives, indeed. But Governor Ritchie was not abashed by it. He was not down on the program for any speech, but this did not keep him from injecting considerable dynamite of his own. Refusing to keep silence in the face of the monstrous conditions in America, he declared that the presence among us of from five to eight million persons wanting work and unable to get it "constitutes the greatest challenge to our social order and the strongest argument in favor of communism," unless the problem is solved.

As for Governor Roosevelt, his subject was "Land Utilization and State Planning," a topic skilfully designed to keep him safe and sane. Instead, he allowed himself the luxury of a long introduction to his theme in which he too spoke of the distressing conditions confronting the nation, denounced the "Pollyannish methods" with which we approach our program, like Governor Ritchie painted a moving picture of the actual situation, and made a number of what might be called constructive suggestions, including a method of industrial insurance to take care of unemployment in periods of depression. It is hard to see what connection this had with land utilization, but it was a kind of State-planning that every man in high office ought to be thinking of and working on. Every one of these addresses was a contribution worth having. Had it not been for them the conference would have been forgotten in a day.

One can if one chooses say that these unexpected departures from the rules of the gubernatorial field day were dictated by political ambitions, and insinuate that if these three men had not been candidates for a higher office, they too would have accepted the role of gubernatorial futility. We do not believe this. They happen to be vigorous personalities in their own right. If thereby they have started the Presidential campaign a year ahead of time, we for ourselves are willing to acclaim them. We are going into one of the most serious Presidential elections in our history, one in which the American people will have to face an extraordinarily difficult choice under grave conditions. Any happening which might bring a number of candidates into the offing is most welcome. The more numerous and more outspoken the candidates the better, because the more difficult it will then be for the party in power to sidestep and pussyfoot and continue to mouth its nonsensical absurdities to the effect that times are improving, that the crisis is over, and that we are on the way uphill.

Particularly shall we rejoice if we may assume that Governor Pinchot has cast his hat into the ring. It will be a disgrace to every American if Mr. Hoover's so-called "right to renomination" is not promptly and honestly challenged within his own party. We hope that Governor Pinchot will enter numerous primaries, and that he will be willing to cooperate with those States which will have their favorite sons to put up, in order that the renomination of President Hoover, if it must be, shall not come to pass without plain speaking and vigorous attacks within the convention itself upon the man who will go down in history chiefly as one who stood unswervingly during the first three years of his Administration for the right of the American worker to die of starvation when he cannot get work—to die without let or hindrance, especially without any interference by that entity which we call government of, by, and for the people.

So in the case of Governor Ritchie and Governor Roosevelt. We cannot believe that either of these charming gentlemen is quite of the fiber that the hour calls for. If it is pleasant to have them recognize the all-overshadowing importance of the economic situation, it is also a fact that up to this time they have been sadly unaware in their public addresses of the all-important question of economic inequality. Either one of them would be the object of pity if he should enter the White House. Unless the economic and agricultural conditions right themselves faster than now appears possible, the man who succeeds President Hoover will be deserving of all possible sympathy. If the crisis continues we shall face vital economic changes. Only a man of unusual breadth and understanding and of rarest courage will be able to lead the country in such an emergency.

Particularly do we hope that neither Governor Roosevelt nor Owen D. Young will be nominated for the Presidency. The Governor has made an excellent record on Power. In his personality, his normality in his personal contacts, his courage on occasion, he has been so far superior to Mr. Hoover that many, we are sure, will see in him the man of the hour, as if he were not doomed to failure if elected by reason of the hopeless condition of his party, now the private property of John J. Raskob. The Governor has not demonstrated at Albany the possession of great qualities of leadership or a thorough understanding of the fundamental issues, of what it is really all about. He has just committed himself at French Lick to the absurdity of a scientific tariff; he has been a big-navy man; he was part and parcel of the Caribbean imperialism and World War folly of Woodrow Wilson, and, so far as we are aware, has never spoken out against the former. With all possible regard for his fine personal qualities, with the highest admiration for the superb moral courage he has shown in the face of the grave illness that overtook him and left him crippled, we still cannot feel that he is the man who will lead America out of the wilderness. Nor can we visualize Governor Ritchie, or even Governor Pinchot, in that capacity. They have had glimpses of a vision of the future, but only glimpses.

Germany in the Last Ditch

> The putting forth of the last power and reserves of the nation entitles the German Government, and makes it its duty toward the German people, to tell the world: The limits of the privations we have imposed on our people have been reached. . . . The government is conscious of the fact that the direly menaced business and financial position of the Reich calls imperatively for alleviation of the unbearable reparation obligations. The economic recovery of the world also depends upon it. The German nation is engaged in a decisive struggle for the future.

NO sincere man can read these words published on June 6 by the German Government and not feel moved by them and by the rest of the manifesto which accompanies its imposition of unbearable additional burdens upon its citizens. Germany has its back to the wall as truly as did the Allies in 1918. In unmistakable terms, with undeniable truth, the question has now been posed to every civilized country: Do you wish the German republic to go down into economic and political chaos, or do you not? As that question is answered in the next few weeks will be determined not only the fate of Germany, but perhaps the fate of Europe.

What we are witnessing is the culmination of what The Nation in its issue of May 17, 1919, called "The Madness at Versailles." That treaty was deliberately conceived to keep the German people in slavery for generations; it seemed deliberately written to make peace impossible in all of Europe, and it has accomplished that object. But more than that, it has helped to bring victors and vanquished to the point of economic collapse in which they find themselves today. Now, in June, 1931, almost twelve years after to a day, the German people, speaking through their government, serve notice that they have reached the last ditch; that they can endure nothing more and that they will not endure anything more, and that there must be an immediate change in the Young Plan of reparations if Germany is to go on. Every observer of any standing whatever who has studied on the spot the decline of Germany in the last twelve months knows that the manifesto from which we have quoted tells the simple and unvarnished truth. There are already protests, abuse, vilification, and charges of bad faith in France, and there will be more perhaps in other quarters. But every responsible statesman (we make no exception for France) knows in his heart of hearts that the manifesto states the truth and nothing but the truth. Indeed, we believe that even more serious statements have been made by the German Chancellor in his week-end conference at Chequers with Ramsay MacDonald and Arthur Henderson. If these British statesmen are not convinced that the time has come for Europe as a whole to safeguard itself against collapse, then we have misinterpreted their intelligence.

What has the German Government done at this last moment to prove its good faith? It has once more cut the salaries of all its civil-service employees by from 4 per cent for salaries under $750 a year up to 8 per cent for salaries over $3,000. All officials in country districts and in the small and middle-sized cities will have to sacrifice an extra 1 per cent, and this although all salaries were reduced by 6 per cent in February of this year. In order that no one shall charge the Cabinet ministers with favoring themselves, they have this time cut their salaries no less than 30 per cent. More than that, all railroad employees, all public-service corporation employees, and all employees of the Reichsbank are also subject to these cuts. That is bitter enough, as everyone knows who has observed the dreadful odds against which these employees have been struggling in their efforts to keep their homes together, but there is even worse to record. The dole for all the jobless has been cut 5 per cent; even the allowances to maimed veterans have been cut; in addition, the dole is hereafter not to be given to those under twenty-one, nor to married women. Seasonal workers will be aided only for twenty weeks, and then at about half of the present rate of unemployment insurance. These are literally hunger taxes; they will drive many a man and woman into a condition in which they will never be free from the gnawing pangs of inadequate nourishment. Finally there is the "crisis tax," planned to produce $100,000,000 in this budget year. Toward it wage-earners must pay 1 per cent on incomes under $60 a month, while monthly salaries of $375—very high for Germany—will be decreased by $15.

Not even these additional burdens give the slightest assurance that they will make safe the present German Government, or afford it the income that it needs. This is because there is an unknown quantity in the computations of the Reich as of every state, city, and commune, and that is the number of unemployed. The government believes that it can balance its budget with the aid of these new demands upon a war-worn and postwar-shocked people, because it reckons on only 4,500,000 unemployed next winter. That is a dangerously frail hope, for there are today 4,250,000 unemployed, and we have heard from competent sources lately that this figure may reach 7,000,000 by the first of February next. If this happens, heaven help Germany! Meanwhile the Chancellor returns from Chequers to face a most dangerous political situation at home. The Socialists and the extreme conservatives are bitterly opposed to his new tax program. If the former refuse further to go along with him, there is likely to be a new Chancellor. Perhaps only a quick decision to call a new conference for the revision of the Young Plan can save him.

We repeat, this is the last ditch and it is now for Europe and the United States to decide. Senator Borah does well to stress again the need of disarmament abroad as a prerequisite to sanitation, and to favor revision of reparations. But the United States cannot stop there. For it now faces the fact that a German move for a revision of the Young Plan is actually in sight, with its consequent effect upon the payments by France and Great Britain to us. But far more important than that is the simple fact that the German republic is now in the balance, and that it is up to the leading statesmen of the world to decide whether there shall be violent revolution and chaos in Germany, and probably all through Europe if Germany goes down, or not.

I Work for Russia
VI. The Life of the Engineer*

By WALTER ARNOLD RUKEYSER

THE conditions of life of the American engineer working in the Soviet Union vary as greatly as do all other things in the present Russian experiment. I have heard of an American living alone far from any city or village in what was barely more than a hut. I have seen American engineers in Sverdlovsk living with their wives and children in two or more rooms in the hotel. I have known others, in operations which use large numbers of foreign technicians, who had modern, American-type housekeeping apartments in buildings specially constructed for foreigners, or were quartered in single or two-family houses supplied with every modern convenience. In very large operations, such as the Magnetogorsk development, which has got under way only within the past year, and which will require the services of a large American contingent, I am told that tennis courts and even a golf course are to be provided for the foreign engineers and their families.

To return, however, to our personal experience. Upon our arrival at Asbest, when we were beginning the last phase of the work under my third contract with the Soviets, my wife and I were shown to a big old house erected many years ago under the former regime. It was the house in which we had been quartered during our first trip out to the mines in 1929, when I was acting in a consulting capacity only. At that time we were housed as the guests of a Russian engineer (he was actually a Finn) with his wife and family, and we had nothing to do with the housekeeping. My new contract called for a six-room "apartment," and since in Russia the kitchen is not considered a room, this was probably the only house in Asbest which, strictly speaking, was of the stipulated size. We found the house too large for our needs, and particularly depressing to us in the absence of our former friends. Upon expressing our feelings in the matter at the office, we were at once tendered one half of a new and delightful two-family house, the other half of which was tenanted by the technical director and his family.

All housing provision was in charge of a special director personally responsible for our comfort. We were permitted to assemble such furnishings as were available either in the general store-sheds or in quarters vacant at the time. The house had been built only a little over a year, and made up one of the new units of the housing program. It had a splendid location on a height with a beautiful outlook over the lake; it was surrounded by evergreens and was adjacent to the hotel just completed. On the first floor were the typical Russian kitchen, maid's room, dining-room with open fireplace, bath, and storage space, with a front and a back porch. On the upper floor were the living-room, bedroom, and a small room which we used for our trunks and luggage. The furniture, including the beds, was comfortable, though plain. We had no rugs on the floors. The walls inside and out were stuccoed with asbestos plaster over the logs of which the house was built. There were two porches on this upper floor also, which afforded us delightful evenings during the summer. The "color scheme" was, as always in Russia, supplied internally and externally by whitewash. On the whole the place was quite comfortable—plain to the point of severity, to be sure, yet scrupulously clean and light, airy, and cheerful.

The rooms were heated by the typical built-in oven, extending from floor to ceiling. These ovens are of brick and so constructed as to form a portion of a wall or corner, extending into adjacent rooms. They burn wood, which even when wet burns readily. As soon as the fire has been well started, the iron door of the furnace is screwed tightly shut and the wood, instead of burning and giving a quick flash heat, chars slowly, giving off a steady heat for several hours. This heat is absorbed by the heavy brickwork of the oven proper and is radiated into the rooms for several hours after the fuel has been entirely consumed. It is remarkable how really hot these Russian ovens can keep the houses even at the prevailing winter outside temperature of forty to fifty degrees below zero.

The Russian devotion to hermetically sealed living and working quarters is worthy of comment. As soon as the weather turns at all cold, double windows are affixed throughout, and even the cracks are puttied. An opening in the window possibly six by fifteen inches is then expected to supply all requirements for fresh air. Circulation is supposed to be effected by a vent built into the oven.

In respect to maids we were extremely fortunate. A departing German engineer had told us about his former maîtresse d'hôtel; she was a marvelous cook, she was honest, she was clean, a willing worker—and red-headed. We obtained her services. She asked twenty rubles (about ten dollars) a month and room with board. Her name, familiarly speaking, was Katya. She was a gem of a servant—she could get more out of the few ingredients available than anyone else in our experience. We were initiated into such Russian delicacies as beef Strogonoff, which under deft ministrations tasted just as well as if the basic element were not horseflesh instead of cow. Her accounts were always in order. She was the soul of cleanliness. She bargained with the peasants who almost daily came to our back door with every conceivable article of food from cucumbers to wild ducks as conscientiously as though she were spending her own money. These bickerings used to be one of our great sources of amusement.

One of the cooperative stores was more or less set aside for the foreigners—in our case several German engineers from the firm of Humboldt and our own household. We could buy commodities in as large amounts as were available. Although we were supplied with "books" to be used in our purchase of certain commodities which were rationed to the Russians, we were not in any sense of the word restricted as to the quantities which we could buy at any one time.

* The last of a series of six articles.—EDITOR THE NATION.

Our great difficulty was the irregularity of supplies. When eggs were in stock, we would buy a case of one hundred, for there might be no eggs again for a considerable time. Naturally, without any other refrigeration facilities than a cellar, which to be sure did remain surprisingly cold even in the hottest weather, food bought in large quantities often went bad before we could use it.

The foodstuffs which we purchased at the cooperative were always reasonably priced. When meat was available—and there were periods when we could buy it daily for weeks and others when we could not for love or money buy a single gram—the prices were often lower than here in America. For example, we paid seventy-two kopeks for a kilogram of lamb (thirty-six cents for about two and one-fifth pounds). We paid six kopeks (three cents) apiece for eggs, twenty-four kopeks a liter (about a quart) for milk, and so on. When the cooperative was out of these commodities, we could often purchase them from the peasants either at the bazaar or at our own door. Then we paid the inflated prices prevailing on the open market, such as forty kopeks (twenty cents) apiece for eggs, five rubles ($2.50) a kilo for meat, and so on. When it came to paying habitually a ruble and a half for a liter of milk with none available at the stores, I registered a mild and good-natured complaint with the manager of the cooperative. Shortly after we had milk, as much as we wanted, and daily, at the old prices. I found that a great deal depended upon the personnel in the cooperative. The first manager always seemed to have ways and means to supply us with our immediate necessities. The man who replaced him later would strike a good average for a few days "and then came the drought." A protest, with resulting deluge, would be followed by a lapsing back to the attitude of nichevo. This probably explains the great divergence of reports emanating from Russia as to the cost of things and as to how Americans live in the Soviet Union. In Moscow, for example, where over two million people must be fed, there was during our stay last June a virtual shortage of nearly everything. Even at the hotels catering primarily to foreigners there was no coffee, no sugar, no butter, and rarely meat. Out in the Urals we found everything—meats in great variety, butter, sugar, even excellent table wines and beer. We were in the center of a farming and cattle country. The shortage in the large centers seemed to be due largely to a breakdown in the transportation and distributing systems, coupled with the lack of refrigeration facilities both in transit and in storage. In the winter just the reverse was true. Everything was to be had in Moscow and we had a downright shortage in the Urals. For two weeks in December we had no meat at all. Only horseflesh was to be purchased at exorbitant prices from the peasants. We lived on eggs, frozen fish, and blini (if my readers have not tasted American-type pancakes served with whipped sour cream and caviar on top, I suggest they do so). But in Moscow the famous "Promparty" trial had just been completed, the "enemy from within" had been exposed and sentenced to punishment, and the Moscow "front" was supplied with every conceivable foodstuff. The extremely low winter temperatures prevailing at those latitudes (the days are correspondingly short, dark till nearly ten in the morning and again before four in the afternoon) permit the transit of perishables away from the areas of production to the large centers of population.

Thus we lived through periods of plenty followed by periods of less "luxury." To buy food as we are accustomed to do here is impossible in that part of Russia in which we lived and worked. Everything is purchased at one store, from preserved fruits and vegetables from the Caucasus to hunks of meat of local origin. Green fresh vegetables were available, owing to the shortness of the season, only for about four weeks during the latter part of July and early August. Then we could get peas, beans, lettuce, tomatoes, and the like. On the whole the American engineer and his family out in the "sticks" will probably find their diet monotonous unless they have such an exceptional cook as we were blessed with. Our table was augmented also by many varieties of game during the season—wild duck, goose, dove, pheasant, gluckha (a bird not unlike our wild turkey, extremely palatable, for which we have no true counterpart in this country), venison occasionally, also a bearsteak now and then.

Our amusement had to be found entirely within ourselves and our little group of friends. Everyone did everything possible to make us happy, and contrary to the general situation in Russia, our Russian coworkers visited us frequently and we them. Such occasions were always festive. The Russians love sociability. The main meal was at four in the afternoon, always with soup and as elaborate as possible. We drank and smoked and talked and ate. The educated Russian knows how to drink and hold it, mainly because he always eats and drinks at the same time. Hours were consumed in discussing philosophies of life and telling how we work and do things in America. More often the topic of conversation would be our work at Asbest. We accomplished perhaps as much at these informal round tables as at our offices. Chess was a great source of entertainment. Nearly every educated Russian plays the game and well. Cards are taboo as being too bourgeois, though my wife and I killed many hours at "Russian Bank," which we found wasn't Russian after all.

Two splendid riding horses had been supplied us, with brand-new pigskin saddles. Daily during the lovely hot summer days we rode out over the steppes, through the forests and over the tundra, covering possibly fifty or sixty miles in four or five hours. The Siberian and Tartar ponies are tireless. We picked armfuls of exquisite wild flowers of every conceivable variety. We stopped at the river and au naturel enjoyed a swim in the cool, clear water. The Russians, we found, were quite naive about nude bathing, though at the mines, at least, the men and women seemed always to seek separate swimming places. Their attitude toward the human body is simple, unaffected, almost childlike.

We refreshed ourselves on our long rides by stopping at an occasional peasant home where kvass or kumiss (fermented mare's milk) was usually available. There is a sanatorium in the Urals for the treatment of tuberculosis where the main article of diet consists of this kumiss.

Occasionally we had a really enjoyable movie, and very rarely an American film. We saw an old picture of Harold Lloyd's last summer, and two or three other American comedies came out to Asbest. The Russians seem to enjoy these pictures of ours above everything else, and the comedies especially appeal to their love of laughter. Then, too, we occasionally had good musical programs even out at the mines—a balalaika orchestra or a string quartet, all part of the cultural program for the people.

"Hire Learning" at Ohio State

By NORMAN THOMAS

A SPLENDID laboratory for the study of what has been called the "hire learning" in America is to be found on the campus of the great Ohio State University at Columbus. Not for many years has there been so clear a demonstration that a board of trustees, dominated by the usual business ideals, expects its students to be docile Babbitts in embryo, its university president to be a high-grade office manager, and its faculty to conform or get out.

Two highly pertinent editorial paragraphs in The Nation for June 3 called attention to the refusal of the trustees to renew their contract with Professor Herbert Adolphus Miller, together with its apparent background of student—and some faculty—opposition to military training, and its aftermath of the most naively frank statements of a university board's conception of its relations to a faculty that have been written in recent years. The story is worth telling at more length.

Ohio State University is one of three State-maintained universities in a State more generously sprinkled with colleges, public and private, than Jack Horner's pie with plums. Until the beginning of this century the material development of Ohio State University, at least in comparison with the development of the corresponding institutions in Wisconsin, Illinois, and Michigan, was retarded by various academic, local, and rural jealousies. Within the last generation, however, it has received large appropriations, and has forged far ahead of its former rivals, the other State-supported colleges, in equipment and attendance. Moreover, until recently the superficial observer and also, I think, the more careful student of American universities would have placed Ohio State University among the more competent and liberal of our great State institutions. It had a very active military department and compulsory training, it is true, but it had also a more lively opposition to such training than existed in most universities; in the critical departments of history, political science, economics, and sociology it boasted a somewhat unusual group of able men, apparently entirely free to speak their minds. Among them Professor Herbert A. Miller stood out, less, perhaps, by reason of his academic work than because of his public interest in problems of race and nationality, and his real services to President Masaryk of Czecho-Slovakia in the war days when that country's declaration of independence was written.

During all this time the university was under the control of a board of seven which had expressly reserved the right to make yearly contracts, and only yearly contracts, with the staff from president to the youngest instructor. This board, in turn, has been completely dominated, not by the president of the university, Dr. George W. Rightmire—a personally likable man, vigorous in neither health nor spirit—but by Julius F. Stone (born Stein), president of the board, of which he has been a member since 1909.

Nobody doubts that in his own way Mr. Stone loves the university, and has something more than the usual layman's interest in some forms of scientific research. But that is not why he is president of the board of a great university. The appropriate reason for his position is his standing as an industrialist and banker. He is today head of the Wolfe interests in Columbus, and these interests control one of Columbus's largest banks (Mr. Stone is a director), the BancOhio chain of banks (Mr. Stone is president), and two Columbus newspapers, the Ohio State Journal and the Columbus Dispatch. Mr. Stone is also chairman of the board of the Seagrave Corporation, which makes fire engines. In general the Wolfe interests dominate Columbus business, and until very lately have had tremendous political power in the city and at the State Capitol no matter which party was in control. Who, then, by American standards, could be more fit than this big-business leader for a high educational post? Well, he has it, and by universal testimony he, who is a strong-minded person, dominates the board to which the new Democratic governor, the supposedly liberal Mr. White, has recently reappointed him.

But things haven't been going so well in these hard times. Candidates in Columbus supposedly backed by the Wolfe crowd went down to defeat last November. The present legislature, now in session, is wrestling with a muddled tax situation in Ohio; it wants to save money, and a cut in the appropriation for Ohio State University might recommend itself to legislators some of whom come from cities with municipal universities of their own, or from towns and counties friendly to other colleges, public or private.

To add to Mr. Stone's worries, while everything was up in the air, some 700 pesky students, after a lot of discussion freely permitted on the campus, signed a petition asking for optional military drill. Still worse, the faculty indorsed the petition by the close vote of 83 to 79. The vote was taken before the head of the fifty-two military men assigned to teach the young idea to shoot, Colonel Grosvenor Townsend, had made his speech. Ostensibly for this reason President Rightmire called another faculty meeting. Things weren't pleasant. The Colonel was talking about Communists as the authors of anti-militarism. Some patriot in the legislature had introduced a resolution to investigate "those faculty members supporting the optional-drill movement." That faculty meeting was the biggest in years. Under some sort of pressure men came who had to have a Boy Scout show them the way to the meeting place. There were many motions, and on the real test votes the supporters of compulsory drill won about two to one. But the vote given out to the press was not the vote on the vital issue, but on a formal motion to transmit the student petition with the unfavorable recommendation of the faculty. This vote, understood to be simply a registering of the facts, was passed 144 to 9, and was deliberately announced to the press to give the impression of an overwhelming reverse for opponents of compulsory drill.

But even this victory for compulsory drill, exaggerated by the Wolfe press, was not enough to ease Mr. Stone's mind. He put through the trustees a statement rejecting the student petition about drill and moralizing on the purposes of the university. Compulsory military drill was declared to be among "those educational activities that have stood the test of time." The statement ended with the extraordinary "if you don't like it, get out" paragraph which The Nation has already quoted. Never was the duty of professors to conform more baldly stated:

> The board feels that the university should not be subjected to emotional criticism because of the unripe vociferations of a small group of students and a very few members of the faculty, who are under no compulsion to come here and under none to remain unless they can subscribe to the fundamental purposes of this university.

No wonder that fifty-six professors and seventy-seven instructors formally protested, and that five deans have declared the innocence of the whole faculty of communism or any offense against academic propriety! The docile Dr. Rightmire had to back up his bosses, the trustees, by a statement of his own amplifying the argument of the board.

Then, perhaps as a warning that papa could spank as well as lecture naughty little professors, Professor Herbert A. Miller was notified that his contract would not be renewed. Mr. Miller had been somewhat active against compulsory drill, but the statement concerning his discharge gave other reasons and alleged that the decision to get rid of him had been reached months previous to the fight on militarism and had been, supposedly, communicated to Mr. Miller by President Rightmire. The latter had, indeed, talked to Mr. Miller in the fall, but by no means in terms of anything more than a desire to clear up some misunderstandings. Hence Mr. Miller had taken no step either to defend his cause or to get another place.

And what were the alleged reasons for eliminating in this offhand fashion a man of real distinction for many public services? These: that Professor Miller's teachings on race relations had brought complaints from parents, and that in India he had expressed an improper degree of sympathy for Gandhi! With regard to the first charge, of itself impertinent, irrelevant, and unsupported by evidence, the head of Mr. Miller's department (sociology) has said that he had received and heard of no complaints from parents. The second is one of the most ridiculous reasons ever given for discharging a professor. It appears that the German-born Mr. Stone and company are more zealous for British supremacy in India than the British, for the British government has never made any complaint concerning Professor Miller. And the particular speech which so shocked Mr. Stone, both in its summary version as given by Mr. Miller and its longer version as discovered by the trustees in a Bombay paper, is a mild expression of interest in Gandhi's tactics, the kind of interest felt by hundreds of thousands of Americans. To discharge a professor for it is a most contemptible truckling, unasked, to foreign imperialism. Of course it is inconceivable that the Gandhi episode is anything but a pretext. Now the Stone crowd have found other pretexts, equally weak: (1) that when Mr. Miller spoke in Korea before a meeting arranged by some of his former students in America, the Japanese police ended the meeting while Mr. Miller was explaining the Czecho-Slovakian independence movement (true, but not at all discreditable to a professor in the land of Jefferson and Lincoln); and (2) that he had been unwelcome at Oberlin, where he formerly taught (emphatically false, as his Oberlin friends proved).

Mr. Stone's dictatorship did not neglect his press. The Ohio State Journal and the Dispatch by cartoons and editorials and columnist chatter have tried to make out that the university trustees are saving the institution from the "reds." The columnist, Hugh Fullerton, with an eye on the rural vote, waxes sentimental over the glories of the American farm—he forgets the mortgage and the price of wheat—and sees the youthful red from the university redeemed from the error of his ways by a combination of hard work and home cooking. In a Dispatch cartoon a mother sheep labeled Common Sense consoles herself with thinking how her errant lambs, gone after a Billy Goat Professor to red pastures, will miss her at "dinner time"—a naive commentary on the strictly utilitarian purposes of education.

It is fair to say that Mr. Stone has not found his university students or faculty or even public opinion so docile as his university president and his papers. Three thousand students, without delay, signed a petition for Professor Miller's reinstatement. A special petition was presented by graduate students with equal enthusiasm. A formal demand has been presented by faculty members for an investigation of the situation by the Association of University Professors. Altogether I found on the campus during a recent visit a livelier degree of social and intellectual interest than is usual in that annex to the stadium which we call the college campus in America. Mr. Stone must rejoice that the end of the academic year is near.

Aside from college sentiment, newspaper comment in the principal papers—especially the Scripps-Howard papers in Ohio—has inclined toward support of Professor Miller. His own varied activities have given him the friendship and support of such diverse groups as the Negroes, many recent immigrant groups, notably the Czecho-Slovaks, who are strong in Cleveland, and some of the best leaders of Protestant and Jewish thought. Sixty-eight Columbus clergymen have sent to the board a letter criticizing its action with great severity. Resolutions for an investigation of the dismissal of Professor Miller and of the business administration of the university, the latter aimed at certain alleged transactions involving members of the board of trustees, have been introduced into the legislature. Governor White may have reason to be less nonchalant than he was when he told the student committee which waited on him and an insistent photographer: "Oh, no, I don't want a picture taken. If I did, why Rightmire, or whatever his name is, might come down here and want his picture taken, too. You've got your publicity now and that's enough."

There can be no solution of this situation which does not reinstate Professor Miller, rescind the limitations upon faculty freedom implied in the trustees' statement, and permit student discussion on such pertinent issues as college militarism. Anything less will leave Ohio State University a school for "hire learning" in the most literal sense.

The situation is particularly a challenge to youth and to the teaching profession. Unless things are changed in Columbus, every young man or woman who goes to Ohio State will know that he and his professors on certain vital matters must think—or at any rate talk—as Mr. Julius Stone thinks proper or get out. Education will be crassly a process of getting certain information for the sake of "success" in a world in which bankers, with the approval of the legislators, are the final authority on militarism, race relations, and economic wisdom.

At least equally concerned must be the whole academic profession. Acquiescence in the Ohio situation is unadorned prostitution of loyalty to truth, to be excused only for the same economic reasons that excuse the women who follow the oldest of professions. If to teach sociology at a university one must refrain from offending the race prejudice of any parent, must express no interest in Gandhi's technique of revolution, and must stimulate no students to question compulsory militarism, then to teach sociology is an intellectual slavery worse than the devotion of any theologian to a rigid creed; for a theologian's creed has at least a nobler background than the prejudices and self-interest of the particular Babbitts who are the fount of academic power. At the very least it must be understood that a man taking Professor Miller's place becomes by that act an outcast and pariah from his own profession. In general, an academic blacklist against an unrepentant university would be a salutary and in the long run a very powerful thing.

Finally, the situation at Ohio State University raises once more the question of the competence of democracy and the validity of its ideals. Our State universities at best are proof of a genuine hunger of democracy for education. That is not education which subordinates the quest for truth to the service of existing prejudice. Democracy fastens on itself its own chains whenever in the name of patriotism or any popular prejudice it lets its own friends and servants, the seekers after truth, be made the victims of that sort of disguised economic dictatorship which Mr. Julius Stone of the Wolfe interests so conspicuously typifies.

Hoover's Public-Buildings Bluff

By RUBY A. BLACK

Washington, June 5

MISREPRESENTATION of the federal government's contribution to employment through its public-buildings program continues. The Department of Labor told the Interdepartmental Public Buildings Committee that a $10,000,000 construction project, taking two years to complete, provides 1,000 jobs for men on actual construction, with three to five men working in fabrication plants for every man working on the building itself. Thus a $10,000,000 job provides work for an average of 4,000 to 6,000 workers for two years. But in estimating the number of jobs given by the federal building program, no Administration speaker has ever estimated less than 6,000 jobs for every $10,000,000 of construction.

Fourth Assistant Postmaster General John W. Philp told the Bronx Board of Trade that the federal government is spending $504,000,000 for construction of public buildings outside the District of Columbia. The authorized program for buildings and sites is $415,000,000. Some $69,000,000 will be added to this by funds realized from the sale of old buildings and sites, which can be used for other projects. That makes $484,000,000 that can be spent to buy sites and construct buildings outside the national capital in the ten-year program begun in theory in 1926 and ending in theory in 1936. Mr. Philp, whose letters to Congressmen indicate that in his comparatively short time in Washington he has not yet learned the difference between an appropriation and an authorization or allocation, got up to $504,000,000 by adding $20,000,000 which it is estimated the government will save by getting buildings constructed for less than the limit of cost set by law for each project. Of course, the $20,000,000 can be twice allocated on paper, but it cannot buy land twice, give jobs in factories twice, or give jobs twice to mechanics and laborers on construction.

On the projects put under contract between last June and last December, the cost of the land amounted to about one-sixth of the total limit of cost, and the savings to about one-fourth. If the sites continue to cost what they have been costing, at least $80,000,000 of the $484,000,000 will be spent on sites alone, and probably one-fifth, or about $95,000,000, will actually be spent on land, since the government already owned land on which many of last year's buildings were being constructed. Buying land puts money into circulation but it does not immediately put men to work. That leaves from $390,000,000 to $400,000,000 to be spent on materials and labor—and profits to contractors—during the total ten-year program, or 156,000 to 240,000 man-years, averaging 15,600 to 24,000 jobs a year.

If the Treasury realizes its hopes, expressed to the Senate Committee on Appropriations, and spends $85,000,000 on actual construction in 1931, jobs will be provided for 8,500 men on construction work and for from 25,500 to 42,500 in factories and plants—a total of 34,000 to 51,000 men. It has never yet been able to live up to its hopes for annual construction.

The Treasury Department, with its tremendous job of buying land at reasonable rates, selecting sites which will suit the ofttimes cantankerous demands of local interests selfishly concerned over the location of their post-office buildings, condemning sites through the Department of Justice, getting that department to work promptly on clearing titles to land, is not to be blamed for the slowness in actual construction which has marked the federal public-buildings program to date. Some hard-working men are devoting their best efforts to putting the program through as speedily, as fairly, as effectively as possible, but they are hampered by local squabbles over sites or materials to be used, and they are kept in a constant "talk-fest" by Congressmen pressing for action on their pet projects. Until recently they have been hampered by law.

The Administration, however, is definitely to blame for at least three things: its slowness to recognize the need and appropriate more funds, as it did shortly before the end of the Seventy-first Congress; its failure to recommend the legislation cutting red tape in federal building work, which was passed at the end of the third session of the Seventy-first Congress and might as well have been passed early in the second session, if not in the special session; and its repeated misrepresentation of the program actually under way.

Worst among the offenders against the intelligence of the ordinary observer, by its misrepresentation of the federal public-buildings program actually effective in providing jobs for the jobless, is the President's Emergency Committee for Employment. The Washington newspaper correspondent who receives this committee's hand-outs daily and who likewise knows intimately what is going on in the federal building program is likely to exaggerate but slightly in saying that the committee has provided more jobs for publicity writers, paper-makers, mimeographers, stencil producers, and ink manufacturers than the federal building program has provided for building workers.

Colonel Arthur Woods of the President's Committee gave out to the press at the beginning of 1931 "progress reports" on the status of the federal building program in groups of States. These "progress reports" always started off with a lead like the following: "A progress report on the $22,643,200 federal building program in the six New England States was made by the Treasury Department today to Colonel Arthur Woods, chairman of the President's Emergency Committee for Employment. The statement covers fifty-eight separate projects, and shows the status ot each as of January 12."

Examining that report, we find that in Maine, for example, not one project of the eight mentioned as a $1,658,600 program was under actual construction. As a matter of fact, the Treasury had awarded, before the specified date, only one construction contract of this group in Maine, the contract for excavating the ground for the $400,000 addition to the federal courthouse at Portland, the contract being for $1,380. It was not awarded until December 10, 1930. This test, applied to the entire list of New England projects in order to see how many dollars have been "put in the pockets of grimy overalls," as Assistant Secretary of Commerce Julius Klein puts it, reveals that only $2,890,902 worth of construction was under contract in these States during 1930, and some of the contracts were awarded late in the year. On the basis of 1,000 workers for every $10,000,000 worth of construction on a two-year project, with five others working in fabrication plants for every construction worker, this New England program meant work for not more than 1,800 workers as a generous allowance.

The largest figure mentioned in one of these "progress reports" was in the report on "the present $57,863,000 federal building program in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Kentucky." Note the word "present." But of the sixty-four projects listed, with this great limit of cost, only thirteen were under contract, the construction contracts amounting to $2,225,540 in these five States.

Contracts awarded between June 1 and November 15, 1930, as listed by Treasury officials, involved total limits of cost amounting to $41,838,000, but the contract obligations on these amounted to only $21,726,938. Of the $41,838,000, purchase of sites had taken $6,621,244; $1,284,059 had been reserved for various equipment and minor finishing work; $1,268,950 was set aside for contingencies, leaving a saving of $10,836,809 on these projects, which may be used in later work. The projects put under contract after June 1 last would probably mean 8,400 to 13,000 jobs. During the calendar year 1930, projects under contract involved limits of cost amounting to $65,070,000, but the construction contracts on these projects amounted to only $38,273,393.20. This includes those begun but not finished before the first of 1930 and those begun but not finished before the end of 1930. This amount of construction provides 15,200 to 22,800 jobs.

In the District of Columbia the program has apparently progressed more rapidly. During 1930 the following projects were completed: Administration building of the Department of Agriculture, $1,948,138.50 contract; Government Printing Office building, $1,237,327.37 contract; Internal Revenue building, $9,104,866.11 contract.

During 1930 the following contracts were awarded or were still running for construction in the District of Columbia: for the building of the Department of Agriculture, $2,075,000, with an additional $159,216 for elevators; Department of Commerce building, said to be the largest office building in the world, $13,567,000, with some $600,000 or $700,000 worth of electric-lighting fixtures and elevators likewise to be installed; office building for Congressmen, excavation and foundation, $163,000, and superstructure contract, not awarded until December, 1930, amounting to $5,270,000. These contracts would mean, according to their estimates, from 8,400 to 12,600 jobs.

Furthermore, it was not until the Seventy-first Congress approached its end that Congress finally determined that Uncle Sam should, in the future, not be a "scab" employer. Then it passed a measure requiring that the local rate of wages be paid on federal construction projects.

In the meanwhile, complaints had been placed before the Treasury and Post Office departments, and before Congress, against the wages paid by contractors constructing federal buildings. In Kingsport, Tennessee, a labor foreman made an affidavit that he was working for 25 cents an hour on the post-office building. The carpenter foreman on the same job swore he was getting 60 cents an hour. A skilled carpenter, with twenty-five years' experience, swore he worked for 50 cents an hour on the same building. Another got 30 cents an hour. The wage scale for carpenters in Kingsport has been 70 cents an hour for three years, according to the local union.

The Bricklayers, Masons, and Plasterers International Union of America complained to the President last December about the employment of cheap non-union labor on numerous federal building projects, including post offices, veterans' hospitals, and other federal structures in various States. It was only after these complaints poured in that the Administration decided it must follow the advice it has been giving private employers and insist upon maintaining fair wages.

Again the Treasury was not to be blamed, for under the law it must award the contract to the lowest responsible bidder. The White House must shoulder the onus. The Treasury could not, prior to a law recently passed, specify that the regular wage rate and local labor (rather than imported Mexican labor, for example, as was used on some Texas projects) be employed. Representative Robert Low Bacon, regular Republican Congressman, scion of a rich, prominent, conservative Long Island family, once pointed out that an executive order could do what the Congress later did. No such executive order was ever issued. A law was finally passed. But the Administration should have seen that the law was passed at the very beginning of the federal building program.

The federal public-buildings program is doubtless adding to employment. The last session of the Seventy-first Congress added to the effectiveness and speed of that program. But most of the actual construction work speeded up to help out during the depression will not mean any jobs for a year or two. There was not the slightest reason why the special session called by President Hoover immediately after his inauguration should not have done all the things which the final session of the Seventy-first Congress, two years later, did. It usually takes two years after the funds are appropriated to get a public building started. The additional $100,000,000 authorized for federal buildings was not even appropriated in the Seventy-first Congress, and cannot be appropriated, barring a special session, before next spring. Even if it should be appropriated, it could not be put to work unless more architects, more administrators (such as L. C. Martin, special assistant to Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Ferry K. Heath, who bears most of the real brunt of the federal building program), and more assistant district attorneys to clear site titles should be employed.

Herbert Hoover, if he thought about it at all, knew this when he was inaugurated. He and his henchmen did nothing but boast and oppose the bills introduced by Senator Robert F. Wagner of New York, which might have been of some aid. Any Washington newspaper correspondent who has followed the federal building program for small-city papers, to which the progress of the local federal building is the most important Washington news, could have told him what was delaying the federal building program and how to speed it up. So could have L. C. Martin. The information, based on experience, was all available by 1929, three years after the original Elliott-Fernald public-buildings law was passed. The aids to speeding up the program were comparatively simple and could as well have been adopted in the special session of 1929 as in the final session of 1930-31.

In other words, the federal building program, while, as far as I can tell, honestly and intelligently administered by the minor officials charged with carrying it out, has been marked by delays, by bungling, by misrepresentation, by refusal to see the needed changes in legislation and to get them promptly effected. Congress has so far never refused to pass any public-buildings measure recommended by the Administration except one which would have made possible a wild riot of corruption and political favoritism—the proposal that construction contracts be awarded without competitive bidding. All other measures to cut red tape, to speed up plans, such as employing outside architects and taking immediate possession of sites under condemnation, all measures to increase authorized appropriations from the original $215,000,000 to the present $415,000,000, have been promptly passed by Congress as soon as the President gave the word. If the President had given the word sooner on the legislation passed at the end of the Seventy-first Congress, the federal building program might have meant something in relieving unemployment in 1930 and 1931.

In the Driftway

A FRIEND of the Drifter's, country-bred and city-dwelling, tried to still his nostalgia for New England a few years ago by buying a farm. The house, sturdily built 150 years ago, needed some patching, which he dutifully accomplished. As dutifully he supplied his family with the necessary articles of furniture, the necessary water fixings, the requisite furnace and woodpiles, and playhouses for his children, and electricity, and hot-water heaters. Then it must be that he gave a sigh of relief and turned to more essential matters. Down in the meadows just below the house, where they successfully obscured the view of the spreading valley, stood a tangle of barns. There was—or it might be more correct to say there had once been—a cow barn with elaborate buggy sheds abutting on it; there was a large horse barn; there was a manure shed in a highly dilapidated condition; there was a great barn for hay; there was a milk-house, an ice-house, a chicken house. A village for live stock, in short. Only he had no live stock. What family he had was soundly housed in the middle of a grassed yard, carefully kept. What should he do with the barns?

* * * * *

THERE was plenty of advice forthcoming wherever he sought it. Almost everyone told him to tear them down; or at least to tear parts of them down. To recover the view, to recover the lumber, to recover the rich dirt of the barnyard and make a lovely rock garden in it. The only trouble was that he preferred the sight of the barns to any view on the place; he had no need of lumber at all; and he abominated a rock garden on a farm above all other things as suburban and an affectation. It was years before he mustered up courage to do what he wanted to do. The Drifter, visiting nearby, caught him at it and received a frank and full explanation. He was standing at the edge of his barn lot watching a couple of workmen cementing stones for a foundation—the foundation, in fact, of the largest cow barn. "Yes," he said, in response to the Drifter's question, "I'm having them fixed up. They'll tumble down in a few years if I don't, and it would cost me thousands of dollars to build new ones. No, we aren't getting any stock. I suppose we may never need those barns as long as we live. But I sort of like the look of them right there where they've always been. I can't afford to do any work on them, but I'm doing it anyway. I'm making a large, unnecessary, entirely useless expenditure just because I want to. I'm tired of spending money for mortgages and interest and taxes and brass pipe and useful gadgets about a house. There isn't a single excuse for fixing those barns. That's why I'm doing it.

* * * * *

TO this superior wisdom the Drifter could only bow in humble gratitude. Here at last was justification, and ample justification, for the poor who go to the movies on the money given them by the charity organization; for the laborer who, earning for the first time in his life eight or ten dollars a day, spends it on phonographs and silk shirts and second-hand Fords. A lifetime of spending money on necessities, the things that make life possible, is too long.

There must be vacations sometime, when money is squandered on the most fanciful of luxuries. In an ideal society it should not be necessary to justify such expenditure. But in this one, where the Drifter's friend lives, all sorts of explanations have to be made to any impertinent fellow who chooses to inquire. Nor will the questioner be interested in the true explanation. He will suspect an ulterior motive. He will insist on smelling a rat, on seeing not an old barn restored for nothing except its owner's pleasure, but a hidden fortune, a projected applejack mill or gymnasium or dance hall. The Drifter, being a person of superior wisdom himself, knew his friend spoke the truth and honored him for it. Most persons who watched the workmen at their task of repairing the barns, not to mention the workmen themselves, thought the man was plumb crazy.

Summer School for Workers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The Barnard Summer School for Women Workers in Industry is facing a serious situation. Now in its fifth year, this school is planning to enrol sixty women this summer from the factories of New York City for a seven weeks' course. Never has the school received so many applications. One hundred women are eager to come. In addition, a group of forty men have become interested and are also applying for admission. Most of these workers applying are unemployed. They are eager to study those subjects which will give them a better understanding of the whole industrial situation. With this unusually large number of applicants the Barnard school is short of funds. Many subscriptions have been cut this year; others have been withdrawn entirely. The committee in charge must decide whether to carry on the school this summer with a small number of students or to close it entirely.

The course at Barnard is similar to that given at Bryn Mawr and at other summer schools for workers. It includes economics, English, and general science, taught in small classes and by a tutoring system. Every student receives a scholarship covering instruction and two meals a day for five days a week. The students live at home in New York City. As an experiment with a type of school adapted to the needs of workers in a large industrial center, this school is unique. We need help in order not to disappoint these unemployed workers who are hoping to attend this summer.

Amend the Naturalization Law

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your recent editorial comment on the Macintosh and Bland decisions of the United States Supreme Court, I notice with regret that you do not emphasize the fact that the Supreme Court construed not a constitutional provision, but a mere Act of Congress. The only provision on the subject in the Constitution is in Article 1, Section 8, and reads: "The Congress shall have power . . . to establish a uniform rule of naturalization." A movement to amend the act, in view of the decisions in the two cases as well as in the Schwimmer case, is therefore clearly indicated and will receive, I have no doubt, your strong editorial support. It seems very necessary, however, that people should realize that Congress has power to act in the premises, so that they may bring pressure to bear upon it to do so.

Richard Doddridge Blackmore

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I am undertaking the collection of material for a biography of Richard Doddridge Blackmore, author of "Lorna Doone," and shall be grateful for information that will contribute to a vital portrayal of the man. I shall be especially glad to hear from those who knew him personally, and to have copies of his letters sent to me at 704 Buckeye Street, Wooster, Ohio.

Two Per Cent Buttons

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your readers have doubtless heard the story of the days of the 1905 revolution in St. Petersburg, when the revolutionists shouted for a constitution and the troops thought that "Constitutza" was the mistress of one of the grand dukes. We have something like that happening out here in Los Angeles just now. Some of our pacifist friends are distributing Einstein's "2 per cent buttons," and people take it for granted that they are agitating for 2 per cent beer!

The Reporter's Art

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Several of us here in Washington wish to thank you for Mr. Hallgren's series of articles on the political and economic situation in Wisconsin, Chicago, Detroit, and South Bend. They remind one that reporting can be an art.

The Man Indoors

By ROBERT P. TRISTRAM COFFIN

The man who seems a large man out-of-doors
May grow small when he is through his chores
And sits inside with women for the night.
Somehow, his hands do not become him right,
His back and thighs, so fine above a furrow,
Move with confidence less fine and thorough.
He sits with shoulders rounded, roughly skinned,
Who lately was essential as the wind
And rude and upright as a seasoned tree.
The cautious grace has left his slackened knee.
Gone is every trace of that caress
His body outdoors made of weariness.
He sits and listens to his wife. His thighs
Are less alive and conscious than his eyes.
His strength is in his way, the thews betray
The man who played Creator in the clay.
He is less entire than the sun,
Now his day and furrowing are done.

O. Henry

The Caliph of Bagdad: Being Arabian Nights Flashes of the Life, Letters, and Work of O. Henry—William Sydney Porter. By Robert H. Davis and Arthur B. Maurice. D. Appleton and Company. $3.50.

THIS fascinating volume belongs to the best of all the many kinds of biography. I suppose it is too late to do anything about the title and the subtitle. If these are good, then Boswell should have called his work "The Great Cham: Being Anecdotes and Reminiscences of the late Dr. Samuel Johnson." For this is a Boswellian biography. The subject—whom the authors knew well—becomes the hero; but he is drawn to the life. The whole story is told. The generous volume is packed full of letters, quotations, reminiscences, anecdotes, all kinds of tales—authenticated and doubtful, legendary and recorded, impossible but never (to borrow a nice distinction used by Professor C. Alphonso Smith in his own "O. Henry Biography" apropos of the O. Henry stories) improbable. Not only does "Bob Davis recall"; dozens of editors, journalists, novelists, playwrights, friends of Bill Porter from all over, from the South and West, from South America and prison days, all contribute their bits. And the authors have leaned heavily, wherever it suited their purpose, on previously published material—notably on Professor Smith's book. The result is a conglomeration of material from which the figure and character of William Sydney Porter emerge, for the first time, plain and in the round. There also emerge, incidentally, many pictures of the American scene during O. Henry's lifetime, especially of the New York of the first decade of this century—its editorial world and Grub Street, its restaurants and saloons, its color and manners.

O. Henry is the man who, in the current phrase of his day, came back. He made his one great mistake—the flight to Honduras on account of a crime of which he was then and is now considered innocent. Had he not fled he would undoubtedly have been acquitted. He returned in time to comfort the last days of his dying wife and to face his trial. Porter's nature was one which shrank from cruelty, viciousness, or unredeemed ugliness. That is why his work never gets down to fundamentals. We knew before how close he came to suicide during his early months in prison; and this not because of his own hardships, for he was well treated from the beginning and held a "soft job." But the torture and cruelty, the disregard for human life and suffering, which he as drug clerk in the prison saw going on all around him seemed more than he could bear. So searing was the prison experience that after he came out he could never reveal his secret to his closest friends—and all of them knew about it from other sources but were afraid to be frank with him. That secret was, as Mr. Davis calls it, his Old Man of the Sea. Al Jennings in his "Through the Shadows with O. Henry" tells how he urged O. Henry to write some scorching stories of prison life, to waken in the minds of the American people the need for prison reform—something that was very close to both of them. But Will Porter could never do it. He couldn't use the experience—except indirectly. I think this softness, this desire to escape from the touch of horror and bitterness, prevented O. Henry from becoming a great writer. Perhaps the prison years were too strong a dose. And yet it was in prison that he found the time and freedom from economic pressure to forge his technique. Some of his good stories were written there.

The biography, like the stories of its hero, belongs to the old New York rather than to the new—to the old sophistication, to the days of saloons and famous bars in famous hotels and restaurants, to the "man's world" of the old night life, to the old Bowery, the old East Side, the old Madison Square. It is romantic. There are humor and tears. And like his stories, O. Henry's latest biography—though outside our fashion—has a unique quality about it—something gallant and large of heart and surprising. Looking back on the immediate past, we often find both truth and fiction very strange.

Make Money and Read Homer

Schliemann: The Story of a Gold-Seeker. By Emil Ludwig. Little, Brown and Company. $3.50.

EMIL LUDWIG is on the defensive. In his preface to "Schliemann," the latest of his biographies, he backs into a corner, crouches slightly, raises a right elbow to guard his jaw, and faces his critics. He protests that he is not an analyst; he does not examine character—he describes it. His voice drops and his right arm falls. He becomes engaging. No, he has not written too many books (there is a suggestion of a smile), nor has he written them too rapidly. He hopes, modestly, that this book, his "Schliemann," will be an example to youth, an inspiration. Perhaps Herr Ludwig has a moral in mind; read the book and see.

It so happens that Heinrich Schliemann is not only an example (example is too mild a word) but something of a caution. What a man! Son of a profligate minister in a little German village, narrow-chested, spectacled, with a meager education that gave him a passion for learning, he ran away from home and stormed the counting houses of Amsterdam. Once definitely settled in a job where he could utilize his remarkable ability as a linguist, nothing could stop him. In so far as his desire for learning went, he was a full-fledged idealist, imaginative, sentimental, fiery, inaccurate, but in handling money he never lost his head or a cent of the profits that he saw mounting in his private ledger. He taught himself Russian and persuaded his employer to send him as an agent to Moscow.

To Moscow he went, and within a short time was chief of his own importing house—banker, jobber, commission merchant, and agent, all in one. He rose at five in the morning, breakfasted at five-thirty, worked in a frenzy all day, studied languages at night, and was virtuously pleased with himself. He married a Russian woman, not for money as one might expect, but because he had a sentimental yearning for domesticity. Once he had captured a home, he had no use for it, nor time to spend with the woman in charge; he was too busy making millions. Even the Crimean War was turned to his advantage. Suddenly, however, things began to go awry. Business was not so good; his marriage was a failure. He promptly shut up shop, pocketed his profits, which were no small sum indeed, and sailed for America. He secured a transatlantic divorce, and then, apparently quite by accident, rediscovered his boyish love for Homer and ancient Greece by gazing at a photograph of a Greek girl. He wrote letters to the girl and soon arrived at her home in Athens with a proposal of marriage. His new wife was the beginning of a new career. Schliemann read his Homer literally; there could be no doubt, Homer was Homer. There was nothing to do but to find Troy. Well, Schliemann applied the same dogmatic talents that had made him a millionaire to the business of archaeology. The dust flew. He not only made possible the discovery of Homeric Troy, but in his haste, his eagerness to see the body of Agamemnon, he uncovered civilizations older than Troy itself. He was a little mad, but no matter, he had outplayed archaeologists at their own game, and even went so far as to name his young son Agamemnon and his little daughter Andromache. He spoke of his first love, now a grandmother in a German village, as Cleopatra. There were no limits to Schliemann's Homeric legend. He lived the Odyssey.

Ludwig handles the story admirably. It is as though Schliemann had lived for the sole purpose of becoming the hero of a Ludwig biography. Whenever Ludwig refers to him as Napoleonic, somehow the adjective seems singularly apt. All that Schliemann, the successful financier and archaeologist, lacked was the dignity of Napoleon's failure. As for the moral contained in this biography, one would say that it pays to be a little bit crazy and to make as much money as possible.

HORACE GREGORY

A Christ Without Strength?

Son of Woman: The Story of D. H. Lawrence. By John Middleton Murry. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $3.50.

MURRY presents Lawrence as a Christ who had not sufficient strength to carry his burden. Lawrence, he says, was endowed with a spiritual sensitivity and power of sympathy which have rarely been equaled in history; unable to endure the sufferings which such a temperament causes, he tried to escape into a condition of subhuman mindlessness. His method of escape was sex: unfortunately his attachment to his mother made him incapable of genuine love; and his lack of virility and his unmanly need for feminine consolation made his sexual experiences one long humiliation. Lawrence tried to justify himself by formulating a doctrine of two infinities, the sensual and the spiritual; his ideal was a balance between the two; but as he was unable to find any method of genuinely reconciling them, this ideal led to a disintegration of his personality. At the end of his life he abandoned all hope of salvation for himself; a harmonized personality and a happy married life became a mere dream possible only to different people in a different world.

Murry gives his own answers to Lawrence's problems—answers which will be unacceptable and probably unintelligible to all but his own disciples. The problems are, however, fairly stated, and the study of Lawrence's psychological experiences is extraordinarily penetrating; Murry analyzes all his more important writings and draws, when necessary, on his own recollections; he was, for a period, Lawrence's closest friend. He proves that Lawrence himself never found a satisfactory answer to his own problems; he lays bare the confusion and inconsistency of his attempted answers, and shows that much of Lawrence's preaching about sex was mere wish-fulfilment dictated by his own lack of virility. This book arouses pity and terror as few works of fiction do—pity for Lawrence's forty-five years of misery, and terror because Lawrence's dilemma is that of civilized man—and if lesser persons are not broken by it, it is through apathy and not because they have discovered any solution.

HENRY BAMFORD PARKES

Individualism at Bay

Social Politics and Modern Democracies. By Charles W. Pipkin. The Macmillan Company. Two volumes. $7.50.

PROFESSOR PIPKIN is the author of a book on "Social Justice" which he has now elaborated into a substantial two-volume work on social and industrial legislation in England and France during the present century. Since the major change in the conceptions of the function of government which marks our own age is that from the emphasis upon "maintaining peace and enforcing contracts" to the recognition of the concern of the state with welfare and the good life, the importance of the field which Professor Pipkin's work covers scarcely requires stress. The education acts, old-age pensions, national health insurances, unemployment insurances—all come under Professor Pipkin's survey, which also includes a sketch of the British labor movement and of French syndicalism. Some kind of guide through the intricacies of this rapidly shifting legislation is quite indispensable, and Professor Pipkin's careful and comprehensive work will supply the need. The only doubt which arises is whether, even in so large an undertaking, he does not range too far afield and thus deprive himself of the opportunity of studying intensively, for example, the implications of the system of regulations issued by the Ministry of Health for the whole conception of administrative government in England. These general considerations are at least as important in shaping future policy as abbreviated descriptions of the acts themselves.

That this voluminous social legislation has involved a change of philosophy concerning the relations of the state and the individual and has required, even if it has not received, the guidance of some kind of philosophy of the good social life is made clear by the extremely interesting contrast between the policy pursued in England and in France. Professor Pipkin has been well advised to choose precisely these two countries. He himself adopts a quotation given by Professor Siegfried: the French "give people leisure so that they may read books but the Anglo-Saxons give them leisure so that they can have an automobile." Again Professor Siegfried writes: "Politically the Anglo-Saxon state is moral rather than intellectual." The "backwardness" of France, from the Anglo-Saxon point of view, in social and hygienic regulations, the "impractical tendencies" of its labor movement are to be accounted for by this demand for the right to be leisured and to discuss rather than for the means to be efficient and organized. It is not, indeed, clear that it is better to read the Autocar than to own an automobile. It is not clear that the leisure of the many is feasible save upon condition that there is restriction upon the liberty of the few, or that an intelligent civilization is rightly intelligent if it does not issue in "moral cooperation" and, for example, reduction of the infant death-rate. Intellect is not enough. Only reason is enough—which is not the same thing.

The issue is, indeed, the profound one whether a polished culture, such as is almost necessarily individualistic, and even egoistic and narcissistic, is to be regarded as the adornment or as the end of civilization. The extent of social legislation in France Professor Pipkin's book records, but the book also makes apparent the profound conservatism of the French spirit, which casts its shadow in the violence of the French revolutionary tendencies. Those who consult these two useful volumes of Professor Pipkin's will discover the extent to which inroads have been made, in two of the most civilized countries of the world, upon the doctrine of "no governmental interference." In considering, however, the differences between these two countries, they will be forced to ask themselves the fundamental question whether material prosperity, with its requirements in cooperation, is the ultimate object of social endeavor, or is the inevitable precondition of popular happiness, or is an obstacle to civilized living so far as its mechanical requirements enchain the individual. GEORGE E. G. CATLIN

As to Mr. Tomlinson—

Out of Soundings. By H. M. Tomlinson. Illustrated by H. Charles Tomlinson. Harper and Brothers. $4.

I HAVE been slow in writing about this book, and I will explain why. Soon after getting the volume—it is a collection of miscellaneous essays—I sat down one evening and, beginning at the front, read several chapters. I was not greatly impressed. The writing was good—Mr. Tomlinson's always is—but the articles did not say much to me. I concluded that they had been bundled together to sell on the reputation of "The Sea and the Jungle" and the more recent success of "All Our Yesterdays." That was all right; in our economic system it was a valid excuse for marketing a book, but not necessarily for reading it. I thought to say that—and not much more—when I got around to saying anything. But there was no hurry about saying anything—or about reading farther in the book either.

A little later several reviews of the volume appeared, filled with what struck me as extravagant—almost fulsome—praise. It seemed probable that the writers were reviewing Mr. Tomlinson's reputation rather than the collection of essays at hand; unconsciously they were imagining in his latest book some of what they had enjoyed in earlier volumes. I thought to say something about that too when I got around to commenting on "Out of Soundings."

Eventually I read more of the essays, switching from the front to near the back and selecting the one entitled, A Footnote to the War Books. It seemed to throw a cool but revealing light on war and post-war psychology. It contained a measure of those fine perceptions, those rare understandings, that come only from a delicately geared, high-tension mind. Reading farther, the same qualities were encountered in the essays entitled Côte d'Or, Exploration, A Lost Wood, and others. It was necessary to revise my first estimate of "Out of Soundings."

Mr. Tomlinson does not put his best apples at the top of the basket. Yet it is not certain that he puts them at the bottom either. What seems to be more true is that you have to eat slowly and taste carefully in order to get the flavor of the fruit. Or putting it another way, he is a nourishing rather than a stimulating writer; he offers food, not cocktails. You most not expect too immediate an effect, and must meet him halfway with an adequate digestion.

The best writing is not what we call "timely"; it is timeless. Robert Louis Stevenson tells a fable of a monk who sat down in a wood one day to listen for a moment to the song of a nightingale. When the monk returned to the monastery he found it falling into decay and his brothers all old men. The peculiar virtue of Mr. Tomlinson's mind is that it is not too much immersed in its era. He does not assume that what is new is better, merely because of its newness, than what is old. He looks past the gadgets of the twentieth century to contemplate enduring beauty and permanent value. Honesty and restraint are two of the characteristics of his writing. His honesty does not restrict itself to saying what he believes and not saying what he doubts. It is an honesty which tests everything scrupulously. It is that precious quality which the French describe as a sense of measure. Perhaps, after that, it is not necessary to add anything about restraint. It is an inevitable consequence, or part, of that kind of honesty.

I still think that some of the critics of "Out of Soundings" are extravagant. They have written as Mr. Tomlinson himself would not write were he able to review impersonally his own volume. They have sinned against his own canons of honesty and restraint. It looks as if some admirers were trying to do for Mr. Tomlinson what ill-advised enthusiasts of Joseph Conrad did for him some years before his death—raise him too high. While it raged, the Conrad worship did serious harm to other writers ambitious to portray the sea. Probably no writer ever should attempt to imitate another, but imitation of Conrad was a little more devastating than that of almost anybody else. Conrad penned some pages of masterly and limpid imagery, but he wrote also some painfully murky ones, and the advice to other writers on the sea to duplicate his "mystery," to reproduce his "spell," released a fog of adjectives amid which it was hard to distinguish a patch of blue water. In recent years Conrad has been lowered considerably and Herman Melville raised in his stead. Ten years hence Melville will be laid by the heels to make room for—quien sabe?

But I am wandering. From reviewing Mr. Tomlinson I straggled off to review his reviewers and then to review Messrs. Conrad, Melville, and Quien Sabe. Let me merely suggest in closing that whatever else be said of Mr. Tomlinson, he is too able a writer to need a claque and too live a one to welcome a monument. ARTHUR WARNER

A Revolution in Vienna

Pilgrims of '48. One Man's Part in the Austrian Revolution of 1848 and a Family Migration to America. By Josephine Goldmark. Yale University Press. $4.

THE first half of this book comprises a sketch, well written and exceptionally informative, of the revolutionary movement in Austria, and particularly in Vienna, in 1848-50, the description of the political, social, and cultural life of the old Austria being skilfully mingled with an account of the agitation which attempted, first by political means and then by violence, to secure constitutional government and political and intellectual liberty. Joseph Goldmark, the author's father, a young doctor and chemist just out of the university, was a prominent revolutionary leader, and the story of his life forms the core of the historical narrative. Indicted for high treason and complicity in the brutal murder of Latour, the aged Minister of War, whom he had in fact risked his life to protect, Goldmark escaped from Austria and made his way to America, whither the Wehle family of Prague, into which he later married, had preceded him.

The second half of the book recounts the experiences of this family, and incidentally of other political exiles, and of Goldmark himself, the former mainly in what is now the Central West and the latter in New York. Goldmark began medical practice in New York, but shortly turned his attention to the manufacture of percussion caps and cartridges, the fruit of chemical researches which had attracted notice in Vienna, and it was from his factories that the federal government obtained most of its supplies of those articles during the Civil War. Following the promulgation by the Emperor Francis Joseph, in 1867, of a general amnesty for political offenses, Goldmark went back to Vienna and obtained an annulment of his conviction, returning shortly to America, where he died in 1880. One of his daughters married Louis D. Brandeis, now Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court. Miss Goldmark has not only produced a charming volume of history, biography, and reminiscence, but has also in so doing pointed to a field that might well be further explored.

The Chronic Criminal Law

Criminal Justice in America. By Roscoe Pound. Henry Holt and Company. $2.

Our Criminal Courts. By Raymond Moley. Minton, Balch and Company. $3.50.

THE chronic maladministration of the criminal law in our country is the subject of both of these books. It would be pleasant to report to the American citizen weary of crime waves and racketeering that Dean Pound and Professor Moley, who are both eminent authorities—indeed, the former is a member of the Wickersham Commission and warns his readers against regarding his remarks as other than obiter dicta—are in essential agreement in their perspectives and have programs to offer capable of reasonably immediate realization. But one cannot read them together without being struck not only by their frequent variance in conclusions but by their radically different methods of approach. Without either explicitly referring to the other, they seem to be almost carrying on a debate. Although both profess a skeptical and tentative point of view, it is only Professor Moley who adheres closely to it. Dean Pound presumably regards the criminal law as chaotic, but being a person of a rationalizing turn of mind, he finds in it the development of a sort of harmonious chaos.

The essential core of Dean Pound's analysis of the breakdown of the criminal law is that it is anachronistic. Its machinery, inherited from English legal institutions of the eighteenth century, was adapted to the conditions of an agricultural pioneer America in which crime was occasional and sporadic and in which religious and social controls remained unchallenged, but the machinery is no longer capable of coping with the demands of a twentieth-century industrialized and urbanized America, in which crime is increasingly professional and organized and in which the whole cultural complex is in dissolution. On the other hand, the adjustment of the criminal law to the new age involves certain fateful difficulties. There are certain inherent obstacles in the administration of justice according to law. Dean Pound speaks of the "antinomy of criminal justice." To be efficient the criminal law would have to override safeguards of individual freedom, but it dare not do so because of our democratic institutions. The criminal law is almost predestined not to work because of the evil influence of politics in a democracy. We have "too many laws," yet because of the complex character of our society and the extent of modern administration we cannot do without them. And so on through a series of dilemmas. The only hope for the future lies in discarding the old punitive system of criminal law for a system of a preventive criminal justice.

No doubt there is a good deal in Dean Pound's main argument that is very suggestive, but its application to specific problems of the criminal law begins to show inherent weaknesses and contradictions. If the criminal law is only one of the factors of control in the cultural complex, if the criminal law can accomplish only so much, it seems unprofitable to concentrate for the most part, as Dean Pound does, upon a sociological examination of the legal rules of criminal justice to discover the differences of conditions which have impaired their usefulness. To take but one example, the effect of the local territorial basis of criminal prosecution—if it is so much easier for a criminal to get away now by crossing county and State boundaries because of enhanced means of communication, it must have been no less easy in the eighteenth century because of the fact that a criminal had to go only a small distance to escape. On the other hand, Dean Pound's evaluation of many particular factors in the cultural complex must remain debatable—for instance, the effect of the decay of religious influences. In short, if the criminal law suffers from certain inevitable antinomies, they were as operative in the eighteenth as in the twentieth century. The necessary implication of Dean Pound's argument is that the criminal law worked far better then than now. But has the criminal law ever worked? The very fact that it has been called into operation is an evidence of social strain. So far as social factors are concerned, the conditions of twentieth-century industrialism and urbanization prevail not only in America but in other countries, which however do not suffer from so great a collapse of criminal prosecution. Indeed, England, the very country from which we have inherited our legal machinery, has now a comparatively good record. The search for variables is one of the most important tasks which a sociological jurisprudence such as that represented by Dean Pound can perform, but the inevitable result of the search has become a tendency to overlook the constants of human nature and the more fundamental social institutions.

Professor Moley's "Our Criminal Courts" is in a sense a continuation and completion of his earlier "Politics and Criminal Prosecution." In the latter he showed the effects of American politics upon criminal prosecution, particularly in connection with the extraordinary accession of virtually dictatorial powers to American prosecuting attorneys as a result of their discretion in accepting pleas—a fact that would indicate that American criminal law has perhaps "adjusted" itself somewhat, although through a rather questionable administrative process. The realism of this analysis of the preliminary stage of criminal prosecution is maintained in the present work in the examination of the problems of the subsequent stages of trial and punishment. The petit jury is now shown to have been undermined no less than the grand jury, and some evidence is given to show that this is true in the rural counties as well as the urban centers. But as a result of the preliminary examination in magistrates' courts, the ordinary trial courts are given an opportunity to function in fewer and fewer cases; thus the "machinery" of criminal prosecution, whether of the model of the eighteenth or twentieth century, is called into action very infrequently. Professor Moley's skepticism is with a few strange exceptions particularly marked in dealing with the standard panaceas for reform of the criminal law—from changing procedure through crime commissions to non-partisan judicial nominations by bar associations. How far this skepticism goes can be judged from such observations as these: "There is no 'criminal law,' there are criminal laws." "The inappropriateness to the conditions of the times is no new condition." "It is hardly sound to assert as some of the 'socially minded' persist in doing, that 'a criminal law based upon vengeance' must yield to a criminal law based on something or other else. 'It' is based upon little that has not changed since 'it' was formulated. It cannot be adjusted to a 'new' conception because apparently a 'new' conception has not yet formulated itself." Such sense has not been spoken since Mr. Tutt, the celebrated creation of Arthur Train, discoursed on the criminal law. Thus Professor Moley sets no great present store by the "preventive" criminal justice of the future of which Dean Pound rather vaguely but hopefully talks. Presumably it means an administration by scientific criminologists of the indeterminate sentence, probation, and parole; but Professor Moley, in common with most thoughtful students, shows himself not too optimistic about the immediate possibilities of these devices, in view of the fact that, apart from other present limitations as criminological techniques, their administration is left largely to political hacks. In any event, to apply even a preventive justice we must first be able to convict criminals.

Neither Professor Moley nor Dean Pound indulges in any propaganda for a program of radical political reform as a condition precedent to remedying the criminal law, but they might well have done so. The social amelioration of the state may be achieved to a large extent long before it is made either almost perfect or communistic. It is the tendency now to underestimate the value and importance of political institutions, but they constitute the fundamental technique of human relations, of which the criminal law is only a part. It is only the small chance of accomplishing at present a really radical alteration of the American political system that makes the situation so discouraging. Apparently at present neither God nor Mr. Tutt can help us. William Seagle

Books in Brief

A Shakespeare Bibliography. By Walter Ebisch and Levin L. Schücking. Oxford University Press. $7.50.

A selective bibliography of books and articles about Shakespeare was badly needed, particularly one which took account of the scholarship of the past twenty years. The present compilers, confining themselves within 300 pages, have performed their task with an excellent economy. Their classification of the material is interesting and useful, and their comments, when comment is made, are expert. Much is missing here, of course; but there is scarcely one significant omission.

Mencken and Shaw. By Benjamin De Casseres. Silas Newton. $2.50.

By way of subtitle Mr. De Casseres calls his book "The Anatomy of America's Voltaire and England's Other John Bull." That last italicized word and remarks like "there are so many Lucifers, Menckens, and De Cassereses that give Abra a pain in the cadabra," are examples of the depths to which this collection of unrelated notes sinks. Occasionally one of them hits the mark for a bull's eye. The extraordinary verbal fireworks, when good, are very good. But the duds are things to look out for.

The History of the Mayas: From the Earliest Times to the Present Day. By Thomas Gann and Eric Thompson. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

The title of this book is too ambitious for its contents. The history before the Spanish conquest is limited almost entirely to statements of the founding dates of the known Mayan cities; the history after the conquest is a routine anthropological description of the Mayan communities. The authors provide neither conclusive generalization nor interesting detail. Its literary lacks make the book unattractive for general reading, but its accuracy makes it useful as a reference book for the student of Mayan civilization.

PRESIDENT HOOVER took a vigorous and determined stand in the first speech of his "swing around the circle" against any and all who would have him deviate in slightest degree from his stubborn opposition to unemployment insurance, any form of dole, and any other changes in the social order. He is for the "American system," come what may. It has carried us farther "than any other nation in all history." His retort to the demand for a ten-year plan, which he terms "an infection from the slogan of the Five-Year Plan through which Russia is struggling to redeem herself," is a twenty-year plan to "take care of a 20,000,000 increase in population." The rest is rhetoric:

> We plan to build for them 4,000,000 new and better homes, thousands of new and still more beautiful city buildings, thousands of factories; to increase the capacity of our railways; to add thousands of miles of highways and waterways; to instal 25,000,000 electrical horse-power; to grow 20 per cent more farm products. We plan to provide new parks, schools, colleges, and churches for this 20,000,000 people. We plan more leisure for men and women and better opportunities for its enjoyment.

We are glad to commend this attitude of Mr. Hoover. It joins the issue with a clearness we rarely get from him. Everybody now knows where he stands today and where he will stand a year hence in the Presidential campaign. He is for the old order and old methods—more and better and bigger things of the same kind.

WHO IS KNOCKING the tariff now? Why, no less a person than Andrew Mellon himself. His Aluminum Company of America, which has as near a monopoly, we fancy, as any company in the country, has just decided that it will be one of the six hundred American companies that have established branches in Canada in order to avoid the consequences of the Canadian tariff law. It is the eighty-seventh company which has made this move since the Hawley-Smoot law went into effect last year. What does this signify? In the first place, it means that a considerable part of the production of the Aluminum Company is transferred to foreign soil where foreign laborers are employed instead of the work being done by American laborers on American soil. Next, if a tariff is such a wonderful thing, Mr. Mellon ought not to resent the Canadian tariff, but should be perfectly content to have it prohibit his goods from entering the dominion. That is what he does in the United States to foreign producers, and he ought to be willing to take his medicine himself when it comes to Canada. Not for your life! We don't know anybody who equals the protectionist for squealing and squawking when he gets a dose of his own medicine—it is just too wicked for other people to exclude American goods simply because we exclude theirs. Finally, while Mr. Ford and Mr. Mellon and other great capitalists can afford to move abroad and build branch factories inside of other people's tariff walls, the small American manufacturer, like the American workingman, has to stay at home. There he pays the price for our protection policy in a sluggish home market, a steadily restricted foreign-export field, and increased prices on about everything he buys.

OF ALL UNBELIEVABLE THINGS the surrender of the Civic Federation to the wicked Soviets seems to us the most incredible. Here is the federation, under the leadership of that notably progressive and liberal-minded leader of the American Federation of Labor, Matthew Woll, actually calling a national industrial conference to work out a ten years' plan for the United States as absolutely necessary to "establish balance between production, distribution, and consumption" and to end "the chaos and misapplication of energy" in American life. All of this is for "the creation of a democratic industrial structure comparable to our democratic political structure." Now we ask our readers if that is not exactly what The Nation, the New Republic, the New Freeman, the League for Industrial Democracy, the Socialists, and many other wicked and subversive organizations, which the Civic Federation has denounced all these many years, have been advocating in season and out. But, as we have indicated, we cannot claim all the credit. The Civic Federation has capitulated to the Russian Five-Year Plan. If the Bolsheviki had not coined that name and carried on that plan, the Civic Federation would never have decided to combat bolshevism with a five-day work week of six hours a day or have urged a ten-year plan to show the superiority of the capitalist system to all others. Of course Mr. Woll is careful to say that the Russian Five-

Year Plan is "proving a hopeless failure." Really? Well then, why the necessity for this sudden move for a ten-year American plan to offset the lure of Soviet achievement?

THE SOVIET GOVERNMENT, it appears, is a government according to the courts of the United States even though to the State Department it is non-existent. Three years ago the Chase National Bank and the Equitable Trust Company received two shipments of gold from German banking agents of the Soviet Government. The Bank of France claimed that this gold belonged to it, alleging that the bars had been seized by the Soviet Government in 1917 from the Russian Imperial Bank, in which they were stored. It therefore brought suit against the New York banks, which shortly afterwards returned the gold to the senders, as related in The Nation of March 28, 1928. In handing down his decision, Federal Judge Caffey says: "I cannot escape the conclusion that although there has been no recognition by the State Department of this country of what has been called the Soviet regime either as a de jure or a de facto government, that regime is a government." Holding that the Soviet Government is a sovereign, Judge Caffey therefore declares the present case to be one for diplomacy, inasmuch as a sovereign state is exempt from suit by outsiders, and the American banks were acting as agents for the Russian Government. We are interested to note this legal confirmation of the judgment expressed by The Nation on this case in its issue of April 25, 1928. Judge Caffey's decision adds another interesting and amusing element to the legal confusion occasioned by our non-recognition of Russia.

HUNGER AND TRAGEDY continue to stalk over the hills of the Ohio, Kentucky, West Virginia, and Pennsylvania mining country. In Kentucky they have led to the arrest of nearly one hundred men—miners, union officials, and sympathizers—who today are held in the jail at Harlan, where they are awaiting trial for attempting to defend themselves and their families against an unwarranted attack by company police and State militiamen. Eighteen of these men, accused of murder, face the death penalty; the remainder may be sentenced to long prison terms on charges of conspiracy and criminal syndicalism. As a result of the mine strike there had been trouble at Evarts, a small town near by. The disorders ran along until at last they culminated in a battle between the miners and a handful of company guards. Three men were killed. The militia was called in; the miners and those who upheld their cause, including the chief of police of Evarts, were put under arrest. Although union leaders and others interested in the case have demanded information as to the arrests and have called for immediate trials, no one knows just how many men are in jail, and the officials refuse to say when and under what circumstances the men will be brought to trial. All that has so far been definitely learned is that the murder indictments rest upon the testimony of one man, a guard employed by the local mining company. Meanwhile other miners are being arrested by twos and threes in this district while a few days ago the Reverend Frank Martin, pastor of a Baptist church near Harlan, was lodged in the same jail on a charge of criminal syndicalism for having delivered a speech from the steps of Harlan courthouse telling of starvation and misery among the coal workers.

MEANTIME THE OPEN WARFARE between miners and police is spreading elsewhere. Dozens of men and women on both sides have been wounded, scores have been gassed, hundreds have fallen under policemen's clubs. In St. Clairsville, Ohio, an army of special deputy sheriffs, armed with machine-guns and tear-gas bombs, has been called out to guard mine property. In western Pennsylvania a union leader has warned the owners that trouble is impending and that the strikers are armed. In the same section State troopers have clubbed hundreds of marching miners, some of them into insensibility. Harry Kirk, a farmer living near Canonsburg, Pennsylvania, said that he saw "about two hundred men, women, and children running up over a hill with a couple of State policemen on horses behind them. When a State policeman caught up with one of the people he hit him over the head with a club, leaving a trail of people lying on the ground." Near the Mellon-owned Westland mine in Pennsylvania the police opened fire on a column of miners when their gas bombs and clubs failed to halt the marchers. In Kentucky a murder of a pit worker has resulted in the arrest of fourteen other miners, but the killer, who is known, was allowed to go free. In Illinois the miners have planned a "hunger march" to the State capital. Some 20,000 workers have left the pits, demanding higher wages, enforcement of the eight-hour day, and recognition of their unions. An appeal for mediation has been sent to President Hoover, but he has so far done nothing except refer the appeal to the Department of Labor for "consideration and report." The situation is grave at many points.

NOW THAT COLONEL HOUSE has come back into politics and intends to do what he can to get Governor Roosevelt into the Presidency, the movement of political traffic to the Colonel's summer residence in Massachusetts promises to reach considerable proportions. Governor Roosevelt himself has already been over for a luncheon, and other Democrats, we may be sure, will not be long in following. Manchester-by-the-Sea will now rival Mr. Hoover's week-end capital at Rapidan and the Pullman car that takes him on his Western trip as a center of political interest, and, with only the difference that Mr. Hoover wants to stay in the White House and Governor Roosevelt hopes to make him vacate it, substantially the same questions of ways and means, primaries, conventions, platforms, nominations, and running mates will be talked over at either place. On the whole, we are inclined to rate Colonel House a good deal higher than Senator Fess when it comes to advice. The Colonel is a quiet person much averse to ballyhoo, but he knows how to bore from within and keep the politicians guessing, he can make a little oil go farther and work better than any other of our political machinists, he got a lot of valuable experience in putting over Woodrow Wilson, and he is not a bit averse to fooling trusting people, as his memoirs show.

"HAWKS IN ROME HOP to Get His Hair Cut." Thus the casual news from our speediest flyer. He told those who greeted him when he dropped down on the landing field at the Littorio Airport in Rome, after a four hours' flight from Paris, that he preferred Italian barbers to German. "The last time I had my hair cut," he declared, "was in Berlin, where the barber clipped the top of my head so that I had to let my hair grow for a month." Here we have a glimpse of the real future before us. Soon we shall read in the society news of all the dailies items like these: "Mrs. John Van Astorbilt with a party of eleven yesterday flew to Peking for a week-end visit to be rounded out by a bird's-nest supper on the Chinese Wall by moonlight." Or we shall hear that our best-known Fifth Avenue matron delighted her European friends the other day by breakfasting in London, having luncheon in Paris, tea in Rome, and spending the night in Tripoli. Or that Otto H. Kahn flew to London yesterday to buy some collars from his favorite haberdasher. Soon it will be as commonplace to run over to New York for luncheon from Chicago as it is now to drive to a nearby golf club. How easily explored and how little the world will be when one flies out to San Francisco and back for a set of tennis!

THE CASE of Professor Herbert A. Miller at Ohio State University, which was discussed by Norman Thomas in our issue of June 17, has stirred up a most encouraging body of protest in the academic world. In addition to two vigorous memorials signed by no less than 153 professors and instructors at Ohio State itself, the trustees have now received, according to latest advices, protests from faculty groups in eight other important universities and colleges. Harvard, Yale, Columbia, New York University, Pittsburgh, Oberlin, Western Reserve, and Wisconsin have all contributed to the swelling body of indignant remonstrance from members of the academic community who are thoroughly awake to the importance of the question at issue. The American Association of University Professors, that watch-dog of academic freedom in the United States, has already instituted an investigation of the whole affair. The clergymen of Columbus, the Ohio Sociological Society, the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and many newspapers both inside and outside Ohio have added their protest to that of the university men. As long as trustees continue legally to be the governing body of the American university and students continue to be as docile as in the past, so long must the guaranty of freedom of opinion and liberty of speech be in an alert and militant state of mind in the faculties themselves and in the public supporting them. From this point of view, the Ohio State incident is one of the most encouraging happenings of recent years.

IN AMERICA the higher learning is climbing ever upward, toward a loftier idealism, and perhaps also toward a higher culture. There have been many examples of this in recent years, but the latest and most touching has just come to us from the College of Puget Sound in the State of Washington. This institution of higher education a week or two ago awarded the degree of master of arts to Maurice Owens and Augustus C. Voelker. Mr. Owens was accorded the distinction on the basis of his thesis entitled "An Experimental Study of Free Throwing in Basketball," while Mr. Voelker was honored for a paper in which he discussed the "Vocational and Avocational Values of the Merit Badge System in Scouting." These are, indeed, important contributions to the higher learning, and they show once more with what circumspect care some colleges are making America safe for culture.

FRANKLIN HENRY GIDDINGS, who died on June 11, was a distinguished member of that group of great scholars and teachers who over a period of fifty years have made the School of Political Science of Columbia University one of the world's leading centers of social study. After six years of experience in journalism and a period of teaching at Bryn Mawr College he was called in 1894 to join the group of young scholars whom Professor John W. Burgess had gathered around him at Columbia, and the history of the remainder of his life is closely identified with that of the School of Political Science. One of the earlier workers in the even yet ill-defined field of sociology, he made a profound impression on his coworkers in the social sciences by his gift of brilliant generalization, and his striking phrase "the consciousness of kind" has become coin of the sociological realm. The broad sweep of his thought, the clarity of his exposition, the sturdy independence of his judgments, the pungency of his speech and the unfailing warmth of his human sympathies all combined to attract to his classroom successive generations of devoted students, who found in his celebrated Friday afternoon lecture-discussions a new intellectual experience of the highest order. Another of America's great teachers has gone.

WE HOPE that none of our readers in New York will fail to see "Precedent," the stirring play which deals with the Tom Mooney case. Frankly a propaganda piece, it is so remarkably done as to stir all who come to see it. Yet never is it anything else than a quiet portrayal of what actually happened as recorded by the documents of this case. It could easily have been spoiled by even a single bit of exaggeration, but it is impossible to see how it could in fact have been made more telling. For its effectiveness the remarkable acting of the entire cast also deserves great credit. Meanwhile Tom Mooney, the victim of incredible injustice, languishes in jail in need of funds to carry on his fight for freedom, but he is buoyed up by the hope that the new Governor of California may yet grant him a new hearing.

TO ARTURO TOSCANINI goes our deepest sympathy. A great artist, as such superior to all nationalistic considerations, he was viciously assaulted at Bologna because he would not desecrate his concert by playing the Fascist hymn at the opening. He had twice notified the Mayor of Bologna of his refusal to do so, but a mob of thirty or forty men met him at the stage door and beat him until blood flowed from his mouth. No one was arrested and, of course, there was no apology from the Mayor, or expression of regret from the Mussolini Government itself. Now he is in Switzerland, en route to Bayreuth to conduct for part of the season there, with his spirit undaunted, as witness these words:

> We must have truth and freedom of speech at any price, even if the price be death. I have said to our Fascisti time and again: "You can kill me if you wish, but as long as I am living I shall say what I think."

There speaks the true patriot, a brave and honest man. We sincerely hope that he will now consider becoming an American citizen—not, however, without realizing that if we get into another war he will be compelled by American mobs to abandon his concerts or to preface them with a wretched piece of music known as the "Star Spangled Banner."

Washington Moves at Last

THE world does move—and also the Hoover Government. In all the aftermath of the Chequers conference nothing is more striking than the confirmation of the news that Secretary Stimson is really going over to see for himself how matters are in Europe, and the statement given to the press by the Undersecretary of State, William R. Castle, Jr., in Washington on June 13. His statement was to the effect that while the position of the United States Government as to debts owed to it by European countries was clearly established, "obviously, in case of any serious crisis, the government would have to consider whether a temporary change in its policy was necessary." Naturally, this announcement that the Hoover Administration would not be adamant in the face of a German collapse cheered Berlin not a little at a moment when it needed cheering. For the reaction of some of the New York bankers to the Chequers conference had led to their calling their German loans, with the result that German bonds declined all along the line—the 6½'s to 63—and the German mark sank lower than at any time since May, 1929, doubtless partly because the Reichsbank lost $250,000,000 of its gold reserve during the first two weeks in June.

If we were to judge by comments of press and statesmen upon the Chequers conference, we should be inclined to write it down as a considerable failure. Particularly disappointing was Mr. MacDonald's declaration that if a conference for the revision of the Young Plan were to be called, the British Government would not now take part in it. That in itself seemed to seal the fate of Germany; or rather it seemed to leave to Berlin no alternative but to denounce the whole Young Plan and face the consequences, whatever they might be. At best Mr. MacDonald's remarks were a tactlessness only to be explained as having been compelled by the necessity of calming and reassuring the French. But fortunately, in France itself the reactions to the Chequers conference have been more friendly and wiser than had seemed possible. Briand, on June 8, informed the chamber that Germany's economic condition is, "to say the least, sad," but added, after pointing out that "the Young Plan has been recently applied," that "there can be no question of revising it since it has a definite character. It contains within itself possibilities for Germany. She will use them, perhaps. It is to her interest to do so"—a direct invitation to Dr. Brüning to apply for the postponement which the plan provides. If his statement appears also to close the door to a complete revision, on the other hand its language is so pacific that it cannot profoundly have disturbed Berlin.

More than that, Briand declared once more that the future of France and Germany lies in the cooperation of both peoples. It would certainly not be, he pointed out, to France's advantage to have the present government overthrown by the Nationalists. His ringing declaration that he would consider it in the interest of his country to continue a policy of peace with Germany and the other countries of Europe was upheld by the Chamber of Deputies by a vote of 314 to 252. Thereupon, on June 14, he went to Gourdon, France, to defend his peace policy there and to ask the sincere support of the people of France, using these words:

> It has been said of old that if you want peace prepare for war. That was the motto of the past, and what has the past given us? Search into history, turn back as far as you please, what has preparation for war given humanity but dreadful stains of blood? I tell you that if we are to avoid war we must prepare for peace. We must organize it, we must constantly think and plan for it.

It was a vast crowd which heard him speak these solemn and gravely needed truths—some 20,000 people. There was not a dissenting note; on the contrary he received a tremendous ovation.

Meanwhile, however, the condition of Germany becomes steadily worse, and one must look forward with apprehension to the next six weeks. President von Hindenburg's support of Dr. Brüning's position that the Reichstag shall not be called into session reinforces the Chancellor well, but the unrest grows, the rioting continues, and the denunciation of Brüning as the Hunger Chancellor is unceasing. No one can guess how long the Chancellor will be able to maintain himself, and there are many well-informed to say that there is nothing left for him but to denounce the whole Young Plan as the sole means of saving himself, and then to invite the Allies to do their worst. It is this repudiation that the Hitlerites are steadily promising Germany. One of their leaders, Hermann Göring, an intimate of Hitler, has again publicly declared that if their party comes to power it will repudiate all of Germany's foreign debts. He serves warning that the National Socialists "will not keep the promises made by those in power today." To the rest of the world he says: "Lend money as much as you like, but we shall not repay one cent. Our creditors would do well to consider who will rule Germany next year—Brüning or we."

Under these circumstances the Hoover Administration is heartily to be commended for changing its attitude of indifference and letting the world know that it will stand by if the emergency which is to be feared should arrive. In this connection we would call attention to the remarkable address made by Alanson B. Houghton, our former Ambassador to Germany and Great Britain. Speaking at the Carnegie Institute of Technology, Mr. Houghton said:

> Germany, I am inclined to believe, has been pushed about as far as she can go. That this is partly her own fault I have no doubt whatever. That, however, does not affect the net result. . . . If Germany no longer possesses in herself the power to carry on indefinitely, if the reparations payments are slowly but surely draining her dry, then either she must be left to go under when finally exhausted or she must be given the necessary assistance.

The breakdown of Germany, he said, might postpone a recovery of the rest of Europe and the United States for a generation. Then he stressed the fact that "relief must be afforded by all the nations concerned, not by America alone. We should be prepared, it seems to me, if the other nations are ready, to make our contribution." With this position every intelligent interpreter of the situation must agree.

We Need Russia

GIVEN free play, the economic forces now at work in both Russia and the United States will in all likelihood bring these two countries closer together. Diverted or handicapped by a hostile public opinion—the goal of men like Ralph Easley, Secretary of Labor Doak, Matthew Woll, and Hamilton Fish, of organizations like the National Civic Federation, and of newspapers like the New York Evening Post—the same economic forces will without doubt widen the present cleavage between Russia and America. By constantly arousing American public sentiment with their hysterical speeches, sensational statements, and scare headlines, these men and organizations are building up hatred and bitterness, creating anti-Russian feeling of a most dangerous kind. That way lies neither political nor economic peace. In such an inflamed atmosphere one could not look for reasonable understanding between the countries; one could only hope that no small accident or incident would turn this hatred of Russia into an open demand for war. Unfortunately, it appears almost certain that the propaganda drive of the Russophobes, instead of decreasing, will increase in scope and intensity as Russia's economic strength becomes more apparent and our own system continues to lumber along from mistake to mistake.

We do not question the sincerity of these persons who are forever agitating against the Soviet Union. They unquestionably feel that Moscow presents a real threat to our institutions and our much-vaunted individualism, and there can be little doubt that many of them have felt the pressure of Russian commercial and industrial competition. But we cannot agree that Moscow will at any time in the foreseeable future upset our institutions, though it is probable that if communism succeeds, its influence may in the course of years serve to modify them. Nor can we agree that the erection of an economic cordon sanitaire about the Soviet Union will either convert Russia to capitalism or solve the problem involved in Russia's trade relations with America and the rest of the world.

In point of fact, we need Russia exactly as Russia needs us. Even by the most careful planning and with the most generous of outside help, the Soviet Union cannot hope to complete its industrialization program for many years to come. Able and dependable economists who have studied the problem put the number of these years at no less than twenty-five, though most of them agree that perhaps it will take a period longer than fifty years to put Russian industry on a plane nearly equal to our own. During this period the Russians will need to import goods of many kinds, but particularly agricultural and heavy industrial machinery; they will have to import capital in various other forms, much as we imported capital from Europe in the century and a half of our own industrial development. Russia will also need financial aid in the shape of credit, and credit can only be sent to it in the form of goods or services. Where is Moscow to buy these goods? It will want to buy some, if not a large proportion, of them in the United States, but we must be ready to offer it moderately reasonable terms lest we lose its trade to Europe. Russia has already shown a marked preference for American products. We have created an industrial machine that Russia wishes to copy, and we have developed agricultural machinery for use over a terrain very similar to that of the grain-growing areas of the Soviet Union. Hence we possess the technical knowledge and the experience necessary for the production of the kind of machinery which the Russians consider peculiarly suited to their needs, while this knowledge and experience are largely lacking among European manufacturers.

Nevertheless, Russia has in recent months unmistakably revealed that she prefers to deal with Europe when she is denied fair treatment at our hands. Were this policy to be continued over a period of years, we should stand to lose not only our fair share of the growing Russian trade, but also a large part of our present trade with Western Europe, for if these European countries are to sell to Russia they must buy from Russia in increasing measure. In 1929 we sold goods worth $2,300,000,000 to Europe, which was almost half of our total exports. We have now to choose between the blind philosophy of the Easleys and the Wolls, which is having the effect of driving this lucrative trade toward Russia, and a more reasonable and intelligent attitude, which would in large part conserve this trade and at the same time open the expanding Russian market to us.

Pay or Plunder?

RECENT discussion of the Bethlehem Steel Company's bonus system has drawn renewed attention to the extraordinary overpayment of some American business men and the strange fiduciary relations that too often exist between business executives and their stockholders. We have already indicated our lack of keen sympathy with the Bethlehem stockholders who know so little of the business they supposedly own as to be wholly ignorant of a bonus arrangement described in detail in the annual report of their corporation for 1916, formally ratified by them in 1917, and further regulated by means of a by-law they adopted a year later. Further, we have condemned the egregious notion that million-dollar bonuses are necessary to get the best work out of executives. Yet the whole matter deserves further notice.

Bethlehem bonus payments have been made under a system devised and operated by the genial Charles M. Schwab, who said to his stockholders at their recent annual meeting: "I had the feeling that the damn company belonged to me, you know, and I went ahead and did the best I could." Doing the best he could, Mr. Schwab so arranged things that during the years since 1911 nearly $37,000,000 has gone in bonuses to a handful of Bethlehem officers (not including Mr. Schwab himself), President Eugene G. Grace, "the ablest steel man in America," averaging $814,993 a year over the past thirteen years. While about twenty executives up to 1928 were receiving about $31,000,000 (half a dozen of them getting the bulk of it), common stockholders received a total of about $44,000,000 in dividends. From 1925 to 1928, though there were earnings of nearly $44,000,000 after payment of preferred dividends, it all went back into the business, and the common stockholders got no dividends; but the executives salted away hard-earned bonuses amounting to $6,800,000. Since 1928 the common stockholders have received $36,600,000 in dividends, against bonuses of $5,400,000. As Mr. Schwab blandly explains, "There is, of course, no relation between compensation to executives and the payment of dividends. The payment of dividends is within the control of the Board of Directors, not of the executive officers." If in the judgment of the directors, he goes on, it seems wise not to pay dividends but to reinvest the earnings, the amount so reinvested enhances the intrinsic value of the stock. This, even Mr. Schwab's critics must admit, is good common sense and ordinary business practice. Certainly Bethlehem's dividend record since 1928 gives common stockholders small cause for complaint.

Common stockholders, however, are an unreasonable tribe, and the common Bethlehemites, forgetting how much Mr. Grace and his associated bonus-getters had done for them back in the good old pre-Hoover days, and never bothering to look up the records of their company, ungratefully charged the great-hearted Mr. Schwab with keeping the bonus matter secret from them. Yet worse, they got the Vice-Chancellor of the New Jersey Court of Chancery to agree with them, declaring that "the administration of the bonus system has been sedulously suppressed from the stockholders, the result only coming to their notice recently." Of course under ordinary conditions the stockholder, once he has put in his money, limits his activity to banking his dividend checks, if there be any, and lets George do it in running the business. Most of us, perhaps, would have missed a matter of $37,000,000 earlier, but not Bethlehem stockholders. When it did come to their attention, however, one of them declared cantankerously: "It is wrong in principle, it is outrageous in practice it is contrary to justice to take this money out of these stockholders and put it into the laps of a few men." But as Mr. Schwab has so neatly indicated, the stockholders never got the money—so how could it have been taken away from them? We weep for these much-misunderstood executives and their benevolent chairman.

But what about the soundness of Mr. Schwab's scheme of huge bonuses as "incentives" to big executives? Bethlehem stockholders object because they think that the executives are getting some of theirs. We object because we think the whole theory of the scheme disgusting. Mr. Schwab maintains that Mr. Grace and his associates "earn" their bonuses. Very likely. But does Mr. Grace feel complimented at the assumption that he will not do his best unless appeal is thus made to his cupidity? What normal men want, in business as out of it, is a chance to work and give what is in them, and most of the best work in the world is done in response to that motive. The notion of money "incentives" has been carried to ridiculous extremes under our business system, but it is perfectly consistent with a conception of business as nothing more than a system of making profits. Mr. Schwab may weep all the tears he will at the questions his stockholders ask him; he will never successfully defend such practices. But those questions will not get very far until they begin to be directed at the fundamental morality and workableness of any scheme of work and pay based on the assumption that hoggishness is the one motive on which an efficient industrial system can be built. Not only the economic life of Communist Russia but the experience of numerous business enterprises in our own country teaches a wiser lesson.

They Honor Harding

(A Dispatch NOT Sent by the Associated Press)

MARION, OHIO, JUNE 16. Herbert Hoover and Calvin Coolidge unveiled today the long-finished marble tomb of President Harding and his wife. The money for this magnificent structure was contributed largely by the friends of Harding in Wall Street—the Iron and Steel Institute through Elbert H. Gary and Charles M. Schwab alone contributed $25,000—and by large capitalists elsewhere, in the first flush of their sorrow over the death of their kind and helpful friend; the bipartisan character of the contribution list is evidenced by a gift of $5,000 from the late Thomas F. Ryan. There were many of President Harding's old friends and members of his Administration present, but some well-known figures were missed. Thus, Albert Fall, Harding's Secretary of the Interior, was unable to be present as he is about to enter jail for a year; "Mal" Daugherty, brother and "pal" of the Harding Attorney General was also detained by a pressing engagement of several years with the Ohio State Penitentiary, which fate Harry Daugherty escaped because of a "hung" jury. Other well-known figures who were conspicuously absent were Jess Smith, Mr. Daugherty's confidential man, believed to have been murdered in the Wardman Park Hotel in Washington, and seven other members of the "Ohio Gang," all of whom died suddenly and mysteriously or committed suicide, among them, Brigadier General Charles Sawyer, President Harding's friend and personal physician.

An address of President Hoover, which he might have delivered but did not, follows verbatim:

> FRIENDS AND FELLOW-CITIZENS: This is the most difficult moment of my life. Mr. Harding's Administration, of which I was a part, was the most corrupt in the history of this country, unless we except that of President Grant. Never before have I had the courage to say a word about it, but now I have had to speak lest my refusal be misinterpreted. Let me say at once that I have come to honor Warren G. Harding, not as a President or a statesman, but as a friend, a man of warm heart and keen human sympathies which often betrayed him, but nevertheless created a feeling of attachment to him among all who came in daily contact with him. He felt indignation at injustice and he indubitably meant to do right. But his misfortunes arose from the fact that he came straight out of the fetid atmosphere of political corruption and public larceny which marked the political life of Ohio in his day, that he could not and would not climb above it. Not on the stepping-stone of the dead self of his Ohio life would he rise when he reached the White House. It was the same game on a larger scale that he played, with what disaster everyone knows.
> I will not falsify history or mislead my countrymen. The Administration of Harding was a grave misfortune for him and for all concerned. His death was a kindness of fate which cannot be too strongly emphasized. At this moment I lay a wreath upon his bier out of my deep personal affection, and I ask you and our country to bear and forbear, to forgive and to forget the sins of one who was but mortal. May this wreath be a symbol of friendship and a warning that the best of good friends needs a stern will and rigid rectitude as well as a heart overflowing with kindliness.

President Hoover's Record

I. The Tragedy of Herbert Hoover[*]

By OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

YES, Mr. Hoover's position is nothing less than tragic. If he is the sensitive, proud, and high-minded man that his intimate friends have certified him to be, it must seem to him that in his case the road to glory has led but to despair. For years he planned and worked and schemed—and stooped—to achieve the greatest gift the American people can bestow. It has turned to ashes in his hands. Not in my thirty-four years of journalistic experience has any President so failed to impress or to win the public. He is a tragic figure, one to be pitied; and his own unhappiness appears mirrored in every counterfeit presentment which reaches an entirely unresponsive public. Unless he is utterly deluded he must know that he has failed in his task, that the bulk of his fellow-citizens regard him with indifference, and that large numbers of them have identified him with the economic disaster which has come upon the nation.

Let it be said at the outset that Mr. Hoover is in considerable part the victim of circumstances. It is wrong and unjust to hold him entirely responsible for the unemployment and economic confusion. Both would have come if the smooth and smug Calvin Coolidge had remained in office. It is a world-wide depression, and the ablest minds here and in Europe believe that no nation can work out of it by itself; that joint action alone can restore the normal processes of manufacture, barter, and exchange. But Mr. Hoover, after coming back from the Peace Conference a Democrat to the extent of running successfully in the Democratic Presidential primary in Michigan and of supporting to the full President Wilson, especially in his advocacy of the League of Nations, joined the Republican Party. As a Republican he cannot complain if the country, after being taught for generations that prosperity inevitably comes with and through the Republicans, now holds his party responsible for the bad times. He himself boasted during his preelection campaign that the nation had progressed from the full dinner pail to the full garage. How shriveled must he feel when he rereads his speech of acceptance of the Republican nomination on August 11, 1928, in which he declared that we were reaching "one of the oldest and perhaps the noblest of human aspirations . . . the abolition of poverty." By poverty, he explained, "I mean the grinding of undernourishment, cold, and ignorance, and fear of old age of those who have the will to work." He went on:

> We in America today are nearer the final triumph over poverty than ever before in the history of any land. The poorhouse is vanishing from among us. We have not yet reached the goal, but given a chance to go forward with the policies of the last eight years and we shall soon with the help of God be in sight of the day when poverty will be banished from this nation.

As if this were not enough, he continued in these striking words: "There is no guaranty against poverty equal to a job for every man. This is the primary purpose of the economic policies we advocate." Can he justly complain if he finds himself, less than three years later, held responsible for the six or seven millions of unemployed who are now confronted, not with "the abolition of poverty," but with absolutely empty dinner pails, and are facing "undernourishment, cold, and ignorance, and fear of old age"?

But if the major responsibility for the panic is not his, there are minor responsibilities for which he can be and is justly held responsible. His Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve could have put some brakes on the stock-exchange speculation long before the crash. He could have refused to put out, and to allow his Cabinet secretaries to put out, those endless misleading statements on the character of the crisis and the amount of unemployment, as to which The Nation will shortly print some interesting matter. No matter how innocent he was of responsibility for the evil times, there was no wisdom or common sense in his assuring his fellow-countrymen on March 8, 1930, that the unemployment was little more than seasonal and that there was every prospect that the depression would be over in two months. He who would prophesy must pay the price if his prophecies turn out to be as childish as the products of a kindergarten. If Mr. Hoover's White House conferences had a good effect upon the morale of his fellow-countrymen, at least in business circles, they none the less gave rise to much buncombe, to much mumbling that in every way we should be better tomorrow and tomorrow, and to the dissemination of a lot of bogus information. Deceiving your fellow-countrymen is no way to end economic distress!

Mr. Hoover is in another sense the victim of circumstances. We are witnessing the collapse not merely of one but of several political philosophies. We are beholding as well the breakdown of an entire social system. It matters not whether there will be one or many recoveries, or how soon prosperity will reappear; for some political legends are now wholly shattered, and when this panic ends not all the king's horses or all the king's men will put Humpty-Dumpty exactly together again. It is hard to believe that when the American people come out of this Slough of Despond they will again be so stupid or so set in money-making as not to lay ruthless hands upon some of the cherished idols of the masters of money who have also been the masters of our men, but stand now revealed in all their incredible plundering and blundering. But here, too, Mr. Hoover's lips are sealed. He has long identified himself completely with the policies and the system he so admires. To him it was near complete success. It was the greatest achievement of mankind. The record of the previous seven and a half Republican years (including the corruption of Harding's regime) "constitutes," he said, "a period of rare courage in leadership and constructive action. Never has a political party been able to look back upon a similar period with more satisfaction"—yes, upon its Fall, Mr. Hoover's convicted Cabinet associate, its Daugherty, its Jess Smith, and all the rest!

[*] The first of a series of ten articles on President Hoover's Record. The second, on Mr. Hoover's Foreign Policy, by Professor John B. Whitton, will appear in our next issue.—EDITOR THE NATION.

Mr. Hoover is also to be pitied because his own theory of governing has broken down. His plan of government by commission has achieved only ridicule in the case of the Wickersham body; his other commissions have so far merely acted as lightning arresters, like his Committee on Unemployment, whose chairman, Colonel Arthur Woods, has finally run off to Europe in despair. His excellent plan for the reorganization of the government in Washington has come to nothing, partly because of Congressional indifference, and partly because of Mr. Hoover's own inability to challenge public interest and drive things through. His method of improving conditions within a trade by action of the trade itself under government leadership succeeds here but fails there. One business after another breaks down under his eyes: the rubber business, the oil business, the sugar business, the grain business, and numerous others. Without knowing whither such a policy may lead, these great industries each clamor for a czar and the right to fix prices and act unitedly without the slightest regard for the anti-trust laws. Yet Mr. Hoover does not himself come out for the anti-trust laws or against them. Men looked to him to achieve great administrative reforms because he was an engineer. They looked to him for extraordinary sympathy for the suffering and unemployed, only to find that he is willing that the unemployed should starve, but not that the American policy of refusing them any government aid which might be called a dole should be abandoned. Men thought that he would help us to an intelligent foreign policy, especially in relation to Europe. They have seen his Geneva disarmament conference break down and his London disarmament conference end disappointingly for lack of strong leadership and a clear-cut program. Men thought that he, a Quaker, might be relied upon to check our growing militarism, but under him, the Quaker, the aggrandizement of the military has gone on apace, until our military and naval forces have become a menace to American liberties. At least men thought that under his engineering and administrative skill waste, inefficiency, and extravagance would be cut out of the budget; only now, a year and a half after the Wall Street crash, with a deficit of $1,250,000,000 at hand, does he suddenly realize that there are twenty-five million dollars to be saved here, and twenty million there, when in one department at least the savings could run to two hundred millions—a Washington daily newspaper recently declared that the commission on reforms and retrenchment in the War Department had so decided.

What is it that has brought about this debacle in Herbert Hoover? Viewing him as calmly as my nature and judgment permit, it seems to me that what is chiefly undoing him is lack of courage; or to put it more severely, cowardice. Why is it when Herbert Hoover took office under real obligations to no man, when he was elected by the most tremendous sweep in our history, that he has not dared say his soul was his own; that he has made such indefensible appointments, that he has let himself be represented in the Senate by a Jim Watson, has frequently surrounded himself by wretched advisers, cheap and discredited politicians, and has appointed a Cabinet whose general average of mentality and ability is extraordinarily low? No one whom I know can give the answer. Why, for example, should the President have sent to one of the European countries as representative of the United States a man whose sole qualification was that he felt that he was entitled to a job (although a very rich man) because of his campaign contributions (he is today practically never at his post)? True, Mr. Wilson did similar things, and so have other Presidents; but why should an engineer, a man of great business efficiency, a tried administrator and executive, follow such bad examples?

Yes, it is cowardice at bottom. Man after man comes from the White House and declares privately that he is certain that Mr. Hoover would personally like to recognize Russia, but feels that he cannot because public opinion is not yet ready for it. But for what is a President there except to organize and lead public opinion in the direction in which his conscience tells him to go? Russia is but one example of many. It is impossible to avoid the belief that Mr. Hoover constantly does violence to his better self, that he knows better than his actions suggest, that at bottom his conscience troubles him. Like almost every other politician the world over, he has frequently disavowed his own beliefs, and has compromised deeply and often—as in the matter of signing the latest inexcusable tariff, which he solemnly told Congress he never, never would sign, and then did sign. By that action he contemptuously brushed aside the sound and considered judgment of more than a thousand of the country's leading economists, scholars, and men of affairs who besought his veto. Yet the still, small voice plainly troubles him—let him be credited with that, for better, for worse. But take his courage in both hands he rarely can. No more than a Watson or a Tilson does he perceive the simplest and plainest of all political truths—that the country honors nothing so much as bravery in its public men. No, often he is as timid as the timidest, and ever the second-term specter follows him about as persistently as Banquo's ghost pursued Macbeth. What is it that makes so unhappy a man desire four years more of the life he lives in the White House? Pride? Hope that a revival of prosperity before the end of his second term will bring him the cheers of the crowd? The belief that there is one more victory to be had in sticking to the dry side? Determination not to rank behind Washington, Lincoln, Cleveland, Roosevelt, and Wilson, as a one-term President? One would think he would long for rest, for the quiet, peace, and happiness of private life.

It is a commonplace that no other public man is so thin-skinned as Mr. Hoover; surely no other man in the White House ever suffered so deeply from criticism, or was so sensitive to blame, not even Wilson. The refusal of a friend to go along farther hurts and rankles, is turned over and over within his breast. Moreover, his sensitiveness is closely akin to his emotionalism, and his emotions, easily stirred, lie near the surface. It is curious that none of the ready philosophy of the pioneer is his, none of the readiness to give and take cheerfully, as something all in the day's work, which one associates with the globe-trotting engineer and executive. So, it appears, his heart is set on vindication by reelection. He has all the desire of a weak man to appear the great and masterful leader he is not. Meanwhile, his shyness and his sensitiveness together too often make him appear at his worst. I saw him in the talkies accepting a cup from a sweet, clean-faced, young Scout, after the youngster, much scared, had stumbled through his little piece. In response no words but "I thank you" came from the President. No generous gesture, no kind hand upon that handsome lad's shoulder, no message for all the other Scouts, no gracious human word of gratitude. Only "I thank you." His better nature, of course, struggles to break through, usually in vain. Ineptness, lack of grace joined with his shyness prevent, his intimates say, the appearance in public of the man of heart and warmth whom they know and cherish.

Yes, he can fight—at times, enough to whet the thirst of the onlooker for more, and to make one wonder why he is so slow and so infrequent in joining issue. He did fight against the Red Cross appropriation; he did stick to his guns on Muscle Shoals, and veto as well the highly desirable Wagner employment-exchange bill. He was unyielding in his opposition to the farm-debenture proposal and fought vigorously for his Power Commission appointees. He has, moreover, done some excellent things for which he merits full praise—his new Caribbean policy; his insistence upon disarmament, however feeble his moves in that direction; his veto of the veterans' loan measure; the establishment of publicity for tax refunds larger than $20,000, thus overruling his own Secretary of the Treasury and his own predecessor; and his withdrawal of all oil lands from leasing save where such leases had been made mandatory by Congress.

But these are after all few cases of courage compared to what was expected of him. Multitudes thought when he took office that a new era had come to pass, that a new type of public servant had taken office who would put efficiency and ability and complete independence above all else. Instead of a new leadership, it is the old, old lack of leadership with which we are confronted. Mr. Hoover is no different as a politician from Mr. Coolidge and other predecessors, except that he is a much poorer one. No one can claim that the bright side of his record reveals him as the man above all others fitted to steer the ship of state in the emergency which looms ahead. What may we expect of him as more and more of his cherished shibboleths are shoved aside; as he is compelled to take other positions he has sworn he never, never would take; as his beloved world of business, over which he was to be beyond compare the business President, crumbles more and more? Will he have the iron and the courage to meet changes head on as our business masters would have him? Or will he yield sullenly, gracelessly, unconvinced? Yield he must at many points if our economic disaster continues and grows worse. Or else—but let us neither prophesy nor borrow trouble. Only the fact is that in days when there should be plans and programs made to fit the minute, and new courses pricked upon the charts to meet the shifting tides and winds, the navigator has nothing to say save that the gales will soon blow themselves out, that the skies will soon be bright again and the sun warm.

Only—the masses had hoped and had longed, and the plain people had wished a real leadership, a new leadership; had dreamed of a man in the White House of whom it could never be said that he truckled or compromised or played the political game. Thus it has come to pass that men everywhere are saying that Mr. Hoover does not wish a newer and a better order, and a newer and juster world. And so the tides of human progress sweep by him and leave him high and dry, a cowering, frightened man in the most beautiful house in America. With the most wonderful opportunity to make himself not only the regenerator and the moral leader of aspiring America, yes, of the whole world, he fears to act, fears to assume that leadership which could easily write his name and fame upon the imperishable scroll of time.

The Farce of Power Regulation

By MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

"WE, therefore, find that the Public Service Commission has been negligent in its duties, indifferent to its stewardship, and a menace to proper utility regulation. We recommend that the members of our Public Service Commission be immediately removed from office." This was the finding of a Pennsylvania legislative committee which in response to a resolution of the State legislature has for the past several months been conducting a most thorough investigation of the Public Service Commission and the utilities situation in that State.

The committee might have gone on to say that by its negligence and its indifference to its stewardship the regulatory commission has been consistently playing into the hands of the power trust, for this fact is brought out time and time again in the 5,181-page report the committee has sent to the legislature. For example, in 1927 the Scranton Electric Company earned more than 100 per cent on its common stock, and on the basis of these earnings declared a dividend of 48 per cent, transferring the remainder to surplus. A year or so later the exorbitant profits being made by this company were exposed by the Federal Trade Commission, and shortly thereafter Scranton Electric voluntarily reduced its rates. But all the facts uncovered by the federal body had for years been in the possession of the Public Service Commission of Pennsylvania. It could at any time have moved to investigate Scranton Electric's immense profits, yet it refused to act until virtually compelled to do so as a result of the federal investigation. Even as recently as a few months ago one of the members of the State Commission declared before the legislative committee that the huge earnings of the Scranton company could not be accepted as indication that its rates were too high. And this statement he made months after the company had itself inferentially confessed that its rates were in fact exorbitant. What more tender consideration could the power trust expect from a State regulatory body?

The Scranton company has not stood alone in this respect. Henry L. Mitchell, president of the West Penn Power Company, testified that the commission had never acted to control the rates of his company. J. H. Shearer, president of the Penn Central Light and Power Company, told the committee his company had carried on its business as though there were no regulatory body in existence, and he answered with an unmistakable "No, sir," when asked if he knew "of any act taken by the Public Service Commission that has controlled either the cost of the line or the rate paid . . . in your territory." F. R. Phillips, president of the Duquesne Light and Equitable Gas companies, declared "That's news to me," upon being informed that the commission had fixed 7 per cent as a fair return on the capital investment of utility companies. Incidentally, Mr. Phillips frankly contended that there should be no legal limit placed upon power profits. Asked what was his conception of a proper return, he replied:

> First, to maintain the property in the highest physical condition, to insure the very best quality of service that can be rendered, and, second, rates that will be attractive in order to maintain the integrity of the property and to protect the investment of the investors and produce a high credit rating, whatever it is, whether 1 per cent or 15 per cent or 20 per cent. Economic law will determine that. not civil law.

In practice this appears to have been the very principle the Public Service Commission has been following. It is true that in the few cases in which it has taken positive action the commission has laid down the rule that a 7 per cent return was fair and equitable, but it is also true that the utilities companies have been almost universally permitted to earn much larger returns. On the exceedingly generous basis used by the commission in determining electric rates in 1928, only three companies of twenty-five investigated were found by the Bureau of Accounting to be earning less than a 7 per cent return After 1928 a new accounting basis was adopted, and then thirty-nine of the largest companies in the State were earning more than 7 per cent, and seven of these companies had earnings in excess of 20 per cent. The return of the Natrona Light and Power Company was computed at 44.72 per cent, that of the Cresson Electric Light Company at 39.07 per cent. and that of the Hershey Electric Company at 33.53 per cent. Apparently economic law rather than legal regulation had been permitted to operate in these three cases. In any event the committee pointed out that the excessive earnings of these and other companies in the State represented "a return in the electric industry on a sum of over $300,000,000 which was never invested." To this extent, the investigators concluded, the Public Service Commission "may be fairly said to have defeated regulation."

Unfortunately, the commission's negligence and indifference did not stop there. It was just as indifferent in accepting unquestioningly the electric companies' own estimates of the value of their capital investments, and it must be remembered that these valuations are the basis upon which are fixed the rates charged the public for electricity, gas, water, telephone, and other service. Several methods have been used in recent years in making valuations, but the commission was found to have permitted the utilities to make their own appraisals, except in a very few cases, whatever the method of valuation currently in vogue. Many companies have taken advantage of this attitude of the commission to write up the value of their assets on their books either by arbitrarily increasing these book values or "through the more elaborate manipulation of having a second, affiliated company purchase the stock of a series of small companies at highly speculative prices, and then sell them to the operating company, which wrote them on its books at the purchase price far above the actual money invested in the plant and equipment itself." Of this practice the committee report said:

> Although the bases on which these write-ups were made were not checked in any way by disinterested authorities, they were accepted by the commission at full value. Thus Commissioner Young expressed the opinion that when an appraisal was written on the books of a company, "it is pretty good indication of what their earnings are and a fair value of their property."

The committee added that "some of these were arbitrary write-ups, based on ex parte appraisals and probably influenced by the fact that the commission was allowing large earnings and that the property could consequently be capitalized at a higher figure, following the practice of unregulated industries."

It would not be fair to say that the Public Service Commission had in every case given the utilities a free hand in appraising their assets and fixing their rates. It has in fact participated in several rate and valuation cases, but until 1930 not one of these cases had been started upon its own initiative. This the commissioners themselves admitted in testifying at one of the committee hearings, the committee report adding that "in regard to natural gas companies, water, telephone, and other companies, the commission apparently has made no surveys at all." Nevertheless, the commission has acted in a few cases, but here again it has all too obviously subordinated the public interest to that of the utilities. The pretense of a scientific examination of facts was maintained by sending testimony taken in such cases to the State Bureau of Engineering for analysis, but instead of reaching any scientific and unprejudiced conclusions "it appears," said the committee report, "that the policy of the Bureau of Engineering has been to attempt to arrive at results desired by the commission." This was brought out by questioning Chief Snow of the Bureau of Engineering, who candidly admitted that "we don't fix value on land, but we do what our masters tell us." He explained that his "masters" were "the Public Service Commission who hired us."

How the "masters" issue their orders was revealed in a letter read into the record. A valuation of $4,000,000 had been placed upon the assets of the Luzerne County Gas and Electric Company, but according to the investigating committee "this evidently was not satisfactory to the sitting commissioner as such a valuation would not sustain the existing rates." At any rate, the sitting commissioner wrote the assistant chief of the Bureau of Engineering in the following words:

> I do not know what your method will be of increasing the figures of fair value, but it occurred to me that you might be able to justify a higher estimate on a few of the items on physical property upon which the engineers did not agree. For instance: Were there not some conditions perhaps involved which slightly differentiate it from other cases upon which the commission has ruled? Could not item d be lifted eight or ten thousand? How about item h, might that not allow a little stretch of ten thousand? In j is your position correct that the claim is substantially comprehended in Going Concern, etc.?
> These questions are asked not in the way of criticism but with a view of helping you or rather of making you feel that I did not desert you and make you carry the whole burden without giving the case any further thought. You > may have discovered a better line of approach and found some line of cleavage that will help you through the mire. . . .

In other words, this seems to say, don't lean too heavily on the facts, but give the utility what it wants. Whether this be an exact interpretation or not, the Bureau of Engineering did subsequently increase its original $4,000,000 valuation by approximately $800,000. Virtually the same thing happened in the Scranton Water Company merger case in January, 1928. The engineers had found by careful computation that common-labor costs should be reckoned at forty cents an hour. Chief Snow later increased this item to fifty cents, the figure claimed by the utility company, and this increase made a difference of $4,500,000 in the valuation. Three of the commissioners were questioned at length by the committee as to the reasons for this change, "but could give no rational basis for the lump-sum alterations. . . . In every case their only answer was that it was a matter of judgment."

By relying on their judgment the commissioners found that they could also be helpful to the utilities in estimating the financial value of that intangible factor called good-will. The engineering report in the Scranton Electric case in 1930 allowed $2,000,000 for "going-concern value," otherwise known as good-will. The engineer in charge testified that there was no established rule for making such estimates, but in this particular case the sum of $2,000,000 was agreed upon "after observation of the territory, its prospects and growth and development; it [the sum] is a recognition of the economic worth-whileness of this utility property to serve in comparison with unregulated business undertakings in this area served." The language here is ambiguous, but it suggests that what the engineer really sought and found was the answer to the question of how much the electricity traffic in that territory would bear. In the words of the investigating committee, the method used "amounts to allowing a utility to capitalize the growth of the community where it is located and to collect a return from the consumers on that growth."

Thus it appears that the utilities in Pennsylvania have virtually had their own way in fixing rates and in appraising the value of their property for rate-making purposes in those few cases in which the Public Service Commission has acted. The utilities have not even hesitated to send different and in many cases much lower estimates of the value of their capital assets to the Department of Revenue for taxation purposes. The fixed capital (less reserves) of eighteen companies as reported to the Public Service Commission totaled $237,575,227.93; the estimated value of the fixed assets of the same companies as reported to the Department of Revenue totaled $173,673,643.51, or about 35 per cent less. In this list is included the Clarion River Power Company, whose capital was reported as $11,226,390.66 for rate-making purposes, and as only $4,773,322.67 for taxation purposes. The Duquesne Lighting Company estimated its capital at $149,361,000.20 for the Public Service Commission's records, but reduced this estimate to $107,611,701.61 in its capital-stock tax report. However, the utilities had little to fear in this connection. As far as has been shown, the Public Service Commission never once availed itself of this opportunity to check up on the capital-investment valuations submitted to it by the various utilities.

In the hearings before the legislative committee the utility commissioners admitted many of their shortcomings, but sought to defend themselves on the ground that "this commission leans, if it leans any way at all, toward the public." Commissioners Young and Brown contended that 75 per cent of the rate cases had been decided in favor of the public against the railroads and other utilities. Later the commission brought forward actual figures for the years 1926 to 1930, and these showed that "the claim was true only in railroad rates. In other cases only one out of three complaints was sustained. In the case of railroad rates the commission is largely bound by the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission." Moreover, in many instances in which the commission had taken positive action against the utilities the latter either ignored the commission's orders or else evaded them, as happened in the Penn Public Service Company case. By merely changing its name this company was enabled to take over properties it previously had been forbidden to buy.

The consumers' side of the utility-regulation question was presented by municipal officials representing 886 of the 950 boroughs in the State. "Not one representative of all these boroughs praised the Public Service Commission," according to the legislative committee's report. In addition to their general complaints, the borough delegates brought out the fact that consumers and public bodies are at a marked disadvantage in pressing rate complaints before the commission. Many of them testified, to quote a short passage from the report,

> . . . that when the utilities increased the rates in their municipality the boroughs did not file a complaint because they could not afford to enter into litigation and attempt to get justice for the consumers. . . . No municipality can safely contemplate a rate case unless they are prepared to spend a minimum of $25,000 to establish their case. Added to this expense is that of the utility. The company attempting to justify the increase in rates must also employ expert engineers and accountants. They must also make a complete inventory of their plant. They must also employ experienced counsel to represent them. The average cost of a rate case to a utility is $25,000. . . . An examination of the records of the Pennsylvania Public Service Commission will show that the utilities have spent with an open hand in their attempts to establish their new rates. And why should they be conservative at a time like this? The consumer will be obliged to pay it all back. The expense incurred by the utility in fighting the rate case is amortized over a period of years and added in as an operating expense. . . . This means, therefore, that the consumer must not only pay his share of this rate case, but he must also pay the company's share.

The committee report presented a specific example of this in the Conewago Gas case. The Borough of Hanover won the case, but the company was authorized by the Public Service Commission to amortize its expense totaling $10,500 over a period of three years at $3,500 a year. Although the case was decided in 1918, "the citizens of Hanover are still paying this additional $3,500 a year."

Hundreds of similar examples and facts were uncovered during the investigation, but the few here cited are perhaps sufficient to show that the power trust has been the principal, if not the sole, beneficiary of State regulation of utilities in Pennsylvania.

One of the Six Million

By T. SWANN HARDING

I WAS working in the back yard the other day, for therapeutic reasons rather than motivated by a love of nature, when one of the six million called to me over the fence and introduced himself. Of course I already knew of the fellow, but I had never seen him in the flesh, that is, in as much of the flesh as he had left after several months of malnutrition. He had a disarming and rather humiliating obsequiousness about him, at least it humiliated me. For some reason or other he seemed to think he was not so good as I was, and he asked about work, but he smiled as he did so.

So this was Mr. Dawson. My wife had had him there earlier in the year, in fact, early last fall, it being spring now. He had dropped in one day and asked to work in the yard. He was a veteran. While I had my back turned he was over in France fighting for me. Now he had a wife and two children, a growing goiter, and no job. He didn't get any allowance for heroism. It seems he hadn't suffered any physical injury in the war. He had no pull anyway. He had the wife and children in a bare room over on the other side of the capital city of the richest country on earth. They had a few boxes and blankets. They were somehow struggling along. My wife had set him to work, she told me, and he had had all he could do to tug around until she discovered he had had no breakfast. In fact, he had had no dinner the night before. So she cooked him a big breakfast and he ate it and got sick and couldn't work after all. Then she gave him five dollars and he went off happy.

He came back two or three times after that. Sometimes he did what little work we had for him to do. He had had a skilled trade of some sort or other that had been closed out by machinery; so I saw in him one of the "technologically unemployed" as well as one of the six million. Now he would scrub floors, or wash out the bathtub, or clean rugs, or do almost anything, and we paid him more than it was worth to help keep his wife and kids alive. If they had been let starve at once, it might have been better all round.

For why not? We have too much labor going to waste as it is. Why prolong the misery? What right did he have to have children anyway? Why did he even have a wife? Do people have no caution when they live in economic anarchy? I was canny, I was. I tied myself pretty close to socialism. I got into the government as soon as I could, where employment is financed socialistically. I also got told some pretty nasty things for doing that—especially the time I left my one detour into industrial life at the end of four years, after I had got tired of our president's one bad habit. He was an austerely moral man, but he would call me down to his office every so often—this was between 1918 and 1922—and show me letters from starving chemists outside who would be glad to come in and take my job for half the salary. He would show the letters and sigh significantly and remark that business was awful. I got tired of that and went back to socialism.

I was always very careful how I assumed obligations, too. I got married, of course, but I sidestepped children. What right has a man who lives in a society based upon economic anarchy to have children? None, I feel. He only runs a big risk of doing them monstrous injustice. As far as two people are concerned, a wife can often support herself, if worse comes to worst, and there is no great harm in risking a wife, particularly if you are willing to take small money coming surely on pay day. My professional friends on the outside amuse me right now writing in and telling me how hard times are, how doctors' and dentists' and lawyers' fees are not paid. And I write: "You kidded me when I took the government as a sure thing at a small salary. You said I had kissed initiative and individual independence and the chance to make a fortune goodby. Well, I had. But it would humiliate me to depend on the fees of the unemployed as you do. No, I believe in taking no chances in economic anarchy."

Mr. Dawson had taken chances. He had a skilled trade; he made his eight dollars a day; and he accumulated a wife and two children. Then machines came along and squeezed the economic life out of him, and he found himself just exactly where he should have expected himself to be if he had had any brains at all or had considered the matter. Since he lacked judgment, what business was it of mine? Of course, so long as he came to the house he got on my wife's nerves and he got on mine, so we gave him money to be rid of him. You can't feel comfortable with pale-faced men starving pleasantly and placidly right before your eyes. It is better to give them a little money and let them go off and starve less obtrusively (to you) on the other side of the city, in a bare room where you don't see them.

For that would be painful to me. I blame Dawson, of course. He knew jolly well what sort of economic anarchy he was growing up in. He had sense enough for that. He is thirty-five. He came up about as I did. I am forty. Ever since I was fifteen I have been in contact in one way or another with sudden unemployment, seldom due to personal deficiencies. I grew up in a family where the father could not remain employed and where agents of the landlord continually threatened to set us out in the street. By the time I was seventeen I had decided that a man was a fool to have children in such a disorganized society and that until the social and economic system was more stable, I should never think of establishing a family. The state wants families, true enough, but so long as we cannot perfect a state which will guarantee families against economic want, and so long as an anarchy prevails which may throw any man out of a job tomorrow, through no fault of his own, I wanted no families. Dawson had that much sense, too, if he had stopped to think of it.

However, he got out of my life. I forgot him. Why should I be annoyed with him and the results which followed from his errors in judgment, anyway? Why does the government permit me to be bothered by such men? I have attained peace and tranquillity. I can sit in a chair and draw a good salary. I was canny and cautious. I sized this system up, acted accordingly, and came out on top. What have I to do with fellows like Dawson? Why should they even be permitted to cross my path and annoy me? He went out of my life, anyway. If I stopped to think of it I knew he was hanging desperately on to life somewhere and that the kids couldn't go to school because they were too hungry. But he could go over and look at Lincoln Memorial. He could drown himself in the pool over there, or hop off a million-dollar bridge.

Last week I began to feel logy. I knew I needed some stooping and bending and I decided on three hours in the back yard. I probably hate nothing more bitterly than I do physical exertion, but the human system aged forty demands this at times, and though I rebelled I went forth to rake leaves, fix fences, mow grass, and tidy the yard. I had worked about half an hour when Mr. Dawson came to me. I recognized him at once as one of the six million. Then I saw the goiter and knew also who it was. He introduced himself and said my wife had told him to come in the spring, she would have work for him. He had been selling apples but the racket wore out. Had I anything?

I was annoyed. Can't a slightly distended male citizen work in his own yard to keep his own arteries from hardening without pale, poorly nourished members of the six million approaching and begging piteously for work? Must I pay this man to do what my physical organism simply demanded that I do? I would be hard. I said no, firmly, and I meant it. He bowed and walked away.

As I raked I thought. He was finishing up in the next yard. That woman would give him about twenty-five cents an hour and he would work for that because he had to. He would leave with fifty cents. Should I give him money? I rebelled. Then I weakened and called him. He came subserviently. It humiliates me to be approached that way. I don't like it. The man had no poise. How could he retain that, badly nourished as he was? I said come Monday. In the meantime I decided I could think up something for him to do, and I did. I left word for him to wait when he got through working till I got out home, for I had a suit I decided to risk offering him.

When I got home he had gone off. But the housekeeper went after him. He was sitting down at the bank waiting—just waiting. He had done the little work I had in about an hour. I decided to give him two dollars and the suit, an outrageous thing in a way if you maintain that the laborer should justly requite his employer. When he came he had on an overcoat and two shabby undercoats. He was clean but his clothes were pretty terrible. He had a newspaper bundle and a battered hat which he took off. I didn't like that. He acted as if he were some European peasant and I were the lord of the manor. Had he forgotten he was a free-born American citizen and I was no better than he? Didn't he know all men were equal? He made me uneasy.

As casually as I could I said, "Well, how about $2?" He swallowed hard and his face lighted up as if I had told him to enter heaven, I had fixed it up with God. "Is the work satisfactory?" Fancy his asking that. It didn't matter to me what he did. I was giving him the money to help out. Surely it was satisfactory. I gave him the money and then in a low voice asked about the suit. I was ass enough to think he might resent being offered one of my old suits. He didn't reply in a low voice. He was so overjoyed at the very thought that he spoke right out. I got the suit and he admired it as if it had been brand-new. I asked him to wait till I found paper to wrap it. I hunted all over and couldn't find a bit. I came back baffled, when he burst out he would be glad to take it unwrapped. Lord, had I forgotten he had long since got past the point where carrying an unwrapped suit bothered his sense of respectability?

His face beamed. He had a long nose. The sinews stood out in his neck. He was visibly emaciated. The goiter looked alarming. This was Mr. Dawson, free-born American citizen, glad to get two dollars he didn't earn, and a cast-off suit, from a man no better than he was, and acting as if that man had conferred an everlasting favor upon him. This was Mr. Dawson, one of the six million. He told me the lady across the street was going to send him down to her farm in Virginia the next day and he would be there the rest of the week. I congratulated him. I told him to come back the following Monday when my wife would be home. I was rid of him for a week. Was I rid of him?

Mr. Dawson turned away and I went in. The housekeeper remarked, "Poor man," and sighed. I looked at her questioningly and she told me Mr. Dawson had no home. His wife and children had been packed off to relatives. The bare room on the other side of the capital city of the richest nation on earth was vacant.

This was not, you see, one of the six million after all. It was not one out of seven unemployed wage-earners. It was not a percentage, or a unit of population, or a mathematical figment of the technologically unemployed. It was not a fraction of surplus labor or one of the underprivileged classes. This was Mr. Dawson, an American citizen known to me, who bore his home and his wardrobe with him and slept where he could; he also ate with an infrequency that must have been somewhat alarming to his alimentary apparatus. Yet he was as polite about it as Alfonso on leaving the Spanish throne. He was as certain that everything would finally come out all right as a man ever was. He was as placidly unprejudiced against the employer who fired him and the social and economic anarchy in which he lived as he could be. He had never thought of social or economic questions; he told me he "couldn't put his mind to big questions very well."

The trouble about it is that I have been a careful, cautious citizen. If I have reaped any fruits from this civilization at all, I have done so because I carefully scanned the system and decided that an individual could beat it by only one policy—by exercising the most extreme caution. I have a right now to peace and tranquillity. I have a right to some protection from these fellows who starve with such disturbing placid courtesy. Yet I can't get the fellow out of my mind. He haunts me. Now that I have seen him, and he has become a personal reality rather than a subject of conversation with my wife, his face peeks out at me unexpectedly. He doesn't sneer. He doesn't appear vindictive. He doesn't display envy, or malignancy, or even acute suffering. He half smiles and bows obsequiously. He is dying that an obsolete system may live, and he that is not about to die, but who rather dies daily and hourly, in silent and desolate misery, salutes me with a smile and bows to a common rotter like me.

Copyright and Common Sense

By THORVALD SOLBERG

THE period of copyright protection for an author's work is, under existing law, a first term of twenty-eight years with a possible renewal for a like period. The International Copyright Union protects an author's work during the remainder of his life after he has created the work and for fifty years after his death. It is one of the fundamental purposes of the Copyright Union to secure all possible uniformity in the protection of literary property, and this term of protection was adopted because it is now accorded by the legislation of most of the countries of Europe. Variations exist, however. Germany protects an author's work for only thirty years after his death; Spain extends such protection for eighty years after a writer's decease. But it is not obligatory to accept the Copyright Union's term of copyright in order to enter that organization. The protection accorded by the domestic legislation of each country may be continued, except that such protection cannot exceed the term fixed in the country of origin of the work.

In the copyright bill H. R. 12,549, which passed the House of Representatives on January 13, 1931, the Copyright Union term was proposed. The Senate Committee on Patents, in lieu of this, suggested a direct term of seventy years. In the committee's report on the bill it was explained that in their opinion the proposed term in the House bill revealed inconsistencies which should be removed. It was pointed out that under that proposal only in rare instances would copyright exist for an equal term for any two authors. If, for example, one author died soon after writing his work, "he would have a copyright in himself for a very brief period of time which would be extended in favor of his heirs or assigns for a further period of fifty years," whereas if an author should live fifty years after creating his work, he would be entitled to a total protection of 100 years! So also, in the case of a work by joint authors, the Vestal bill provided that the copyright should end fifty years after the death of the author who should die first or at the end of the life of the author who should die last—whichever period might be longer. From information furnished to the Senate committee, the report states, it was ascertained that the average age at which authors do most of their creative work is approximately from thirty-five to forty-five years, and that the approximate duration of life thereafter is twenty years. As the International Copyright Union provides a term of fifty years of copyright from and after the death of an author, the committee decided "to add this extension of fifty years to the average twenty years' duration of his life after the creation of his work," thus making a total term of seventy years. This would insure that the maximum protection should not exceed seventy years for the works of any and all authors, but the date at the end of the copyright would differ in the case of each work by any one author. It is one advantage of a term ending fifty years after the death of the author that while each of his works would be protected for a different period of time, all his copyrights would fall into the public domain simultaneously at that final date.

Under the provisions of the Senate bill it would not be possible to learn the exact date when the copyright in any work either began or ended. Section 12 provides: "The term for which copyright is secured by this act shall endure for seventy years from the date of copyright." Section 1 reads: "Copyright . . . is hereby secured and granted to authors . . . from and after the creation of their work." But as there are no provisions for the obligatory recording of the date of the completion of any work, there are no means available for ascertaining when the work was actually created or when the seventy-year term began, and, in consequence, no power to determine when the protection ended. The seventy years proposed would increase by fourteen years the present maximum period of copyright, which is now fifty-six years, two terms of twenty-eight years each.

It is a curious fact that this period of fourteen years has prevailed in copyright legislation since the first British act of 1709, when copyright protection was granted for new works for fourteen years. That term was copied in some of our early State laws, 1783-86, and in our first federal Copyright Act of 1790, with its first term of fourteen years and a second term also of fourteen years. In the Act of 1831 the first term was increased from fourteen to twenty-eight years, but the renewal term remained fourteen years. In the Act of 1909 the renewal term was increased from fourteen to twenty-eight years; thus providing for two terms of twenty-eight years each, or a maximum of fifty-six years, which it is now proposed to increase fourteen years more to a total of seventy years.

A comparatively small number of copyrighted works are protected for the present maximum period. The number has increased in recent years and the renewal entries for 1929-30 numbered 5,937; but from 1909 to 1930 the average renewal entries per year were less than 3,000, and the total number of such entries was 55,813. When the term of copyright protection has been extended by law, it has been held proper to increase the period of subsisting copyrights accordingly. The Copyright Act of 1909 provides that the then subsisting copyrights might "be renewed and extended . . . for a further period such that the entire term shall be equal to that secured by this act." This extension of protection was not, however, automatic; the act requires that "application for such renewal and extension shall have been made to the Copyright Office and duly registered therein within one year prior to the expiration of the original term of copyright."

The Senate bill provides (Section 13) that the "copyright subsisting in any work when this act goes into effect shall be continued seventy years from the date of copyright." The bill does not prescribe compliance with any formalities whatever. The extension of all subsisting copyrights is automatic. If it should go into force on July 1, 1932, the copyrights then subsisting which would be extended would be the copyrights for all works registered after July 1, 1904. These numbered 3,513,224, up to June 30, 1930, and if the registrations for the two succeeding fiscal years are estimated at 350,000, the total number of subsisting copyrights when the act goes into effect would be 3,863,224. These registrations are for works now protected for a first term of copyright of twenty-eight years, which protection, under the provisions of the Senate bill, would be extended to a new term of seventy years—that is to say, in the case of each one of these nearly four million works the increase of protection would be forty-two years.

It may be believed that no such result was intended and it may be reasonably held that no such result should be permitted. While it is well known that the great mass of copyrighted works are for all practical purposes dead and forgotten after a comparatively few years from the date of their publication, it would not be desirable now to tie them all up automatically by legal inhibition so that there would be a delay of forty-two years in each case before these nearly four million works would fall into the public domain. On the other hand, works of such outstanding value or considerable popularity that they would be still published at the end of the present term of protection, and copies of them still demanded and sold, should, in justice to their authors or the children and heirs of the creators of these works, secure an extended copyright to make the total time of protection equal any copyright term finally adopted.

In the Driftway

ALWAYS, in his heart of hearts, the Drifter has longed to carry a cane. Spats he can take or leave alone, for their uses are too practical, in the last analysis, whatever be the verdict of history on the folk who wear them. There is little satisfaction in going around with decorated ankles, when your motive can be construed ambiguously. But a cane, at any rate upon the streets of a metropolis—what useful purpose could it have? Against the stick-up man it would exert quite other than a helpful influence, for it would put you in the idle class. For protection against skidding, fully as great a danger for hell-bent pedestrians like the Drifter as for motorists, a cane might be of value; but even here the credit side is overbalanced by the probability of its getting tangled up with people's feet, not excluding the Drifter's own.

* * * * *

WHEN he was younger, the Drifter might have dared it. Even now he looks with jealous eyes upon the collection he keeps hidden far from prying multitudes. Here is an ash stick carved into a rude design; its head resembling a crayfish which looks warily out of a hole on the bank of an Ohio stream. Here is one artistically without distinction, but which aided the Drifter up a lonely mountain side in N'oth Ca'lina and shared some dangerous night adventures over broken trestles. Still another is a relic of undergraduate days, when this evidence of membership in the Senior Class was paraded vulgarly down the chapel aisle. A fourth was crudely purchased with tourist money in the Alps, but at the bottom of it is a beautiful, virile spike which would be a great help in climbing Mont Blanc if only the Drifter dared try it. And among the rest none evokes more honest pleasure than the old bamboo affair which was thrown at the Drifter's head by an irate old man years ago, when the Drifter, in company with a gang of praiseworthy young rascals, had hung a dried fish on the door as a token of censure for the misanthrope's habit of stealing—for such we called it—all baseballs accidentally batted into his garden.

* * * * *

OH, it is sad, but the Drifter cannot, like a willow, put forth shoots in summer and bask in smug magnificence. For years he has denied his inmost self this boon. In a byway of Barcelona he could have bought a beautiful, swishing work of art, that would have been a knock-out on Fifth Avenue, for a paltry three pesetas. In Lancashire he saw one once that looked like a briar pipe the whole of its lovely length, but he still clung to his eager shilling. Twice in Venice, once in Nürnberg, and another time in Brittany, he could have quieted the urge for less than twenty cents. It isn't that the Drifter runs to luxury; that's the most venomous thing about it.

* * * * *

THE sore truth is, the Drifter has a subtle, gnawing fear. Some day, unless he exercises vigilance, someone will think him better than he wants to be. For him, from that day onward, life's obligation will be heavy, life's fun will all be over. That experienced globe-trotter, Harry A. Franck, in one of his wanderer's volumes, lays down a solemn dictum. "To be without a walking stick," he says, "is to be mistaken for a man rather than a gentleman." You note the delicacy of the imputation. Never, so long as he can help it, will the Drifter be mistaken for a gentleman.

Alabama Justice

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Readers of Mrs. Van Doren's excellent article about the unfortunate young Negroes condemned to death for alleged rape of two white girls in Alabama will be interested in the following illustration of how the mind of a jury in that State sometimes "works" (if that term may be used with accuracy).

In Reed vs. State (20 Alabama Appellate Reports, 496; 1925) the Alabama Court of Appeals had up for review the case of a colored man and a white woman who had been tried jointly in Washington County Circuit Court for violation of the anti-miscegenation law. The proceedings and evidence as to both parties were identical. Nevertheless, the jury returned a verdict of guilty as to the Negro but failed to make any findings as to his white codefendant—a disposition which the trial judge concurred in by pronouncing judgment on the colored man only. Obviously prompted by the impulse of "commendable guardianship and abundant generosity" which "the dominant race manifests toward the inferior race," and "inspired by motives not only of fundamental justice but of sentiment engendered by the earlier legal dependence and subjection of the slave to the master" (Story vs. State, 178 Alabama Reports, 98, 103; 1912), the appellate court reversed the judgment of the trial court and remanded the case for a new trial. As a matter of law, declared the court, the Negro and the white woman must both be found guilty or both acquitted.

Hard Times in the West

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Out here on the edge of the Rockies five-dollar bills are becoming almost as scarce as mountain goats and grizzlies. There are thousands of able-bodied men working on farms in these parts for a dollar a day and one meal. There are many who receive their board only and perhaps consider themselves lucky at that. In the beet fields the workers have this year been reduced to $17 per acre with practically no possibility of a bonus. A strong man can tend ten or eleven acres. That means less than $200 for an entire season of torturing, back-breaking toil. The condition of the farmers themselves is little better. Eggs are selling for 10 cents a dozen, butter fat for 15 cents a pound. Beans bring only $1.50 per hundred pounds. Despite excellent crops last year, conditions are very bad.

I have little faith in the palliatives proposed by progressives and liberals but I have respect and admiration for a paper that reports real news and faces real issues with intellectual honesty and candor. I think you deserve much praise for your fair and illuminating articles on Russia.

In the Cattle Country

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I am sorry to lose The Nation. Hard times are to blame. Formerly I could now and then mingle with people from whom a subscription would occasionally be secured. Today the ranches have thinned down. In this cattle country folks now admit having eaten horse meat. Colts are slaughtered. Eggs bring 5 to 16 cents not only here but in some parts of the Dakotas as well. A sack of flour retails at $2.85, while anyone on the range may buy from neighbors 100 pounds of wheat for $1. Sometimes one gets it for 40 cents a bushel (60 pounds). For $3,000 I can buy from the county ample land on which to place all of New York City. There are fifty-five counties in the State, and each one of them is being dragged under by land on which the owners cannot or will not pay taxes. From the courthouse steps on a given day, by due process of law, you can bid as you please and buy a square mile of good land for $320, or 50 cents an acre.

The Nation reports on relief or lack of it for the unemployed. I wish it would tell what is occurring to people out in this part of the country.

Religious Liberty in Maryland

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Is Mr. Mencken's characterization of the Free State of Maryland correct? For a generation demands have been pressed in Maryland for the insertion of the principle of elementary freedom of conscience in its constitution, code, and decisions. Yet the last legislature refused to consider a bill which would make civil marriage legal, no marriage without religious sanctification being legal at present in the State of Maryland. Mr. Douglas H. Gordon, newly elected president of St. John's College, has urged an amendment to the constitution of Maryland, which as it stands denies the right to testify to any except "believers in a Supreme Being under whose dispensation one will be rewarded for his good deeds and suffer punishment for his bad deeds." Maryland and Arkansas stand alone in this denial, though there are still nineteen States in which unbelief of witnesses either makes their testimony incompetent (unreceivable) or so affects its credibility that it may be killed on cross-examination by appeals to the religious prejudices of the jury.

The legislature also killed a bill abolishing religious tests for office. Such an important office as constable still requires the "declaration of religious belief" in addition to the constitutional oath of office. In fact, the new officer is required "to declare orally at the time his belief in the Christian religion or, if he professes to be a Jew, his belief in a future state of rewards and punishments." Singularly, this medieval adjuration makes it impossible for adherents of any other religion except the two specified above to hold office, and unbelievers are entirely ignored. No attempt has been made to alter the code prescribing heavy penalties for the denial of the divinity of Jesus Christ and the Holy Family, or to remove from the Sabbath-breaking laws the requirement of the Edict of Toleration of 1649, whereunder to this day the Lord's Day is observed "in commemoration of the Resurrection."

An Appeal to the Deaf

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I should like to appeal to those of your readers who, like myself, have become deafened in adult life and are shut out from social contacts with friends whose ideas and opinions might help to make life worth while. Lip-reading does not enable one to follow lectures or plays or general conversation, and in cases like my own, electrical and mechanical aids to hearing are of no avail in listening to music or the radio. There remains for us so afflicted, yet having a strong social instinct and almost boundless energies for intellectual development, only correspondence with like-minded fellow-sufferers who understand one another's problems. I should be glad to hear from any of your deafened readers who are in sympathy with my views and who would care to correspond with myself and others. My address is 529 West 111th Street.

Earth Is No Symbol

By HAL SAUNDERS WHITE

Earth is no pledge or symbol held to the light
Or spun against the darkness for a token
To such as we who cannot sleep at night
Thinking of death, and all the body broken.

Death's but a stone that crumbling in the night
Lives surely downward and is earth again;
Or the wind shifts, and clouds across the light
Darken the seeming of the moon to men.

O, question nothing: grown infallibly,
The rooted heart shall know the dark of the moon;
Water that wears the hills to an ignorant sea
Is blood along the bone, and a sweet tune.

Earth could be image of no fairer thing
Than dwindling autumn or exceeding spring.

The Columbia "Milton"

The Works of John Milton. Volumes I and II. Columbia University Press. Each $10.

IT has long been one of the paradoxes of our scholarship that we have no complete edition of the works of Milton; and the publication, accordingly, of the first two volumes of the Columbia "Milton" constitutes an event of first-rate importance in the history of English studies. It is eighty years since Mitford's edition appeared. Mitford did not include the important treatise "On Christian Doctrine," discovered in 1823—a treatise which, even if it were unimportant, would still be interesting from the circumstance that its publication in 1825 occasioned Macaulay's Essay. The Mitford necessarily lacks a number of minor Milton items; and above all it lacks the apparatus of modern scholarship. Whatever defects subsequent study may reveal in the Columbia "Milton," at least no one will charge it with defect of critical apparatus. Indeed, apparatus could no farther go, and even a critic friendly to minute scholarship will wonder why it was necessary to record every variant—or any variant—from the 1680 edition of "Paradise Regained."

These first two volumes—which are, in fact, four—take in the whole of Milton's poetry. They are to be followed by the complete prose works in sixteen volumes—which will really be seventeen; and the whole will be rounded off by a volume of bibliography. The editors hope within the next five years to see the end of an undertaking conceived twenty years ago—conceived upon generous and noble lines, and in the execution of it informed throughout by a proper sense of the dignity of scholarship. The externals of design, printing, and binding are sufficiently praised when it is said that they have been intrusted to William Edwin Rudge.

Beginning with the Poems, the editors have taken first the easy and enjoyable part of their task. This is, even so, the first critical edition of the Poems of Milton which the student of Milton has ever seen. The material lay ready to hand, but until now the necessary industry and enterprise were wanting. The critical principles which the editors have laid down for themselves cannot, I think, be criticized. They print, in every case, the text of the latest edition published in Milton's lifetime. And in fact, even for "Paradise Lost," no other course was open to them. Here and there they will be criticized as over-conservative: in particular, they have, I feel, too much persuaded themselves that the 1674 edition of "Paradise Lost" is incapable of error—they follow it even where it is patently wrong (e. g., i, 530; ii, 282; viii, 269). To the text which they print, however, they append, at the end of each volume, every variant from all the texts printed in Milton's lifetime and every variant from the extant manuscripts. They must be congratulated on a good and clear arrangement of the variant lections; and especially upon the manner in which they have dealt with those of the Minor Poems—where they had a difficult task.

The student of Milton will turn with particular interest to the array of variants gathered for the first book of "Paradise Lost" from the Morgan MS. Here, it can hardly be doubted, is the actual "copy" handed by Milton to his printers in 1667. The collation of it offered by the Columbia editors is, I think, in the main, careful. But it is not wholly free from inaccuracies. The punctuation is not always truly recorded; and here and there interesting details have been missed. For example, at line 71, and again at line 432, the MS reads, not those, but these. At 756 the original, the surely true, reading is Capitoll, not Capitall. The whole will need careful checking—a collotype facsimile of the MS is to be published shortly, edited by Miss Helen Darbishire. The MS itself has been on loan in Oxford for some time; and these small corrections I owe to the kindness of Miss Darbishire. Elsewhere I have tried to check the record of variants by notes of my own made at different times; and I cannot but think that the Columbia editors are occasionally in error in small matters; for example, in their record from the MS of the poem to Rouse.

The critical apparatus includes (I have hinted) a good deal that might well have been spared. It also excludes a good deal which the student of the text has a right to expect. There are a good many readers of Milton, for example, who have never seen the famous line correctly printed; who know it only in the form in which alone, apparently, it was known to Matthew Arnold. Surely a note was needed here? Surely, yet again, Bentley's "swelling gourd" deserved record at "Paradise Lost" vii, 321, and his "Soul living in her kind" at line 452 of the same book? The art of conjectural emendation has done singularly little for Milton; but at least these corrections are part of the history of criticism. Here and there I looked for the name of Bentley in connection with improvements in punctuation—the only kind of editorial improvement in which the Columbia editors show much interest. They might have noticed that some of Bentley's punctuations seem to be confirmed by the Morgan MS. The text, once again, of the Latin poems is at many points far from satisfactory. Not all the suggested corrections of it merited complete neglect. I may make the editors a present of the fact that in line 21 of the Seventh Elegy the suspicious aeterno has been corrected, in Milton's own copy in the Bodleian, to aetherio—though only the last two letters of the correction survive, the rest having been clipped by the binder. Milton's Greek is printed in such a way as to give little chance to Mr. Rudge; and it is not easy to find, from the editors' notes, any justification for the procedure followed.

> And what is else not to be overcome?

The Latin poems are accompanied by an English translation vis-a-vis—at least it endeavors to be vis-a-vis, and could easily have been so in fact if Mr. Knapp had been, in an otherwise well-made version, a degree less diffuse. Where Mr.

Knapp's English is redundant, supplying, as it often does and sometimes had to do, words that are wanting in the original, the redundant words appear within square brackets. Everywhere these brackets give the page an uncomely look, and once again Mr. Rudge is not given a fair chance. I mention this because the later volumes will give plenty of work to the translator. I hope he will be as good a translator as Mr. Knapp; indeed, I hope he will be the most learned man in the world—a less man will be beaten, when he comes to, say, the "Prolusions," by riddles that have long clamored for an interpreter.

The Columbia editors have, in any case, the hardest part of their task still before them: very few scholars have worked on Milton's prose writings, and the text of them, Latin and English, offers many perplexities. The two volumes before us are a fine augury of what we may expect to follow. We may look in fact for a work which, when it is completed, will rank with the best achievements of English scholarship.

The only misprint which I have noted in these two volumes is on page 359 of Volume II, where Book xii is printed for Book xi.

Too Many If's

If, or History Rewritten. By Philip Guedalla, G. K. Chesterton, Hendrik W. van Loon, André Maurois, Hilaire Belloc, H. A. L. Fisher, Harold Nicolson, Winston Churchill, Milton Waldman, Emil Ludwig, J. C. Squire. The Viking Press. $3.

FROM such a galaxy of clever or brilliant authors one might expect a pyrotechnical display of dazzling sort. Unfortunately what one soon begins to be conscious of in reading is the dull wooden scaffolding from which such displays are shot off, the sticks instead of the rockets. Each author discourses on what the subsequent chain of events would have been if some one event in history had been different from what it was. Thus Guedalla gives us a chapter on modern history assuming that the Moors had conquered, instead of having been conquered by, Spain; Chesterton assumes that Mary Queen of Scots married Don John of Austria; van Loon that the Dutch defeated the English and retained New Amsterdam; Maurois that Louis XVI had "an atom of firmness"; Nicolson that Byron became king of Greece; and so on. Treatment of such "if's" may range from mere amusing spoofing to an intellectual exercise of a high order. There is very little of the latter in these eleven essays, Churchill's If Lee Had Won the Battle of Gettysburg coming nearest to it perhaps. Guedalla's contribution is cleverly done also, but on the whole most of the essays must be set down, notably Chesterton's, as among the dullest things that their respective authors have written. Possibly the cumulative effect of nearly four hundred pages of this sort of supposition has something to do with it. Practically all the authors are journalists or modern biographers rather than historians. Nowhere in the book do we find any convincing logic in the succession of suppositious events following upon the "if." In the hands of a thorough scholar, a book even of this size might carry through in intellectual interest. On the other hand, as mere amusing fooling, any one of the chapters if published separately might be entertaining, but when taken en masse the dulness becomes overpowering. The idea of the book has possibilities. The list of authors would seem to insure an unusually entertaining volume. The fact remains that the thing does not "come off." Eleven clever men all trying to be clever at once have produced a merely depressing effect. Is it possible that, after all, fidelity to truth is essential to sustained interest, whatever the truth may be?

The Two Mexicos

Mexico and Her Foreign Creditors. By Edgar Turlington. Columbia University Press. $6.

The Genius of Mexico. Edited by Hubert C. Herring and Katherine Terrill. The Committee on Cultural Relations with Latin America. $2.50.

THERE are two Mexicos. There is that member of the family of nations whose bonds sell at fifteen cents on the dollar, whose credit in international finance is nigh nil, whose fiscal history but for a brief interlude is that of unbalanced budgets, of repeated but unavailing efforts to fulfil its pecuniary obligations, a noli me tangere today of financiers and investors. And there is that domain of incredible beauty and mystery, of purple mountain and golden desert, of warm sunlight and warm-hearted people, of canyon and cactus, of costume and craftsmanship, land of eternal snows, burning mesa, and lush jungle, archaeologist's el dorado and painter's paradise—still a frontier of adventure and romance.

Both these Mexicos have undergone study by cooperative enterprises. For five years the Columbia University Council of Research in the Social Sciences, aided by the Laura Spelman Rockefeller Memorial, has sponsored an exhaustive research into every aspect of Mexico's international relations in finance. The first of three scheduled volumes represents a thoroughness in the combing of all available archives and in the examination of hitherto unpublished material that would have been almost impossible for an unassisted individual. In consequence we have the definitive work on Mexico's external finances for the first 110 years of her national existence. It is complete, wholly objective, scholarly, buttressed by graphs, tables, and appendices galore. It is perhaps needlessly dry.

The facts collated indicate that internal disorders were an early source of default; that army expenses alone soon exceeded the total national revenue; that peculation by corrupt officials aggravated the shortages; that correspondingly onerous terms were exacted by lenders—90 per cent in one instance—and that at times over 90 per cent of customs receipts were pledged to debt service. Nevertheless, as Mr. Turlington and his associates make clear, the Mexican debt as it stands today represents no inflation brought about by past exactions, but is the residue of unpaid arrears of moneys loaned at moderate rates. Conversely, he points out that despite appearances Mexico's creditors have in the end fared well considering the low price at which Mexican securities were often acquired. It is suggestive that with the ink scarcely dry on the postscript footnote recording another revised Mexican debt settlement, payments thereon have already been perforce deferred.

For this precise scrutiny through accountants' spectacles, the collection of forty-one lectures delivered in the summer of 1930 before the Seminar in Mexico conducted annually by the Committee on Cultural Relations with Latin America furnishes a suitable corrective and complement. Genius is proverbially a bit irregular in payments of the conventional sort—but how gorgeously generous in its own way! Here the panorama of Mexico unfolds in all its glory, full-panoplied in the richness of two great cultures. Here are assembled the infinite variations made possible in a country the characteristic of which, as Ramón Beteta, the sociologist, points out, "is that no one part of it and no one person living in it seem to be like any other part or any other person." Here are found the diverse, conflicting, but always stimulating presentations by Mexican leaders of thought and action, and by specially qualified Americans, of every important aspect of Mexican life. Enthusiasm and caustic criticism are found side by side. Such authorships as those of Moisés Sáenz, Rafael Heliodoro

Valle, Diego Rivera, Carlos Mérida, Carlos Chávez, Manuel Gamio, Vicente Lombardo Toledano, Salvador Urbina, and Antonio Díaz Soto y Gama, among others, reveal that the genius of Mexico is here presented by its very exponents. Similarly the names of Mary Austin, Paul U. Kellogg, René d'Harnoncourt, Chester Lloyd Jones, Judge Florence E. Allen, Samuel Guy Inman, Frank Tannenbaum, Frederic Siedenburg, and Carleton Beals disclose the breadth and depth of this unique and valuable contribution to the existing literature on our southern neighbor. As Hubert C. Herring says of Mexico in his closing essay, "There is wealth here upon which no conquistador could lay his hands."

And that is Mexico's eternal repayment, fully amortized and with interest compounded. To understand one Mexico, it is indispensable to know and understand the other. Perhaps, after all, they are but one.

How Wars Are Made

The Martial Spirit: A Study of Our War with Spain. By Walter Millis. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.

MR. MILLIS in his account of the Spanish-American War has written a mature, intelligent, and exciting work—a rare occurrence in historical writing. He has avoided those pitfalls that beset the unwary in their search for historical truth; for he has succumbed neither to partisanship on the one side nor to "objectivity" on the other. What we have in "The Martial Spirit," as a result, is a complete history of the American people at war—in this case the war with Spain—which is so well contrived and so wittily written that it puts to shame both the efforts of professional historians and the products of those writers who merely seek to amuse without intending to inform.

The main body of "The Martial Spirit" is concerned with the tale of but four years—from the breaking out of the second insurrection in Cuba in 1895 to the ratification of the Peace of Paris by the United States Senate in 1899. What we have, then, is a recital of why the United States went to war with Spain, how we armed ourselves for the conflict, how the war was prosecuted, and what spoils fell to the victors. The roles of the leading warmakers: Hearst, Pulitzer, Roosevelt, McKinley; of the leading military and naval heroes: Shafter, Wheeler, Miles, Dewey, Sampson, Schley; of the peacemakers: Day, Reid, Lodge, Hay, Bryan—these are all set down with the nicest detail. Once more Americans whose memories can run back to Thomas Beer's "mauve decade" can relive in the pages of this book (but with what a curious change of emphasis!) the exciting days of rebellion in Cuba, the insurgent patriots García and Gómez, the "reconcentration camps" of the Spanish Butcher, the blowing up of the Maine, the hunt for Cervera's fleet, the assaults on Kettle and San Juan hills, the rotten bully beef, the winter uniforms in a tropical campaign, the inadequate transports, the dysentery and typhoid fever which took a greater toll of young manhood than all the Spanish bullets, the seizure and retention of the Philippine Islands for the purpose of Christianizing (i. e., converting to Protestantism) their benighted inhabitants, and the rest.

Perhaps I am emphasizing unduly the lighter parts of Mr. Millis's narrative. I can say, in extenuation, that so has he, for in a postscript the author declares:

> It may seem that I have stressed the satiric aspects of the war. This is true; and my defense is a belief that every war in modern times has presented the same elements, though ordinarily they are concealed beneath the immense tragedy which war normally involves. Our war with Spain merely offered an opportunity to examine them in one case where that tragedy was not present.

Because Mr. Millis is indulgent toward all the human weaknesses that his history exposes, he makes no effort to point his moral. But it is not necessary. Here for all those good people who place so much store in their Leagues of Nations, World Courts, disarmament conferences, Kellogg Peace Pacts, and Locarno treaties—in short, that whole mumbo-jumbo that one earnest clubwoman has recently called the "alternatives to war"—are the reasons why national strife will not be eliminated. As long as there are a sensational press and newspaper proprietors like Hearst and Pulitzer who in their hunt for profits and prestige will stoop to anything; as long as there are misguided patriots like Captain Mahan and Whitelaw Reid who cannot be happy unless their country is great and powerful; as long as there are ambitious politicians like Roosevelt and Lodge, noisy and stupid ones like Alger, and sly ones like McKinley, all of whom hope to continue in office or get better ones by beating the drum; as long as people can make money out of war, or accept war as an alternative to the courageous handling of their national problems, or rush to war to escape the boredom of their daily lives—so long shall we fail to attain to the millennium of our peace societies.

The war with Spain—and, for that matter, almost every war in which we have fought—had next to nothing to do with those "non-justiciable" disputes for whose settlement our peace advocates now look with such hope toward the international machinery that has appeared since Wilson went to Paris. We did not fight Spain because our national honor had been violated, our security threatened, a solemn treaty spurned, an act of irreparable injury committed. Every official grievance against the Spanish throne had been eliminated before the war declaration was made. The "reconcentration camps" had been ordered closed. Autonomy had been granted the Cubans. An armistice with the insurgents—though, heaven knows, they had no fighting force worthy of the name—had been promised. There were no American citizens (Cuban-born or not) held in any of the island jails. Arbitration on the destruction of the Maine had been proffered. (Who and what blew up the Maine neither Americans of 1898 nor those of today know!) Finally, the American Minister at Madrid had cabled to McKinley, the day before the President went to Congress with his war message, that Spain had yielded on every single cause at issue.

Yet we fought. The lesson that is implicit in Mr. Millis's book, as it must be in every honest and courageous work that is written on how wars come about, is that wars are not waged because of the existence of international ill-will or because nations menace or wrong each other—in other words, that the root causes of war are not external; rather that wars come about because each land raises regularly its own crop of nationalists, economic and financial imperialists, yellow-press sensation-mongers, and venal politicians—in other words, that the root causes of war are to be found on our very own doorstep. The advocates of peace might just as well cease agitating themselves over the implementing of the Kellogg Peace Pact, the Senate's acceptance of the World Court protocols, or the elimination of armaments. They would do better to concentrate on the internal causes of war.

Mr. Millis has done us a great service by telling the whole truth about one of the wars the United States has been party to. And because the book is so good I cannot help regretting that it is not even better. Mr. Millis's story might have laid claim to the attributes of completeness in every particular had he devoted some attention to the following: the influence of Captain Mahan's ideas of naval strategy on the shaping of the war psychology; the role that Anglophilism played in turning the thoughts of Roosevelt, Lodge, Reid, and Hay to overseas expansion; our economic stake in Cuba; the cruise of the Oregon; the attitude of the European Powers toward our relations with Spain; the part really played by Vice-Admiral von Diedrichs in Manila Bay; the financing of the war and how the war bonds helped bring back prosperity. It is to be noted, too, that the author's bibliography has several important omissions, notably mention of Leland H. Jenks's "Our Cuban Colony," B. A. Reuter's "Anglo-American Relations During the Spanish-American War," and L. B. Shippee's article on the von Diedrichs interlude published in the American Historical Review for July, 1925. I should be the last person, however, to insist that these lacunae detract from the great merit of Mr. Millis's performance.

Louis M. Hacker

Modern Palestine in Fiction

Yehuda. By Meyer Levin. Jonathan Cape and Harrison Smith. $2.50.

MR. LEVIN'S novel takes its name from a young violinist, member of a small Palestinian commune on the banks of the Kishon. By day Yehuda works in the fields and at night he practices long hours, forcing his work-dulled fingers to be nimble on the strings. But progress is slow; he begins to think of leaving the commune for America where he can support himself and perfect his art. He struggles between desire for perfect musicianship and loyalty to his group. However, the problem is resolved for him by the visit to the commune of a famous violinist. From the genius's playing, Yehuda learns that at least in intention and in understanding he himself is not inferior; from the genius himself, he understands how good the commune is and how necessary for him.

This story in itself is scarcely original. But its place in the novel is preeminent not so much because of its intrinsic interest as because of its functional usefulness, and it is unfortunate that Mr. Levin exaggerated its importance by his title. Properly, the novel is about the commune itself, and the story of Yehuda only serves to make explicit the commune's ideals. We see the group first in the routine of its daily life; then when the strain of harvest and the bickerings of personalities drive it into a crisis of partisanship; and finally when, harvest over and the emotional atmosphere cleared by the drama of an Arab attack, it coheres once more into unity.

Russia and Palestine are perhaps the only two nations which offer the novelist the opportunity to deal with the group and with certain important emotions which depend on the individual's sense of the group. In the ideologies of these two polities there is the conception of society and the individual in vital relationship to each other. From this conception there arises for the Russian and Palestinian writers the possibility of the social emotions—those which refer to political honor, loyalty, glory—which have been classically important in life and literature but which in the modern state, especially in America, are dead or moribund. And not only does this conception allow the renewal of these important social emotions, but it seems to give added importance to the private emotions, which, though it is not always apparent, are of course dependent on the group for their value.

Mr. Levin has made good use of the opportunity which his material afforded him. He carefully proportions his emphases so that the group remains whole, and yet no flavor of individuality is lost. His commune is not saintly because of its idealism and devotion; its members are quarrelsome, selfish, obstinate, and silly, and Mr. Levin's ironic realism lets us see all this. But the ironic realism only makes the more credible the dignity and vitality which the group possesses and which it gives its members.

Lionel Trilling

Thin Emotion

Naked Heel. By Leonora Speyer. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

LEONORA SPEYER has fair taste, an accurate sense of rhythm, a sense of the proper subject matter for poetry, but her emotion is thin, and she depends entirely upon emotion, never upon intellect. Again and again in her new book of verse she uses a conceit but has not the intellectual nicety of selection or the intensity to make it important. Let us imagine for the moment how Donne might have treated this:

THE LADDER

I had a sudden vision in the night,
I did not sleep, I dared not say I dreamed,
Beside my bed a curious ladder gleamed
And lifted upward toward the sky's dim height;
And every rung shone luminous and white
And every rung a woman's body seemed
Outstretched, and down the sides her long hair streamed:
And you, you climbed that ladder of delight.
You climbed sure-footed, naked rung by rung,
Clasped them and trod them, called them by their name,
And my name too, I heard you speak at last;
You stood upon my breast the while and flung
A hand up to the next—and then, oh shame,
I kissed the foot that bruised me as it passed.

This type of verse is purely a narrative of emotion; it is fancy without impact of feeling or intellect. Its images are strung out, played with, presented with detail which leaves one quite cold. Such verse has no heights, no depths. Mrs. Speyer is at her best in telling stories, as in The Ballad of Old Doc Higgins, where the material itself is fanciful and humorous. Nor is her sonnet sequence concerning the well-bred love of a man and a woman anything but commendable within its limits. But when this poet begins searching for subjects to be made into poetry, subjects which have actually no significance to her emotionally, she is always tedious. Exposed Mummy, Trade Rats, and this from Fido, are examples:

She made a pet of Grief,
Trained it and taught it many a trick:
It begged and fetched and carried,
Hid, waiting to be found,
Or played at being dead—
Lying there, limp upon the ground.
Ran by her side,
Slept warm within her bed,
And on her heart immoderately was fed.

The Future of Religion

World Revolution and Religion. By Paul Hutchinson. The Abingdon Press. $2.

EVEN the reader who isn't—or thinks he isn't—interested in religion will find this short book immensely worth while. Mr. Hutchinson belongs to the company of the friend to whom he dedicates the book—a man "not afraid of a fact"—and he packs the book with relevant and well-stated facts on the world revolution already upon us, in its political, social, and racial aspects.

These facts he relates to the organized religions of the world, all of which he finds to be breaking before their impact. Organized Christianity, which is his chief concern, lacks the ethical dynamic, despite its occasional prophets, to deal with a profit civilization and the rising tide of revolt among exploited races, nations, and classes. It is too thoroughly the religion of the comfortable—especially the comfortable white man. Christian missions have not bridged and probably cannot bridge the gap. At best they seem to Chinese and African to stand for patronage or welfare work.

Then there is the religious revolution itself—a revolution arising largely from the new philosophy and science, the new sense of man's littleness in an indifferent cosmos. After five convincingly pessimistic chapters of this, the author has a brief chapter—suggestive rather than conclusive—in which he foresees a future for religion "inspired by utter devotion to man's welfare," a "resurrection of religion outside the church we know." This chapter seems to me least satisfactory. Mr. Hutchinson owes it to himself to enlarge it. For the casual and even for the careful reader, if not for himself, he fails to distinguish adequately the various meanings and uses of religion and its relation to ethics.

In the psychological sense, communism, for all its atheism, is proof enough that religion, the religious attitude for evil as well as good, for dogmatic intolerance as well as splendid devotion, is not easily to perish from the earth. But, historically, organized religion has had to do with metaphysics—the nature of the universe and the destiny of man—that is, with God. Here we face not merely ethical or social problems, but philosophical ones. Organized religion in this sense may fall before Einstein and Planck, relativity and the quantum theory (as Mr. Hutchinson seems to suggest), even if it was less powerless before the revolt of the oppressed. Passion for mankind will not of itself restore faith in some sort of God. Nor, on the other hand, will faith in some sort of God, based on what Mr. Hutchinson calls "mystical experience" or the "permanent values" of goodness and beauty, easily or automatically meet the ethical problem of the nature of the ultimate reality in relation to man. What does God, if there is any sort of God, care for man's failure to build the truly great society in an inhospitable universe? One wishes that Mr. Hutchinson's candor, insight, and power as a thinker were addressed more fully to these problems. But he has given us one of the most arresting books of recent years.

NORMAN THOMAS

Books in Brief

The Englishman. By W. Macneile Dixon. Longmans, Green and Company. $2.40.

There are evidently subtle changes going on in the Englishman. He is, for example, inclosing his bus tops against wind and weather, and has taken to writing books of national self-analysis. These symptoms are almost as notable in England as would be the storming of parliament houses or toppling thrones among its less stolid neighbors. Any light which an Englishman can throw on his own alteration is welcome. Mr. Dixon's illumination is partly of an indirect sort, occasionally annoying, but by no means negligible. In four chapters he treats of the English Character, Genius, People, and Soul with such hyperbole of patriotism as indicates a certain fundamental lack of confidence. He constantly throws off such statements as "it will not be denied" that the English have been the most successful of modern nations and have written the best poetry; that it is too late "to learn any lessons of consequence from others"; that England won the late war precisely because she was not prepared for it; and so on. In the final two chapters he adds further attempts at interpretation by means of the English Bible and Shakespeare the Englishman. In spite of, perhaps because of, the author's extreme insularity of view, he manages to tell us a good deal of the English "character," "genius," and "soul," though these are less divisible than his water-tight compartments would have them. In fact, this small volume of pocket size and scarce two hundred pages, with not a few obvious faults, gives us a better insight into many aspects of England than other far more pretentious ones. It is worth reading, as much for its unconscious as for its conscious revelations.

What's Wrong with Taxation? By Jackson H. Ralston. San Diego: Ingram Institute. $1.

Here is advocacy of the single tax by a man known chiefly for works on international law. Ralston sees even the most complex social and economic structures as fruits of the earth, and in discussing elaborate theories of taxation he employs refreshing imagery of soil and rain and sun. From the fundamental loam arise twin plants, the individual and the community, dynamically blended in the author's mind by the simple ideal of "cooperation . . . the unhampered activities of man working for the common good." He contends that the idea, not in doctrinaire form but as common sense applied to the practical work of government, is gaining ground all over the world, even while our minds are preoccupied with the militaristic-mathematical melodramas of communism and fascism.

The Jealous Ghost. By L. A. G. Strong. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

The second novel by the author of "Dewer Rides" is a more or less plotless description of the environment a forty-year-old American, John Carmichael Stewart, discovers upon his return to his ancestral home in the beautiful Highlands. We must take the author's word for it when we learn at the end that John, a seemingly dull and rather unresponsive person, has been overwhelmed by the local beauty of life and has found his true happiness by merging himself, very mysteriously, with nature. As a human being John does not come to life in a tremendous abundance of petty, pointless incident. But the spirit is sweet and idyllic and the style is easily a match. The author excels in his descriptions of natural settings, and his portrayal of minor characters is always subtle and sympathetic. As a novel, however, "The Jealous Ghost" lacks motive force; it has none of the vitality of "Dewer Rides"; it remains unconvincing, despite its virtues of imagination and delicacy, because in the objective presentation of John's new environment there are inadequate clues to the totally subjective conclusions formulated by this vague, half-dull, half-romantic, papier mache American.

Cattle Car Express. By Emil Lengyel. Ralph Beaver Strassburger Foundation. $2.50.

Mr. Lengyel has given an excellent picture of the war as it appeared to those who saw it from behind the barbed-wire inclosures of the Russian prison camps, and no quarrel with his photographic method can lessen the value of the pictures themselves. A group of Hungarian soldiers, from infantry privates to field officers, who were captured in the early months of the conflict had little concern thereafter with the more spectacular aspects of war, and war became then a struggle against filth, lice, starvation, and the more primitive aspects of human nature. Under Mr. Lengyel's pen this material appears extraordinarily vivid and entertaining, and his book will be a welcome addition to any extensive war library.

Early Poems. By Humbert Wolfe. Alfred Knopf. $2.50.

These early poems of Humbert Wolfe's are proof of his tendency to imitate. He was here, in the very beginning, trying himself out in the technical patterns and subject matter of much older poets. Mr. Wolfe's poetry has, as a whole, been much overrated; he has always been imitative, never very original. His popularity is doubtless due to this very fact: his

Labor Fights For Bread

Coal miners strike by thousands, march on cities demanding food; hosiery workers strike against pay cuts, send 3,000 to jail via picket lines; breadlines, soup kitchens, flop-houses close, yet employment sags and wage cuts grow more numerous. verses sound vaguely familiar, his imagery, his manner, his subjects are all traditional. In these early poems Mr. Wolfe is not yet in complete command of the facility which was soon to be his, but it is growing upon him. These poems are not, he states, in the fashion of their day; nor are they, we might add, in the fashion of this day. They are actually much more in the fashion of the aesthetes of the nineties.

Baedae Opera Historica. Translated by J. E. King. Two volumes. St. Augustine: Selected Letters. Translated by James Houston Baxter. Demosthenes: Olynthiacs, Philippics, Minor Public Speeches, Speech Against Leptines. Translated by J. H. Vince. Lysias. Translated by W. R. M. Lamb. Philo. Volume III. Translated by F. H. Colson and G. H. Whitaker. Saint Basil: The Letters. Volume III. Translated by Roy J. Deferrari. Loeb Classical Library. G. P. Putnam's Sons. Each $2.50.

Of these seven new volumes in the Loeb Classical Library, the first two have the special interest of containing a translation of Bede's "Ecclesiastical History" based on the sixteenth-century version of Thomas Stapleton, which is highly readable. The same holds true for Mr. Baxter's selection—made with the man rather than the theologian in view—from Augustine's letters, and for Mr. Lamb's "Lysias," whom we can appreciate here, particularly in the narrative prefaces to his legal orations, as one of the most valuable commentators we have upon Athenian life in the famous fifth century.

Molière. By John Palmer. Brewer and Warren. $5.

This is a sober convincing biography, but it sacrifices sprightliness to veracity. It is not sufficiently selective, it is long drawn out, and in its analysis of Molière's plays too earnestly conscientious. But what a picture one gets of this follower of Lucretius, so human, so sage, so vulnerable, this man who fought so passionately for the life and liberty of the comic art, this son of an upholsterer, who for the love of his mistress took to acting, and was tortured by a wayward wife into becoming the greatest author of France!

A Newman Anthology. Arranged by Erich Przywara, S. J. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.

This volume first appeared in Germany. Its title is misleading, for it is not a Newman anthology in the sense of giving a complete view of Newman's work, as Augustus Ralli's "Guide" usefully does of Carlyle's. It is merely a systematization of Newman's pietistic passages, and it does not, as the jacket announcement declares, permit the study of "Newman's whole range of teaching." Indeed, no more misleading means of studying Newman could be imagined.

German Lyric Poetry. By Norman Macleod. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $1.25.

This thirteenth volume of the Hogarth Lectures, a series designed to help both students and teachers of literature, is an interesting and well-documented survey of the development of the German lyric. That this development is very different from that of the English lyric, discontinuous rather than continuous, is Mr. Macleod's thesis. After the great minnesingers of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries there was a collapse in German poetry. The seventeenth century attempted a revival, and the great revival of poetry under Goethe coincided with a renewed interest in folk-song. The richest sources of German lyricism lie, in other words, almost altogether in a folk background. There is no definite progression here in which one poet directly influences another poet who follows him and in turn influences still another, but rather a sporadic flowering of the deeply rooted poetic feelings of the folk.

Films

Hollywood "Entertains"

THE past fortnight having been singularly deficient in pictures of interest, my comments need go no farther than listing the films I have seen. These come under two heads: (1) stale junk rehashed without an atom of distinction, and (2) stale junk rehashed with just enough distinction to make it appear different. To the first category belong "White Shoulders" (Mayfair), "The Lady Who Dared" (Strand), "Lover Come Back" (Globe), "She-Wolf" (Rialto); to the second, "The Maltese Falcon" (Winter Garden) and "A Free Soul" (Astor). The only redeeming features about the last two films are that the "Maltese Falcon" treats its mystery-crime plot with an intelligence somewhat superior to that usually encountered in this type of film, and "A Free Soul" displays highly competent if artificial acting that lends its lurid story a certain superficial brilliance.

A picture that stands out against these second- and third-rate fabrications from Hollywood is "The Five-Year Plan," the Russian film at the Central. So momentous and so fascinating is the material of this extended news-reel that one refuses to cavil at the failure of the producers to convey as clearly as they could the actual mechanism of the Five-Year Plan. The film, it must be admitted, never shows us the dynamic force that relates the component parts of the plan to one another and has welded the industrial efforts of Soviet Russia into a drive of epic grandeur. But even with this important defect the film remains one of the most interesting on Broadway.

The main attractions on the list of feature films being what they are, this may be as good an occasion as any to dilate on the other, less prominent items of the movie programs. Here is a kind of picture that positively cries to heaven for some swift retribution. I refer to the one- and two-reel comedies. What sort of people make these films, and for what sort of audience are they intended? Most of them are so incredibly imbecile that it is an agony to have to sit through them. During the past season the Cameo Theatre, the same that distinguished itself by a series of Soviet and travel pictures, was perhaps the worst offender. The Pathé and Columbia comedies with which it embellished its programs were the limit of ineptitude and incompetence. They made few if any people laugh. They made most gnash their teeth and cry for murder.

Unfortunately this sadistic practice of subjecting innocent people to the torture of seeing and hearing these efforts in "entertainment" is not confined to one theater. There have been few programs during the fortnight under review that did not contain at least one comic short. At the Rialto the cannibal within us was roused by the tremulous bulk of Mr. Billy House, who in "The Headache" kept winking at us as he does on the vaudeville stage. At the Strand a company of young people were busy smashing "effects and furniture" for twenty-five minutes in a criminal outburst called "Moving In." One could go on enumerating these outrages against all that goes under the name of art and entertainment. But that would be wasting time. The important thing is that the outrages should stop. The public should indicate to the exhibitors that even in the matter of short subjects it demands some consideration. As a rule it has no choice in submitting to the minor items of a program, for it is the feature picture that brings it into the theater. All the more reason why it should be treated with at least the decency that is its due.

IF YOU had no job
. . . what would you do?

If you will multiply yourself in that predicament by 6,000,000 you will have a picture of unemployment in the United States today.

What are we going to do about it?

FIRST—Get the FACTS!

Here is the first book—the only one book—which presents the facts, completely, fearlessly. Stuart Chase says in the New York Herald Tribune that it "maps the Dark Continent of joblessness more thoroughly, I venture to state, than has ever been done before...We find exact description of all the various classes of the unemployed; the extent, current and historical, of unemployment in all major nations, a complete glossary of all remedies proposed or in operation—remedies short of the lunatic fringe.

Wall Street goes to Russia!

The vivid and valuable new narrative of an American business man's amusing adventures in Soviet Russia.

THE RED FOG LIFTS

By ALBERT MULDAVIN

This delightfully informal account, by a man who does not take himself too seriously, of the conditions in present-day Russia represents the lively, honest, and unbiased impressions of a business visitor who, during the course of his stay, and because of his ability to speak the language, took occasion to identify himself with Russian life in all its phases. The result is a volume as entertaining as it is valuable for the understanding it conveys of the Five Year Plan, food, distribution, cooperative farming and other subjects vitally involved in Russia's problems and prospects, political, economic and social. This is a human guide to Soviet Russia. There is no other book on Russia just like it. $2.00

Mexico Giggles

By ALBERT HARRIS

Mexico City, May 16

MEXICO is giggling. If it dared it would guffaw, but hardihood for doing so openly does not exist, yet. Guffawing overtly at anything the government does isn't salutary just now, especially after what happened recently to Luis Cabrera. So the Mexicans, who, given occasion, are a mocking and derisive folk, are outwardly limiting their risibilities to giggling. They are giggling at the government and the Great Cabrera Plot. For it does seem that the Great Cabrera Plot, like the deceased Ahkoon of Swat, "is not." Apparently it never was. But to the story, so that we may see why the Mexicans giggle.

Luis Cabrera is a clever man. Also he has humor. He is one of the outstanding intellectual figures born of the revolution, with José Vasconcelos, Manuel Gamio, and one or two others. But Cabrera has a better, more tightly screwed-on head than any of them. His brains run to practice more than to philosophical theorizing. He was at the forefront of the revolution from the start. In 1910 he was side by side with Madero, when it took real nerve to be a revolutionist and defy Díaz. Later with Carranza, as his right-hand man and finance minister, he supplied 48 per cent of the brains that ran the Constitutionalist cause from 1913 to 1920. Carranza himself contributed 48 per cent, and the remainder of the men who were in the government with him and Cabrera the other 4 per cent.

When Obregón, Calles, and de la Huerta, with the Sonoran hosts, hurled themselves at the throat of the Carranza Government in 1920, Cabrera fled from Mexico City with his chief. He fought in the ranks with a rifle during the week that the rebels besieged the Carrancistas in their miles of stalled trains between the capital and Vera Cruz. He was of the handful that bore Carranza company in his flight into the mountains. He was with him when Carranza was murdered in his sleep by an amigo of Obregón. That adventure dated his permanent retirement from Mexican politics and official life. Cabrera is a brilliant lawyer, either in counsel or in plea. Since 1920 he has amassed a comfortable fortune from his practice. So precisely scrupulous and cautious has he been in avoidance of any activities of political color that during the whole of the last presidential campaign he absented himself in Europe. He frankly said that he did not purpose to jeopardize his life, his liberty, or his personal fortunes by affording any of his political enemies—including all the old dominant Calles crowd, who saw to it that Ortiz Rubio was well and duly "elected" over the popular candidate Vasconcelos, now wisely self-exiled from Mexico—an opportunity to dig pits into which he might be precipitated. The man is known and honored in Mexico for his honesty, ability, and moral and physical bravery, as well as for his uncompromising truth-telling in his written or spoken public statements. If there are spades to be discussed he calls them spades, not sugar-tongs or something else.

In November last the twentieth anniversary of the beginning of the revolution was celebrated. To commemorate the anniversary El Excelsior, the government-owned official newspaper organ of Mexico City, got out a special edition. By some slip of the cogs Cabrera, although conspicuously out of official countenance and favor, was asked to contribute. His offering was printed under the title The Balance Sheet of the Revolution (reprinted in The Nation of December 31, 1930). Cabrera gave as his verdict that the revolution, in respect to profitable accomplishment and compliance with its principles and promises, was depressingly in the red. He proved it. The article raised a rumpus in governmental and revolutionary circles and cost El Excelsior's editor-in-chief his job, as a penalty for having incautiously admitted such opinions into the official organ.

Worse was to come. Again the cogs slipped. Cabrera later was invited to participate in a course of lectures on revolutionary topics under government auspices in the National Library, as part of the anniversary celebration. He accepted. To the mingled delight and consternation of his auditors he expanded his "Balance Sheet of the Revolution" into a two-hour talk. The speech set forth—with proof—that so far the revolution, barring a few exceptions to which he painstakingly gave ample credit, was nearly a total loss. He summed up by iterating and reiterating—with proof—that the Mexicans lacked sufficient civic valor, patriotism, and honesty to deserve or to have or to create any sort of government save the brands that always have prevailed there. He bore down heavily in condemnation of prevailing judicial corruption, army pretorianism, rascality and ineptness in development of the agrarian program, and, especially, of the fact that the revolution had failed utterly to live up to the two fundamental planks of its platform—effective suffrage and no reelection.

In his address Cabrera broadcasted nothing new, of course, nor anything which is not notorious and wholly apparent. El Universal, the only independent daily newspaper in the country, decided to print the address in full, as a matter of news. It published instalments on a Saturday and a Sunday. On Sunday President Ortiz Rubio at army maneuvers passionately did what he could, in an address to the troops, to salve the weals upon the sensitive hides of the generals raised by Cabrera's castigation of militarism as one of the country's chief ills. He called Cabrera names. It was rather an undignified performance.

On Monday El Universal announced that circumstances compelled it to cease printing the address. Reasons were not stated. It was unnecessary. Goaded to desperation, its editors later charged in print that army officers and other persons were bulldozing its advertisers and, using the President's name, threatening them with official reprisals unless they ceased to patronize El Universal. The paper openly challenged the President to deny this and to repudiate the men who were said to be thus employing his name; but Ortiz Rubio never did it. In some fashion El Universal made its peace with the National Palace and got its advertising back, after a loss in revenue which almost forced it into bankruptcy. Since this the paper has been tame. It has learned its lesson.

Three months elapsed. On the afternoon of May 2—a Saturday—Cabrera was finishing a game of billiards. A gentleman with a soiled collar and a bright badge, accompanied by several other gentlemen similarly adorned, tapped him on the shoulder. They took him away. In Mexico this sort of pleasantry is usually perpetrated on Saturday, which is an official half-holiday. As the courts are closed, one who is then taken captive, even under legal forms—which Cabrera was not—is thus hampered in providing bail, and may be held for three days incomunicado before being arraigned in court. Cabrera's friends scattered in a hunt for judges before whom to sue out what in the United States would be writs of habeas corpus. They succeeded in obtaining several writs, directed to every official, from the President down, who they thought might be the authority responsible for ordering Cabrera's arrest. The writs were served. No one paid the slightest attention to them. Through Saturday night and Sunday night Cabrera's captors, who were of the secret police, shuffled him around from police station to police station and barracks to barracks, to foil his friends who were searching for the place of his detention. On Monday they loaded him into an airplane and dumped him across the border into Guatemala, thus distinguishing him by making him the pioneer deportee from his native country by air route.

Now we come to the Great Cabrera Plot, and the giggles. The man once safely out of the country, the chief of police of the Federal District called in the reporters and with suitable impressiveness and dramatic recountal revealed the Plot. This wretch Cabrera, according to the chief, had conspired to start a rebellion on May 5, one of the principal national holidays. Señores, upon my word of honor a terrible Plot. Indeed, a very bloody Plot. For, look you, did it not comprehend the assassinations of three of the most highly placed personages in the realm—the President, former President Calles, and Minister of War Amaro? Carramba, que complot! Verdad, Señores? Proof? Plenty of it. To wit: five or six actual prisoners. Also a confession. One of the prisoners had admitted the conspiracy. Cabrera? Ah, yes. Upon the word of this prisoner Cabrera was in it. True, the man acknowledged that he had never set eyes upon Cabrera, nor, so far as he knew, had any of the other prisoners. But of a certainty he had been told by someone—by whom he could not remember—that in reality Cabrera was the intellectual author of the Plot. Anything else? Assuredly, Señores. For had not this scoundrel Cabrera himself admitted the Plot and pleaded that as an act of grace he be permitted to leave the country instead of being placed on trial to answer for his foul conduct? Which boon the government had mercifully granted, in remembrance of Cabrera's past services to the revolution. Very kind!

Somehow the thing smelled fishy. In the first place, all of the five prisoners were miserables, very obscure and manifestly undernourished individuals, including two pseudo-generals of whom no one had ever heard before. They had no money, they had no guns, they had no followers, they had no jobs. Aside from the alleged statement of one of them, who had never seen Cabrera, that he was the intellectual author of the Plot, the government produced no evidence of Cabrera's complicity. The aroma of fish became worse when in an outburst of complacent official auto-backslapping it was explained that the Plot had been unearthed by a member of the secret police who had wormed his way into the confidence of the conspirators. It was all very old, clumsy, raw stuff. Public opinion was not tardy in veering to the belief that the Plot had been bred artificially to serve as a pretext for throwing Cabrera out of the country. Then the giggling began.

Now for repercussions. There is a strong and decent public sentiment in Mexico. Cowed and largely inarticulate, it exists, nevertheless. All of it, especially among lawyers of standing, is behind Cabrera. Before the government told what had been done to Cabrera and why, a demand was made in the National Juridical Congress, then in session, for the appointment of a committee to have audience of the President and protest against Cabrera's arrest. That created an uproar, intensified by the storming into the congress of a throng of law students who stridently demanded justice for Cabrera. The loyal presiding officer of the congress, Attorney José Lopez Lira, didn't propose to have anything like that going on if he could help it, so he adroitly met the situation by adjourning the congress.

Then the Supreme Court began to act up. Some of the justices had no stomach for the manner in which the writs directing Cabrera to be brought into court had been flouted by his captors. One of the justices put teeth into his protest by immediately resigning, after denouncing the lawlessness of everyone who had taken a hand in the shanghaiing of Cabrera. This caused a huge sensation. For it was a thing unheard of for anyone to throw up a fat-salaried job as a matter of conscience. The government has been trying to stave off other resignations from the court.

The resignation of the justice who quit—for his honor let his name be blazoned: Alberto Vasquez del Mercado—was immediately accepted by the federal congress, to the accompaniment of a vast spluttering of rhetorical pyrotechnics. At the same time swift reward was bestowed upon the government-championing president of the National Juridical Congress, who was hoisted to the Supreme Court bench temporarily in place of another justice on leave of absence. All of which has added its quota to the volume of Mexico's giggles.
